'Don't pre-empt me unworthily of a philosopher. My source of information was very simple and very good. He has been negotiating a loan from the Rabbis at Carthage. They were either frightened, or loyal, or both, and hung back. He knew—as all wise governors know when they allow themselves time—that it is no use to bully a Jew, and applied to me. I never lend money—it is unphilosophical—but I introduced him to old Miriam, who dare do business with the devil himself, and by that move, whether he has the money or not, I cannot tell, but this I can tell, that we have his secret—and so have you now, and if you want more information, the old woman, who enjoys an intrigue as much as she does Falerman, will get it for you.'

'Well, you are a true friend, after all.'

'Of course I am. Now, is not this method of getting at the truth much easier and pleasanter than setting a couple of dirty negroes to pinch and pull me, and so making it a point of honour with me to tell you nothing but lies? Here comes Ganymede with the wine, just in time to calm your nerves, and fill you with the spirit of divination. To the goddess of good counsels, my lord. What wine this is!'

'True Syrian—fire and honey, fourteen years old next vintage, my Raphael. Out, Hypocorisma! See that he is not listening. The impudent rascal! I was humbugged into giving two thousand gold pieces for him two years ago, he was so pretty—they said he was only just rising thirteen—and he has been the plague of my life ever since, and is beginning to want the barber already. Now, what is the count dreaming of?’

‘What, is it not enough to be Count of Africa?’

‘I suppose he sets off against that his services during the last three years.’

‘Well, he saved Africa.’

‘And thereby Egypt also. And you too, as well as the emperor, may be considered as owing him somewhat.’

‘My good friend, my debts are far too numerous for me to think of paying any of them. But what wages does he want?’

‘The purple.’

Orestes started, and then fell into thought. Raphael sat watching him a while.

‘Now, most noble lord, may I depart? I have said all I have to say, and unless I get home to luncheon at once, I shall hardly have time to find old Miriam for you, and get through our little affair with her before sunset.’

‘Stay. What force has he?’

‘Forty thousand already, they say. And those Donatist ruffians are with him to a man, if he can but scrape together wherewith to change their bludgeons into good steel.’

‘Well, go. So. A hundred thousand might do it,’ said he, meditating, as Raphael bowed himself out. ‘He won’t get them. I don’t know, though, the man has the head of a Julius. Well—that fool Attalus talked of joining Egypt to the Western Empire. . . Not such a bad thought either. Anything is better than being governed by an idiot child and three ranting nuns. I expect to be excommunicated every day for some offence against Pileheria’s prudery. . . Heracleian emperor at Rome. . . And I lord and master on this side the sea the Donatists pitted again furly against the orthodox, to cut each other’s throats in peace. . . no more of Cyril’s spying and tale-bearing to Constantinople. . . Not such a bad dish of fare. . . But then—it would take so much trouble!’

With which words, Orestes went into his third warm bath for that day.

CHAPTER III

THE GOths

FOR two days the young monk held on, paddling and floating rapidly down the Nile-stream, leaving city after city to right and left with longing eyes, and looking back to one villa after another, till the reaches of the banks hid them from his sight, with many a yearning to know what sort of places those gay buildings and gardens would look like on a nearer view, and what sort of life the thousands led who crowded the busy quays, and walked and drove, in an endless stream, along the great highroads which ran along either bank. He carefully avoided every boat that passed him, from the gilded barge of the wealthy landlord or merchant, to the tiny raft buoyed up with empty jars, which was floating down to be sold at some market in the Delta. Here and there he met and hailed a crew of monks, drawing their nets in a quiet bay, or passing along the great watery highway from monastery to monastery; but all the news he received from them was, that the canal of Alexandria was still several days’ journey below him. It seemed endless, that monotonous vista of the two high clay banks, with their sluices and water-wheels, their knots of palms and date trees, endless seemed that wearisome succession of bars of sand and banks of mud, every one like the one before it, every one dotted with the same line of logs and stones strewn along the water’s edge, which turned out as he approached them to be basking crocodiles and sleeping pelicans. His eye, wearied with the continual confinement and want of distance, longed for the boundless expanse of the desert, for the jagged outlines of those far-off hills, which he had watched from boyhood rising mysteriously at morn out of the eastern sky, and melting mysteriously into it again at even, beyond which dwelt a whole world of wonders, elephants and dragons, satyrs and anthropophagi,—ay, and the phoenix itself. Tired and melancholy, his mind returned inward to prey on itself, and the last words of Arsenius rose again and again to his thoughts. ‘Was his call of the spirit or of the flesh?’ How should he test that problem? He wished to see the world that might be carnal. True, but, he wished to convert the world. . . was not that spiritual? Was he not going on a noble errand? . . . thirsting for toil, for saintship, for martyrdom itself, if it would but come and cut the Gordian knot of all temptations, and save him for he dimly felt that it would save him—a whole sea of trouble in getting safe and triumphant out of that world into which he had not yet entered—and his heart shrank back from the untrodden homeless wilderness before him. But no! the die was cast, and he must down and onward, whether in obedience to the spirit or the flesh. Oh, for one hour of the quiet of that dear Laura and the old familiar faces!

At last, a sudden turn of the bank brought him in sight of a gaudily-painted barge, on board of which armed men, in unclean and foreign dresses, were chasing with barbaric shouts some large object in the water. In the bows stood a man of gigantic stature, brandishing a harpoon in his right hand, and in his left holding the line of a second, the head of which was fixed in the huge purple sides of a hippopotamus, who foamed and wallowed a few yards down the stream. An old grizzled warrior at the stern, with a rudder in either hand, kept the boat’s head continually towards the monster, in spite of its sudden and frantic wheelings; and when it dashed madly across the stream, some twenty oars flashed through the water in pursuit. All was activity and excitement, and it was no wonder if Philammon's curiosity had tempted him to drift down almost abreast of the barge ere he descended, peeping from under a decorated awning in the afterpart, some dozen pairs of languishing black eyes, turned alternately to the game and to himself. The serpents—chattering and smiling, with pretty little shrieks and shaking of glossy curls and gold necklaces, and fluttering of muslin dresses, within a dozen yards of him! Blushing scarlet, he knew not why, he seized his paddle, and tried to back out of the snare. But somehow, his very efforts to escape those sparkling eyes devoted his attention from everything else. The hippopotamus had caught sight of him, and furious with pain, rushed straight at the unoffending canoe, the harpoon line became entangled round his body, and in a moment he and his frail bark were overturned, and the monster, with his huge white tusks gashing wide, close on him as he struggled in the stream.

Jackily Philammon, contrary to the wont of monks, was a bather, and swam like a water-fowl. Fear he had never known. Death from childhood had been to him, as to the other inmates of the Lania, a contemplation too perpetual to have any paralyzing terror in it, even then, when life seemed just about to open on him anew. But the monk was a man, and a young one, and had no intention of dying tamely or unavenged. In an instant he had freed himself from the line, drawn the short knife which was his only weapon, and diving suddenly, avoided the monster's rush, and attacked him from behind with stabs, which, though not deep, still dyed the waters with gore at every stroke. The barbarians shouted with delight. The hippopotamus turned furiously against his new assailant, crushing, alas! the empty canoe to fragments with a single snap of his enormous jaws, but the turn was fatal to him, the barge was closs upon him, and as he presented his broad side to the blow, the snevy arm of the giant drove a harpoon through his heart, and with one convulsive shudder the huge blue mass turned over on its side and floated dead.

Poor Philammon! He alone was silent, and the yells of triumph, sorrowfully he swam round and round his little paper wreck. . . it would not have floated a mouse. Wistfully he eyed the distant banks, half minded to strike out for them and escape, . . . and thought of the crocodiles, . . . and paddled round again, . . . and thought of the basilisk eyes, . . . he might escape the crocodiles, but who could escape women? . . . and he struck out valiantly for shore. . . when he was brought to a sudden stop by finding the stern of the barge close on him, a noose thrown over him by some friendly barbarian, and himself hauled on board, amid the laughter, praise, astonishment, and grumbling of the good-natured crew, who had expected him, as a matter of course, to avail himself at once of their help, and could not conceive the cause of his reluctance.

Philammon gazed with wonder on his strange hosts, their pale complexions, globular heads and faces, high cheek-bones, tall and sturdy figures, their red beards, and yellow hair knotted fantastically above the head, their awkward dresses, half Roman or Egyptian, and half of foreign fur, soiled and stained in many a storm and fight, but tastelessly bedizened with classic jewels, brooches, and Roman coins, strung like necklaces. Only the steersman, who had come forward to wonder at the hippopotamus, and to help in dragging the unwieldy binto on board, seemed to keep genuine and unornamented the costume of his race, the white linen leggings, strapped with thongs of deerskin, the quilted leather cuirass, the bear'-fur cloak, the only ornaments of which were the fangs and claws of the beast itself, and a fringe of grizzled tufts, which looked but too like human hair. The language which they spoke was utterly unintelligible to Philammon, though it need not be so to us.

'A well grown lad and a brave one, Wulf the son of Ovida,' said the giant to the old hero of the bearskin cloak, 'and understands wearing skins, in this furnace mouth of a climate, rather better than you do.'

'I keep to the dress of my forefathers, Analar, the Analar. What did to sack Rome in, may do to find Asgard in.'

The giant, who was decked out with helmet, cuirass, and senatorial boots, in a sort of mongrel mixture of the Roman military and civil dress, his neck wreathed with a dozen gold chains, and every finger sparkling with jewels, turned away with an impatient snort.

'Asgard!—Asgard! If you are in such a hurry to get to Asgard up this ditch in the sand, you had better ask the fellow how far it is thither.'

Wulf took him quietly at his word, and addressed a question to the young monk, which he could only answer by a shake of the head.

'Ask him in Greek, man.'

'Greek is a slave's tongue. Make a slave talk to him in it, not me.'

'Here—some of you girls! Pelagia! you understand this fellow's talk. Ask him how far it is to Asgard.'

'You must ask me more civilly, my rough hero,' replied a soft voice from underneath the awning. 'Beauty must be sued, and not commanded.'

'Come, then, my olive-tree, my gazelle, my lotus-flower, my—what was the last nonsense you taught me?—and ask this wild man of the sands how far it is from these accursed endless rabbit-burrows to Asgard.'

The awning was raised, and lying luxuriously on a soft mattress, fanned with peacock's feathers, and glittering with rubies and topazes, appeared such a vision as Philammon had never seen before.

A woman of some two-and-twenty summers, formed in the most voluptuous mould of Grecian beauty, whose complexion showed every violet veer through its veil of luscious brown. Her little bare feet, as they dimpled the cushions, were more perfect than Aphrodite's, softer than a swan's bosom. Every swell of her bust and arms showed through the thin gauze robe, while her lower limbs were wrapped in a shawl of orange silk, embroidered with wreaths of shells and roses. Her dark hair lay carefully spread out upon the pillow, in a thousand ringlets entwined with gold and jewels, her languishing eyes blazed like diamonds from a cavern, under eyelids darkened and deepened with black antimony, her lips pouted of themselves, by habit or by nature, into a perpetual kiss, slowly she raised one little lazy hand, slowly the ripe lips opened; and in most pure and melodious Attic, she layed her huge lover's question to the monk, and repeated it before the boy could shake off the spell, and answer.

'Asgard? What is Asgard?'

The beauty looked at the giant for further instructions.

'The City of the immortal Gods,' interposed the old warrior, hastily and sternly, to the lady.

'The city of God is in heaven,' said Philammon to the interpreter, turning his head away from those gleaming, luscious, searching glances.

His answer was received with a genial laugh by all except the leader, who shrugged his shoulders.

'It may as well be up in the skies as up the Nile. We shall be just as likely, I believe, to reach it by flying, as by rowing up this big ditch. Ask him where the river comes from,' Pelagia.

Pelagia obeyed . . . and thereon followed a confusion worse confounded, composed of all the impossible wonders of that mythic fairyland with which Philammon had gorged himself from boyhood in his walks with the old monks, and of the equally trustworthy traditions which the Goths had picked up at Alexandria. There was nothing which that river did not do. It rose in the Caucasus. Where was the Caucasus? He did not know. In Paradise—in Indian Æthiopia—in Æthiopian India. Where were they? He did not know. Nobody knew. It ran for a hundred and fifty days' journey through deserts where nothing but flying serpents and satyrs lived, and the very lions' manes were burnt off by the heat.

'Good sporting there, at all events, among those dragons,' quoth Simd the son of Troll, armourer to the party.

'As good as Thor's when he caught Snake Midgard with the bullock's head,' said Wulf.

It turned to the east for a hundred days' journey more, all round Arabia and India, among forests full of elephants and dog-headed women.

'Better and better, Simd!' growled Wulf, approvingly.

'Fresh beef cheap there, Prince Wulf, eh?' quoth Simd, 'I must look over the arrow-heads.'

—To the mountains of the Hyperboreans, where there was eternal night, and the air was full of feathers. . . . That is, one-third of it came from thence, and another third came from the Southern ocean, over the Moon mountains, where no one had ever been, and the remaining third from the country where the phoenix lived, and nobody knew where that was. And then there were the cataracts, and the inundations—and—and—and above the cataracts, nothing but sand hills and ruins, as full of devils as they could hold. . . . and as for Asgard, no one had ever heard of it till every face grew longer and longer, as Pelagia went on interpreting and misinterpreting, and at last the giant smote his hand upon his knee, and swore a great oath that Asgard might rot till the twilight of the gods before he went a step farther up the Nile.

'Curse the monk!' growled Wulf. 'How should such a poor beast know anything about the matter?'

'Why should not he know as well as that ape of a Roman governor?' asked Simd.

'Oh, the monks knew everything,' said Pelagia. 'They go hundreds and thousands of miles up the river, and cross the deserts among hells and monsters, where any one else would be eaten up, or go mad at once.'

'Ah, the dear holy men! It's all by the sign of the blessed cross!' exclaimed all the girls together, devoutly crossing themselves, while two or three of the most enthusiastic were half-minded to go forward and kneel to Pelagion for his blessing, but hesitated, their Gothic lovers being heathenishly stupid and prudish on such points.

'Why should he not know as well as the prefect? Well said, Simd! I believe that prefect's quill-driver was hummingbugging us when he said Asgard was only ten days' sail up.'

'Why?' asked Wulf.

'I never give any reasons. What's the use of being an Anjal, and a son of Odin, if one has always to be giving reasons like a rascally Roman lawyer? I say the governor looked like a liar, and I say this monk looks like an honest fellow, and I choose to believe him, and there is an end of it.'

'Don't look so cross at me, Prince Wulf, I'm sure it's not my fault; I could only say what the monk told me,' whispered poor Pelagia.

'Who looks cross at you, my queen?' roared the Anjal. 'Let me have him out here, and by Thor's hammer, I'll—'

'Who spoke to you, you stupid darling?' answered Pelagia, who lived in hourly fear of thunderstorms. 'Who is going to be cross with any one, except I with you, for mishearing and misunderstanding, and meddling, as you are always doing? I shall do as I threatened, and run away with Prince Wulf, if you are not good.'

Don't you see that the whole crew are expecting you to make them an oration?'

Whereupon the Amal rose.

'See you here, Wulf the son of Ovida, and warriors all! If we want wealth, we shan't find it among the sand-hills. If we want women, we shall find nothing prettier than these among dragons and devils. Don't look angry, Wulf. You have no mind to marry one of those dog-headed girls the monk talked of, have you? Well, then, we have money and women, and if we want sport, it's better sport killing men than killing beasts; so we had better go where we shall find most of that game, which we certainly shall not up this road. As for fame and all that, though I've had enough, there's plenty to be got anywhere along the shores of that Mediterranean. Let's burn and plunder Alexandria forty of us Goths might kill down all these donkey riders in two days, and hang up that lying prefect who sent us here on this fool's errand. Don't answer, Wulf. I knew he was humbugging us all along, but you were so open-mouthed to all he said, that I was bound to let my elders choose for me. Let's go back, send over for any of the tribes, send to Spain for those Vandals—they have had enough of Adolf by now, curse him!—I'll warrant them, get together an army, and take Constantinople. I'll be Augustus, and Pelagia, Augusta, you and Smid head the two Caesars, and we'll make the monk the chief of the eunuchs, eh?—anything you like for a quiet life; but up this accursed kennel of hot water I go no farther. Ask your girls, my heroes, and I'll ask mine. Women are all prophetesses, every one of them.'

'When they are not harlots,' growled Wulf to himself.

'I will go to the world's end with you, my king!' sighed Pelagia, 'but Alexandria is certainly pleasanter than this.'

Old Wulf sprang up fiercely enough.

'Hear me, Amalric the Amal, son of Odín, and heroes all! When my fathers swore to be Odín's men, and gave up the kingdom to the holy Amals, the sons of the Æsir, what was the bond between your fathers and mine? Was it not that we should move and move, southward and southward ever, till we came back to Asgard, the city where Odín dwells for ever, and gave into his hands the kingdom of all the earth? And did we not keep our oath? Have we not held to the Amals? Did we not leave Adolf, because we would not follow a Balth, while there was an Amal to lead us? Have we not been true men to you, son of the Æsir?'

'No man ever saw Wulf, the son of Ovida, fail friend or foe.'

'Then why does his friend fail him? Why does his friend fail himself? If the bison-bull he down and wallow, what will the herd do for a leader? If the king-wolf lose the scent, how will the pack hold it? If the Yngling forgets the song of Asgard, who will sing it to the heroes?'

'Sing it yourself, if you choose. Pelagia sings quite well enough for me.'

In an instant the cunning beauty caught at the lute, and poured forth a soft, low, sleepy song—

'Loose the sail, rest the oar, float away down, Fleeting and gliding by lower and town,
Life is so short at best! snatch, while thou canst, thy rest,
Sleeping by me!'

'Can you answer that, Wulf?' shouted a dozen voices.

'Hear the song of Asgard, warriors of the Goths! Did not Alaric the king love it well? Did I not sing it before him in the palace of the Cæsars, till he swore, for all the Christian that he was, to go southward in search of the holy city? And when he went to Valhalla, and the ships were wrecked off Sicily, and Adolf the Balth turned back like a lazy hound, and married the daughter of the Romans, whom Odín hates, and went northward again to Gaul, did not I sing you all the song of Asgard in Messina there, till you swore to follow the Amal through fire and water until we found the hall of Odín, and received the mead-cup from his own hand? Hear it again, warriors of the Goths!'

'Not that song!' roared the Amal, stopping his ears with both his hands. 'Will you drive us blood-mad again, just as we are settling down into our sober senses, and finding out what our lives were given us for?'

'Hear the song of Asgard! On to Asgard, wolves of the Goths!' shouted another, and a babel of voices arose.

'Haven't we been fighting and marching these seven years?'

'Haven't we drunk blood enough to satisfy Odín ten times over? If he wants us let him come himself and lend us!'

'Let us get our wounds again before we start afresh!'

'Wulf the Pinnock like his name, and in our tires; he has a wolf's-wolf's legs under him, that is no reason why we should have.'

'Haven't you heard what the monk says? we can never get over those cataracts.'

'We'll stop his old wives' tales for him, and then settle for ourselves,' said Smid; and springing from the thwart where he had been sitting, he caught up a bill with one hand, and seized Philannion's throat with the other. In a moment more, it would have been all over with him.

For the first time in his life Philannion felt a hostile gripe upon him, and a new sensation rushed through every nerve, as he grappled with the warrior, clutched with his left hand the up-lifted wrist, and with his right the girdle, and commenced, without any definite aim, a fierce struggle, which, strange to say, as it went on, grew absolutely pleasant.

The women shrieked to their lovers to part the combatants, but in vain.

'Not for worlds! A very fair match and a very fair fight! Take your long legs back, Itho, or they will be over you! That's right, my Smid, don't use the knife! They will be overboard in a moment! By all the Valkyrs, they are down, and Smid undermost!

There was no doubt of it, and in another moment Philammon would have wrenched the bull out of his opponent's hand, when, to the utter astonishment of the onlookers, he suddenly loosed his hold, shook himself free by one powerful wrench, and quietly retreated to his seat, conscience-stricken at the fearful thirst for blood which had suddenly boiled up within him as he felt his enemy under him.

The onlookers were struck dumb with astonishment, they had taken for granted that he would, as a matter of course, have used his right of splitting his vanquished opponent's skull—an event which they would of course have deeply deplored, but with which, as men of honour, they could not on any account interfere, but merely console themselves for the loss of their comrade by flaying his conqueror alive, 'carving him into the blood-eagle,' or any other delicate ceremony which might serve as a vent for their sorrow and a comfort to the soul of the deceased.

Smid rose, with a bill in his hand, and looked round him—perhaps to see what was expected of him. He half lifted his weapon to strike . . . Philammon, seated, looked him calmly in the face . . . The old warrior's eye caught the bank, which was now receding rapidly past them, and when he saw that they were really floating downwards again, without an effort to stem the stream, he put away his bill, and sat himself down deliberately in his place, astonishing the onlookers quite as much as Philammon had done.

'Five minutes' good fighting, and no one killed! This is a shame!' quoth another. 'Blood we must see, and it had better be yours, master monk, than your betters',—and therewith he rushed on poor Philammon.

He spoke the heart of the crew, the sleeping wolf in them had been awakened by the struggle, and blood they would have, and not frantically, like Celts or Egyptians, but with the cool humorous cruelty of the Teuton, they rose altogether, and turning Philammon over on his back, deliberated by what death he should die.

Philammon quietly submitted if submission have anything to do with that state of mind in which sheer astonishment and novelty have broken up all the custom of man's nature, till the strangest deeds and sufferings are taken as matters of course. His sudden escape from the Laura, the new world of thought and action into which he had been plunged, the new companions with whom he had fallen in, had driven him utterly from his moorings, and now anything and everything might happen to him. He who had promised never to look upon woman found himself, by circumstances over which he had no control, amid a boatful of the most objectionable species of that most objectionable genus—and the utterly worst having happened, everything else which happened must be better than the worst. For the rest, he had gone forth to see the world—and this was one of the ways of it. So he made up his mind to see it, and be filled with the fruit of his own devices.

And he would have been certainly filled with the same in five minutes more, in some shape too ugly to be mentioned but, as even sinful women have hearts in them, Pelagia shrieked out—

'Analyze! Analyze! do not let them! I cannot bear it!'

'The warriors are free men, my darling, and know what is proper. And what can the life of such a brute be to you?'

Before he could stop her, Pelagia had sprung from her cushions, and thrown herself into the midst of the laughing ring of wild beasts.

'Spare him! spare him for my sake!' shrieked she.

'Oh, my pretty lady! you mustn't interrupt warriors' sport!'

In an instant she had torn off her shawl, and thrown it over Philammon, and as she stood, with all the outlines of her beautiful limbs revealed through the thin robe of spangled gauze—

'Let the man who dares, touch him beneath that shawl!—though it be a saffron one!'

The Goths drew back. For Pelagia herself they had as little respect as the rest of the world had. But for a moment she was not the Messiah of Alexandria, but a woman, and true to the old woman-worshipping instinct, they looked one and all at her flashing eyes, full of noble pity and indignation, as well as of more woman's terror—and drew back, and whispered together.

Whether the good spirit or the evil one would conquer, seemed for a moment doubtful, when Pelagia felt a heavy hand on her shoulder, and turning, saw Wulf the son of Ovida.

'Go back, pretty woman! Men, I claim the boy Smid, give him to me. He is your man. You could have killed him if you had chosen, and did not; and no one else shall.'

'Give him us, Prince Wulf! We have not seen blood for many a day!'

'You might have seen rivers of it, if you had had the hearts to go onward. The boy is mine, and a brave boy. He has upset a warrior fairly this day, and spared him, and we will make a warrior of him in return.'

And he lifted up the prostrate monk.

'You are my man now. Do you like fighting?'

Philammon, not understanding the language in which he was addressed, could only shake his head—though if he had known what its import was, he could hardly in honesty have said, No.

'He shakes his head! He does not like it! He is craven! Let us have him!'

'I had killed kings when you wore shooting frogs,' cried Smid. 'Listen to me, my sons! A coward grips sharply at first, and loosens his hand after a while, because his blood is soon hot and soon cold. A brave man's grips grows the firmer the longer he holds, because the spirit of Odin comes upon him. I watched the boy's hands on my throat, and he will make a man, and I will make him one. However, we may as well make him useful at once, so give him an oar.

'Well,' answered his new protector, 'he can as well row us as be rowed by us, and if we are to go back to a cow's death and the pool of Hela, the quicker we go the better.'

And as the men settled themselves again to their oars, one was put into Phalanmon's hand, which he managed with such strength and skill that his late tormentors, who, in spite of an occasional inclination to robbery and murder, were thoroughly good-natured, honest fellows, clapped him on the back, and praised him as hearty, as they had just now heartily intended to torture him to death, and then went forward, as many of them as were not rowing, to examine the strange beast which they had just slaughtered, pawing him over from tusks to tail, putting their heads into his mouth, trying their knives on his hide, comparing him to all beasts, like and unlike, which they had ever seen, and laughing and showing each other about with the fun and childish wonder of a party of schoolboys; till Smid, who was the wit of the party, settled the comparative anatomy of the subject for them—

'Valhalla! I've found out what he's most like!—One of those big blue plums, which give us all the stomach-ache when we were encamped in the orchards above Ravenna.'

CHAPTER IV

ONE morning in the same week, Hypatia's favourite maid entered her chamber with a somewhat terrified face.

'The old Jewess, madam—the hag who has been watching so often lately under the wall opposite. She frightened us all out of our wits last evening by peeping in. We all said she had the evil eye, if any one ever had—'

'Well, what of her?'

'She is below, madam, and will speak with you. Not that I care for her, I have my amulet on. I hope you have?'

'Silly girl! Those who have been initiated as I have in the mysteries of the gods, can defy spirits and command them. Do you suppose that the favourites of Pallas Athene will condescend to charms and magic? Send her up.'

The girl retreated, with a look half of awe, half of doubt, at the lofty pretensions of her mistress, and returned with old Miriam, keeping, however, prudently behind her, in order to test as little as possible the power of her own amulet by avoiding the baneful eye which had terrified her.

Miriam came in, and advancing to the proud beauty, who remained seated, made an obeisance.

ance down to the very floor, without, however, taking her eyes for an instant off Hypatia's face.

Her countenance was haggard and bony, with broad sharp cut lips, stamped with a strangely mingled expression of strength and sensuality. But the feature about her which instantly fixed Hypatia's attention, and from which she could not in spite of herself withdraw it, was the dry, glittering, coal-black eye which glared out from underneath the gray fringe of her scowling brows, between black locks covered with gold coins. Hypatia could look at nothing but those eyes; and she reddened, and grew all but unphilosophically angry, as she saw that the old woman intended her to look at them, and feel the strange power which she evidently wished them to exercise.

After a moment's silence, Miriam drew a letter from her bosom, and with a second low obeisance presented it.

'From whom is this?'

'Perhaps the letter itself will tell the beautiful lady, the fortunate lady, the discerning lady,' answered she, in a fawning, wheedling tone. 'How should a poor old Jewess know great folks' secrets?'

'Great folks?—'

Hypatia looked at the seal which fixed a silk cord round the letter. It was Orestes', and so was the handwriting. Strange that he should have chosen such a messenger! What message could it be which required such secrecy?

She clapped her hands for the maid. 'Let this woman wait in the ante-room.' Miriam glided out backwards, bowing as she went. As Hypatia looked up over the letter to see whether she was alone, she caught a last glance of that eye still fixed upon her, and an expression in Miriam's face which made her, she knew not why, shudder and turn chill.

'Foolish that I am! What can that witch do to me? But now for the letter.'

'To the most noble and most beautiful, the mistress of philosophy, beloved of Athene, her pupil and slave sends greeting.'

'My slave! and no name mentioned!'

'There are those who consider that the favourite hen of Honorius, which bears the name of the Imperial City, would thrive better under a new feeder, and the Count of Africa has been despatched by himself and by the immortal gods to superintend for the present the poultry-yard of the Cæsars—at least during the absence of Adolf and Placidia. There are those also who consider that in his absence the Numidian lion might be prevailed on to become the yoke-fellow of the Egyptian crocodile, and a farm which, ploughed by such a pair, should extend from the upper cataract to the Pillars of Hercules, might have charms even for a philosopher. But while the ploughman is without a nymph, Arcadia is imperfect. What were Dionysos without his Ariadne, Ares without Aphrodite, Zeus without Hera? Even Artemis has her Endymion, Athens alone remains unwedded, but only because Hephestus was too rough a wooer. Such is not he who now offers to the representative of Athens the opportunity of sharing that which may be with the help of her wisdom, which without her is impossible φωσφύρα συνέροισιν. Shall Eros, invincible for ages, be balked at last of the noblest game against which he ever drew his bow? . . .

If Hypatia's colour had faded a moment before under the withering glance of the old Jewess, it rose again swiftly enough, as she read him after him of this strange epistle, till at last, crushing it together in her hand, she rose and hurried into the adjoining library, where Theon sat over his books.

'Father, do you know anything of this? Look what Orestes has dared to send me by the hands of some base Jewish witch!'—And she spread the letter before him, and stood impatient, her whole figure dilated with pride and anger, as the old man read it slowly and carefully, and then looked up, apparently not ill pleased with the contents.

'What, father?' asked she, half reproachfully. 'Do not you, too, feel the insult which has been put upon your daughter?'

'My dear child,' with a puzzled look, 'do you not see that he offers you —'

'I know what he offers me, father. The Empire of Africa. . . I am to descend from the mountain heights of science, from the contemplation of the unchangeable and ineffable glories, into the foul fields and faringards of earthly practical life, and become a chudge among political chicanery, and the petty ambitions, and sins, and falsehoods of the earthly herd. . . And the price which he offers me — me, the stainless — me, the virgin — me, the untamed, — is — his hand! Pallas Athene! dost thou not blush with thy child?'

'But, my child — my child, — an empire —'

'Would the empire of the world restore my lost self respect — my just pride? Would it save my cheek from blushes every time I recollected that I bore the hateful and degrading name of wife? — The property, the puppet of a man — submitting to his pleasure — bearing his children — wearing myself out with all the nanseous cares of wifehood — no longer able to glory in myself, pure and self-sustained, but forced by day and night to recollect that my very beauty is no longer the sacrament of Athens's love for me, but the plaything of a man, — and such a man as that! Luxurious, frivolous, heartless — courting my society, as he has done for years, only to pick up and turn to his own base earthly uses the scraps which fall from the festal table of the gods! I have encouraged him too much — vain fool that I have been! No, I wrong myself! It was only — I thought — I thought that by his being seen at our doors, the cause of the immortal gods would gain honour and strength in the eyes of the multitude. . . I have tried to feed the altars of heaven with earthly fuel. . . And this is my just reward!'

I will write to him this moment, — return by the fitting messenger which he has sent, insult for insult!'

'In the name of Heaven, my daughter! — for your father's sake! — for my sake! Hypatia! my pride, my joy, my only hope! — have pity on my gray hairs!'

And the poor old man flung himself at her feet, and clasped her knees imploringly.

Tenderly she lifted him up, and wound her long arms round him, and laid his head on her white shoulder, and her tears fell fast upon his gray hair, but her lip was firm and determined.

'Think of my pride — my glory in your glory, think of me. . . Not for myself! You know I never cared for myself!' sobbed out the old man. 'But to die seeing you empress!'

'Unless I died first in childhood, father, as many a woman dies who is weak enough to become a slave, and submit to tortures only fit for slaves.'

'But — but —' said the old man, racking his bewildered brains for some argument far enough removed from nature and common sense to have an effect on the beautiful fanatic — 'but the cause of the gods! What you might do for it! Remember Julian!'

Hypatia's arms dropped suddenly. Yes, it was true! The thought flashed across her mind with mingled delight and terror. . . Visions of her childhood rose swift and thick — temples — sacrifices — priesthoods — colleges — museums! What might she not do? What might she not make Africa? Give her ten years of power, and the hated name of Christian might be forgotten, and Athens Pallas, colossal in ivory and gold, watching in calm triumph over the harbours of a heathen Alexandria. . . But the price!

And she hid her face in her hands, and bursting into bitter tears, walked slowly away into her own chamber, her whole body convulsed with the internal struggle.

The old man looked after her, anxiously and perplexed, and then followed, hesitating. She was sitting at the table, her face buried in her hands. He did not dare to disturb her. In addition to all the affection, the wisdom, the glorious beauty, on which his whole heart fed day by day, he believed her to be the possessor of those supernatural powers and favours to which she so boldly laid claim. And he stood watching her in the doorway, praying in his heart to all gods and demigods, principalities and powers, from Athens down to his daughter's guardian spirit, to move a determination which he was too weak to gainway, and yet too rational to approve.

At last the struggle was over, and she looked up, clear, calm, and glorious again.

'It shall be. For the sake of the immortal gods — for the sake of art, and science, and learning, and philosophy. . . It shall be. If the gods demand a victim, here am I. If a second time in the history of the ages the Grecian fleet cannot sail forth, conquering and civilising, without the sacrifice of a virgin, I give my throat to the knife. Father, call me no more Hypatia. call me Iphigenia!

'And me Agamemnon!' asked the old man, attempting a faint jest through his tears of joy. 'I daresay you think me a very cruel father, but—'

'Spare me, father—I have spared you.'

And she began to wreathe her answer

'I have accepted his offer—conditionally, that 19 And on whether he have courage or not to fulfil that condition depends—Do not ask me what it is. While Cyril is leader of the Christian mob, it may be safer for you, my father, that you should be able to deny all knowledge of my answer. Be content. I have said this—that if he will do as I would have him do, I will do as you would have me do.'

'Have you not been too rash? Have you not demanded of him something which, for the sake of public opinion, he dare not grant openly, and yet which he may allow you to do for yourself when once—'

'I have. If I am to be a victim, the sacrificing priest shall at least be a man, and not a coward and a time-server. If he believes this Christian faith, let him defend it against me, for either it or I shall perish. If he does not—as he does not—let him give up living in a lie, and taking on his lips blasphemies against the immortals, from which his heart and reason revolt!'

And she clapped her hands again for the maid-servant, gave her the letter silently, shut the doors of her chamber, and tried to resume her Commentary on Plotinus. Alas! what were all the wire drawn dreams of metaphysics to her in that real and human struggle of the heart? What availed it to define the process by which individual souls emanated from the universal one, while her own soul had, singly and on its own responsibility, to decide so terrible an act of will? or to write fine words with pen and ink about the immutability of the supreme Reason, while her own reason was left there to struggle for its life amid a roaring shoreless waste of doubts and darkness? Oh, how grand, and clear, and logical it had all looked half an hour ago! And how irrefragably she had been deducing from it all, syllogism after syllogism, the non-existence of evil!—how it was but a lower form of good, one of the countless products of the one great all-pervading mind which could not err or change, only so strange and recondite in its form as to excite antipathy in all minds but that of the philosopher, who learnt to see the stem which connected the apparently bitter fruit with the perfect root from whence it sprang. Could she see the stem there!—the connection between the pure and supreme Reason, and the hideous carcases of the debauched and cowardly Orestes? was not that evil pure, unadulterate with any vein of good, past, present, or future? . . .

True,—she might keep her spirit pure amid it all; she might sacrifice the base body, and ennoble the soul by the self-sacrifice. . . . And yet, would not that increase the horror, the agony, the evil of it—to her, at least, most real evil, not to be explained away—and yet the gods required it? Were they just, merciful in that? Was it like them, to torture her, their last unshaken votary? Did they require it? Was it not required of them by some higher power, of whom they were only the emanations, the tools, the puppets?—and required of that higher power by some still higher one—some nameless, absolute destiny of which Orestes and she, and all heaven and earth, were but the victims, dragged along in an inevitable vortex, helpless, hopeless, toward that for which each was meant?—And she was meant for this! The thought was unbearable, it turned her giddy. No! she would not! She would rebel! Like Prometheus, she would dare destiny, and brave its worst! And she sprang up to recall the letter. . . . Miriam was gone, and she threw herself on the floor, and wept bitterly.

And her peace of mind would certainly not have been improved, could she have seen old Miriam hurry home with her letter to a dingy house in the Jews' quarter, where it was unscaled, read, and sealed up again with such marvellous skill, that no eye could have detected the change, and finally, still less would she have been comforted could she have heard the conversation which was going on in a summer room of Orestes' palace, between that illustrious statesman and Raphael Aben Ezra, who were lying on two divans opposite each other, whiling away, by a throw or two of dice, the anxious moments which delayed her answer.

'Trays again! The devil is in you, Raphael!'

'I always thought she was,' answered Raphael, sweeping up the gold pieces.

'When will that old witch be back?'

'When she has read through your letter and Hypatia's answer.'

'Read them?'

'Of course. You don't fancy she is going to be fool enough to carry a message without knowing what it is? Don't be angry, she won't tell. She would give one of those two grave-lights there, which she calls her eyes, to see the thing prosper.'

'Why?'

'Your excellency will know when the letter comes. Here she is, I hear steps in the cloister. Now, one bet before they enter. I give you two to one she asks you to turn pagan.'

'What in? Negro-boys?'

'Anything you like.'

'Taken. Come in, slaves!'

And Hypatia entered, pointing.

'That Jewish fury is outside with a letter, and has the impudence to say she won't let me bring it in!'

'Bring her in then. Quick!'

'I wonder what I am here for, if people have secrets that I am not to know,' grumbled the spoilt youth.

'Do you want a blue ribbon round those white sides of yours, you monkey!' answered

Orestes. 'Because, if you do, the hippopotamus hide hangs ready outside.'

'Let us make him kneel down here for a couple of hours, and use him as a dice-board,' said Raphael, 'as you used to do to the girls in Armenia.'

'Ah, you recollect that?—and how the barbarian papas used to grumble, till I had to crucify one or two, oh! That was something like life! I love those out-of-the-way stations, where nobody asks questions, but here one might as well live among the monks in Nitria. Here comes Candida! Ah, the answer! Hail it here, my queen of go-betweens!'

Orestes read it—and his countenance fell.

'I have won!'

'Out of the room, slaves! and no listening!'

'I have won then?'

Orestes tossed the letter across to him, and Raphael read—

'The immortal gods accept no divided worship; and he who would command the counsels of their prophetesses must remember that they will vouchsafe to her no illumination till their lost honours be restored. If he who aspires to be the lord of Africa dare example on the hateful cross, and restore the Cæsareum to those for whose worship it was built—if he dare proclaim aloud with his lips, and in his deeds, that contempt for novel and barbarous superstitions, which his taste and reason have already taught him, then he would prove himself one with whom it were a glory to labour, to dare, to die in a great cause. But till then—'

And so the letter ended.

'What am I to do?'

'Take her at her word!'

'Good heavens! I shall be excommunicated! And—and—what is to become of my soul?'

'What will become of it in any case, my most excellent lord!' answered Raphael blandly.

'You mean—I know what you cursed Jews think will happen to every one but ourselves. But what would the world say? I an apostate! And in the face of Cyril and the populace! I daren't, I tell you!'

'No one asked your excellency to apostatise.'

'Why, what? What did you say just now?'

'I asked you to promise. It will not be the first time that promises before marriage have not exactly comended with performance afterwards.'

'I daren't—that is, I won't promise. I believe, now, this is some trap of your Jewish intrigue, just to make me commit myself against those Christians, whom you hate.'

'I assure you, I despise all mankind far too profoundly to hate them. How disinterested my advice was when I proposed this match to you, you never will know, indeed, it would be boastful in me to tell you. But really you must make a little sacrifice to win this foolish girl. With all the depth and daring of her intellect to help you, you might be a match for Romans, Byzantines, and Goths at once. And as for beauty—why, there is one dimple inside that wrist, just at the setting on of the sweet little hand, worth all the other flesh and blood in Alexandria.'

'By Jove! you admire her so much, I suspect you must be in love with her yourself. Why don't you marry her? I'll make you my prime minister, and then we shall have the use of her wits without the trouble of her fauca. By the twelve Gods! If you marry her and help me, I'll make you what you like!'

Raphael rose and bowed to the earth.

'Your serene high-mightiness overwhelms me. But I assure you, that never having as yet cared for any one's interest but my own, I could not be expected, at my time of life, to devote myself to that of another, even though it were to yours.'

'Candid!'

'Exactly so; and moreover, whosoever I may marry, will be practically, as well as theoretically, my private and peculiar property. . . . You comprehend?'

'Candid again!'

'Exactly so, and waiving the third argument, that she probably might not choose to marry me, I beg to remark that it would not be proper to allow the world to say, that I, the subject, had a wiser and fairer wife than you, the ruler, especially a wife who had already refused that ruler's complimentary offer.'

'By Jove! and she has refused me in good earnest! I'll make her repent it! I was a fool to ask her at all! What's the use of having guards, if one can't compel what one wants? If fair means can't do it, foul shall! I'll send for her this moment!'

'Most illustrious majesty—it will not succeed. You do not know that woman's determination. Scourges and red-hot pincers will not shake her, alive, and dead, who will be of no use whatsoever to you, while she will be of great use to Cyril.'

'How!'

'He will be most happy to make the whole story a handle against you, give out that she died a virgin-martyr, in defence of the most holy catholic and apostolic faith, got miracles worked at her tomb, and pull your palace about your ears on the strength thereof.'

'Cyril will hear of it anyhow—that's another dilemma into which you have brought me, you intriguing rascal! Why, this girl will be boast in all over Alexandria that I have offered her marriage, and that she has done herself the honour to refuse me!'

'She will be much too wise to do anything of the kind; she has sense enough to know that if she did so, you would inform a Christian populace what conditions she offered you, and, with all her contempt for the burden of the flesh, she has no mind to be lightened of that pretty load by being torn in pieces by Christian monks, a very probable ending for her in any case, as she herself, in her melancholy moods, confesses!'

'What will you have me do then?'

'Simply nothing. Let the prophetic spirit go out of her, as it will, in a day or two, and then—I know nothing of human nature, if she does not bate a little of her own price. Depend on it, for all her ineffabilities, and impossibilities, and all the rest of the seventh-heaven moonshine at which we play here in Alexandria, a throne is far too pretty a bait for even Hypatia the Pythoness to refuse. Leave well alone is a good rule, but leave ill alone is a better. So now another bet before we part, and this time three to one. Do nothing either way, and she sends to you of her own accord before a month is out. In Caucasian mules? Done? Be it so.'

'Well, you are the most charming counsellor for a ; our perplexed devil of a prefect! If I had but a private fortune like you, I could just take the money, and let the work do itself.'

'Which is the true method of successful government. Your slave bids you farewell. Do not forget our bet. You dine with me to-morrow!'

And Raphael bowed himself out.

As he left the prefect's door, he saw Miriam on the opposite side of the street, evidently watching for him. As soon as she saw him, she held on her own side, without appearing to notice him, till he turned a corner, and then crossing, caught him eagerly by the arm.

'Does the fool dare!'

'Who dare what?'

'You know what I mean. Do you suppose old Miriam carries letters without taking care to know what is inside them? Will he ipso-facto? Tell me. I am secret as the grave!'

'The fool has found an old worm-eaten rag of conscience somewhere in the corner of his heart, and dare not.'

'Curse the coward! And such a plot as I had laid! I would have swept every Christian dog out of Africa within the year. What is the man afraid of?'

'Hell-hire.'

'Why, he will go there in any case, the accursed Gentile!'

'So I hunted to him, as delicately as I could, but, like the rest of the world, he had a sort of partiality for getting thither by his own road.'

'Coward! And whom shall I get now? Oh, if that Pelagia had as much cunning in her whole body as Hypatia has in her little finger, I'd set her and her Goth upon the throne of the Cæsars. But—'

'But who has five senses, and just enough wit to use them, oh?'

'Don't laugh at her for that, the darling! I do delight in her, after all. It warms even my old blood to see how thoroughly she knows her business, and how she enjoys it, like a true daughter of Eve.'

'She has been your most successful pupil, certainly, mother. You may well be proud of her.'

The old hag chuckled to herself a while, and then suddenly turning to Raphael—

'See here! I have a present for you,' and she pulled out a magnificent ring.

'Why, mother, you are always giving me presents. It was but a month ago you sent me this poisoned dagger.'

'Why not, oh?—why not? Why should not Jew give to Jew? Take the old woman's ring!'

'What a glorious opal!'

'Ah, that is an opal, indeed! And the unspeakable name upon it, just like Solomon's own. Take it, I say! Whosoever wears that never need fear fire, steel, poison, or woman's eye.'

'Your own included, oh?'

'Take it, I say!' and Miriam caught his hand, and forced the ring on his finger. 'There! Now you're safe. And now call me mother again. I like it. I don't know why, but I like it. And—Raphael Aben-Ezra—don't laugh at me, and call me witch and hag, as you often do. I don't care about it from any one else, I'm accustomed to it. But when you do it, I always long to stab you. That's why I gave you the dagger. I used to wear it, and I was afraid I might be tempted to use it some day, when the thought came across me how handsome you'd look, somehow quiet, when you were dead, and your soul up there so happy in Abraham's bosom, watching all the Gentiles frying and roasting for ever down below. Don't laugh at me, I say; and don't thwart me! I may make you the emperor's prime minister some day, I can if I choose.'

'Heaven forbid!' said Raphael, laughing.

'Don't laugh. I cast your nativity last night, and I know you have no cause to laugh. A great danger hangs over you, and a deep temptation. And if you weather this storm, you may be chamberlain, prime minister, emperor, if you will. And you shall be—by the four archangels, you shall!'

And the old woman vanished down a by-lane, leaving Raphael utterly bewildered.

'Moses and the prophets! Does the old lady intend to marry me? What can there be in this very lazy and selfish personage who bears my name, to excite so romantic an affection? Well, Raphael Aben-Ezra, thou hast one more friend in the world beside Bran the mastiff, and therefore one more trouble—seeing that friends always expect a due return of affection and good offices and what not. I wonder whether the old lady has been getting into a scrape kidnapping, and wants my patronage to help her out of it. . . . Three-quarters of a mile of roasting sun between me and home! . . . I must hire a gig, or a litter, or something, off the next stand with a driver who has been eating onions and of course there is not a stand for the next half-mile. Oh, divine ether—as Prometheus has it, and ye swift-winged breezes (I wish there were any here), when will it all be over? Three-and-thirty years have I endured already of this babel of knaves and fools, and with this abominable good health of mine, which won't even help me with gout or indigestion, I am likely to have three-and-thirty years more of it. . . . I know nothing, and I care for nothing, and I expect nothing, and I actually can't take the trouble to prick a hole in myself, and let the very small amount of wits out, to see something really worth seeing, and try its strength at something really worth doing—if, after all, the other side the grave does not turn out to be just as stupid as this one. . . . When will it be all over, and I in Abraham's bosom—or any one else's, provided it be not a woman's?

A DAY IN ALEXANDRIA

In the meanwhile, Philammon, with his hosts, the Goths, had been slipping down the stream. Passing, one after another, world-old cities now dwindled to decaying towns, and numberless canal-mouths, now fast falling into ruin with the fields to which they ensured fertility, under the pressure of Roman extortion and usury, they had entered one evening the mouth of the great canal of Alexandria, and early all night across the star bespangled shadows of Lake Mareotis, and found themselves, when the next morning dawned, among the countless masts and noisy quays of the greatest seaport in the world. The motley crowd of foreigners, the hubbub of all dialects from the Crimea to Cadiz, the vast piles of merchandise, and heaps of wheat, lying unsheltered in that rainless air, the huge bulk of the corn-ships lading for Rome, whose tall sides rose story over story, like floating palaces, above the buildings of some inner dock—these sights, and a hundred more, made the young monk think that the world did not look at first sight a thing to be despised. In front of heaps of fruit, fresh from the market-boats, black groups of glossy negro slaves were basking and laughing on the quay, looking anxiously and coquettishly round in hopes of a purchaser, they evidently did not think the change from desert toil to city luxuries a change for the worse. Philammon turned away his eyes from beholding vanity, but only to meet fresh vanity where-soever they fell. He felt crushed by the multitude of new objects, stunned by the din around, and scarcely recollected himself enough to seize the first opportunity of escaping from his dangerous companions.

'Holloa!' roared Smid the armourer, as he scrambled on to the steps of the ship; 'you are not going to run away without bidding us goodbye!'

'Stop with me, boy!' said old Wulf. 'I saved you; and you are my man!'

Philammon turned and hesitated.

'I am a monk, and God's man.'

'You can be that anywhere. I will make you a warrior.'

'The weapons of my warfare are not of flesh and blood, but prayer and fasting,' answered poor Philammon, who felt already that he should have ten times more need of the said weapons in Alexandria than ever he had had in the desert. . . . 'Let me go! I am not made for your life! I thank you, bless you! I will pray for you, sir! but let me go!'

'Curse the craven hound!' roared half a dozen voices. 'Why did you not let us have our will with him, Prince Wulf? You might have expected such gratitude from a monk.'

'He owes me my share of the sport,' quoth Smid. 'And here it is!' And a hatchet, thrown with practised aim, whistled right for Philammon's head—he had just time to swerve, and the weapon struck and snapped against the granite wall behind.

'Well saved!' said Wulf coolly, while the sailors and market-women above yelled murder, and the custom-house officers, and other constables and catchpools of the harbour, rushed to the place—and retired again quietly at the thunder of the Anial from the boat's stern—

'Never mind, my good fellows! we're only Goths; and on a visit to the prefect, too.'

'Only Goths, my donkey-riding friends!' echoed Smid, and at that ominous name the whole posse comitatus tried to look unconcerned, and found suddenly that their presence was absolutely required in an opposite direction.

'Let him go,' said Wulf, as he stalked up the steps. 'Let the boy go. I never set my heart on any man yet,' he growled to himself in an under voice, 'but what he disappointed me—and I must not expect more from this fellow. Come, men, ashore, and get drunk!'

Philammon, of course, now that he had leave to go, longed to stay at all events, he must go back and thank his hosts. He turned unwillingly to do so, as hastily as he could, and found Pelagia and her gigantic lover just entering a palanquin. With downcast eyes he approached the beautiful basilisk, and murmured out some commonplace, and she, full of smiles, turned to him at once.

'Tell me more about yourself before we part. You speak such beautiful Greek—true Athenian. It is quite delightful to hear one's own accent again. Were you ever at Athens?'

'When I was a child, I recollect—that is, I think.'

'What?' asked Pelagia eagerly.

'A great house in Athens—and a great battle there—and coming to Egypt in a ship.'

'Heavens!' said Pelagia, and paused.

'How strange! Girls, as he said he was like me?'

'I'm sure we meant no harm, if we did say it in a joke,' pouted one of the attendants.

'Like me!—you must come and see us. I have something to say to you. You must!'

Philammon misinterpreted the intense interest of her tone, and if he did not shrink back, gave some involuntary gesture of reluctance. Pelagia laughed aloud.

'Don't be vain enough to suspect, foolish boy, but come! Do you think that I have nothing to talk about but nonsense? Come and see me.'

It may be better for you. I live in——' and she named a fashionable street, which Philammon, though he inwardly vowed not to accept the invitation, somehow could not help remembering.

'Do leave the wild man, and come,' growled the Amal from within the palanquin. 'You are not going to turn nun, I hope!'

'Not while the first war, I ever met in the world stays in it,' answered Pelagia, as she skipped into the palanquin, taking care to show the most lovely white heel and ankle, and, like the Parthian, send a random arrow as she retreated. But the dart was lost on Philammon, who had been already huffed away by the bevy of laughing attendants, and baskets, dressing-cases, and bird-cages, and was fain to make his escape into the Babel round, and inquire his way to the patriarch's house.

'Patriarch's house?' answered the man whom he first addressed, a little lean, swarthy fellow, with merry black eyes, who, with a basket of fruit at his feet, was sunning himself on a baulk of timber, meditatively chewing the papyrus-cane, and examining the strangers with a look of absurd sagacity. 'I know it, without a doubt I know it, all Alexandria has good reason to know it. Are you a monk?'

'Yes.'

'Then ask your way of the monks, you won't go far without finding one.'

'But I do not even know the right direction what is your grudge against monks, my good man?'

'Look here, my youth, you seem too ingenious for a monk. Don't flatter yourself that it will last. If you can wear the sheepskin, and haunt the churches here for a month, without learning to lie, and slander, and clap, and hoot, and perhaps play your part in a sedition-and murder satyrical drama—why, you are a better man than I take you for. I, sir, am a Greek and a philosopher, though the whirlpool of matter may have, and indeed has, involved my ethereal spark in the body of a porter. Therefore, youth,' continued the little man, starting up upon his baulk like an excited monkey, and stretching out one oratoric paw, 'I bear a triple hatred to the monkish tribe. First, as a man and a human being, for as for the smiles of beauty, or otherwise,—such as I have, I have, and the monks, if they had their wicked will, would leave neither men nor women in the world. So, they would exterminate the human race by a single generation, by a voluntary suicide! Secondly, as a porter; for if all men turned monks, nobody would be idle, and the profession of portering would be annihilated. Thirdly, sir, as a philosopher; for as the false coin is odious to the true, so is the irrational and animal asceticism of the monk, to the logical and methodic self-restraint of one who, like your humblest of philosophers, aspires to a life according to the pure reason.'

And pray, asked Philammon, half laughing, 'who has been your tutor in philosophy?'

'The fountain of classic wisdom, Hyjatia herself. As the ancient sage—the name is unimportant to a monk—pumped water mightily that he might study by day, so I, the guardian of cloaks and parasols, at the sacred doors of her lecture-room, imbibe celestial knowledge. From my youth I felt in me a soul above the matter-entangled herd. She revealed to me the glorious fact, that I am a spark of Divinity itself. A fallen star, I am, sir,' continued he, pensively, stroking his lean stomach—'a fallen star'—fallen, if the dignity of philosophy will allow of the simile, among the hogs of the lower world—indeed, even into the hog bucket itself. Well, after all, I will show you the way to the Arch-bishop's. There is a philosophic pleasure in opening one's treasures to the modest young. Perhaps you will assist me by carrying this basket of fruit?' And the little man jumped up, put his basket on Philammon's head, and trotted off up a neighbouring street.

Philammon followed, half contemptuous, half wondering at what this philosophy might be, which could seduce the self conceit of anything so abject as his ragged little apish guide, but the novel roar and whirl of the street, the perpetual stream of busy fairs, the line of carriages, palanquins, laden asses, camels, elephants, which met and passed him, and squeezed him up steps and into doorways, as they threaded their way through the great Moon gate into the ample street beyond, drove everything from his mind but wondering curiosity, and a vague, helpless dread of that great living wilderness, more terrible than any dead wilderness of sand which he had left behind. Already he longed for the repose, the silence of the Lanra—for trees which knew him and smiled upon him, but it was too late to turn back now. His guide held on for more than a mile up the great main street, crossed in the centre of the city, at right angles by one equally magnificent, at each end of which, miles away, appeared, dim and distant over the heads of the living stream of passengers, the yellow sand-hills of the desert, while at the end of the vista in front of them glared the blue harbour, through a network of countless masts.

At last they reached the quay at the opposite end of the street, and there burst on Philammon's astonished eyes a vast semicircle of blue sea, ringed with palaces and towers. He stopped involuntarily, and his little guide stopped also, and looked askance at the young monk, to watch the effect which that grand panorama should produce on him.

'There!—Behold our works! Us Greeks!—us benighted heathens! Look at it and feel yourself what you are, a very small, concerted, ignorant young person, who fancies that your new religion gives you a right to despise every one else. Did Christians make all this? Did Christians build that Pharos there on the left horn—wonder of the world? Did Christians raise that mile long mole which runs towards the land, with its two drawbridges, connecting the two ports? Did Christians build this esplanade, or this gate of the Sun above our heads? Or that Casareum on our right here? Look at those obelisks before it! And he pointed upwards to those two world-famous ones, one of which still lies on its ancient site, as Cleopatra's Needle. 'Look up! look up, I say, and feel small—very small indeed! Did Christians raise them, or engrave them from base to point with the wisdom of the ancients? Did Christians build that Museum next to it, or design its statues and its frescoes—now, alas! re-echoing no more to the hummings of the Attic bee? Did they pile up out of the waves that palace beyond it, or that Exchange? or fill that Temple of Neptune with breathing brass and blushing marble? Did they build that Timonium on the point, where Antony, worsted at Actium, forgot his shame in Cleopatra's arms? Did they quarry out that island of Antirrhodus into a nest of docks, or cover those waters with the sails of every nation under heaven? Speak! Thou son of bats and moles—thou six feet of sand—thou mummy out of the cliff caverns! Can monks do works like these?'

'Other men have laboured, and we have entered into their labours,' answered Philammon, trying to seem as unconcerned as he could. He was, indeed, too utterly astonished to be angry at anything. The overwhelming vastness, multiplicity, and magnificence of the whole scene, the range of buildings, such as mother earth never, perhaps, carried on her lap before or since, the extraordinary variety of form—the pure Doric and Ionic of the earlier Ptolemies, the barbaric and confused gorgeousness of the later Roman, and here and there an imitation of the grand elephantine style of old Egypt, its gaudy colours relieving, while they deepened, the effect of its massive and simple outlines, the eternal repose of that great belt of stone contrasting with the restless ripple of the glittering harbour, and the busy sails which crowded out into the sea beyond, like white doves taking their flight into boundless space—all dazzled, overpowered, saddened him. This was the world. Was it not beautiful? Must not the men who made all this have been—if not great, yet he knew not what? Surely they had great souls and noble thoughts in them! Surely there was something godlike in being able to create such things! Not for themselves alone, too, but for a nation—for generations yet unborn. And there was the sea, and beyond it, nations of men innumerable. His imagination was dizzy with thinking of them. Were they all doomed—lost? . . . If God no love for them?

At last, recovering himself, he recollected his errand, and again asked his way to the archbishop's house.

'This way, O youthful nonentity!' answered the little man, leading the way round the great front of the Casareum, at the foot of the obelisks.

Philammon's eye fell on some new masonry in the pediment, ornamented with Christian symbols.

'How! Is this a church?'

'It is the Casareum. It has become temporarily a church. The immortal gods have, for the time being, condescended to waive their rights, but it is the Casareum, nevertheless. This way, down this street to the right. There,' said he, pointing to a doorway in the side of the Museum, 'is the last haunt of the Muses—the lecture-room of Hypatia, the school of my unworthiness. . . And here,' stopping at the door of a splendid house on the opposite side of the street, 'is the residence of that best favourite of Athens—Neith, as the barbarians of Egypt would denominate the goddess—women of Macedonia retain the time-honoured Grecian nomenclature. You may put down your basket.' And he knocked at the door, and delivering the fruit to a black porter, made a polite obeisance to Philammon, and resumed on the point of taking his departure.

'But where is the archbishop's house?'

'Close to the Serapion. You cannot miss the place: four hundred columns of marble, now ruined by Christian persecutors, stand on an eminence—'

'But how far off?'

'About three miles, near the gate of the Moon.'

'Why, was not that the gate by which we entered the city on the other side?'

'Exactly so, you will know your way back, having already traversed it.'

Philammon checked a decidedly carnal inclination to seize the little fellow by the throat, and knock his head against the wall, and contented himself by saying—

'Then do you actually mean to say, you heathen villain, that you have taken me six or seven miles out of my road?'

'Good words young man. If you do me harm, I call for help, we are close to the Jews' quarter, and there are some thousands there who will swarm out like wasps on the chance of beating a monk to death. Yet that which I have done, I have done with a good purpose. First, politically, or according to practical wisdom—in order that you, not I, might carry the basket. Next, philosophically, or according to the intuitions of the pure reason—in order that you might, by beholding the magnificence of that great civilisation which your fellows wish to destroy, learn that you are an ass, and a tortoise, and a nonentity, and so beholding yourself to be nothing, may be moved to become something.'

• And he moved off.

Philammon seized him by the collar of his ragged tunic, and held him in a gripe from which the little man, though he twisted like an eel, could not escape.

'Peaceably, if you will; if not, by main force. You shall go back with me, and show me every step of the way. It is a just penalty.'

'The philosopher conquers circumstances by submitting to them. I go peaceably. Indeed, the base necessities of the hog-bucket side of existence compel me of themselves back to the Moon-gate, for another early fruit job.

So they went back together.

Now why Philammon's thoughts should have been running on the next new specimen of womankind to whom he had been introduced, though only in name, let psychologists tell, but certainly, after he had walked some half-mile in silence, he suddenly woke up, as out of many meditations, and asked—

'But who is this Hypatia, of whom you talk so much?'

'Who is Hypatia, rustic? The queen of Alexandria! In wit, Athens; Hera in majesty, in beauty, Aphrodite!'

'And who are they?' asked Philammon.

The porter stopped, surveyed him slowly from foot to head with an expression of boundless pity and contempt, and was in the act of walking off in the ecstasy of his disdain, when he was brought to suddenly by Philammon's strong arm.

'Ah!—I recollect. There is a compact. . . Who is Athens? The goddess, giver of wisdom Hera, spouse of Zeus, queen of the Celestials Aphrodite, mother of love. . . You are not expected to understand.'

Philammon did understand, however, so much as this, that Hypatia was a very unique and wonderful person in the mind of his little guide, and therefore asked the only further question by which he could as yet test any Alexandrian phenomenon—

'And is she a friend of the patriarch?'

The porter opened his eyes very wide, put his middle finger in a careful and complicated fashion between his fore and third fingers, and extending it playfully towards Philammon, performed therewith certain mysterious signals, the effect whereof being totally lost on him, the little man stopped, took another look at Philammon's stately figure, and answered—

'Of the human race in general, my young friend. The philosopher must rise above the individual, to the contemplation of the universal. . . Aha—Here is something worth seeing, and the gates are open.' And he stopped at the portal of a vast building.

'Is this the patriarch's house?'

'The patriarch's tastes are more plebeian. He lives, they say, in two dirty little rooms—knowing what is fit for him. The patriarch's house? Its antipodes, my young friend—that is, if such beings have a cosmic existence, on which point Hypatia has her doubts. This is the temple of art and beauty; the Delphic tripod of poetic inspiration, the solace of the earthworm drudge, in a word, the theatre; which your patriarch, if he could, would convert to-morrow into a— but the philosopher must not revile. Ah! I see the prefect's apparitors at the gate. He is making the polity, as we call it here, the dispositions; setting, in short, the bill of fare for the day, in compliance with the public palate. A facetious pantomime dances here on this day every week—admired by some, the Jews especially. To the more classic taste, many of his movements—his recoil, especially—are wanting in the true antique severity—might be called, perhaps, on the whole, indecent. Still the weary pilgrim must be amused. Let us step in and hear.'

But before Philammon could refuse, an uproar arose within, a rush outward of the mob, and inward of the prefect's apparitors.

'It is false!' shouted many voices. 'A Jewish calumny! The man is innocent!'

'There is no more sedition in him than there is in me,' roared a fat butcher, who looked as ready to fella a man as an ox. 'He was always the first and the last to clap the holy patriarch at sermon.'

'Dear tender soul,' whispered a woman, 'and I said to him only this morning, why don't you flog my boys, Master Hierax? how can you expect them to learn, if they are not flogged? And he said, he never could abide the sight of a rod, it made his back tingle so.'

'Which was plainly a prophecy.'

'And proves him innocent, for how could he prophesy if he was not one of the holy ones!'

'Monks, to the rescue! Hierax, a Christian, is taken and tortured in the theatre!' thundered a wild hermit, his beard and hair streaming about his chest and shoulders.

'Nitria! Nitria! For God and the mother of God, monks of Nitria! Down with the Jewish slanderers! Down with heathen tyrants!—And the mob, reinforced as if by magic by hundreds from without, swept down the huge vaulted passage, carrying Philammon and the porter with them.

'My friends,' quoth the little man, trying to look philosophically calm, though he was fairly off his legs, and hawking between heaven and earth on the elbows of the bystanders, 'whence this tumult?'

'The Jews got up a cry that Hierax wanted to raise a riot. Curse them and then sabbath, they are always rioting on Saturdays about this dancer of theirs, instead of working like honest Christians!'

'And rioting on Sunday instead. Ahem! sectarian differences, which the philosopher—'

The rest of the sentence disappeared with the speaker, as a sudden opening of the mob let him drop, and buried him under innumerable legs.

Philammon, furious at the notion of persecution, maddened by the cries around him, found himself bursting heresly through the crowd, till he reached the front ranks, where tall gates of open ironwork barred all further progress, but left a full view of the tragedy which was enacting within, where the poor innocent wretch, suspended from a gibbet, withied and shrieked at every stroke of the hide whips of his tormentors.

In vain Philammon and the monks around him knocked and beat at the gates, they were only answered by laughter and taunts from the apparitors within, curses on the turbulent mob of Alexandria, with its patriarch, clergy, saints, and churches, and promises to each and all outside, that their turn would come next, while the piteous screams grew fainter and more faint, and at last, with a convulsive shudder, motion and suffering ceased for ever in the poor mangled body.

'They have killed him! Martyred him! Back to the archbishop! To the patriarch's house he will avenge us!' And as the horrible news, and the watchword which followed it, passed outwardly through the crowd, they wheeled round as one man, and poured through street after street towards Cyril's house, while Philammon, beside himself with horror, rage, and pity, hurried onward with them.

A tumultuous hour, or more, was passed in the street before he could gain entrance; and then he was swept, along with the mob in which he had been fast wedged, through a dark low passage, and landed breathless in a quadrangle of mean and new buildings, overhung by the four hundred stately columns of the ruined Serapeum. The grass was already growing on the ruined capitals and architraves. Little did even its destroyers dream then, that the day would come when one only of that four hundred would be left, as 'Pompey's Pillar,' to show what the men of old could think and do.

Philammon at last escaped from the crowd, and putting the letter which he had carried in his bosom into the hands of one of the priests who was mixing with the mob, was beckoned by him into a corridor, and up a flight of stairs, and into a large, low, mean room, and there, by virtue of the world-wide freemasonry which Christianity had, for the first time on earth, established, found himself in five minutes awaiting the summons of the most powerful man south of the Mediterranean.

A curtain hung across the door of the inner chamber, through which Philammon could hear plainly the steps of some one walking up and down hurriedly and fiercely.

'They will drive me to it!' at last burst out a deep sonorous voice. 'They will drive me to it. Their blood be on their own head! It is not enough for them to blaspheme God and His church, to have the monopoly of all the cheating, fortune-telling, usury, sorcery, and coming of the city, but they must deliver my clergy unto the hands of the tyrant?'

'It was so even in the apostles' time,' suggested a softer but far more unpleasant voice.

'Then it shall be so no longer! God has given me the power to stop them, and God do so to me, and more also, if I do not use that power. To-morrow I sweep out this Augean stable of villainy, and leave not a Jew to blaspheme and cheat in Alexandria.'

'I am afraid such a judgment, however righteous, might offend his excellency.'

'His excellency! His tyranny! Why does Orestes truckle to these circumcised, but because they lend money to him and to his creatures? He would keep up a den of fiends in Alexandria if they would do as much for him! And then to play them off against me and mine, to bring religion into contempt by setting the mob together by the ears, and to end with outrages like this! Seditious! Have they not cause enough? The sooner I remove one of their temptations the better let the other tempter beware, lest his judgment be at hand!'

'The prefect, your holiness?' asked the other voice shyly.

'Who spoke of the prefect? Whosoever is a tyrant, and a murderer, and an oppressor of the poor, and a favourer of the philosophy which despises and enslaves the poor, should not he perish, though he be seven times a prefect?'

At this juncture Philammon, thinking perhaps that he had already heard too much, notified his presence by some slight noise, at which the secretary, as he seemed to be, hastily lifted the curtain, and somewhat sharply demanded his business. The names of Pambos and Arsennus, however, seemed to pacify him at once; and the trembling youth was ushered into the presence of him who in reality, though not in name, sat on the throne of the Pharaohs.

Not, indeed, in their outward pomp; the furniture of the chamber was but a grade above that of the artisan's, the dress of the great man was coarse and simple, if personal vanity peeped out anywhere, it was in the careful arrangement of the bushy beard, and of the few curling locks which the tonsure had spared. But the height and majesty of his figure, the stern and massive beauty of his features, the flashing eye, curling lip, and projecting brow—all marked him as one born to command. As the youth entered, Cyril stopped short in his walk, and looking him through and through, with a glance which burnt upon his cheeks like fire, and made him all but wish the kindly earth would open and hide him, took the letters, read them, and then began—

'Philammon. A Greek. You are said to have learned to obey. If so you have also learned to rule. Your father-abbot has transferred you to my tutelage. You are now to obey me.'

'And I will.'

'Well said. Go to that window, then, and leap into the court.'

Philammon walked to it, and opened it. The pavement was fully twenty feet below; but his business was to obey, and not take measurements. There was a flower in the vase upon the sill. He quietly removed it, and in an instant more would have leapt for life or death, when Cyril's voice thundered 'Stop!'

'The lad will pass, my Peter. I shall not be afraid now for the secrets which he may have overheard.'

Peter smiled assent, looking all the while as if he thought it a great pity that the young man had not been allowed to put talebearing out of his own power by breaking his neck.

'You wish to see the world. Perhaps you have seen something of it to-day.'

'I saw the murderer—'

'Then you saw what you came hither to see, what the world is, and what justice and mercy it can deal out. You would not dislike to see God's reprisals to man's tyranny! . . . Or to be a fellow worker with God therein, if I judge rightly by your looks!'

'I would avenge that man.'

'Ah! my poor simple schoolmaster! And his fate is the portent of portents to you now! Stay awhile, till you have gone with Ezekiel into the inner chambers of the devil's temple, and you will see worse things than these—women weeping for Thammuz, bemoaning the decay of an idolatry which they themselves disbelieve—That, too, is on the list of Heracles' labour, Peter mine.'

At this moment a deacon entered. 'Your holiness, the rabbi of the accursed nation are below, at your summons. We brought them in through the back gate, for fear of—'

'Right, right. An accident to them might have ruined us. I shall not forget you bring them up. Peter, take this youth, introduce him to the parabolani. Who will be the best man for him to work under?'

'The brother Theopompus is especially sober and gentle.'

Cyrl shook his head laughingly. 'Go into the next room, my son. No, Peter, put him under some fiery saint, some true Boanerges, who will talk him down, and work him to death, and show him the best and worst of everything. Cletoophon will be the man. Now then, let me see my engagements, five minutes for those Jews—Crestes did not choose to frighten them. Let us see whether Cyrl cannot; thou an hour to look over the hospital accounts, an hour for the schools; a half-hour for the reserved cases of distress, and another half-hour for myself, and then divine service. See that the boy is there. Do bring in every one in their turn, Peter mine. So much time goes in hunting for this man and that man. . . and life is too short for all that. Where are the Jews?' and Cyrl plunged into the latter half of his day's work with that untiring energy, self-reliance, and method, which commanded for him, in spite of all suspicions of his violence, ambition, and intrigue, the loving awe and implicit obedience of several hundred thousand human beings.

So Philammon went out with the parabolani, a sort of organised guild of district visitors. . . . And in their company he saw that afternoon the dark side of that world, whereof the harbour-panorama had been the bright one. In squalid misery, filth, profligacy, ignorance, ferocity, discontent, neglected in body, house, and soul, by the civil authorities, proving their existence only in aimless and sanguinary riots, there they starved and rotted, heap on heap, the masses of the old Greek population, close to the great food-exporting harbour of the world. Among these, fiercely perhaps, and fanatically, but still among them and for them, laboured those district visitors night and day. And so Philammon toiled away with them, carrying food and clothing, helping sick to the hospital, and dead to the burial, cleaning out the infested houses—for the fever was all but perennial in those quarters—and comforting the dying with the good news of forgiveness from above, till the larger number had to return to evening service. He, however, was kept by his superior, watching at a sick bedside, and it was late at night before he got home, and was reported to Peter the Reader as having acquitted himself like 'a man of God,' as, indeed, without the least thought of doing anything noble or self-sacrificing, he had truly done, being a monk. And so he threw himself on a trundle-bed, in one of the many cells which opened off a long corridor, and fell fast asleep in a minute.

He was just wakening about in a dreary dream-jumble of Gophers dancing with district visitors, Pelagia as an angel, with peacock's wings, Hypatia with horns and cloven feet, riding three hippopotami at once round the theatre, Cyrl standing at an open window, cursing frightfully, and pelting him with flower-pots, and a similar self-sown after-crop of his day's impressions, when he was awakened by the tramp of hurried feet in the street outside, and shouts, which gradually, as he became conscious, shaped themselves into cries of 'Alexander's Church is on fire! Help, good Christians! Fire! Help!'

Whereat he sat up in his trundle-bed, tried to recollect where he was, and having with some trouble succeeded, threw on his sheepskin, and jumped up to ask the news from the deacons and monks who were hurrying along the corridor outside. 'Yes, Alexander's church is on fire,' and down the stairs they poured, across the courtyard, and out into the street, Peter's tall figure serving as a standard and a rallying point.

As they rushed out through the gateway, Philammon, dazzled by the sudden transition from the darkness within to the blaze of moon and starlight which flooded the street, and walls, and shining roofs, hung back a moment. That hesitation probably saved his life, for in an instant he saw a dark figure spring out of the shadow, a long knife flashed across his eyes, and a priest next to him sank upon the pavement with a groan, while the assassin dashed off down the street, hotly pursued by monks and parabolani.

Philammon, who ran like a desert ostrich, had soon outstripped all but Peter, when several more dark figures sprang out of doorways and corners and joined, or seem to join, the pursuit. Suddenly, however, after running a hundred yards, they drew up opposite the mouth of a side street, the assassin stopped also. Peter, suspecting something wrong, slackened his pace, and caught Philammon's arm.

'Do you see those fellows in the shadow?'

But, before Philammon could answer, some thirty or forty men, their daggers gleaming in the moonlight, moved out into the middle of the street, and received the fugitives into their ranks. What was the meaning of it? Here was a pleasant taste of the ways of the most Christian and civilised city of the Empire!

'Well,' thought Philammon, 'I have come out to see the world, and I seem, at this rate, to be likely to see enough of it.'

Peter turned at once, and fled as quickly as he had pursued, while Philammon, considering discretion the better part of valour, followed, and they rejoined their party breathless.

'There is an armed mob at the end of the street.'

'Assassins! *Jews! 'A conspiracy!' Up rose a babel of doubtful voices. The foe appeared in sight, advancing stealthily, and the whole party took to flight, led once more by Peter, who seemed determined to make free use, in behalf of his own safety, of the long legs which nature had given him.

Philammon followed, sulkily and unwillingly, at a foot's pace, but he had not gone a dozen yards when a pitiable voice at his feet called to him—

'Help! mercy! Do not leave me here to be murdered! I am a Christian, indeed I am a Christian!'

Philammon stooped, and lifted from the ground a comely negro woman, weeping, and shivering in a few tattered remnants of clothing.

'I ran out when they said the church was on fire,' sobbed the poor creature, 'and the Jews beat and wounded me. They tore my shawl and tunic off me before I could get away from them, and then our own people run over me and trod me down. And now my husband will beat me if I ever get home. Quick! up this side street, or we shall be murdered!'

The armed men, whosoever they were, were close on them. There was no time to be lost, and Philammon, assuring her that he would not desert her, hurried her up the side street which she pointed out. But the pursuers had caught sight of them, and while the mass held on up the main street, three or four turned aside and gave chase. The poor negress could only hump along, and Philammon, unaimed, looked back, and saw the bright steel points gleaming in the moonlight, and made up his mind to die as a monk should. Nevertheless, youth is hopeful. One chance for life. He thrust the negress into a dark doorway, where her colour hid her well enough, and had just time to ensconce himself behind a pillar, when the foremost pursuer reached him. He held his breath in fearful suspense. Should he be seen? He would not die without a struggle at least. No! the fellow ran on, panting. But in a minute more, another came up, saw him suddenly, and sprang aside startled. That start saved Philammon. Quick as a cat, he leapt upon him, felled him to the earth with a single blow, tore the dagger from his hand, and sprang to his feet again just in time to strike his new weapon full into the third pursuer's face. 'The man put his hand to his head, and recoiled against a fellow-ruffian, who was close on his heels. Philammon, flushed with victory, took advantage of the confusion, and before the worthy pair could recover, dealt them half a dozen blows which, luckily for them, came from an unpractised hand, or the young monk might have had more than one life to answer for. As it was, they turned and limped off, cursing in an unknown tongue, and Philammon found himself triumphant and alone, with the trembling negress and the prostrate ruffian, who, stunned by the blow and the fall, lay groaning on the pavement.'

It was all over in a minute. . . . The negress was kneeling under the gateway, pouring out her simple thanks to Heaven for this unexpected deliverance, and Philammon was about to kneel too, when a thought struck him; and coolly despoiling the Jew of his shawl and sash, he handed them over to the poor negress, considering them fairly enough as his own by right of conquest, but, lo and behold! as she was overwhelming him with thanks, a fresh mob poured into the street from the upper end, and were close on them before they were aware.

A flush of terror and despair, . . . and then a burst of joy, as, by mingled moonlight and torchlight, Philammon detected priestly robes, and in the forefront of the battle—there being no apparent danger—Peter the leader, who seemed to be anxious to prevent inquiry, by beginning to talk as fast as possible.

'Ah, boy! Safe? The saints be praised! We give you up for dead! Whom have you here? A prisoner? And we have another. He ran right into off arms up the street, and the Lord delivered him into our hand. He must have passed you.'

'So he did,' said Philammon, dragging up his captive, 'and here is his fellow-wounded! Whereon the two worthies were speedily tied together by the elbows, and the party marched on once more in search of Alexander's church, and the supposed conflagration.'

Philammon looked round for the negress, but she had vanished. He was far too much ashamed of being known to have been alone with a woman to say anything about her. Yet he longed to see her again; an interest even something like an affection—had already sprung up in his heart toward the poor simple creature whom he had delivered from death. Instead of thanking her ungrateful for not staying to tell what he had done for her, he was thankful to her for having saved his blushes, by disappearing so opportunely. . . . And he longed to tell her so—to know if she was hurt—to— Oh, Philammon! only four days from the Laura, and a whole regiment of women acquaintances already! True, Providence having sent into the world about as many women as men, it may be difficult to keep out of their way altogether. Perhaps, too, Providence may have intended them to be of some use to that other sex, with whom it has so mixed them up.

Don't argue, poor Philammon; Alexander's church is on fire!—forward!

And so they hurried on, a confused mass of monks and populace, with their hapless prisoners in the centre, who, hauled, cuffed, questioned, and cursed by twenty self-elected inquisitors at once, thought fit, either from Jewish obstinacy or sheer bewilderment, to give no account whatsoever of themselves.

As they turned the corner of a street, the folding-doors of a large gateway rolled open, a long line of glittering figures poured across the road, dropped their spears on the pavement with a single rattle, and remained motionless. The front rank of the mob recoiled, and an awe-struck whisper ran through them.

'The Str' our ones!' 'Who are they?' asked Philammon in a whisper.

'The soldiers—the Roman soldiers,' answered a whisperer to him.

Philammon, who was among the leaders, had realised too—he hardly knew why—at that stern apparition. His next instinct was to press forward as close as he dared.

And these were Roman soldiers!—the conquerors of the world! the men whose name had thrilled him from his childhood with vague awe and admiration, dimly heard of up there in the lonely Laura.

Roman soldiers! And here he was face to face with them at last!

His curiosity received a sudden check, however, as he found his arm seized by an officer, as he took him to be, from the gold ornaments on his belt and empress, who lifted his vine-stock threateningly over the young monk's head, and demanded—

'What's all this about? Why are you not quietly in your beds, you Alexandrian rascals?'

'Alexander's church is on fire,' answered Philammon, thinking the shortest answer the wisest.

'So much the better.'

'And the Jews are murdering the Christians.'

'Fight it out, then. Turn in, men, it's only a riot.'

And the steel-clad apparition suddenly flashed round and vanished, tramping and jangling, into the dark jaws of the guardhouse-gate, while the stream, its temporary barrier removed, rushed on wilder than ever.

Philammon, hurried on too with them, not without a strange feeling of disappointment.

'Only a riot!' Peter was chuckling to his brothers over their cleverness in 'having kept the prisoners in the middle, and stopped the rascals' mouths till they were past the guardhouse.'

'A fine thing to boast of,' thought Philammon, 'in the face of the men who make and unmake kings and Caesars.'

'Only a riot!' He, and the corps of distinct victors—whom he fancied the most august body on earth—and Alexander's church, Christians murdered by Jews, persecution of the Catholic faith, and all the rest of it, was simply, then, not worth the notice of those forty men, alone and secure in the sense of power and discipline, among tens of thousands. He hated them, those soldiers. Was it because they were indifferent to the cause of which he was inclined to think himself a not unimportant member, on the strength of his late Samson's defeat of Jewish persecutors? At least, he obeyed the little porter's advice, and 'felt very small indeed.'

And he felt smaller still, being young and alive to ridicule, when, at some sudden ebb or flow, wave or wriggle of the Babel sea, which weltered up and down every street, a shrill female voice informed them from an upper window, that Alexander's church was not on fire at all, that she had gone to the top of the house, as they might have gone, if they had not been fools, etc. etc., and that it 'looked as safe and as ugly as ever', whereupon a brickbat or two having been sent up in answer, she shut the blinds, leaving them to halt, inquire, discover gradually and piecemeal, after the method of mobs, they had been following the nature of mobs, that no one had seen the church on fire, or seen any one else who had seen the same, or even seen any light in the sky in any quarter, or knew who raised the cry, or—in short, Alexander's church was two miles off, if it was on fire, it was either burnt down or saved by this time, if not, the night air was, to say the least, chilly and, whether it was or not, there were ambuscades of Jews—Satan only knew how strong—in every street between them and it.

Might it not be better to secure their two prisoners, and then ask for further orders from the archbishop? Whereupon, after the manner of mobs, they melted off the way they came, by twos and threes, till three of a contrary opinion began to hulk themselves left alone, and having a strong dislike to Jewish diggers, were fain to follow the stream.

With a panic or two, a cry of 'The Jews are on us!' and a general rush in every direction (in which one or two, seeking shelter from the awful nothing in neighbouring houses, were handed over to the watch as burglars, and sent to the quarries accordingly), they reached the Scrapem, and there found, of course, a counter-mob collected to inform them that they had been taken in—that Alexander's church had never been on fire at all—that the Jews had murdered a thousand Christians at least, though three dead bodies, including the poor priest who lay in the house within, were all of the thousand who had yet been seen—and that the whole Jews' quarter was marching upon them. At which news it was considered advisable to retreat into the archbishop's house as quickly as possible, barricade the doors, and prepare for a siege—a work at which Philammon performed prodigies, tearing woodwork from the rooms, and stones from the parapets, before it struck some of the more sober-minded that it was as well to wait for some more decided demonstration of attack, before incurring so heavy a carpenter's bill of repairs.

At last the heavy tramp of footsteps was heard coming down the street, and every window was crowded in an instant with eager heads; while Peter rushed downstairs to heat the large copper, having some experience in the defensive virtues of boiling water. The bright moon glittered on a long line of helmets and cuirasses. Thank Heaven! it was the soldiery.

'Are the Jews coming?' 'Is the city quiet?' 'Why did not you prevent this villainy?' 'A thousand citizens murdered while you have been snoring'—and a volley of similar ejaculations, greeted the soldiers as they passed, and were answered by a cool—'To your perches, and sleep, you noisy chickens, or we'll set the coop on fire about your ears.'

A yell of defiance answered this polite speech, and the soldiery, who knew perfectly well that the unarmed ecclesiastics within were not to be trifled with, and had no ambition to die by coping-stones and hot pater, went quietly on their way.

All danger was now past, and the cackling rose jubilant, louder than ever, and might have continued till daylight, had not a window in the courtyard been suddenly thrown open, and the awful voice of Cyril commanded silence.

'Every man sleep where he can. I shall wait you at daybreak. The superiors of the parabolani are to come up to me with the two prisoners, and the men who took them.'

In a few minutes Philammon found himself, with some twenty others, in the great man's presence. He was sitting at his desk, writing, quietly, small notes on slips of paper.

'Here is the youth who helped me to pursue the murderer, and having outrun me, was attacked by the prisoners,' said Peter. 'My hands are clean from blood, I thank the Lord!'

'Three set on me with daggers,' said Philammon, apologetically, 'and I was forced to take this one's dagger away, and beat off the two others with it.'

Cyril smiled, and shook his head.

'Thou art a brave boy, but hast thou not read, "If a man smite thee on one cheek, turn to him the other"?''

'I could not run away, as Master Peter and the rest did.'

'So you ran away, eh? my worthy friend?'

'Is it not written,' asked Peter, in his blandest tone, 'If they persecute you in one city, flee unto another?'

Cyril smiled again. 'And why could not you run away, boy?'

Philammon blushed scarlet, but he dared not lie. 'There was a—a poor black woman, wounded and trodden down, and I dare not leave her, for she told me she was a Christian.'

'Right, my son, right. I shall remember this. What was her name?'

'I did not hear it.—Stay, I think she said Judith.'

'Ah! the wife of the porter who stands at the lecture-room door, which God confound! A devout woman, full of good works, and sorely ill-treated by her heathen husband. Peter, thou shalt go to her to-morrow with the physician, and see if she is in need of anything. Boy, thou hast done well. Cyril never forgets. Now bring up those Jews. Their Rabbis were with me two hours ago promising peace, and thus is the way they have kept their promise. So be it. The wicked is snared in his own wickedness.'

The Jews were brought in, but kept a stubborn silence.

'Your holiness perceives,' said some one, 'that they have each of them rings of green palm-leaf on their right hand.'

'A very dangerous sign! An evident conspiracy!' commented Peter.

'Ah! What does that mean, you rascals? Answer me, as you value your lives.'

'You have no business with us. We are Jews, and none of your people,' said one sulkily.

'None of my people? You have murdered my people! None of my people? Every soul in Alexandria is mine, if the kingdom of God means anything, and you shall find it out. I shall not argue with you, my good friends, any more than I did with your Rabbis. Take these fellows away, Peter, and lock them up in the fuel-cellar, and see that they are guarded. If any man lets them go, his life shall be for the life of them.'

And the two worthies were led out.

'Now, my brothers, here are your orders. You will divide these notes among yourselves, and distribute them to trusty and godly catholics in your districts. Wait one hour, till the city be quiet, and then start, and raise the church. I must have thirty thousand men by sunrise.'

'What for, your holiness?' asked a dozen voices.

'Read your notes. Whosoever will fight to-morrow under the banner of the Lord, shall have free plunder of the Jews' quarter, outrage and murder only forbidden. As I have said it, God do so to me, and more also, if there be a Jew left in Alexandria by to-morrow at noon. Go.'

And the staff of orderlies filed out, thanking Heaven that they had a leader so prompt and valiant, and spent the next hour over the hall fire, eating millet cakes, drinking bad beer, likening Cyril to Barak, Gideon, Samson, Jephthah, Judas Maccabeus, and all the worthies of the Old Testament, and then started on their pacific errand.

Philammon was about to follow them, when Cyril stopped him.

'Stay, my son, you are young and rash, and do not know the city. Lie down here and sleep in the anteroom. Three hours hence the sun rises, and we go forth against the enemies of the Lord.'

Philammon threw himself on the floor in a corner, and slumbered like a child, till he was awakened in the gray dawn by one of the parabolani.

'Up, boy! and see what we can do. Cyril goes down greater than Barak the son of Abinoam, not with ten, but with thirty thousand men at his feet!

'Ay, my brothers!' said Cyril, as he passed proudly out in full pontificals, with a gorgeous retinue of priests and deacons 'the Catholic Church has her organisation, her unity, her common cause, her watchwords, such as the tyrants of the earth, in their weakness and their divisions, may envy and tremble at, but cannot mutate. Could Orestes raise, in three hours, thirty thousand men, who would die for him?'

'As we will for you!' shouted many voices.

'Say for the kingdom of God.' And he passed it.

And so ended Philanimon's first day in Alexandria.

CHAPTER VI

THE NEW DIOGENES

ABOUT five o'clock the next morning, Raphael Aben-Ezra was lying in bed, alternately yawning over a manuscript of Philo Judæus, pulling the ears of his huge British mastiff, watching the sparkle of the 'mountain in the court outside, wondering when that lazy boy would come to tell him that the bath was warmed, and meditating, half aloud

'Alas! poor me! Here I am, back again just at the point from which I started.'

How am I to get free from that heathen Suen? Plagues on her! I shall end by falling in love with her. . . I don't know that I have not got a bail of the blind boy in me already. I felt absurdly glad the other day when that fool told me he dare not accept her modest offer. Ha! ha! A delicious joke it would have been to have seen Orestes howling down to stocks and stones, and Hypatia installed in the ruins of the Scraparium, as High Priestess of the Abomin-tion of Desolation! . . . And now. . . Well

I call all heaven and earth to witness, that I have fought valiantly. I have faced mighty little Eros like a man, red in hand. What could a poor human being do more than try to marry her to some one else, in hopes of sickening himself of the whole matter? Well, every moth has its candle, and every man his destiny.

But the darling of the little fool? What huge imaginings she has! She might be another

Zenobia, now, with Orestes as Odenatus. And Raphael Aben-Ezra to play the part of Longinus and receive Longinus's salary of six or poison. She don't care for me, she would smother me, or a thousand of me, the cold blooded fanatical archangel that she is, to water with our blood the foundation of some new temple of cast rags and broken dolls. . . Oh, Raphael

Aben-Ezra, what a fool you are! You know you are going off as usual to her lecture, this very morning!

At this crisis of his confessions the page entered, and announced, not the bath, but Miriam.

The old woman, who, in virtue of her profession, had the private entry of all fashionable chambers in Alexandria, came in hurriedly, and instead of seating herself as usual, for a gossip, remained standing, and motioned the boy out of the room.

'Well, my sweet mother? Sit. Ah? I see! You rascal, you have brought in no wine for the lady. Don't you know her little ways yet?'

'Eros has got it at the door, of course,' answered the boy, with a saucy air of offended virtue.

'Out with you, imp of Satan!' cried Miriam. 'This is no time for wheedling. Raphael Aben-Ezra, why are you lying here? Did you not receive a note last night?'

'A note? So I did, but I was too sleepy to read it. There it lies. Boy, bring it here. . .

What's this? A scrap out of Jeremiah? "Arise, and flee for thy life, for evil is determined against the whole house of Israel!"—Does this come from the chief rabbi, I always took the venerable father for a sober man. . . Eh,

Miriam?'

'Fool! instead of laughing at the sacred words of the prophets, get up and obey them. I sent you the note.'

'Why can't I obey them in bed? Here I am, reading hard at the Cabbala, or Philo—who is stupider still—and what more would you have?'

The old woman, unable to restrain her impaticence, literally ran at him, gnashing her teeth, and, before he was aware, dragged him out of bed upon the floor, where he stood meekly wondering what would come next.

'Many thanks, mother, for having saved me the one daily torture of life—getting out of bed

by one's own exertion.'

'Raphael Aben-Ezra! are you so besotted with your philosophy and your heathenry, and your laziness, and your contempt for God and man, that you will see your nation given up for a prey, and your wealth plundered by heathen dogs? I tell you, Cyril has sworn that God shall do so to him, and more also, if there be a Jew left in Alexandria by to-morrow about this time.'

'So much the better for the Jews, then, if they are half as tired of this noisy Pandemonium as I am. But how can I help it? Am I Queen

Ethere, to go to Abasnerus there in the prefect's palace, and get him to hold out the golden sceptre to me?'

'Fool! if you had read that note last night, you might have gone and saved us, and your name would have been handed down for ever from generation to generation as a second Mordecai.

'My dear mother, Abasnerus would have been either fast asleep, or far too drunk to listen to me. Why did you not go yourself?'

'Do you suppose that I would not have gone if I could? Do you fancy me a sluggard like yourself! At the risk of my life I have got into in time, if there be time to save you'

'Well shall I dress! What can be done now!'

'Nothing! The streets are blocked by Cyril's mob—There! do you hear the shouts and screams! They are attacking the father part of the quarter already'

'What! are they murdering them?' asked Raphael, throwing on his pelisse 'Because, if it has really come to a practical joke of that kind, I shall have the greatest pleasure in employing a counter-irritant. Heie, boy! My sword and dagger! Quick!'

'No, the hypocrites! No blood is to be shed, they say, if we make no resistance, and let them pass. Cyril and his monks are there, to prevent outrage, and so forth.
 The Angel of the Lord scatter them!'

The conversation was interrupted by the rushing in of the whole household, in an agony of terror, and Raphael, at last thoroughly roused, went to a window, which looked into the street. The thoroughfare was full of scolding women and screaming children, while men, old and young, looked on at the plunder of their property with true Jewish doggedness, too prudent to resist, but too manful to complain, while furniture came flying out of every window, and from door after door poured a stream of rascality, carrying off money, jewels, silks, and all the treasures which Jewish usury had accumulated during many a generation. But unmoved amid the roaring sea of plunderers and plundered, stood, scattered up and down, Cyril's spiritual police, enforcing, by a word, an obedience which the Roman soldiers could only have compelled by hard blows of the spear-butt.
 'There was to be no outrage, and no outrage there was and more than once some man in priestly robes hurried through the crowd, leading by the hand, tenderly enough, a lost child in search of its parents.

Raphael stood watching silently, while Miriam, who had followed him upstairs, paced the room in an ecstacy of rage, calling vainly to him to speak or act.

'Let me alone, mother,' he said, at last 'It will be full ten minutes more before they pay me a visit, and in the meantime what can one do better than watch the progress of this, the little Exodus!'

'Not like that first one! Then we went forth with cymbals and songs to the Red Sea triumph! Then we borrowed, every woman of her neighbour, jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment.'

'And now we pay them back again, it is but fair, after all. We ought to have listened to Jeremiah a thousand years ago, and never gone back again, like fools, into a country to which we were so deeply in debt.'

'Accursed land!' cried Miriam. 'In an evil hour our forefathers disobeyed the prophet; and now we reap the harvest of our sins!—Our sons have forgotten the faith of their forefathers for the philosophy of the Gentiles, and fill their chambers' (with a contemptuous look round)

 'with heathen imagery; and our daughters are —Look there!'

As she spoke, a beautiful girl rushed shrieking out of an adjoining house, followed by some half-drunk ruffian, who was clutching at the gold chains and trinkets with which she was profusely bedecked, after the fashion of Jewish women. The rascal had just seized with one hand her streaming black tresses, and with the other a heavy collar of gold, which was wound round her throat, when a priest, stepping up, laid a quiet hand upon his shoulder. The fellow, too maddened to obey, turned, and struck back the restraining arm . . . and in an instant was felled to the earth by a young monk . . .

'Toucheest thou the Lord's anointed, sacrilegious wretch!' cried the man of the desert, as the fellow dropped on the pavement, with his booty in his hand.

The monk tore the gold necklace from his grasp, looked at it for a moment with childish wonder, as a savage might at some incomprehensible product of civilised industry, and then, spitting on it in contempt, dashed it on the ground, and trampled it into the mud.

'Follow the golden wedge of Achan, and the silver of Iscarot, thou root of all evil!' And he rushed on, yelling, 'Down with the circumcision! Down with the blasphemers!'—while the poor girl vanished among the crowd.

Raphael watched him with a quaint thoughtful smile, while Miriam shrieked aloud at the destruction of the precious trumpery.

'The monk is right, mother. If those Christians go on upon that method, they must beat us.
 It has been our ruin from the first, our fault for loading ourselves with the thick clay.'

'What will you do?' cried Miriam, clutching him by the arm.

'What will you do?'

'I am safe. I have a boat waiting for me on the canal at the garden gate, and in Alexandria
 I stay, no Christian hound shall make old Miriam move a foot against her will. My jewels are all buried—my girls are sold, save what you can, and come with me!'

'My sweet mother, why so peculiarly solicitous about my welfare, above that of all the sons of Judah?'

'Because—because—No, I'll tell you that another time. But I loved your mother, and she loved me. Come!'

Raphael relapsed into silence for a few minutes, and watched the tumult below.

'How those Christian priests keep their men in order! There is no use resisting destiny.
 They are the strong men of the time, after all,
 and the little Exodus must needs have its course.
 Miriam, daughter of Jonathan—'

'I am no man's daughter! I have neither father nor mother, husband nor—Call me mother again!'

'Whatsoever I am to call you, there are jewels enough in that closet to buy half Alexandria. Take them. I am going.

'With me!'

'Out into the wide world, my dear lady. I am bored with riches. That young savage of a monk understood them better than we Jews do. I shall just make a virtue of necessity, and turn beggar.'

'Beggar?'

'Why not? Don't argue. These scoundrels will make no one, whether I like or not, so forth I go. There will be few leavetakings. This brute of a dog is the only friend I have on earth, and I love her, because she has the true old, dogged, spiteful, cunning, obstinate, Maccabee spirit in her—of which it was her a spark lit in us just now, there would be no little Exodus, eh, Bran, my beauty?'

You can escape with me to the perfects, and save the mass of your wealth.'

'Exactly what I don't want to do. I hate that prophet as I hate a dead camel, or the vulture who eats him. And to tell the truth, I am growing a great deal too fond of that heathen woman there.'

'What?' shrieked the old woman—'Hypatia?'

'If you choose. At all events, the easiest way to cut the knot is to expatriate. I shall beg my passage on board the first ship to Cyrene, and go and study life in Italy with Hierarchus's expedition. Quick—take the jewels, and loved flesh troubles her yourself with them. I am going. My liberators are battering the outer door already.'

Miriam greedily tore out of the closet diamonds and pearls, rubies and emeralds, and concealed them among her ample robes—'Go! go! Escape from her! I will hide your jewels.'

'Ay, hide them, as mother earth does all things, in that all-embracing bosom. You will have doubled them before we meet again, no doubt. Farewell, mother!'

'But not for ever, Raphael! not for ever! Promise me, in the name of the four archangels, that if you are in trouble or danger, you will write to me, at the house of Euphronion.'

'The little porter philosopher, who hangs about Hypatia's lecture-room?'

'The same, the same. He will give me your letter, and I swear to you, I will cross the mountains of Kaf, to deliver you—I will pay you all back. By Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob I swear! May my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, if I do not account to you for the last penny!'

'Don't commit yourself to rash promises, my dear lady. If I am bored with poverty, I can but borrow a few gold pieces of a rabbi, and turn pedlar. I really do not trust you to pay me back, so I shall not be disappointed if you do not. Why should I?'

'Because—because—O God! No—never mind! You shall have all back. Spirit of Elias! where is the black agate? Why is it not among these?—The broken half of the black agate talisman!'

Raphael turned pale. 'How did you know that I have a black agate?'

'How did I? How did I not?' cried she, clutching him by the arm. 'Where is it? All depends on that! Fool!' she went on, throwing him off from her at arm's length, as a sudden suspicion stung her—'you have not given it to the heathen woman?'

'By the soul of my fathers, then, you mysterious old witch, who seem to know everything, that is exactly what I have done.'

Miriam clapped her hands together wildly. 'Lost! lost! lost! No! I will have it, if I tear it out of her heart! I will be avenger of her—the strange woman who flatters with her words, to whom the simple go in, and know not that the devil is there, and that her guests are in the depths of hell! Cool do so to me, and thou also, if she and her sorceries be on earth a twelvemonth hence!'

'Silence, Jezabel! Heathen or none, she is as pure as the sunlight! I only gave it her because she launched the talisman upon it.'

'To enchant you with it, to your ruin!'

'Bingo of a slave-dealer! you fancy every one as base as the poor wretches whom you buy and sell to shame, that you may make them slaves into the children of hell, if that be possible, as yourself!'

Miriam looked at him, her large black eyes widening and kindling. For an instant she lit for her poniard—and then burst into an agony of tears, hid her face in her withered hands, and rushed from the room, as a crash and shout below announced the bursting of the door.

'There she goes with my jewels! And here come my guests, with the young monk at their head.—One rising when the other sets. A worthy pair of Discours! Come, Bran! Boys! Slaves! Where are you? Sit down, one what he can lay his hands on, and run for your lives through the back gate!'

The slaves had obeyed him already. He walked smiling downstairs through utter solitude, and in the front passage met face to face the mob of monks, costermongers and dock-workers, fishermen and beggars, who were thronging up the narrow entry, and bursting into the doors right and left, and at their head, alas! the young monk who had just trampled the weeklings into the mud. No other, in fact, than Euphronion.

'Welcome, my worthy guests! Enter, I beseech you, and fulfil, in your own peculiar way, the precepts which bid you not be over anxious for the good things of this life. . . . For eating and drinking, my kitchen and cellar are at your service. For clothing, if any illustrious personage will do me the honour to change his holy rags with me, here are an Indian shawl-pelisse and a pair of silk trousers at his service. Perhaps you will accommodate me, my handsome young captain, choragus of this new school of the prophets?'

Philammon, who was the person addressed, tried to push by him contemptuously.

'Allow me, sir, I lead the way. This dagger is poisoned, a scratch and you are dead. This dog is of the true British breed, it she bites you, red hot iron will not loose her, till she hears the bone crack. If any one will change clothes with me, all I have is at your service. If not, the first that stirs is a dead man.'

There was no mistaking the quiet, high bred determination of the speaker. Had he ragged and blustered, Philammon could have met him on his own ground. But there was an easy self-possession about him, which utterly abashed the young monk, and abashed, too, the whole crowd of rascals at his heels.

'I'll change clothes with you, you Jewish dog,' roared a dirty fellow out of the mob.

'I am your eternal debtor. Let us step into this side room. Walk Capstair, my friends. Take care there, sir!—That porcelain, whole, is worth three thousand gold pieces. Broken it is not worth three pence. I leave it to your good sense to treat it accordingly. Now then, my friend!' And in the midst of the raging vortex of plunderers, who were snatching up everything which they could carry away, and breaking everything which they could not, he quickly divested himself of his linen, and put on the ragged cotton tunic, and lattered straw hat, which the fellow handed over to him.

Philammon, who had hid from the first no mind to plunder, stood watching Raphael with dumb wonder, and a shudder of regret, he knew not why, passed through him, as he saw the mob tearing down pictures, and dashing statues to the ground. Heathen! they were, doubtless, but still, the Nymphs and Venuses looked too lovely to be so brutally destroyed. There was something almost humanly pitiful in their poor broken arms and legs, as they lay about upon the pavement. He laughed at himself for the notion, but he could not laugh it away.

Raphael seemed to think that he ought not to laugh it away, for he pointed to the fragments, and with a quaint look at the young monk—

'Our nurses used to tell us,

'If you can't make it,
You ought not to break it.'

'I had no nurse,' said Philammon.

'Ah!—that accounts for this and other things. Well,' he went on, with the most provoking good nature, 'you are in a fair road, my handsome youth, I wish you joy of your fellow workmen, and of your apprenticeship in the noble art of monkery. Riot and pillage, shrieking women and homeless children in your twentieth summer, are the sure path to a snail-shell, such as Paul of Tarsus, who, with all his eccentricities, was a gentleman, certainly never contemplated. I have heard of Phœbus Apollo under many disguises, but this is the first time I ever saw him in the wolf's ludo.'

'Or in the lion's,' said Philammon, trying in his shame to make a fine speech.

'Like the Ass in the Fable. Farewell! Stand out of the way, friends! 'Ware teeth and poison!'

And he disappeared among the crowd, who made way respectfully enough for his dagger and his bristled rampart.

CHAPTER VII

THINK BY WHOM OFFENCES COME

PHILAMMON'S heart smote him all that day, whenever he thought of his morning's work. Till then all Christians, monks above all, had been infallible in his eyes. All Jews and heathens, insane and accursed. Moreover, meekness under insult, fortitude in calamity, the contempt of worldly comfort, the worship of poverty as a noble estate, were virtues which the Church Catholic boasted as her peculiar heritage. On which side had the balance of these qualities inclined that morning? The figure of Raphael, striking out rugged and penurious into the wide world, haunted him, with its quiet self-assured smile. And there haunted him, too, another penitency in the man, which he had never before remarked in any one but Arsenius—that ease and grace, that courtesy and self-restraint, which made Raphael's monks rankle all the more keenly, because he felt that the reboiler was in some mysterious way superior to him, and saw through him, and could have won him over, or crushed him in argument, or in intrigue—or in anything, perhaps, except mere brute force. Strange—that Raphael, of all men, should in those few moments have unmasked him so much of Arsenius, and that the very same qualities which gave a peculiar charm to the latter should give a peculiar unloveliness to the former, and yet be, without a doubt, the same. What was it? Was it rank which gave it? Arsenius had been a great & in, he knew—the companion of kings. And Raphael seemed rich. He had heard the monk crying out against the priest for favouring him. Was it then familiarity with the great ones of the world which produced this manner and tone? It was a real strength, whether in Arsenius or in Raphael. He felt humbled before it—envied it. If it made Arsenius a more complete and more captivating person, why should it not do the same for him? Why should not he, too, have his share of it?

Bungling with it such thoughts as these, the day ran on till noon, and the mid-day meal, and the afternoon's work, to which Philammon looked forward joyfully, as a refuge from his own thoughts.

He was sitting on his sheepskin upon a step, basking, like a true son of the desert, in a blaze of fiery sunshine, which made the black stone-work too hot to touch with the bare hand, watching the swallows, as they threaded the columns of the Sorapeum, and thinking how often he had delighted in their air-dance, as they turned and hawked up and down the dusty old glen at Seta. A crowd of citizens with causes, appeals, and petitions, were passing in and out from the patriarch's audience-room. Peter and the archdeacon were waiting in the shade close by, for the gutturing of the parabolani, and talking over the morning's work in an earnest whisper, in which the names of Hypatia and Orestes were now and then audible.

An old priest came up, and bowing reverently enough to the archdeacon, requested the help of one of the parabolani. He had a sailor's truly, all fever-stricken, who must be removed to the hospital at once.

The archdeacon looked at him, answered an odd hand 'Very well,' and went on with his task.

The priest, bowing lower than before, represented the immediate necessity for help.

'It is very odd,' said Peter to the swallows in the Scapennum, 'that some people cannot obtain influence enough in their own parishes to get the simplest good works performed without formulating his holiness the patriarch.'

The old priest mumbled some sort of excuse, and the archdeacon, without deigning a second look at him, said—'Find him a man, brother Peter. Anybody will do. What is that boy—Philammon doing there? Let him go with Master Hieron.'

Peter seemed not to receive the proposition favourably, and whispered something to the archdeacon.

'No. I can spare none of the rest. Important persons must take their chance of being well-served. Come—here are our brethren—we will all go together.'

The father together the better for the boy's sake,' grumbled Peter, loud enough for Philammon—perhaps for the old priest—to overhear him.

So Philammon went out with them, and as he went questioned his companions mockingly enough as to who Raphael was.

'A friend of Hypatia's! that name, too, haunted him, and he began, as stealthily and modestly as he could, to obtain information about her. There was no need for his caution for the very mention of her name roused the whole party into a fury of execration.

'My God confound her, such an enchantress, dealer in spells and sorceries! She is the strange woman of whom Solomon prophesied.'

'It is my opinion,' said another, 'that she is the forerunner of Antichrist.'

'Perhaps the virgin of whom it is prophesied that he will be born,' suggested another.

'Not that, I'll warrant her,' said Peter, with a savage sneer.

'And is Raphael Ahen-Ezra her pupil in philosophy?' asked Philammon.

'Her pupil in whatsoever she can find wherewith to delude men's souls,' said the old priest. 'The reality of philosophy has died long ago, but the great ones find it still worth their while to worship its shadow.'

'Some of them worship more than a shadow, when they hunt her house,' said Peter. 'Do you think Orestes goes thither only for philosophy?'

'We must not judge harsh judgments,' said the old priest, 'Synesius of Cyrene is a holy man, and yet he loves Hypatia well.'

'He a holy man?—and keeps a wife! One who had the insolence to tell the blessed Theophilus himself that he would not be made bishop unless he were allowed to remain with her, and despised the gift of the Holy Ghost in comparison of the carnal joys of wedlock, not knowing the Scriptures, which say that those who are in the flesh cannot please God! Well said Synesius of Rome of such men—"Can the Holy Spirit of God dwell in other than holy bodies?" No wonder that such a one as Synesius grovels at the feet of Orestes' mistress!'

'Then she is profligate?' asked Philammon. 'She must be. Has a heathen faith and grace? And without faith and grace, are not all our righteousnesses as filthy rags! What says St. Paul—That God has given them over to a reprobate mind, full of all injustice, uncleanness, covetousness, malice, you know the catalogue—why do you ask me?'

'Alas! and is she this?'

'Alas! And why dost? How would the Gospel be glorified if heathens were holier than Christians? It ought to be so, therefore it is so. If she seems to have virtue, then, being done without the grace of Christ, are only bedazzled views, cunning shams, the devil transformed into an angel of light. And as for chastity, the flower and crown of all virtues—whosoever says that she, being yet a heathen, has that, blasphemes the Holy Spirit, whose peculiar and highest gift it is, and is anathema unmanita for ever! Amen!'

And Peter, devoutly crossing himself, turned angrily and contemptuously away from his young companion. Philammon was quite shrewd enough to see that assertion was not identical with proof. But Peter's argument of 'straight to be, therefore it is,' is one which saves a great deal of trouble—and no doubt he had very good sources of information. So Philammon walked on sad, he knew not why, at the new notion which he had formed of Hypatia, as a sort of awful sorceress Mesdina, whose den was foul with magicians and immed souls of men. And yet if that was all she had to teach, whence had her pupil Raphael learned that fortitude of his? If philosophy had, as they said, utterly died out, then what was Raphael?

Just then, Peter and the rest turned up a side street, and Philammon and Hieron were left to go on their joint errand together. They paced on for some way in silence, up one street and down another, till Philammon, for want of anything better to say, asked where they were going.

'Where I choose, at all events. No, young man! If I, a priest, am to be insulted by archdeacons and readers, I won't be insulted by you.'

'I assure you I meant no harm.'

'Of course not, you all learn the same trick, and the young ones catch it of the old ones fast enough. Words smoother than butter, yet very swart.'

'You do not mean to complain of the archdeacon and his companions?' said Philammon, who of course was boiling over with pugnacious respect for the body to which he belonged.

No answer.

'Why, sir, are they not among the most holy and devoted of men?'

'Ah—yes,' said his companion, in a tone which sounded very like 'Ah—no.'

'You do not think so?' asked Philammon humbly.

'You are young, you are young. Wait a while till you have seen as much as I have. A degenerate age this, my son; not like the good old times, when men dare suffer and die for the faith. We are too prosperous nowadays, and fine ladies walk about with Magdalens embroidered on their silks, and gospels hanging round their necks. When I was young they died for that with which they now bedizen themselves.'

'But I was speaking of the present.'

'Ah, there are a great many among them who have not much business where they are. Don't say I said so. But many a rich man puts his name on the list of the guild just to get his exemption from taxes, and leaves the work to poor men like you. Rotten, rotten my son, and you will find it out. The preachers, now, people used to say—I know Abbot Isidore did—that I had as good a gift for expounding as any man in Pelusium, but since I came here, eleven years since, if you will believe it, I have never been asked to preach in my own parish church.'

'You surely jest?'

'True, as I am a christened man. I know why—I know why they are afraid of Isidore's iron here. . . Perhaps they may have caught the holy man's trick of plain speaking—and ears are dainty in Alexandria. And there are some in these parts, too, that have never forgiven him the part he took about those three villains, Marc, Zenon, and Martinian, and a certain letter that came of it, or another letter either, which we know of, about taking alms for the church from the gains of robbers and usurers. "Cyril never forgets." So he says to every one who does him a good turn. And so he does to every one who he fancies has done him a bad one. So here am I slaving away, a subordinate priest, while such fellows as Peter the Reader look down on me as their slave. But it's always so. There never was a bishop yet, except the blessed Augustine—would to Heaven I had taken my abbot's advice, and gone to him at Ilippo—who had not his flatterers and his tale-bearers, and generally the archdeacon at the head of them, ready to step into the bishop's place when he dies, over the heads of hard-working parish priests. But that is the way of the world. The sleekest and the oiliest, and the noisiest, the man who can bring in most money to the charities, never mind whence or how, the man who will take most of the bishop's work off his hands, and agree with him in everything he wants, and save him, by spying and eavesdropping, the trouble of using his own eyes, that is the man to succeed in Alexandria, or Constantinople, or Rome at itself. Look now, there are but seven deacons to this great city, and all its priests, and they and the archdeacon are the masters of it and us. They and that Peter manage Cyril's work for him, and when Cyril makes the archdeacon a bishop, he will make Peter archdeacon. They have their reward, they have their reward and so has Cyril, for that matter.'

'How?'

'Why, don't say I said it. But what do I care? I have nothing to lose, I'm sure. But they do say that there are two ways of promotion in Alexandria: one by deserving it, the other by paying for it. That's all.'

'Impossible!'

'Oh, of course, quite impossible. But all I know is just this, that when that fellow Amminius got back again into Pelusium, after being turned out by the late bishop for a rogue and hypocrite as he was, and got the ear of this present bishop, and was appointed his steward, and ordained priest—I'd as soon have ordained that street dog—and plundered him and brought him to disgrace, for I don't believe this bishop is a bad man, but those who use rogues must expect to be called rogues—and ground the poor to the earth, and tyrannised over the whole city so that no man's property, or reputation, scarcely then lives, wife side, and after all, but the napuddee, when he was called on by his accusers, to bring the church in as owing him money, I just know that, that he added to all his other shamelessness this, that he offered the patriarch a large sum of money to buy a bishopric of him. . . And what do you think the patriarch answered?'

'Excommunicated the sacrilegious wretch, of course!'

'Sent him a letter to say that if he dared to do such a thing again he should really be forced to expose him! So the fellow, taking courage, brought his money himself the next time—and all the world says that Cyril would have made him a bishop after all, if Abbot Isidore had not written to remonstrate.'

'He could not have known the man's character,' said poor Philammon, hunting for an excuse.

'The whole Delta was ringing with it. Isidore had written to him again and again.'

'Surely then his wish was to prevent scandal, and preserve the unity of the church in the eyes of the heathen?'

The old man laughed bitterly. 'Ah, the old story—of preventing scandals by retaining them, and fancying that sin is a less evil than a little noise, as if the worst of all scandals was not the being discovered in hushing up a scandal! And as for nunt, if you want that, you must go back to the good old times of Diocletian and Decius.'

'The persecutors?'

'Ay, hoy—to the times of persecution, when Christians died like lambs, because they had like brothers. You will see very little of that now, except in some little remote county bishopric, which no one ever hears of from year's end to year's end. But in the cities it is all one great fight for place and power. Every one is jealous of his neighbour. The priests are jealous of the deacons, and good cause they have. The county bishops are jealous of the metropolitan, and he is jealous of the North African bishops, and quite right he is. What business have they to set up for themselves, as if they were infallible? It's a schism, I say—a complete schism. Did not the Council of Nice settle that the Metropolitan of Alexandria should have authority over Libya and Pentapolis, according to the ancient custom?'

'Of course he might,' said Philammon, 'jealous for the honour of his own patriarchate.'

'And the patriarchs of Rome and Constantinople are jealous of our patriarch.'

'Of Cyril?'

'Of course, because he won't be at their beck and nod, and let them be lords and masters of Africa.'

'But surely these things can be settled by councils?'

'Councils? Wait till you have been at one. The blessed Abbot Isidore used to say, that if he ever was a bishop—which he never will be—he is far too honest for that—he would never go near one of them, for he never had seen one which did not call out every evil passion in men's hearts, and have the question more confounded with words than they found it, even if the whole matter was not settled beforehand by some chamberlain, or eunuch, or cook sent from court, as if he were an appointed vessel of the Spirit, to settle the dogmas of the Holy Catholic Church.'

'Cook?'

'Why, Valens sent his chief cook to stop Basil of Caesarea from opposing the Court doctrine. I tell you, the great battle in these cases is to get votes from courts, or to get to court yourself. When I was young, the Council of Antioch had to make a law to keep bishops from running off to Constantinople to intrigue, under pretence of pleading the cause of the orphan and widow. But what's the use of that, when every noisy and ambitious man shifts and shifts, from one see to another, till he settles himself close to Rome or Byzantium, and gets the emperor's ear, and plays into the hands of his courtiers?'

'Is it not written, "Speak not evil of dignities"?' said Philammon, in his most sentimental tone.

'Well, what of that? I don't speak evil of dignities, when I complain of the men who fill them badly, do I?'

'I never heard that interpretation of the text before.'

'Very likely not. That's no reason why it should not be true and orthodox. You will soon hear a good many more things, which are true enough—though whether they are orthodox or not, the court cooks must settle. Of course, I am a disappointed, irreverent old grumbler. Of course, and of course, too, young men must needs buy their own experience, instead of taking old folks at a gift. There's use your own eyes, and judge for yourself. There you may see what sort of saints are bred by this plan of managing the Catholic Church. There comes one of them. Now I say no more.'

As he spoke, two tall negroes came up to him, and set down before the steps of a large church which they were passing an object new to Philammon—a sedan-chair, the poles of which were inlaid with ivory and silver, and the upper part enclosed in rose-coloured silk curtains.

'What is inside that cage?' asked he of the old priest, as the negroes stood wiping the perspiration from their foreheads, and a smart slave girl stepped forward, with a parasol and shippers in her hand, and reverently lifted the lower edge of the curtain.

'A saint, I tell you!'

An embroidered shoe, with a huge gold cross on the instep, was put forth delicately from beneath the curtain, and the kneeling maid put on the shipper over it.

There the whisperted the old grumbler. 'Not enough, you see, to use Christian men as beasts of burden. Abbot Isidore used to say—ay, and told from the pulpit, to his face, that he could not conceive how a man who loved Christ, and knew the grace which has made all men free, could keep a slave.'

'Not can I,' said Philammon.

'But we think otherwise, you see, in Alexandria here. We can't even walk up the steps of God's temple without an additional protection to our delicate feet.'

'I had thought it was written, "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place where thou standest is holy ground".'

'Ah! there are a good many more things written which we do not find it convenient to recollect—look! There is one of the pillars of the church—the richest and most pious lady in Alexandria.'

And forth stepped a figure, at which Philammon's eyes opened wider than they had done even at the sight of Pelagia. Whatever thoughts the rich and careless grace of her attire might have raised in his mind, it had certainly not given his innate Greek good taste the inclination to laugh and weep at once, which he felt at this specimen of the tasteless fashion of an artificial and decaying civilisation. Her gown was stuffed out behind in a fashion which provoked from the dirty boys who lay about the steps, grinning for pastachos on their fingers, the same comments with which St. Clement had upbraided from the pulpit the Alexandrian ladies of his day. The said gown of white silk was belted, from waist to ankle, with certain mysterious red and green figures at least a foot long, which Philammon gradually discovered to be a representation, in the very lowest and ugliest style of fallen art, of Dives and Lazarus, while down her back hung, upon a bright blue shawl, edged with embroidered red crosses, Job sitting, polished in hand, surrounded by his three friends—a memorial, the old priest whispered, of a pilgrimage which she had taken a year or two before, to Arabia, to see and kiss the identical dung-hill on which the patriarch had sat.

Round her neck hung, by one of half a dozen necklaces, a manuscript of the Gospels, gilt-edged and clasped with jewels, the lofty diadem of pearls on the head earned in front a large gold cross, while above and around it her hair, stilted with pomatums, was frizzled out half a foot from a wilderness of plaits and curls, which must have cost some hapless slave girl in hours work, and perhaps more than one scolding, that very morning.

Meekly, with sumptuous face and downcast eyes, and now and then a penitent sigh and shake of the head and pressure of her hand on her jewelled bosom, the fair penitent was proceeding up the steps, when she caught sight of the priest and the monk, and turning to them with an obeisance of the deepest humility, entreated to be allowed to kiss the hem of their garments.

'You had far better, upstart,' said Philammon, bluntly enough, 'kiss the hem of your own. You carry two lessons there which you do not seem to have learnt yet.'

In an instant her face flashed up into pride and fury. 'I asked for your blessing, and not for a sermon. I can have that when I like.'

'And such as you like,' grumbled the old priest, as she swept up the steps, tossing some small coin to the ragged boys, and murmuring to herself, loud enough for Philammon's hearing, that she should certainly inform the confessor, and that she would not be insulted in the streets by savage monks.

'Now she will confess her sins inside—all but those which she has been showing off to us here outside, and beat her breast, and weep like a very Magdalen; and then the worthy man will comfort her with—"What a beautiful chain! And what a shawl—allow me to touch it!" How soft and delicate this Indian wool! Ah! if you knew the debts which I have been compelled to incur in the service of the sanctuary!—'" And then of course the answer will be, as, indeed, he expects it should, that if it can be of the least use in the service of the Temple, she, of course, will think it only too great an honour . . . And he will keep the chain, and perhaps the shawl too. And she will go home, believing that she has fulfilled to the very letter the command to break off her sins by thus giving, and only sorry that the good priest happened to hit on that particular gewgaw.'

'What,' asked Philammon, 'did she actually not refuse such importunity?'

'From a poor priest like me, stoutly enough, but from a popular enthusiast like him.'

As Jerome says, in a letter of his I once saw, ladies think twice in such cases before they offend the city newsmonger. Have you anything more to say?'

Philammon had nothing to say, and wisely held his peace, while the old grumbler ran on.

'Ah, boy, you have yet to learn city fashions! When you are a little older, instead of speaking unpleasant truths to a little lady with a cross on her forehead, you will be ready to run to the Pillars of Hercules at her beck and nod, for the sake of her disinterested help towards a fashionable pulpit, or perhaps a bishopric. The ladies settle that for us here.'

'The women?'

'The women, lad. Do you suppose that they heap jewels and churches with wealth for nothing? They have their reward. Do you suppose that a pious girl goes into the pulpit at that church there, without looking anxiously, at the end of each positively flowery sentence, to see whether her sanctity there is clapping or not? She, who has such a delicate sense for orthodoxy, that she can scent out Novatianism or Origenism where no other mortal nose would suspect it. She who minds at her own house weekly ad the richest and most pious women of the city, to settle our discipline for us, as the court looks down do time. She who has even, it is whispered, the ear of the Augusta Publica herself, and sends monthly letters to her at Constantinople, and might give the patriarch himself some trouble, if he crossed her holy will.'

'What! will Cyril truckle to such creatures?'

'Cyril is a wise man in his generation. Too wise, some say, for a child of the light. But at least, he knows there is no use fighting with those whom you cannot conquer, and while he can get money out of these great ladies for his almshouses, and orphan-houses, and lodging-houses, and hospitals, and workshops, and all the rest of it—and in that, I will say for him, there is no man on earth equal to him, but Ambrose of Milan and Basil of Caesarea—why, I don't quarrel with him for making the best of a bad matter, and a very bad matter it is, boy, and has been ever since emperors and courtiers have given up burning and crucifying us, and taken to patronising and bribing us instead.'

Philammon walked on in silence by the old priest's side, stunned and sickened. . . 'And this is what I have come out to see—reeds shaken in the wind, and men clothed in soft raiment, fit only for kings' palaces!' For this he had left the dear old Anna, and the simple joys and friendships of childhood, and cast himself into a roaring whirlpool of labour and temptation! This was the unanimous strength and unity of that Church Catholic, in which, as he had been taught from boyhood, there was but one Lord, one Faith, one Spirit. This was the indivisible body, 'without spot or wrinkle, which fitly joined together and compacted by that which every member supplied, according to the effectual and proportionate working of every part, increased the body, and enabled it to build itself up in Love.' He shuddered as the well-known words passed through his memory, and seemed to mock the base and chaotic reality around him. He felt angry with the old man for having broken his dream, he longed to believe that his complaints were only exaggerations of cynic peevishness, of selfish disappointment; and yet, had not Aesculus warned him? Had he not foretold, word for word, what the youth would find—what he had found? Then was Saint Paul's great idea an empty and an impossible dream? No! God's word could not fail, the Church could not err. The fault could not be in her, but in her enemies, not, as the old man said, in her too great prosperity, but in her slavery. And then the words which he had heard from Cyril at their last interview rose before him as the true explanation. How could the Church work badly and heathenly while she was crushed and lettered by the rulers of this world? And how could they be anything but the tyrants and autocrats they were, while they were menaced and deluded by heathen philosophy, and vain systems of human wisdom? If Oristes was the curse of the Alexandrian Church, then Hypatia was the curse of Oristes. On her had the true blame lie. She was the root of the evil. Who would extirpate it?

Why should not he? It might be dangerous, yet, successful or unsuccessful, it must be glorious. 'The course of Christ is only a path of great examples. Might he not—and his young heart beat high at the thought—might he not, by some great act of daring, self-sacrifice, divine madness of faith, like David's of old, when he went out against the giant—awaken selfish and luxurious souls to a noble emulation, and recall to their minds, perhaps to their lives, the patterns of those martyrs who were the pride, the glory, the heaven of Egypt? And, as figure after figure rose before his imagination, of simple men and weak women who had conquered temptation and shame, torture and death, to live for ever on the lips of men, and take their seats among the patriarchs of the heavenly court, with brows glittering through all eternities with the martyr's crown, his heart beat thick and fast, and he longed only for an opportunity to dare and die.

And the longing he got the opportunity. For he had hardly rejoined his brother visitors when the absorbing thought took word again, and he began questioning them eagerly for more information about Hypatia.

On that point, indeed, he obtained nothing but fresh invective, but when his companions, after talking of the triumph which the true faith had gained that morning, went on to speak of the great overthrow of Paganism twenty years before, under the patriarch Theophilus, at Olympiodorus and his tools, who held the Serapeum for many days by force of arms against the Christians, making soldiers into the city, and torturing and murdering the prisoners whom they took, of the martyrs who, among those very pillars which overhung their heads, had died in torments rather than submit to Serapis, and of the triumphs, and the soldier who, in presence of the trembling mob, drove the great jaw of the colossal idol, and snapped for ever the spell of heathenism, Philammon's heart burned to distinguish himself like that soldier, and to wipe out his quarrels of conscience by some more unquestionable deed of Christian prowess. There were no roads now to back, but there was philosophy—'Who, not carry you into the heart of the Satan in his very den? Why do you men of God, boldly into the den, the sorceress, and testify against her to her

'Do it yourself, if you dare,' Peter.

'We have no wish to get our bones knocked out by all the profligate young gentlemen in the city.'

'I will do it,' said Philammon.

'That is, it is his holiness allows you to make such a fool of yourself.'

'Take care, sir, of your words. You revile the blessed martyrs, from St. Stephen to St. Paphnutius, when you call such a deed foolishness.'

'I shall most certainly intreat his Holiness of your madness.'

'Do so,' said Philammon, who, possessed with a new idea, wished for nothing more. And there the matter dropped for the time.

The presumption of the youth of this generation is growing insupportable,' said Peter to his master that evening.

'So much the better. They put their elders on their mettle in the race of old. Peter, who has been presuming to die.'

'That wild boy whom Pambos sent up from the deserts dared to offer himself as champion of the faith against Hypatia. He actually proposed to go into her lecture-room and argue with her to her face. What think you of that for a specimen of youthful modesty and self-distinctness?'

Cyril was silent a while.

'What answer am I to have the honour of taking back? A month's reclusion to Nitria on bread and water? You, I am sure, will not allow such things to go unpunished, indeed if they do, there is an end to all authority and discipline.'

Cyril was still silent, whilst Peter's brow clouded fast. At last he answered—

'The cause wants martyrs. Send the lay to me.'

Peter went down with a shrug, and an expression of face which looked but too like envy, and ushered up the trembling youth, who dropped on his knees as soon as he entered.

'So you wish to go into the heathen woman's lecture-room, and defy her? Have you courage for it?'

'God will give it me.'

'You will be murdered by her pupils.'

'I can defend myself,' said Philammon, with a pardonable glance downward at his sinewy limbs. 'And if not, what death more glorious than martyrdom?'

Cyril smiled genially enough. 'Promise me two things.'

'Two thousand, if you will.'

'Two are quite difficult enough to keep. Youth is rash in promises, and rash in forgetting them. Promise me this, whatever happens, you will not strike the first blow.'

'I do.'

'Promise me again, that you will not argue with her.'

'What then?'

'Contradict, denounce, defy. But give no reasons. If you do, you are lost. She is subtler than the serpent, skilled in all the tricks of logic, and you will become a laughing-stock, and run away in shame. Promise me.'

'I do.'

'Then go.'

'When?'

'The sooner the better. At what hour does the accursed woman lecture to-morrow, Peter?'

'We saw her going to the Museum at nine this morning.'

'Then go at nine to-morrow. There is money for you.'

'What is this for?' asked Philammon, fingering curiously the first coins which he ever had handled in his life.

'To pay for your entrance. To the philosopher none enters without money. Not so to the Church of God, open all day long to the beggar and the slave. If you convert her, well. And if not? And he added to himself between his teeth, 'And if not, well also—perhaps better.'

'Ay!' said Peter bitterly, as he ushered Philammon out. Go up to Ramoth Gilead and prosper, young fool! What evil spirit sent you here to feed the noble patriarch's only weakness?'

'What do you mean?' asked Philammon, as fiercely as he dare.

'The fancy that preachings, and protestations, and martyrdoms can drive out the Cannanites, who can only be got rid of with the sword of the Lord and of Gilead. His uncle Theophilus knew that well enough. If he had not, Olympiodorus might have been master of Alexandria, and incense burning before Serapis to this day.

Ay, go, and let her convert you! Touch the accursed thing, like Achan, and see if you do not end by having it in your tent. Keep company with the daughters of Midian, and see if you do not join yourself to Balaam, and eat the offerings of the dead!'

And with this discouraging sentence, the two parted for the night.

CHAPTER VIII

THE FAST WIND

As Hypatia went forth the next morning, in all her glory, with a crowd of philosophers and philosophasters, students, and fine gentlemen, following her in reverend admiration across the street to her lecture-room, a ragged, lagging man, accompanied by a huge and villainous-looking dog, planted himself right before her, and extending a dirty hand, whined for alms.

Hypatia, whose refined taste could never endure the sight, much less the contact, of any thing squalid and degraded, recoiled a little, and bade the attendant slave get rid of the man with a coin. Several of the younger gentlemen, however, considered themselves adepts in that noble art of 'upsetting' him in vogue in the African universities, to which we all have reason enough to be thankful, seeing that it drove Saint Augustine from Carthage to Rome, and they, in compliance with the usual fashion of tormenting any simple creature who came in their way by mystification and insult, commenced a series of personal wittrivings, which the bigger bore stood up enough. The man was obliged him, but he humbly put aside the hand of the giver, and keeping his place on the pavement, seemed inclined to dispute Hypatia's further passage.

'What do you want? Send the wretch and his frightful dog away, gentlemen!' said the poor philosopher in some trepidation.

'I knew that dog,' said one of them, 'it is Alien-Ezra's. Where did you find it before it was lost, you rascal?'

'Where your mother found you when she palmed you off upon her Goodman, my child, in the slave-market. Fan slyd, have you already forgotten your humblest pupil, as these young dogs have, who are already trying to upset their master and instructor in the angelic science of bullying?'

And the beggar, lifting his broad straw hat, disclosed the features of Raymond Alien-Ezra. Hypatia recoiled with a shriek of surprise.

'Ah! you are astonished. At what, I pray?'

'To see you, sir, thus!'

'Why, then? You have been preaching to us all a long time the glory of abstraction from the allurements of sense. It angers ill, surely, for you estimate either of your pupils or of your own eloquence, if you are so struck with can-sternation because one of them has actually at last obeyed you?

'What is the meaning of this masquerade, most excellent sir?' asked Hypatia and a dozen voices beside.

'Ask Cyril. I am on my way to Italy, in the character of the New Diogenes, to look, like him, for a ~~man~~ When I have found one, I shall feel great pleasure in returning to acquaint you with the amazing news. Farewell! I wished to look once more at a certain countenance, though I have turned, as you see, Cyril, and intend henceforth to attend no teacher but my log, who will luckily charge no fees for instruction, if she did, I might go untaught, for my ancestral wealth made itself wings yesterday morning. You are aware, doubtless, of the Phœbistum against the Jews, which was carried into effect under the auspices of a certain holy tribune in the people?'

'Inlamous!'

'And dangerous, my dear lady. Success is unobtainable, and Theon's house is quite uselessly sucked as the Jews spit down.'

'Come, come, Alen-Fza,' cried the young man, 'you are far too good company for us to lose you for that scally patriarch's fancy. We will make a subscription for you, eh? And you shall live with each of us, month and month about. We shall quite lose the trick of joking without you.'

'Thank you, gentlemen. But really you have been my butts for too long for me to think of becoming yours. Madam, one word in private before I go.'

Hypatia leant forward, and speaking in Syrian, whispered hurriedly.

'Oh, stay, sir, I beseech you! You are the wisest of my pupils, perceiving my only true pupil.'

My father will find some concealment for you from these witches, and if you need money, remember he is your debtor. We have never repaid you the gold which—'

'I am not sure, that was but my cut-price fee to Parnissus. It is I who am in your debt, and I have brought my arrears, in the form of this opal ring. As for Shelter men you have went on, lowering his voice, and speaking like her, in Syrian—' Hypatia the Gentile is far too lovely for the peace of mind of Raphael the Jew. And he drew from his finger Miriam's ring and offered it.

'Impossible!' said Hypatia, blushing scarlet. 'I won't accept it.'

'I beseech you. It is the last earthly blessing I have, except this snail's prison of flesh and blood. My dagger will open a crack through that when it becomes intolerable. But as I do not intend to leave my shell, if I can help it, except just when and how I choose, and as, if I take this ring with me, some of Heinrich's Circumcellions will assuredly knock my brains out for the sake of it—I must entreat—'

'Never! Can you not sell the ring, and escape to Synesius? He will give you shelter.'

'The hospitable hurricane! Shelter, yes, but rest, none. As soon pitch my tent in the crater of Aetna. Why, he will be tying day and night to convert me to that eclectic fairrago of his, which he calls philosophic Christianity. Well, if you will not have the ring, it is soon disposed of. We Easterns know how to be magnificent, and vanish as the birds of the world ought.'

And he turned to the philosophic crowd.

'Here, gentlemen of Alexandria! Does any gay youth wish to pay his debts once and for all? Behold the Rainbow of Solomon, an opal such as Alexander never saw before, which would buy any one of you, and his Macedonian paps, and his Macedonian mamma, and his Macedonian sisters, and horses, and parrots, and peacocks, two over, in any slave market in the world. Any gentleman who wishes to pay a jewel worth ten thousand gold pieces, will only need to pick it out of the gutter into which I throw it. Scandalize for it, you young Phœbists and Pamphils! Take care! Ladies and Theons enough about who will help you to spend it.'

And raising the jewel on high, he was in the act of tossing it into the street, when his ring was seized from behind, and the ring snatched from his hand. He turned, fiercely enough, and saw behind him her eyes flashing fury and contempt, old Miriam.

In a spring at the old woman's throat in an instant, but recoiled again before the glare of her eye. Raphael called the dog out, and turning quickly to the disappointed spectators.

'It is all right, my luckless friends. You must use money for yourselves, after all, which, since the departure of my nation, will be a somewhat more difficult matter than ever. The overruling destinies, whom, as you all know so well when you are getting tipsy, not even philosophers can resist, have restored the Rainbow of Solomon to its original possession. I am well, Queen of Philosophy! When I find the ring, you shall hear of it. Mother, I am coming with you for a friendly word before we part, though,' he went on, laughing, as the two walked away together, 'it was a senny trick of you to balk one of The Nation of the exquisite pleasure of seeing those hentzen dogs scrambling in the gutter for his bonny.'

Hypatia went on to the Museum utterly bewildered by this strange meeting, and it still stronger. She took care nevertheless, to betray no sign of her deep interest till she found herself alone in her little writing-room, dismissing the lecture hall, and there throwing herself into a chair, she sat and thought, till she found, to her surprise and anger, the tears trickling down her cheeks. Not that her bosom held one spark of affection for Raphael. If there had ever been any danger of that the wily Jew had himself taken care to ward it off, by the sneering and frivolous tone with which he quashed every approach to deep feeling, either in himself or in others. As for his compliments to her beauty, she was far too much accustomed to such, to be either pleased or displeased by them. But she felt, as she said, that she had lost perhaps her only true pupil, and more—perhaps her only true master. For she saw clearly enough, that under that Silenus' mask was hidden a nature capable of—perhaps more than she dare think of. She had always felt him her superior in practical cunning, and that morning had proved to her what she had long suspected, that he was possibly also her superior in that moral earnestness and strength of will for which she looked in vain among the enervated Greeks who surrounded her. And even in those matters in which he professed himself her pupil, she had long been alternately delighted by finding that he alone, of all her school, seemed thoroughly and instinctively to comprehend her every word, and chilled by the disagreeable suspicion that he was only playing with her, and her mathematics and geometry, and metaphysic and dialectic, like a boxer practising with foils, while he reserved his real strength for some object more worthy of him. More than once some puzzle or question of his had shaken her nearest systems into a thousand cracks, and opened up ugly depths of doubt, even on the most seemingly palpable certainties, or some half-jesting allusion to those Hebrew Scriptures, the quantity and quality of his faith in which he would never confess, made her indignant at the notion that he considered himself in possession of a reserved ground of knowledge, deeper and surer than her own, in which he did not deign to allow her to share.

And yet she was irresistibly attracted to him. That deliberate and consistent luxury of his, from which she shrink, he had always boasted that he was able to put on and take off at will, like a garment, and now he seemed to have proved his words, to be a worthy rival of the great Stons of old time. Could Zenon himself have asked more from half humanity? Moreover, Raphael had been of infinite practical use to her. He worked out, unasked, her mathematical problems, he looked out authorities, kept her pupils in order by his bitter tongue, and drew fresh students to her lectures by the attractions of his wit, his arguments, and last, but not least, his unrivalled cook and cellar. Above all he acted the part of a true and valiant watch-dog on her behalf, against the knots of clownish and often brutal sophists, the wicks of the old Cyne, Stoa, and Academic schools, who, with venom increasing, after the wont of parties, with their derisive, assailed the beautifully bespangled cart-castle of Neo-Platonism, as an empty melody of all Greek philosophies with all Eastern superstitions. All such Philistines had as yet dreaded the pen and tongue of Raphael, even more than those of the chivalrous Bishop of Cyrene, though he certainly, to judge from certain of his letters, hated them as much as he could hate any human being, which was after all not very bitterly.

But the visits of Synesius were few and far between, the distance between Carthage and Alexandria, and the labour of his diocese, and, worse than all, the growing difference in purpose between him and his beautiful teacher, made his protection all but valueless. And now Aben-Ezra was gone too, and with him were gone a thousand plans and hopes. To have converted him at last to a philosophic faith in the old gods! To have made him her instrument for turning back the stream of human error! . . . How often had that dream crossed her! And now, who would take his place? Athanasius? Synesius in his good nature might dignify him with the name of brother, but to her he was a powerless potent, destined to die without having wrought any deliverance on the earth, as indeed the event proved. Plutarch of Athens? He was superannuated. Synesius? A mere logician, twisting Aristotle to mean what she knew, and he ought to have known, Aristotle never meant Her father? A man of triangles and conic sections. How pitiful they all looked by the side of the unfathomable Jew!—Spinners of charming cobwebs.

But would the flux condescend to be caught in them? Builders of pretty houses. If people would but enter and live in them! Preachers of supreme morality, which their almsgiving pupils never dreamt of practising. Without her, she well knew, philosophy must die in Alexandria. And was it his wisdom—or other and more earthly charms of hers—which enabled her to keep it alive? Sackening thought! Oh, that she were ugly, only to test the power of her doctrines!

No! The odds were fearful enough already, she would be glad of any help, however earthly and casual. But was not the work hopeless? What she wanted was no man who could act while she thought. And those were just the men whom she would find nowhere but—she knew it too well—in the hated Christian priesthood. And then that useful hydrogen sulphur loomed on the distance as inevitable. The only hope of philosophy was in her despair!

She dashed away the tears, and proudly entered the lecture-hall, and ascended the tribune like a goddess, amid the shouts of her audience. What did she care for them? Would they do what she told them? She was tall through her long time before she could recollect herself, and banish from her mind the thought of Raphael. And at that point we will take the lecture up.

'Truth? Where is truth but in the soul itself? Facts, objects, are but phantasma matter woven—ghosts of this earthly night, at which the soul, sleeping here in the mire and clay of matter, shudders and names its own vague tremors sense and perception. Yet, even as our nightly dreams stir in us the suspicion of mysterious and immaterial presences, unfettered by the bonds of time and space, so do these waking hears such melodies as most preserve the divine footstep of harmony, it embraces such, and recollects from them that divine harmony, and is impelled to it, and finds its home in it, and shares of it as much as it can share."

And therewith fell on Philonemon's son, for the first time, the mighty thunder roll of Homer's verse—

So spoke the stewardess, but Hector rushed from the house, the same way back, down stately streets,

Through the broad city, to the Scaun gates, Whither he must go forth toward the plain, There running toward him came Andromache, His ample-dowered wife, Hector's child—

Behold the great-hearted he who dwelt In Thebe under Placoe, and the woods Of Placoe, ruling over kith and men

His daughter wouldst thou for bruise be lured, And met him then, and with her came a maid, Who bore in arms a playful bearded babe

An infant still, akin to woe, fair at first, Only and well-loved child of Hector's house, Whom he had named Scamandrius, but the rest

Asleep in it, because his son, among Upheld the word of Helen his enemy

He smothered in silence, looking to his child But she stood close to him, with many tears, And hung upon his hand, and spoke, and called him

"My hero, thy are it, but wilt wear thee out, Then patient not thine infant child, nor me

The hapless, soon to be thy widow, The Greeks will slay thee, falling one and all Upon thee—but to me ere suffer for,

Having lost thee, to die, no cheer to me Will come thenceforth if thou shouldst meet thy fate, Woes only, mother have I none, nor sin

For that my sire divine Achilles slew, And washed utterly the pleasant houses Of his son, in Thoe's lofty navel,

And when Hector with the spear yet spared To strip the dead, we kept his soul from that

There fore he burnt him in his grave's arms, And heaped a mound round him, and round The dais of the Gods bidding Zeus,

The nymphs who hunt the upland, planted him, And seven brothers bred with me in the halls, All in one day we at down to Hades there,

For all of them swift foot Achilles slew Beside the lazy knee and snow-white sheep And he, my mother, who of late was queen

Beneath the woods of Placoe, he brought her, Among his other spoils, yet set her free Again, receiving ransom rich and great

But Artemis, whose bow is all her joy, Smote her to death within her father's halls

Hector! so thou art father to me now, Mother, and brother, and husband fair and strong! Oh, come now, pity me, and stay thou here

Upon the tower, nor make thy child an orphan And me thy wife a widow, mingle me here by the fig tree, where the city is a

Lowest, and where the wall can well be scaled, For here thence thou the best has tried the assault

Round either Ajax and Idomeneus, And round the Atreid both, and Telemachus, Whether some cunning art taught them craft,

Or their own spirit stirred and drove them on! Then spake tall Hector, with the gleaming in his

All this I too have watched, my wife, yet much I hold in dread the women of Troy men

And Trojan women with their trailing shawls, If, like a coward, I should shrink from war

Beside, I have no lust to stay, I have least eye to be bold, and lead the van of fight,

To win my father, and myself, a name For well I know, at heart and in my thought,

The day will come when Ilion the holy Shall lie in heaps, and Priam, and the folk Of ashenspeared Priam, perish all

But yet no wise to come to Trojan men, Nor even to Ilion, nor Priam king,

Nor to my brothers, who shall roll in dust, Many and fair, beneath the strokes of foes, So moves me, as doth thine, when thou shalt go Weeping, led off by some Lacedæmonian Greek, Robbed of the daylight of thy liberty,

To weave in Argos at another's loom, Or bear the water of Mænes home, Or Hyperæa, with miserably tools,

While heavy doom constrains thee, and perchance The folk may say, when thou thy face art down, "This was the wife of Hector, best in fight"

At Ilion, of house-famous Trojan men! So will they say perchance, while unto thee New grief will come, for such a husband's loss,

Who might have wended off the day of ill that may the soul be in need about my corpse, Before I hear thy shriek and see thy shame!"

He spoke, and sternly bid his arms to take the child, But back the child upon his nurse's breast

Shrank crying, frightened at his father's looks, Bearing the breast and crest of Hector's hair Which waved above the helmet terribly

Then out that father dear and mother laughed, And glorious Hector took the helmet off, And laid it gleaming on the ground, and kissed

His darling child, and dandled him in his arm, And spoke in prayer to Zeus, and all the gods Zeus, and ye other gods, oh grant that thus

My child, like me, may grow the champion here As good in strength, and rule with might in Troy

Then men may say, "The boy is better far than was his sire," when he returns from war, Bearing a glory hence, having slain

A woman, and his mother's heart in power Thus saying, on his hands of his dear wife

He laid the child, and she received him back In fragrant bosom smiling through her tears!

"Such is the myth. Do you fancy that in it Homer meant to hand down to the admiration of ages such earthly commonplace as a mother's brute affection, and the terrors of an infant? Surely the deeper insight of the philosopher may be allowed without the reproach of superficiality, to see in it the ministration of some deeper mystery."

"The elect soul, for instance—is not it a name Asymachus, king of the city, by the fact of its ethical parentage, the leader and lord of all around it, though it knows it not? A child as yet, it lies upon the fragrant bosom of its mother Nature, the nurse and yet the enemy of man And lo! as he, as the poet would name a hero, becomes she fights with that being, when grown to man's estate, whom as a child she nourished. Fair is she, yet unwise, pampering us, after the fashion of mothers, with weak indulgences, to bring to send us forth into the great realities of speculation, thus to forget her in the pursuit of glory, she would have us while away our prime within the harim, and play for ever round her knees. And has not the elect soul a father, too, whom it knows not? Hector, he who is without—unconquered, unconditioned by Nature, yet its husband—the all-prevailing, plastic Soul, interior."

"The above lines are not meant as a 'translation' but as an humble attempt to give the literal sense in some sort of metre. It would be an act of arrogance even to aim at such a task where Pope and Chapman failed. It is simply, I believe, impossible to render Homer into English verse, in verse, for one reason among many, it is impossible to preserve the pomp of sound, which in verse with grandeur his most common words. How can any skill represent the rhythm of Homer's Greek in a language which—to take the first verse which comes to hand—transforms 'boson megalo boson,' into 'great ex a child?'"

ing, organising, whom men call Zeus the law-giver, Æther the fire, Osiris the life-giver, whom here the poet has set forth as the defender of the mystic city, the defender of harmony, and order, and beauty throughout the universe? Apart sits his great father—Priami, the first of existences, father of many sons, the Absolute Reason, unsexed, tremendous, immovable, in distant glory, yet himself amenable to that abyssal unity which Homer calls Fate, the source of all which is, yet in itself Nothing, without predicate, unumcald.

'From It and for It the universal Soul thrills through the whole Creation, doing the behests of that Reason from which it overflowed, unwillingly, into the storm and crowd of material appearances warring with the brute forces of gross matter, crushing all which is foul and dissonant to itself, and clasping to its bosom the beautiful and all wherein it discovers its own reflex, impressing on it its signature, reproducing from it its own likeness, whether star, or dæmon, or soul of the elect—and yet, as the poet hints in anthropomorphic language, haunted all the while by a sadness—weighed down amid all its labours by the sense of a fate—by the thought of that First One from whom the Soul is originally descended, from whom it, and its father the Reason before it, parted themselves when they dared to think and act, and assert their own free will.

'And in the meanwhile, alas! Hector, the father, fights around, while his children sleep and feed, and he is away in the wars, and they know him not—know not that they the individuals are but parts of him the universal. And yet at moments—oh! those blessed times whose celestial parentage has made such moments part of their appointed destiny—at moments flashes on the human child the intuition of the immutable secret. In the spangled glory of the summer night—in the roar of the Nile-flood, sweeping down fertility in every wave—in the awful depths of the temple-shrine—in the wild melodies of old Æolian singers, or before the images of those gods of whose perfect beauty the divine theosophists of Greece caught a fleeting shadow, and with the sudden might of artistic ecstasy smote it, as by an enchantment, into an eternal sleep of snowy stone—in these thro' flashes on the inner eye a vision beautiful and terrible, of a force, in energy, a soul, an idea, one and yet million fold, rushing through all created things, like the wind across a lyre, thrilling the strings into celestial harmony—one life-blood through the million veins of the universe, from one great unseen heart, whose thunderous pulses the mind hears far away, beating for ever in the abyssal solitude, beyond the heavens and the galaxies, beyond the spaces and the times, themselves but veins and tunnels from its all-teeming sea.

'Happy, three happy! they who once have dared, even though breathless, blinded with tears of awful joy, struck down upon their knees in utter helplessness, as they feel themselves but dead leaves in the wind which sweeps the universe—happy they who have dared to gaze, if but for an instant, on the terror of that glorious pagant, who have not, like the young Astyanax, clung shrinking to the breast of mother Nature, scared by the heaven-wide flash of Hector's arms, and the glitter of his rainbow crest! Happy, three happy! even though their eyeballs, blasted by excess of light, wither to ashes in their sockets! Were it not a noble end to have seen Zeus, and die like Scinde, burnt up by his glory? Happy, three happy! though their mind reel from the divine intoxication, and the legs of Cenci call them henceforth madmen and enthusiasts. Enthusiasts they are, for Duty is in them, and they in It. For the time, this burden of individuality vanishes, and recognising themselves as portions of the universal Soul, they rise upward, through and beyond that Reason from whence the soul proceeds, to the fount of all the ineffable and Supreme One—and seeing It, become by that act portions of Its essence. They speak no more, but It speaks in them, and their whole being, transmutated by that glorious sunlight into whose rays they have dared, like the eagle, to gaze without shrinking, becomes an harmonious vehicle for the words of Duty, and passive itself, utters the secrets of the immortal gods! What wonder if to the laute mutes they seem as dictators? Be it so. Smile if you will. But ask me not to touch on things unspeakable, above all sciences, which the word-battle of dialectic, the disemative struggles of reason, can never reach, but which must be seen only, and when seen confessed to be unspeakable. Hence, thou disputer of the Academy!—hence, thou greeting Cybele—hence, thou sense-worshipping Stoic, who findest that the soul is to derive her knowledge from those material appearances which she herself creates!—hence—, and yet no shyness and sneer if you will. It is but a little time—a few days longer in this prison-house of our degradation, and each thing shall return to its own tantum, the blood-drop to the abyssal heart, and the water to the river, and the river to the shining sea, and the dew-drop which fell from heaven shall rise to heaven again, shaking off the dust-grains which weighed it down, thawed from the earth-frost which chained it here to herb and swart upward and upward ever through stars and suns, through gods, and through the parents of the gods, purer and purer through successive lives, till it enters The Nothing, which is The All, and finds its home at last.

And the speaker stopped suddenly, her eyes glistening with tears, her whole figure trembling and dilating with rapture. She remained for a moment motionless, gazing earnestly at her audience, as if in hopes of exciting in them some kindred glow—and then recovering herself, added in a more tender tone, not quite unmixed with sadness—

'Go now, my pupils. Hypatia has no more for you to-day. Go now, and spare her at least —woman as she is after all—the shame of finding that she has given you too much, and lifted the veil of Isis before eyes which are not enough purified to behold the glory of the goddess — Farewell !

She ended, and Philammon, the moment that the spell of her voice was taken off him, sprang up, and hurried out through the corridor into the street.

So beautiful ! So calm and merciful to him ! So enthusiastic towards all which was noble ! Had not she too spoken of the unseen world, of the hope of immortality, of the conquest of the spirit over the flesh, just as a Christian might have done ? Was the gulf between them so infinite ? If so, why had her aspirations awakened echoes in his own heart—echoes too, just such as the prayers and lessons of the Lama used to awaken ? If the hint was so like, must not the root be like also ? Could that be a counterfeiter ? That a minister of Satan in the robes of an angel of light ? Light, at least, it was purity, simplicity, courage, earnestness, tenderness, blushed out from eyes, hypagoures. A heathen, who disbelieved ? What was the meaning of it all ?

But the finishing stroke yet remained which was to complete the utter confusion of his mind. For before he had gone fifty yards up the street, his little friend of the fruit basket, whom he had not seen since he vanished under the feet of the mob in the gateway of the theatre, clutched him by the arm, and burst forth, breathless with running.

‘The—gods—help their favours—on those who—who least deserve them ! Rich and insolent rustic ! And this is the reward of thy madness !’

‘Off with you !’ said Philammon, who had no mind at the moment to renew his acquaintance with the little porter. But the guardian of parasols kept him hold on his sheepskin.

‘Fool ! Hypatia herself commands ! Yes, you will see her, have speech with her ! While I—I the illuminated—I the appreciating—I the obedient—I the adoring—who for these three years past have grovelled in the kennel, that the hem of her garment might touch the tip of my little finger—I—I—I—’

‘What do you want, madman ?’

‘She calls for thee, insensate wretch ! Throned sent me—breathless at once with running and with envy—Go ! favourite of the unjust gods !’

‘Who is Thron ?’

‘Her father, ignorant ! He commands thee to be at her house—here—opposite—to-morrow at the third hour. Hither and obey ! There they are coming out of the Museum, and all the parasols will get wrong ! Oh, miserable me !’

And the poor little fellow rushed back again, while Philammon, at his wit’s end between dread and longing, started off, and ran the whole way home to the Serapeum, regardless of carriages, elephants, and foot passengers, and having been knocked down by a silly porter, and lost a piece of his sheepskin between the teeth of a spiteful camel—neither of which results he had time to resent—arrived at the archbishop’s house, found Peter the Reader, and tremblingly begged an audience from Cyril.

CHAPTER IX

THE SNAPPING OF THE BOW

CYRIL heard Philammon’s story and Hypatia’s message with a quiet smile, and then dismissed the youth to an afternoon of labour in the city, counselling him to mention no word of what had happened, and to come to him that evening and receive his order when he should have had time to think over the matter. So forth Philammon went with his companions, through lanes and alleys hideous with filth and poverty, compulsory idleness and native sin. Fearfully real and practical if all was, but he saw it all dimly as in a dream. Before his eyes one fair was shining, in his ears one silver voice was ringing. ‘He is a monk, and knows no better.’ True ! And how should he know better ? How could he tell how much more there was to know, in that great new universe, in such a cranny whereof his life had till now been past ? He had heard but one side already. What if there were two sides ? Had he not a right—that is, was it not proper, fair, prudent, that he should hear both, and then judge ?

Cyril had hardly, perhaps, done wisely for the youth, sending him out about the practical drudgery of benevolence, before deciding for him what was his duty with regard to Hypatia’s invitation. He had not calculated on the new thoughts which were tormenting the young monk, perhaps they would have been more intelligible to him had he known of them. Cyril had been bred up under the most stern dogmatic training, in those vast monastic establishments, which had risen amid the neighbouring salt-petre quarries of Nitria, where thousands toiled in voluntary poverty and slavery at vast bakeries, dyeries, brick-fields, tailors’ shops, carpenters’ yards, and expended the profits of their labour, not on themselves, for they had need of nothing, but on churches, hospitals, and alms. Educated in that world of practical industrial pollution as well as of religious exercise, which by its proximity to the great city accustomed monks to that world which they despised, entangled from boyhood in the images of lay heresy and amiable monk. Theophilus, Cyril had succeeded him in the patriarchate of Alexandria without having felt a doubt, and stood free to throw his life, energy and clear practical intellect into the cause of the Church without scruple, even, where necessary, without pity. How could such a man sympathise with the poor boy of twenty and idly dragged forth from the quiet cavern shadow of the Lama into the full blaze and roar of the world’s noonday ! He, too, was cloister-bred. But the busy and fanatic atmosphere of Nitria, where every nerve of soul and body was kept on a life long artificial strain, without rest, without simplicity, without human affection, was utterly antipodal to the government of the remote and lonely, though no less industrious commonwealths of Canolites, who dotted the lonely mountain glens, far up into the heart of the Nubian desert. In such a one Philammon had received, from a venerable man, a mother's sympathy as well as a father's care, and now he yearned for the encouragement of a gentle voice, for the greeting of a kindly eye, and was lonely and sick at heart.

And still Hypatia's voice haunted his ears, like a strain of music, and would not die away. That lofty enthusiasm, so sweet and modest in its grandeur—that tone of pity—in one so lovely it could not be called contempt—for the many; that delicious phantom of being an elect spirit unlike the crowd.

'And am I altogether like the crowd?' said Philammon to himself, as he staggered along under the weight of a groaning fever patient. 'Can there be found no better work for me than this, which any porter from the quay might do as well? Am I not somewhat wasted on such toil as this? Have I not an intellect, a taste, a reason? I could appreciate what she said—Why should not my faculties be educated? Why am I only to be shut out from knowledge? There is a Christian Gnosis as well as a heathen one. What was permissible to Clement?—he had nearly said to Origen, but checked himself on the edge of heresy—'is surely lawful for me.' Is not my very craving for knowledge a sign that I am capable of it? Surely my sphere is the study rather than the street.'

And then his fellow labourers—he could not say it to himself—began to grow less venerable in his eyes. Let him try as he might to forget the old priest's gibblings and detractions, the feet was before him. The men were coarse, fierce, noisy.

'Different from her! Their talk seemed mere gossip—scandalous talk and hard-judging, most of it, about that man's private ambition, and that woman's proud looks, and who had stayed for the Eucharist the Sunday before, and who had gone out after the sermon, and how the majority who did not stay could possibly dare to go, and how the minority who did not go could possibly dare to stay.'

Kindless suspicions, sneers, complaints. What did they care for the eternal glories and the beatific vision? Then one fast for all men and things, from the pitriarel to the prefect, seemed to be—did he or it advise this use of the Church?—which Philammon soon perceived to mean their own ease, their influence, their self-gloration. And the poor her, as his faculty for fault-finding quickened under the influence of thurs, seemed to see under the humble stock-phrases in which they talked of their labours of love, and the future reward of their present humiliations, a deep and hardy-hidden pride, a faith in their own infallibility, a contemptuous impatience of every man, however venerable, who differed from their party on any, the slightest, matter. They spoke with sneers of Augustine's Latinising tendencies, and with open execrations of Chrysostom, as the vilest and most impious of schematics, and, for aught Philammon knew, they were right enough. But when they talked of wars and desolation past and impending, without a word of pity for the slain and ruined, as a just judgment of Heaven upon heretics and heathens, when they argued over the awful struggle for power which, as he gathered from their words, was even then pending between the Emperor and the Count of Africa, as if it contained but one question of interest to them—would Cyril, and they as his bodyguard, gain or lose power in Alexandria? and lastly, when at some mention of Origen, and of Hypatia as his counsellor, they broke out into open imprecations of God's curse, and comforted themselves with the prospect of everlasting torment for both, he shuddered and ached himself involuntarily—were these the summers of a Gospel?—were these the fruits of Christ's Spirit? And a whisper thrilled through the inmost depths of his soul—'Is there a Gospel? Is there a Spirit of Christ? Would not their fruits be different from these?'

Faint, and low, and distant, was that whisper, like the rumble of an earthquake miles below the soil. And yet, like the earthquake roll, it had in that one moment jarred every belief, and hope, and memory of his being such a hair's-breadth from its place. Only one hair's-breadth. But that was enough, his whole inward and outward world changed shape, and shook at every point. What if it were to fall in pieces? His brain reeled with the thought. He doubted his own identity. The very light of heaven had altered its hue. Was the firm ground on which he stood after all no solid reality, but a fragile shell which covered—what?

The nightmare vanished, and he breathed once more. What a strange dream! The sun and the exertion must have made him giddy. He would forget all about it.

Wary with labour, and still warier with thought, he returned that evening, longing and yet dreading to be permitted to speak with Hypatia. He half hoped it moments that Cyril might think him too weak for it, and the next, all his pride and dreading, not to say his faith and hope, sprang him on. Might he but face the terrible enchantress, and rebuke her to her face? And yet so lovely, so noble as she looked! Could he speak to her, except in tones of gentle warning, pity, counsel, entreaty? Might he not convert her—save her? Glorious thought! to win such a soul to the true cause! To be able to show, as the firstfruits of his mission, the very champion of heathendom! It was worth while to have lived only to do that, and having done it, to die.

The archbishop's lodgings, when he entered them, were in a state of ferment even greater than usual. Groups of monks, priests, parabolans, and citizens rich and poor, were hanging about the courtyard, talking earnestly and angrily. A large party of monks fresh from Nitria, with ragged hair and beards, and the peculiar expression of countenance which fanatics of all creeds acquire, here and yet absent, self-conscious and yet ungoverned, silly and yet sly, with features coarsened and degraded by continual fasting and self-torture, jondishly shrouded from head to heel in their long ragged gowns, were gesticulating wildly and loudly, and calling on their more peaceable companions, in no measured terms, to revenge some insult offered to the Church.

'What is the matter?' asked Philammon of a quiet portly citizen, who stood looking up, with a most perplexed visage, at the windows of the patriarch's apartment.

'Don't ask me, I have nothing to do with it. Why does not his holiness come out and speak to them? Blessed virgin, mother of God! that we were well through it all—'

'Coward!' howled a monk in his ear. 'These shopkeepers care for nothing but seeing their stalls safe. Rather than lose a day's custom, they would give the very churches to be plundered by the heathen!'

'We do not want them!' cried another. 'We managed Dioscoros and his brother, and we can manage Orestes. What matter what answer he sends? The devil shall have his own!'

'They ought to have been huck two hours ago—they are murdered by this time!'

'He would not dare to touch the anhidreton!'

'He will dare anything. Cyril should never have sent them forth as lambs among wolves. What necessity was there for letting the people know that the Jews were gone? He would have found it out for himself last enough, the next time he wanted to borrow money.'

'What is all this about, reverend sir?' asked Philammon of Peter the Reader, who made his appearance at that moment in the quadrangle, walking with great strides, like the soul of Agamemnon across the mounds of Asphodel, and apparently beset himself with rage.

'Ah! you here? You may go to-morrow, young fool! The patriarch can't talk to you. Why should he? Some people have a great deal too much notice taken of them, in my opinion. Yes, you may go. If your head is not turned already, you may go and get it turned to-morrow. We shall see whether he who exalts himself is not abased, before all is over.' And he was strolling away, when Philammon, at the risk of an explosion, stopped him.

'His holiness commanded me to see him, sir, before—'

Peter turned on him in a fury. 'Fool! will you dare to intrude your fantastical dreams on him at such a moment as this?'

'He commanded me to see him,' said Philammon, with the true soldierlike discipline of a monk; 'and see him I will in spite of any man.

I believe in my heart you wish to keep me from his counsels and his blessing.'

Peter looked at him for a moment with a right wicked expression, and then, to the youth's astonishment, struck him full in the face, and yelled for help.

If the blow had been given by Pambo in the Iann a week before, Philammon would have borne it. But from that man, and coming unexpectedly as the hushing stroke to all his disappointment and disgust, it was intolerable, and in an instant Peter's long legs were sprawling on the pavement, while he bellowed like a bull for all the monks in Nitria.

A dozen brown hands were at Philammon's throat as Peter rose.

'Save him! hold him!' half blubbered he. 'The traitor! the heretic! He holds communion with heathens!'

'Down with him!' 'Cast him out!' 'Carry him to the archbishop!' while Philammon shook himself free, and Peter returned to the charge.

'I will call all good Catholics to witness! He has beaten an ecclesiastic in the courts of the Lord's house, even in the midst of thee, O Jerusalem! And he is in Hypatia's lecture-room this morning!'

A group of jeons horror rose. Philammon set his back against the wall.

'His holiness the patriarch sent me.'

'He confesses, he confesses! He divided the prey of the patriarch into letting him go, under colour of converting him; and even now he wants to intrude in the sacred presence of Cyril, humming only with the carnal desire that he may meet the sorceress in her house to-morrow!'

'Scandal!' 'Abomination in the holy place!' and a rush at the poor wretch took place.

His blood was thoroughly up. The respectable part of the crowd, as usual in such cases, promptly retreated, and left him to the mercy of the monks, with an eye to their own reputation for orthodoxy, not to mention their personal safety, and he had to help himself as he could. He looked round for a weapon. There was none. The ring of monks were baying at him like hounds round a hen, and though he might have been a match for any one of them singly, yet their snowy limbs and determined faces warned him that against such odds the struggle would be desperate.

'Let me leave this court in safety! God knows whether I am a heretic, and to Him I commit my cause! The holy patriarch shall know of my minority. I will not trouble you, I give you leave to call me heretic, or heathen, if you will, if I cross this threshold till Cyril himself sends for me back to shame you.'

And he turned, and forced his way to the gate, amid a yell of derision which brought every drop of blood in his body into his cheeks. Twice, as he went down the vaulted passage, a rush was made on him from behind, but the soberer of his persecutors checked it. Yet he could not leave them, young and hot-headed as he was, without one last word, and on the threshold he turned.

'You! who call yourselves the disciples of the Lord, and are more like the demons who abide day and night in the tombs, crying and cutting themselves with stones—'

In an instant, they rushed upon him, and, luckily for him, rushed also into the arms of a party of ecclesiastics, who were hurrying inwards from the street, with faces of blank terror.

'He has refused!' shouted the foremost. 'He declares war against the Church of God!'

'Oh, my friends,' panted the archdeacon, 'we are escaped like the hare out of the snare of the fowler. The tyrant kept us waiting two hours at his palace-gates, and then sent hectors out upon us, with rods and axes, telling us that they were the only message which he had for robbers and rioters.'

'Back to the patriarch!' and the whole mob streamed in again, leaving Philammon alone in the street—and in the world.

Whither now?

He strode on in his wrath some hundred yards or more before he asked himself that question. And when he asked it, he found himself in no humour to answer it. He was adrift, and blown out of harbour upon a shoreless sea, in utter darkness, all heaven and earth were nothing to him. He was alone in the blindness of anger.

Gradually one fixed idea, as a light tower, began to glimmer through the storm. To see Hyzaria, and convert her. He had the patriarch's leave for that. That must be right. That would justify him—bring him back, perhaps, in a triumph more glorious than any Caesar's, leading captive, in the fetters of the Gospel, the Queen of Heathendom. Yes, there was that left, for which to live.

His passion cooled down gradually as he wandered on in the fading evening light, up one street and down another, till he had utterly lost his way. What matter? He should find that lecture-room to-morrow at least. At last he found himself in a broad avenue, which he seemed to know. Was that the Sun-gate in the distance? He sauntered carelessly down it, and found himself at last on the great Esplanade, whither the little porter had taken him three days before. He was close then to the Museum, and to her house. Destiny had led him, unconsciously, towards the scene of his enterprise. It was a good omen, he would go thither at once. He might sleep upon her doorstep as well as upon any other. Perhaps he might catch a glimpse of her going out or coming in, even at that late hour. It might be well to accustom himself to the sight of her. There would be the less chance of his being abashed to-morrow before those sorceress eyes. And moreover, to tell the truth, his self-dependence, and his self-will too, crushed, or rather laid to sleep, by the discipline of the Laura, had started into wild life, and gave him a mysterious pleasure, which he had not felt since he was a disobedient little boy, of doing what he chose, right or wrong, simply because he chose it. Such moments come to every free-willed creature. Happy are those who have not, like poor Philammon, been kept by a hotbed cultivation from knowing how to face them. But he had yet to learn, or rather his tutors had to learn, that the sure path towards willing obedience and manful self-restraint, lies not through slavery, but through liberty.

He was not certain which was Hyzaria's house, but the door of the Museum he could not forget. So there he sat himself down under the garden wall, soothed by the cool night, and the holy silence, and the rich perfume of the thousand foreign flowers which filled the air with enervating bloom. Then he sat and watched, and watched, and watched in vain for some glimpse of his own object. Which of the houses was hers? Which was the window of her chamber? Did it look into the street? What business had his fancy with woman's chambers? But that one open window, with the lamp burning bright inside—he could not help looking up to it—he could not help fancying—hoping. He even moved a few yards to see better the bright interior of the room. High up as it was, he could still discern shelves of books—pictures on the walls. Was that a voice? Yes! a woman's voice—reading aloud in metre—was plainly distinguishable in the dead stillness of the night, which did not even awaken a whisper in the trees above his head. He stood, spellbound by curiosity.

Suddenly the voice ceased, and a woman's figure came forward to the window, and stood motionless, gazing upward at the spangled star-world overhead, and seeming to drink in the glory, and the silence, and the rich perfume.

'Could it be she?' Every pulse in his body throbbed madly. 'Could it be?' What was she doing? He could not distinguish the features, but the full blaze of the eastern moon showed him an upturned brow, between a golden stream of glittering tresses which hid her whole figure, except the white hands clasped upon her bosom. Was she praying? were these her midnight sorceries?

And still his heart throbbed and throbbed, till he almost fancied she must hear its noisy beat—and still she stood motionless, gazing upon the sky, like some exquisite chryselephantine statue, all ivory and gold. And behind her, round the bright room within, painting, books, a whole world of unknown science and beauty. And she the priestess of it all, inviting him to learn of her and be wise! It was a temptation! He would flee from it! Fool that he was!—and it might not be she after all!

He made some sudden movement. She looked down, saw him, and shutting the blind, vanished for the night. In vain, now that the temptation had departed, he sat and waited for its reappearance, half cursing himself for having broken the spell. But the chamber was dark and silent henceforth; and Philammon, wearied out, found himself soon wandering back to the Laura in quiet dreams, beneath the balmy, semitropic night.

CHAPTER X

THE INTERVIEW

PHILAMMON was aroused from his slumbers at sunrise the next morning by the attendants who came in to sweep out the lecture-rooms, and wandered, disconsolately enough, up and down the street, longing for, and yet dreading, the three weary hours to be over which must pass before he would be admitted to Hypatia. But he had tasted no food since noon the day before—he had but three hours' sleep the previous night, and had been working, running, and fighting for two whole days without a moment's peace of body or mind. Sick with hunger and fatigue, and aching from head to foot with his hard night's rest on the grassy flags, he felt as unable as man could well be to collect his thoughts or brace his nerves for the coming interview. How to get food he could not guess, but having two hands, he might at least earn a coin by carrying a load, so he went down to the Esplanade in search of work. Of that, there was none. So he sat down upon the parapet of the quay, and watched the shoals of saildines which played in and out over the marble steps below, and wondered at the strange crabs and sea locusts which crawled up and down the face of the masonry, a few feet below the surface, scrambling for bits of offal, and making occasional fruitless dashes at the numble little silver arrows which played round them. And at last his whole soul, too tired to think of anything else, became absorbed in a mighty struggle between two great crabs, who held on stoutly, each by a claw, to his respective bunch of seaweed, while with the others they tugged, one at the head and the other at the tail of a dead fish. Which would conquer? Ay, which? And for five minutes Philammon was alone in the world with the two struggling heroes. Might not they be emblematic? Might not the upper one typify Cyril—the lower one Hypatia?—and the dead fish between, himself? But at last the deadlock was suddenly ended—the fish parted in the middle, and the typical Hypatia and Cyril, losing hold of their respective seaweeds by the jerk, tumbled down, each with its half-fish, and vanished head over heels into the blue depths in so undignified a manner, that Philammon burst into a shout of laughter.

'What's the joke?' asked a well-known voice behind him; and a hand patted him familiarly on the back. He looked round, and saw the little porter, his head crowned with a full basket of figs, grapes, and water-melons, on which the poor youth cast a longing eye. 'Well, my young friend, and why are you not at church?

Look at all the saints pouring into the Casarsum there, behind you.'

Philammon answered sulkily enough some thing inarticulate.

'Ho, ho! Quarrelled with the success of the Apostles already? Has my prophecy come true, and the strong meat of monks riot and plunder proved too highly spiced for your young palate? Eh?'

Poor Philammon! Angry with himself for feeling that the porter was right, shrinking from the notion of exposing the failings of his fellow-Christians, shrinking still more from making such a weakness his confidant, and yet yearning in his loneliness to open his heart to some one, he dropped out, hurt by hurt, word by word, the events of the past evening, and finished by a request to be put in the way of earning his breakfast.

'Earning your breakfast! Shall the favourite of the gods—shall the guest of Hypatia—earn his breakfast, while I have an obol to share with him? Base thought! Youth! I have wronged you. Unphilosophically I allowed, yesterday morning, my to mull the ocean of my intellect. We are now friends and brothers, in hatred to the monastic tribe.'

'I do not hate them, I tell you,' said Philammon. 'But these Nitrian savages—'

'Are the perfect examples of monery, and you hate them,' and therefore, all greater continuing the less you hate all less monastic monks. I have not heard logic lectures in vain. Now, up! The sun wears our dusty limbs. Nereids and Tritons, charging no cloud come tell us to Nitria's baths. At home a mighty sheet-fish smokes upon the festive board, her crowns the horn, and ominous deck the dish, come then, my guest and brother!'

Philammon swallowed certain scruples about becoming the guest of a heathen, seeing that otherwise there seemed no chance of having anything else to swallow, and after a refreshing plunge in the sea, followed the hospitable little fellow to Hypatia's door, where he dropped his daily load of fruit, and then into a narrow by-street, to the ground-floor of a huge block of lodgings, with a common staircase, swarming with children, cats, and chickens, and was ushered by his host into a little room, where the savoury smell of broiling fish revived Philammon's heart.

'Judith! Judith! where lingerest thou! Marble of Pentelicus! foam-flake of the wine-dark main! Ily of the Mareotic lake! You accursed black Andromeda, if you don't bring the breakfast this moment, I'll cut you in two!'

The inner door opened, and in bustled, trembling, her hands full of dishes, a tall little negress, dressed in true negro fashion, in a snow-white cotton shift, a scarlet cotton petticoat, and bright yellow turban of the same, making a light in that dark place which would have served as a landmark a mile off. She put the dishes down, and the porter majestically waved Philammon to a stool, while she retreated, and stood humbly waiting on her lord and master, who did not deign to introduce to his guest the black beauty which composed his whole seraglio. But, indeed, such an act of courtesy would have been needless, for the first morsel of fish was hardly safe in poor Philammon's mouth, when the negress rushed upon him, caught him by the head, and covered him with rapturous kisses.

Up jumped the little man with a yell, brandishing a knife in one hand and a look in the other, while Philammon, scarcely less scandalised, jumped up too, and shook himself free of the lady, who, finding it impossible to vent her feelings further on his head, instantly changed her tactics, and, wallowing on the floor, began frantically kissing his feet.

'What is this? before my face! Up, shameless baggage, or thou diest the death!' and the porter pulled her up upon her knees.

'It is the monk! the young man I told you of, who saved me from the Jews the other night! What good angel sent him here that I might thank him!' cried the poor creature, while the tears ran down her black shining face.

'I am that good angel,' said the porter, with a look of intense self-satisfaction. 'Rise, daughter of Eribus, thou art pardoned, being but a female. What says the poet?—

"Woman is passion's slave, while faithful lord O'er her and person's rules the noble male."

Yonk! to my aims! Truly say the philosophers, that the universe is magical in itself, and by mysterious sympathies links like to like. The prophetic instinct of thy future benefits towards me drew me to thee as by an invisible warp, hawser, or chain-cable, from the moment I beheld thee. Thou wert a kindred spirit, my brother, though thou knewest it not. Therefore I do not praise thee—no, nor thank thee in the least, though thou hast preserved for me the one palm which shadows my weary steps—the single lotus-flower (in this case black, not white) which blooms for me above the mud-stained ocean wastes of the Hygie Borboros. That which thou hast done, thou hast done by instinct—by divine compulsion—thou couldst no more help it than thou canst help eating that fish, and art no more to be praised for it.

'Thank you,' said Philammon.

'Comprehend me. Our theory in the schools for such cases is this—has been so at least for the last six months, similar particles, from one original source, exist in you and me. Similar causes produce similar effects, our attractions, antipathies, impulses, are therefore, in similar circumstances, absolutely the same, and therefore you did the other night exactly what I should have done in your case.'

Philammon thought the latter part of the theory open to question, but he had by no means stopped eating when he rose, and his mouth was much too full of fish to argue.

'And therefore,' continued the little man,

'we are to consider ourselves henceforth as one soul in two bodies. You may have the best of the corporeal part of the division. . . yet it is the soul which makes the person. You may trust me, I shall not disown my brotherhood. If any one insults you henceforth, you have but to call me, and if I be within hearing, why, by this right arm—'

And he attempted a pat on Philammon's head, which, as there was a head and shoulder's distance between them, might on the whole have been considered, from a theatrical point of view, as a failure. Whereon the little man seized the calabash of beer, and filling therewith a cow's horn, his thumb on the small end, raised it high in the air.

'To the Tenth Muse, and to your interview with her!'

And removing his thumb, he sent a steady jet into his open mouth, and having drained the horn without drawing breath, licked his lips, handed it to Philammon, and flew ravenously upon the fish and onions.

Philammon, to whom the whole was supremely absurd, had no invocation to make, but one which he felt too sacred for his present temper of mind. So he attempted to imitate the little man's feat, and, of course, poured the beer into his eyes, and up his nose, and in his bosom, and finally choked himself black in the face, while his host observed smilingly—

'Aha, rustic! unacquainted with the ancient and classical customs preserved in this centre of civilisation by the descendants of Alexander's heroes! Judith! clear the table. Now to the sanctuary of the Muses.'

Philammon rose, and finished his meal by a monkish grace. A gentle and reverent 'Amen' rose from the other end of the room. It was the negress. She saw him look up at her, dropped her eyes modestly, and bustled away with the remnants, while Philammon and his host started for Hypatia's lecture room.

'Your wife is a Christian?' asked he when they were outside the door.

'Ahem—' The barbaric mind is prone to superstition. Yet she is, being but a woman and a negress, a good soul, and thrifty, though requiring, like all lower animals, occasional chastisement. I married her on philosophic grounds. A wife was necessary to me for several reasons, but mindful that the philosopher should subjugate the material appetite, and rise above the swinish desires of the flesh, even when his nature requires him to satisfy them, I purposed to make pleasure as unpleasant as possible. I had the choice of several cripples—their parents, of ancient Macedonian family like myself, were by no means adverse, but I required a housekeeper, with whose duties the want of an arm or a leg might have interfered.

'Why did you not marry a scold?' asked Philammon.

'Pertinently observed and indeed the example of Socrates rose luminous more than once before my imagination. But philosophic calm, my dear youth, and the peaceful contemplation of the ineffable! I could not relinquish those luxuries. So having, by the bounty of Hypatia and her pupils, saved a small sum, I went out, bought me a negress, and hired six rooms in the block we have just left, where I let lodgings to young students of the Divine Philosophy.

'Have you any lodgers now?'

'Ahem! Certain rooms are occupied by a lady of rank. The philosopher will, above all things, abstain from babbling. To bridle the tongue, is to— But there is a closet at your service, and for the hall of reception, which you have just left—are you not a kindred and fraternal spark? We can combine our meals, as our souls are already united.'

Philammon thanked him heartily for the offer, though he shrunk from accepting it, and in ten minutes more found himself at the door of the very house which he had been watching the night before. It was she, then, whom he had seen!

He was handed over by a black porter to a smart slave-girl, who guided him up, through cloisters and corridors, to the huge library, where five or six young men were sitting, busily engaged, under Theon's supervising tendency, in copying manuscripts and drawing geometric diagrams.

Philammon gazed curiously at these symbols of a science unknown to him, and wondered whether the day would ever come when he too would understand their mysteries, but his eyes fell again as he saw the youths staring at his ragged sheepskin and matted locks with undisguised contempt. He could hardly collect himself enough to obey the summons of the venerable old man, as he beckoned him silently out of the room, and led him, with the titters of the young students ringing in his ears, through the door by which he had entered, and along a gallery, till he stopped and knocked humbly at a door. She must be within!

... Now! ... At last! His knees knocked together under him. His heart sank and sank into abysses! Poor wretch! He was half-minded once to escape and dash into the street. But was it not his one hope, his one object? But why did not that old man speak! If he would have but said something! If he would only have looked cross, contemptuous! ... But with the same impressive gravity, as of a man upon a business in which he had no voice, and wished it to be understood that he had none, the old man silently opened the door, and Philammon followed. ... There she was! looking more glorious than ever, more than when glowing with the enthusiasm of her own eloquence, more than when transfigured last night in golden tresses and glittering moonbeams. There she sat, without moving a finger, as the two entered. She greeted her father with a smile, which made up for all her seeming want of courtesy to him, and then fixed her large gray eyes full on Philammon.

'Here is the youth, my daughter. It was your wish, you know, and I always believe that you know best—'

Another smile put an end to this speech, and the old man retreated humbly toward another door, with a somewhat anxious visage, and then lingering and looking back, his hand upon the latch—

'If you require any one, you know, you have only to call—we shall be all in the library.'

Another smile; and the old man disappeared, leaving the two alone.

Philammon stood trembling, choking, his eyes fixed on the floor. Where were all the fine things he had conned over for the occasion! He dared not look up at that face, lest it should drive them out of his head. And yet the more he kept his eyes turned from the face, the more he was conscious of it, conscious that it was watching him, and the more all the fine words were, by that very knowledge, driven out of his head. When would she speak! Perhaps she wished him to speak first. It was his duty to begin, for she had sent for him. But still she kept silence, and sat scanning him intently from head to foot, herself as motionless as a statue, her hands folded together before her, over the manuscript which lay upon her knee. If there was a blush on her cheek at her own daring, his eyes swam too much to notice it.

When would the intolerable suspense end! She was, perhaps, as unwilling to speak as he. But some one must strike the first blow, and, as often happens, the weaker party, impelled by sheer fear, struck it, and broke the silence in a tone half-indignant, half-apologetic—

'You sent for me hither!'

'I did. It seemed to me, as I watched you during my lecture, both before and after you were rude enough to interrupt me, that your offence was one of mere youthful ignorance. It seemed to me that your countenance bespoke a nobler nature than that which the gods are usually pleased to bestow upon monks. That I may now ascertain whether or not my surmises were correct, I ask you for what purpose are you come hither!'

Philammon hailed the question as a godsend.—Now for his message! And yet he faltered as he answered, with a desperate effort,—'To rebuke you for your sins.'

'My sins! What sins?' she asked, as she looked up with a stately, slow surprise in those large gray eyes, before which his own glance sank abashed, he knew not why. What sins?—He knew not. Did she look like a Messalina! But was she not a heathen and a sorceress!—And yet he blushed, and stammered, and hung down his head, as, shrinking at the sound of his own words, he replied—

'The foul sorceries—and profligacy worse than sorceries, in which, they say—' He could get no farther. for he looked up again and saw an awful quiet smile upon that face. His words had raised no blush upon the marble cheek.

'They say! The bigots and slanderers, with beasts of the desert, and fanatic intriguers, who, in the words of Him they call their master, compass heaven and earth to make one proselyte, and when they have found him, make him two-fold more the child of hell than themselves. Go—I forgive you: you are young, and know not yet the mystery of the world. Science will teach you some day that the outward frame is the sacrament of the soul's inward beauty. Such a soul I had fancied your face expressed, but I was mistaken. Foul hearts alone harbour such foul suspicions, and fancy others to be what they know they might become themselves. Go! Do I look like—? 'The very tapering of these fingers, if you could read their symbolism, would give your dream the lie.' And she flashed full on him, like sun-rays from a mirror, the full radiance of her glorious countenance.

Alas, poor Philammon! where were thy eloquent arguments, thy orthodox theories then? Proudly he struggled with his own man's heart of flesh, and tried to turn his eyes away, the unguet might as well struggle to escape from the spell of the north. In a moment, he knew not how, with shame, remorse, longing for forgiveness, swept over him, and crushed him down, and he found himself on his knees before her, in abject and broken syllables entreating pardon.

'Go—I forgive you. But know before you go, that the celestial milk which fell from Heron's bosom, bleaching the plant which it touched to evilising whiteness, was not more taintless than the soul of Theon's daughter.'

He looked up in her face as he knelt before her. Unerring instinct told him that her words were true. He was a monk, accustomed to believe animal man to be the deadliest and worst of all sins—indeed, 'the great offence' itself, beside which all others were comparatively venial, where there was physical purity, must not all other virtues follow in its wake? All other sinners were invisible under the dazzling veil of that great loveliness, and in his self-abasement he went on—

'Oh, do not spurn me!—do not drive me away! I have neither friend, home, nor teacher. I fled last night from the men of my own faith, maligned by bitter insult and injustice—disappointed and disgusted with their ferocity, narrowness, ignorance. I dare not, I cannot, I will not return to the obscurity and the dulness of a Thebad Laura. I have a thousand doubts to solve, a thousand questions to ask, about that great ancient world of which I know nothing!—of whose mysteries, they say, you alone possess the key! I am a Christian; but I thirst for knowledge. . . I do not promise to believe you—I do not promise to obey you, but let me hear! Teach me what you know, that I may compare it with what I know. . . If indeed' (and he shuddered as he spoke the words) 'I do know anything!'

'Have you forgotten the epithets which you used to me just now?'

'No, no! But do you forget them; they were put into my mouth. I—I did not believe them when I said them. It was agony to me; but I did it, as I thought, for your sake—to save you. Oh, say that I may come and hear you again! Only from a distance—in the very farthest corner of your lecture-room. I will be silent, you shall never see me. But your words yesterday awoke in me—no, not doubts, but still I must, I must hear more, or be as miserable and homeless inwardly as I am in my outward circumstances!'

And he looked up imploringly for consent.

'Rise. This passion and that attitude are fitting neither for you nor me.'

And as Philammon rose, she rose also, went into the library to her father, and in a few minutes returned with him.

'Come with me, young man,' said he, laying his hand kindly enough on Philammon's shoulder. . . 'The rest of this matter you and I can settle,' and Philammon followed him, not daring to look back at Hypatia, while the whole room swam before his eyes.

'So, so I hear you have been saying rude things to my daughter. Well, she has forgiven you—'

'Has she?' asked the young monk, with an eager start.

'Ah! you may well look astonished. But I forgive you too. It is lucky for you, however, that I did not hear you, or else, old man as I am, I can't say what I might not have done. Ah! you little know, you little know what she is!—and the old peasant's eyes kindled with loving pride.

'May the gods give you some day such a daughter!—that is, if you learn to deserve it—as virtuous as she is wise, as wise as she is beautiful. Truly they have repaid me for my labours in their service. Look, young man! little as you merit it, here is a pledge of your forgiveness, such as the richest and noblest in Alexandria are glad to purchase with many an ounce of gold—a ticket of free admission to all her lectures henceforth! Now go, you have been favoured by our deserts, and should learn that the philosopher can practise what the Christian only preaches, and return good for evil.' And he put into Philammon's hand a slip of paper, and bid one of the secretaries show him to the outer door.

The youths looked up at him from their writing as he passed, with faces of surprise and awe, and evidently thinking no more about the absurdity of his sheepskin and his tanned complexion, and he went out with a stunned, confused feeling, as of one who, by a desperate leap, has plunged into a new world. He tried to feel content, but he dare not. All before him was anxiety, uncertainty. He had cut himself adrift, he was on the great stream. Whither would it lead him? Well—was it not the great stream? Had not all mankind, for all the ages, been floating on it? Or was it but a desert-river, dwindling away beneath the fiery sun, destined to lose itself a few miles on, among the and sands? Were Arsenius and the faith of his childhood right? And was the Old World coming speedily to its death-throe, and the Kingdom of God at hand? Or was Cyril right, and the Church Catholic appointed to spread, and conquer, and destroy, and rebuild, till the kingdoms of this world had become the kingdoms of God and of His Christ? If so, what use in this old knowledge which he craved? And yet, if the day of the destruction of all things were at hand, and the times destined to become worse and not better, till the end—how could that be?

'What news?' asked the little porter, who had been waiting for him at the door all the while. 'What news, O favourite of the gods?' 'I will lodge with you, and labour with you. Ask me no more at present. I am—I am—'

'Those who descended into the Cave of Trophonius, and beheld the unspeakable, remained astonished for three days, my young friend—and so will you!' And they went forth together to earn their bread.

But what is Hypatia doing all this while, upon that cloudy Olympus, where she sits exalted far above the noise and struggle of man and his work-day world?

She is sitting again, with her manuscripts open before her, but she is thinking of the young monk, not of them.

'Beautiful as Antinous!' Rather as the young Phœbus himself, fresh glowing from the slaughter of the Python. Why should not he, too, become a slayer of Pythons, and loathsome monsters, bred from the mud of sense and matter? So bold and earnest! I can forgive him those words for the very fact of his having dared, here in my father's house, to say them to me. And yet so tender, so open to repentance and noble shame!—That is no plebeian by birth, patrician blood surely flows in those veins, it shows out in every attitude, every tone, every motion of the hand and lip. He cannot be one of the herd. Who ever knew one of them crave after knowledge for its own sake? . . . And I have longed so for one real pupil! I have longed so to find one such man, among the effeminate selfish triflers who pretend to listen to me. I thought I had found one—and the moment that I had lost him, behold, I find another, and that a fresher, purer, simpler nature than ever Raphael's was at its best. By all the laws of physiognomy—by all the symbolism of gesture and voice and complexion—by the instinct of my own heart, that young monk might be the instrument, the ready, valiant, obedient instrument, for carrying out all my dreams. If I could but train him into a Longinus, I could dare to play the part of a Zenobia, with him as counsellor. . . . And for my Odenatus—Orestes! Horrible!

She covered her face with her hand a minute. 'No!' she said, dashing away the tears—'That—and anything—and everything for the cause of Philosophy and the gods!'

CHAPTER XI

THE LAURA AGAIN

NOT a sound, not a moving object, broke the utter stillness of the glen of Soetia. The shadows of the crags, though paling every moment before the spreading dawn, still shrouded all the gorge in gloom. A winding line of haze slept above the course of the rivulet. The plumes of the palm-trees hung motionless, as if awaiting in resignation the breathless blaze of the approaching day. At length, among the green ridges of the monastery garden, two gray figures rose from their knees, and began, with slow and feeble strokes, to break the silence by the clatter of their hoes among the pebbles.

'These beans grow wonderfully, brother Anfugus. We shall be able to sow our second crop, by God's blessing, a week earlier than we did last year.'

The person addressed returned no answer, and his companion, after watching him for some time in silence, recommenced—

'What is it, my brother? I have remarked lately a melancholy about you, which is hardly fitting for a man of God.'

A deep sigh was the only answer. The speaker laid down his hoe, and placing his hand affectionately on the shoulder of Anfugus, asked again—

'What is it, my friend? I will not claim with you my abbot's right to know the secrets of your heart. But surely that breast hides nothing which is unworthy to be spoken to me, however unworthy I may be to hear it!'

'Why should I not be sad, Pambos, my friend? Does not Solomon say that there is a time for mourning?'

'True. But a time for mirth also.'

'None to the penitent, burdened with the guilt of many sins.'

'Recollect what the blessed Anthony used to say—"Trust not in thine own righteousness, and regret not that which is past."'

'I do neither, Pambos.'

'Do not be too sure of that. Is it not because thou art still trusting in thyself, that thou dost regret the past, which shows thee that thou art not that which thou wouldst gladly praise thyself on being?'

'Pambos, my friend,' said Arsenius solemnly, 'I will tell thee all. My sins are not yet past. For Honorius, my pupil, still lives, and in him lives the weakness and the misery of Rome. My sins past! If they are, why do I see rising before me, night after night, that train of accusing spectres, ghosts of men slain in battle, widows and orphans, virgins of the Lord shrieking in the grasp of barbarians, who stand by my bedside and cry, "Hast thou done thy duty, we had not been thus! Where is that imperial charge which God committed to thee?"'

And the old man hid his face in his hands and wept bitterly.

Pambo laid his hand again tenderly on the weeper's shoulder.

"Is there no pride here, my brother? Who art thou, to change the fate of nations and the hours of emperors, which are in the hand of the King of kings? If thou wert weak, and imperfect in thy work—for unfaithful, I will warrant thee, thou wert never.—He put thee there, because thou wert imperfect, that so that which has come to pass might come to pass, and thou bearest thine own burden only—and yet not thou, but He who bore it for thee."

"Why then am I tormented by these nightly visions?"

"Fear them not, friend. They are spirits of evil, and therefore lying spirits. Were they good spirits they would speak to thee only in pity, forgiveness, encouragement. But be they ghosts or demons, they must be evil, because they are accusers, like the Evil One himself, the accuser of the saints. He is the father of lies, and his children will be like himself. What said the blessed Anthony? That a monk should not busy his brain with painting spectres, or give himself up for lost, but rather be cheerful, is one who knows that he is redeemed, and in the hands of the Lord, where the Evil One has no power to hurt him. "For," he used to say, "the demons believe to us even as they had us. If they see us cast down and faithless, they terrify us still more, that they may plunge us in despair. But if they see us full of faith, and joyful in the Lord, with our souls filled with the glory which shall be, then they shrink abashed, and flee away in confusion." Cheer up, friend! such thoughts are of the night, the hour of Satan and of the powers of darkness, and with the dawn they flee away."

"And yet things are revealed to men upon their beds, in visions of the night."

"Be it so. Nothing, at all events, has been revealed to thee upon thy bed, except that which thou knowest already far better than Satan does, namely, that thou art a sinner. But for me, my friend, though I doubt not that such things are, it is the day, and not the night, which brings revelations."

"How, then?"

"Because by day I can see to read that book which is written, like the Law given on Sinai, upon tables of stone, by the finger of God Himself."

Arsenius looked up at him inquiringly. Pambo smiled.

"Thou knowest that, like many holy men of old, I am no scholar, and knew not even the Greek tongue, till thou, out of thy brotherly kindness, taughtest it to me. But hast thou never heard what Anthony said to a certain Pagan who reproached him with his ignorance of books? "Which is first," he asked, "spirit, or letter?—Spirit, sayest thou? Then know, the healthy spirit needs no letters. My book is the whole creation, lying open before me, wherein I can read, whosoever I please, the word of God."

"Dost thou not undervalue learning, my friend?"

"I am old among monks, and have seen much of their ways, and among them my simplicity seems to have seen this—many a man wearing himself with study, and tormenting his soul as to whether he believed rightly this doctrine and that, while he knew not with Solomon that in much learning is much sorrow, and that while he was puzzling at the letter of God's message, the spirit of it was going fast and faster out of him."

"And how dost thou know that of such a man?"

"By seeing him become a more and more learned theologian, and more and more zealous for the letter of orthodoxy, and yet less and less loving and merciful—less and less full of trust in God, and of hopeful thoughts for himself and for his brethren, till he seemed to have darkened his whole soul with disquisitions, which breed only strife, and to have forgotten utterly the message which is written in that book where with the blessed Anthony was content."

"Of what message dost thou speak?"

"Look," said the old abbot, stretching his hand toward the Eastern desert, "and judge, like a wise man, for thyself."

As he spoke, a long arrow of level light flashed down the gorge from crag to crag, awakening every crack and slab to vividness and life. The great crimson sun rose swiftly through the thin night-mist of the desert, and as he poured his glory down the glen, the haze rose in threads and plumes, and vanished, leaving the stream to sparkle round the rocks like the living, twinkling eye of the whole scene. Swallows flushed by hundreds out of the cliffs, and began their air dance for the day; the heron hopped stealthily homeward on his stilts from his stolen meal in the monastery garden; the brown sand-hazards underneath the stones opened one eyelid each, and having satisfied themselves that it was day, dragged their bloated bodies and whip-like tails out into the most burning patch of gravel which they could find, and nestling together as a further protection against cold, fell fast asleep again; the buzzard, who considered himself lord of the valley, awoke with a long querulous bark, and rising aloft in two or three vast rings, to stretch himself after his night's sleep, hung motionless, watching every lark which chirruped on the cliffs, while from the far-off Nile below, the awakening croak of pelicans, the clang of geese, the whistle of the godwit and curlew, came ringing up the windings of the glen, and last of all the voices of the monks rose chanting a morning hymn to some wild Eastern air, and a new day had begun in Seets, like those which went before, and those which were to follow after, week after week, year after year, of toil and prayer as quiet as its sleep.

"What does that teach thee, Arseneus, my friend?"

Arsenius was silent.

'To me it teaches this that God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all. That in His presence is life, and fulness of joy for evermore. That He is the giver, who delights in His own bounty, the lover, whose mercy is over all His works—and why not over thee, too, O thou of little faith? Look at those thousand birds—and without our Father not one of them shall fall to the ground and at them not of more value than many sparrows, thou for whom God sent His Son to die? Ah, my friend, we must look out and around to see what God is like. It is when we persist in turning our eyes inward, and prying curiously over our own imperfections, that we learn to make a God after our own image, and fancy that our own darkness and hardness of heart are the patterns of His light and love.'

'Thou speakest rather as a philosopher than as a penitent Catholic. For me, I feel that I want to look more, and not less, inward. Deeper self-examination, completer abstraction, than I can attain even here, are what I crave for. I long—forgive me, my friend—for I long more and more, duly, for the solitary life. This earth is accursed by man's sin; the less we see of it, it seems to me, the better.'

'I may speak as a philosopher, or as a heathen, for aught I know; yet it seems to me that, as they say, the half loaf is better than none, that the wise man will make the best of what he has, and throw away no lesson because the book is somewhat torn and soiled. The earth teaches me thus far already. Shall I shut my eyes to those invisible things of God which are clearly manifested by the things which are made, because some day they will be more clearly manifested than now? But as for more abstraction, are we so worldly here in Scetis?'

'Nay, my friend, each man has surely his vocation, and for each some peculiar method of life is more edifying than another. In my case, the habits of mind which I acquired in the world will cling to me in spite of myself even here. I cannot help watching the doings of others, studying their characters, planning and plotting for them, trying to prognosticate their future fate. Not a word, not a gesture of this our little family, but turns away my mind from the one thing needful.'

'And do you fancy that the anchorite in his cell has fewer distractions?'

'What can he have but the supply of the mere necessary wants of life? and then, even, he may abridge to the gathering of a few roots and herbs. Men have lived like the beasts already, that they might at the same time live like the angels—and why should not I also?'

'And thou art the wise man of the world—the student of the hearts of others—the anatomist of thine own? Hast thou not found out that, besides a craving stomach, man carries with him a corrupt heart? Many a man I have seen who, in his haste to fly from the fiends without him, has forgotten to close the door of his heart against worse fiends who were ready to harbour within him. Many a monk, friend, changes his place, but not the anguish of his soul. I have known those who, driven to feed on their own thoughts in solitude, have desperately cast themselves from cliffs or ripped up their own bodies, in the longing to escape from thoughts, from which one companion, one kindly voice, might have delivered them. I have known those, too, who have been so puffed up by those very penances which were meant to humble them, that they have despised all means of grace, as though they were already perfect, and refusing even the Holy Eucharist, have lived in self-glorying dreams and visions suggested by the evil spirits. One such I knew, who, in the madness of his pride, refused to be counselled by any mortal man—saying that he would call no man master—and what befell him? He who used to pride himself on wandering a day's journey into the desert without food or drink, who boasted that he could sustain life for three months at a time only on wild herbs and the Blessed Bread, seized with an inward fire, fled from his cell back to the theatres, the circus, and the taverns, and ended his miserable days in desperate gluttony, holding all things to be but phantasmas, denying his own existence, and that of God Himself.'

Arsenius shook his head:

'Be it so. But my case is different. I have yet more to confess, my friend. Day by day I am more and more haunted by the remembrance of that world from which I fled. I know that if I returned I should feel no pleasure in those pomps, which, even while I battered on them, I despised. Can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women, or discern any longer what I eat or what I drink? And yet—the palaces of those seven hills, their statesmen and their generals, their intrigues, their falls, and their triumphs—for they might rise and conquer yet!—for no moment are they out of my imagination,—no moment in which they are not tempting me back to them, like a moth to the candle which has already scorched him, with a dreadful spell, which I must at last obey, wretch that I am, against my own will, or break by fleeing into some outer desert, from whence return will be impossible!'

Pambo smiled.

'Again, I say, this is the worldly-wise man, the searcher of hearts! And he would soon flee from the little Lanra, which does turn his thoughts at times from such vain dreams, to a solitude where he will be utterly unable to escape those dreams. Well, friend!—and what if thou art troubled at times by anxieties and schemes for this brother and for that? Better to be anxious for others than only for thyself. Better to have something to love—even something to weep over—than to become in some lonely cavern thine own world,—perhaps, as more than one whom I have known, thine own God.'

'Do you know what you are saying?' asked Arsenius in a startled tone.

'I say, that by fleeing into solitude a man cuts himself off from all which makes a Christian man, from law, obedience, fellow-help, self-sacrifice—from the communion of saints itself.

'How then?'

'How canst thou hold communion with those toward whom thou canst show no love? And how canst thou show thy love but by works of love?'

'I can, at least, pray day and night for all mankind. Has that no place—or rather, has it not the mightiest place—in the communion of saints?'

'He who cannot pray for his brothers whom he does see, and whose sins and temptations he knows, will pray but dully, my friend Anfugas, for his brothers whom he does not see, or for anything else. And he who will not labour for his brothers, the same will soon cease to pray for them, or love them either. And then, what is written? "If a man love not his brother whom he hath seen, how will he love God whom he hath not seen?"'

'Again, I say, do you know whither your argument leads?'

'I am a plain man, and know nothing about arguments. If a thing be true, let it lead where it will, for it leads where God wills.'

'But at this rate, it were better for a man to take a wife, and have children, and mix himself up in all the turmoil of carnal affections, in order to have as many as possible to love, and fear for, and work for.'

Pambo was silent for a while.

'I am a monk and no logician. But this I say, that thou leavest not the Laura for the desert with my good will. I would rather, had I my wish, see thy wisdom installed some where nearer the metropolis—at Trœ or Canopus, for example—where thou mightest be at hand to fight the Lord's battles. Why wert thou taught worldly wisdom, but to use it for the good of the Church? It is enough. Let us go.'

And the two old men walked homeward across the valley, little guessing the practical answer which was ready for their argument in Abbot Pambo's cell, in the shape of a tall and grim ecclesiastic, who was busily satisfying his hunger with dates and millet, and by no means refusing the palm-wine, the sole delicacy of the monastery, which had been brought forth only in honour of a guest.

The stately and courtly hospitality of Eastern manners, as well as the self-restraining kindness of monastic Christianity, forbade the abbot to interrupt the stranger, and it was not till he had finished a hearty meal that Pambo asked his name and errand.

'My unworthiness is called Peter the Reader. I come from Cyril, with letters and messages to the brother Anfugas.'

Pambo rose, and bowed reverentially.

'We have heard your good report, sir, as of one zealously affected in the cause of the Church Catholic. Will it please you to follow us to the cell of Anfugas?'

Peter stalked after them with a sufficiently important air to the little hut, and there taking from his bosom Cyril's epistle, handed it to Arsenius, who sat long, reading and re-reading with a clouded brow, while Pambo watched him with simple awe, not daring to interrupt by a question ineubrations which he considered of unfathomable depth.

'These are indeed the last days,' said Arsenius at length, 'spoken of by the prophet, when many shall run to and fro. So Heraclion has actually sailed for Italy.'

'His acquaintance was met on the high seas by Alexandrian merchantmen, three weeks ago.'

'And Orestes hardens his heart more and more?'

'Ay, Pharaoh that he is, or rather, the heathen woman hardens it for him.'

'I always feared that woman above all the schools of the heathen,' said Arsenius. 'But the Count Heraclion, whom I always held for the wisest as well as the most righteous of men! Alas!—alas! what virtue will withstand, when ambition sears the heart?'

'Faintly, truly,' said Peter, 'is that same lust of power. But for him, I have never trusted him since he began to be indulgent to those Donatists.'

'Too true. So does one sin beget another.'

'And I consider that indulgence to sinners is the worst of all sins whatsoever.'

'Not of all, surely, reverend sir?' said Pambo humbly. But Peter, taking no notice of the interruption, went on to Arsenius—

'And now, what answer am I to bear back from your wisdom to his holiness?'

'Let me see—let me see. He might—it needs consideration—I ought to know more of the state of parties. He has, of course, communicated with the African bishops, and tried to unite them with him?'

'Two months ago. But the stiff-necked schismatics are still jealous of him, and hold aloof.'

'Schismatics is too harsh a term, my friend. But has he sent to Constantinople?'

'He needs a messenger accustomed to courts. It was possible, he thought, that your experience might instruct the mission.'

'Me? Who am I? Alas! alas! fresh temptations daily! Let him send by the hand of whom he will. . . . And yet—were I—at least in Alexandria—I might advise from day to day. . . . I should certainly see my way clearer. . . . And unforeseen chances might arise, too.'

Pambo, my friend, thinkest thou that it would be sinful to obey the Holy Patriarch?'

'Alas!' and Pambo, laughing, 'and thou art he who was for fleeing into the desert an hour ago! And now, when once thou smellst the battle afar off, thou art pawing in the valley, like the old war-horse. Go, and God be with thee! Thou wilt be none the worse for it. Thou art too old to fall in love, too poor to buy a bishopric, and too righteous to have one given thee.'

'Art thou in earnest?'

'What did I say to thee in the garden? Go, and see our son, and send me news of him.'

'Ah! shame on my worldly-mindedness! I had forgotten all this time to inquire for him. How is the youth, reverend sir?'

'Whom do you mean?'

'Philammon, our spiritual son, whom we sent down to you three months ago,' said Pambro. 'Risen to honour he is, by this time, I doubt not?'

'He? He is gone!'

'Gone?'

'Ay, the wretch, with the curse of Judas on him! He had not been with us three days before he beat me openly in the patriarch's court, cast off the Christian faith, and fled away to the heathen woman, Hypatia, at whom he is enamoured.'

The two old men looked at each other with blank and horror-stricken faces.

'Enamoured of Hypatia?' said Arsenius at last.

'It is impossible!' sobbed Pambro. 'The boy must have been treated harshly, unjustly? Some one has wronged him, and he was accustomed only to kindness, and could not bear it. Cruel men that you are, and unfaithful stewards. The Lord will require the child's blood at your hands!'

'Ay,' said Peter, rising fiercely, 'that is the world's justice! Blame me, blame the patriarch, blame any and every one but the sinner. As if a hot head and a hotter heart were not enough to explain it all! As if a young fool had never before been bewitched by a fair face!'

'Oh, my friends, my friends,' cried Arsenius, 'why revile each other without cause? I, I only am to blame. I advised you, Pambro!—I sent him—I ought to have known—what was I doing, old worldling that I am, to thrust the poor innocent forth into the temptations of Babylon? This comes of all my schemings and my plottings! And now his blood will be on my head—as if I had not sinned enough to bear already, I must go and add this over and above all, to sell my own Joseph, the son of my old age, to the Midianites! Here, I will go with you—now—at once—I will not rest till I find him, clasp his knees till he pities my gray hairs! Let Herachin and Orestes go their way for aught I care—I will find him, I say. O Absalom, my son! would to God I had died for thee, my son! my son!'

CHAPTER XII

THE BOWER OF ACRYSIA

THE house which Pelagia and the Amal had hired after their return to Alexandria, was one of the most splendid in the city. They had been now living there three months or more, and in that time Pelagia's taste had supplied the little which it needed to convert it into a paradise of lazy luxury. She herself was wealthy, and her Gothic guests, overburdened with Roman spoils, the very use of which they could not understand, freely allowed her and her nymphs to throw away for them the treasures which they had won in many a fearful fight. What matter? If they had enough to eat, and more than enough to drink, how could the useless surplus of their riches be better spent than in keeping their ladies in good humour? . . . And when it was all gone, they would go somewhere or other—who cared whither?—and win more. The whole world was before them waiting to be plundered, and they would fulfil their mission, whensoever it suited them. In the meantime they were in no hurry. Egypt furnished in profusion every sort of food which could gratify palates far more nice than theirs. And as for wine—few of them went to bed sober from one week's end to another. Could the souls of warriors have more, even in the halls of Valhalla?

So thought the petty who occupied the inner court of the house, one blazing afternoon in the same week in which Cyril's messenger had so lately broken in on the repose of the Sects.

Then repose, at least, was still untouched. The great city roared without, Orestes plotted, and Cyril counter-plotted, and the fate of a continent hung—or seemed to hang—trembling in the balance, but the turmoil of it no more troubled those lazy Titans within, than did the roll and rattle of the carriage-wheels disturb the parakeets and quibirds which peeped, under an awning of gilded wire, the inner court of Pelagia's house. Why should they fret themselves with it all? What was every fresh riot, execution, conspiracy, bankruptcy, but a sign—that the fruit was growing ripe for the plucking? Even Heraclius's rebellion, and Orestes' suspected conspiracy, were to the younger and coarser folks a sort of child's play, at which they could look on and laugh, and bet, from morning till night, while to the more cunning heads, such as Wulf and Smid, they were but signs of the general rottenness—now cracks in those great walls over which they intended, with a simple and boyish consciousness of power, to mount to victory when they chose.

And in the meantime, till the right opening opened, what was there better than to eat, drink, and sleep? And certainly they had chosen a charming retreat in which to fulfil that lofty mission. Columns of purple and green porphyry, among which gleamed the white limbs of delicate statues, surrounded a basin of water, fed by a perpetual jet, which sprinkled with cool spray the leaves of the oranges and unmoses, mingling its murmurs with the warblings of the tropic birds which nested among the branches.

On one side of the fountain, under the shade of a broad-leaved palmetto, lay the Amal's mighty limbs, stretched out on cushions, his yellow hair crowned with vine-leaves, his hand grasping a golden cup, which had been won from Indian Rajahs by Puthian Choroos, from Choroos by Roman generals, from Roman generals by the heroes of sheepskin and horsehide, while Pelagia, by the side of the sleepy Hercules-Dionysos, lay leaning over the brink of the fountain, lazily dipping her fingers into the water, and basking, like the gnats which hovered over its surface, in the mere pleasure of existence.

On the opposite bank of the bay, tended each by a dark-eyed Illic, who killed the wine cups, and helped now and then to empty them, lay the especial friends and companions in arms of the Amal, Goderie the son of Emmerie, and Aglunad the son of Chuva, who both, like the Amal, loved a decent frolic with girls, and last, but not least, that most important and all but red personage, Smid the son of Troll, revered for cunning beyond the sons of men, for not only could he make and mend all matters, from a pontoon bridge to a gold bracelet, shoe horses and doctor them, charm all diseases out of man and beast, carve runes, interpret war-omens, foretell weather, raise the winds, and finally, conquer in the battle of meal-horns all except Wulf the son of Ovida, but he had actually, during a sojourn among the half-civilised Mesogoths, picked up a fair share of Latin and Greek, and a rough knowledge of reading and writing.

A few yards off lay old Wulf upon his back, his knees in the air, his hands crossed behind his head, keeping up, even in his sleep, a half-conscious comment of growls on the following intellectual conversation --

'Noble wine this, is it not?'

'Perfect. Who bought it for us?'

'Old Miriam bought it, at some great tax-farmer's sale. The fellow was lankrupt, and Miriam said she got it for the half what it was worth.'

'Serve the penny turning rascal right. The old vixen fox took care, I'll warrant her, to get her profit out of the bargain.'

'Never mind if she did. We can afford to pay like men, if we earn like men.'

'We shan't afford it long, at this rate,' growled Wulf.

'Then we'll go and earn more. I am tired of doing nothing.'

'People need not do nothing, unless they choose,' said Goderie. 'Wulf and I had courting fit for a king, the other morning on the sand-hills. I had had no appetite for a week before, and I have been as sharp-set as a Danneboken ever since.'

'Courting? What, with those long legged, brush-tailed brutes, like a fox upon stilts, which the prefect cozened you into buying?'

'All I can say is, that we put up a herd of those—what do you call them here—deer with goats' horns?'

'Antelopes?'

'That's it—and the curs ran into them as a falcon does into a skein of ducks. Wulf and I galloped and galloped over those accursed sand-heaps till the horses stuck fast, and when they got their wind again, we found each pair of dogs with a deer down between them—and what can man want more, if he cannot get fighting? You eat them, so you need not suffer.'

'Well, dogs are the only things worth having, then, that this Alexandria does produce.'

'Except fair ladies,' put in one of the girls.

'Of course. I'll except the women. But the men—'

'The what? I have not seen a man since I came here, except a dock-worker or two—priests and fine gentlemen they are all—and you don't call them men, surely?'

'What on earth do they do, beside riding donkeys?'

'Philosophise, they say.'

'What's that?'

'I'm sure I don't know; some sort of slave's quill-driving, I suppose.'

'Pelagia! do you know what philosophising is?'

'No—and I don't care.'

'I do,' quoth Aglunad, with a look of superior wisdom; 'I saw a philosopher the other day.'

'And what sort of a thing was it?'

'I'll tell you. I was walking down the great street there, going to the harbour, and I saw a crowd of boys—men they call them here going into a large doorway. So I asked one of them what was doing, and the fellow, instead of answering me, pointed at my legs, and set all the other monkeys laughing. So I boxed his ears, and he tumbled down.'

'They all do so here, if you box their ears,' said the Amal meditatively, as if he had hit upon a great inductive law.

'Ah,' said Pelagia, looking up with her most winning smile, 'they are not such gnats as you, who make a poor little woman feel like a gazelle in a lion's paw.'

'Well—it struck me that, as I spoke in Gothic, the boy might not have understood me, being a Greek. So I walked in at the door, to save questions, and see for myself. And there a fellow held out his hand—I suppose for money, so I gave him two or three gold pieces, and a box on the ear, at which he tumbled down, of course, but seemed very well satisfied. So I walked in.'

'And what did you see?'

'A great hall, large enough for a thousand heroes, full of these Egyptian rascals scribbling with pencils on tablets. And at the farther end of it the most beautiful woman I ever saw—with right fair hair and blue eyes, talking, talking—I could not understand it, but the donkey-riders seemed to think it very fine, for they went on looking first at her, and then at their tablets, gaping like frogs in drought. And, certainly, she looked as fair as the sun, and talked like an Alruna-wife. Not that I knew what it was about, but one can see somehow, you know.—So I fell asleep, and when I woke, and came out, I met some one who understood me, and he told me that it was the famous maiden, the great philosopher And that's what I know about philosophy'

'She was very much wasted then, on such soft-handed starvelings Why don't she marry some hero?'

'Because there are none here to marry,' said Pelagia, 'except some who are fast netted, I fancy, already'

'But what do they talk about, and tell people to do, these philosophers, Pelagia?'

'Oh, they don't tell any one to do anything—at least, if they do, nobody ever does it, as far as I can see, but they talk about suns and stars, and right and wrong, and ghosts and spirits, and what sort of thing, and about not enjoying oneself too much Not that I ever saw that they were any happier than any one else'

'She must have been an Alruna maiden,' said Wulf, half to himself

'She is a very conceited creature, and I hate her,' said Pelagia

'I believe you,' said Wulf

'What is an Alruna-maiden?' asked one of the girls

'Something as like you as a salmon is like a horse-leech Heroes, will you hear a saga?'

'If it is a cool one,' said Agilmund, 'about ice, and pine trees, and snowstorms I shall be roasted brown in three days more'

'Oh' said the Amal, 'that we were on the Alps again for only two hours, sliding down those snow-slopes on our shields, with the sleet whistling about our ears! That was sport!'

'To those who could keep their seat,' said Goderic. 'Who went head over heels into a glacier-crack, and was dug out of fifty feet of snow, and had to be put inside a fresh-killed horse before he could be brought to life?'

'Not you, surely,' said Pelagia 'Oh, you wonderful creature! what things you have done and suffered!'

'Well,' said the Amal, with a look of stolid self-satisfaction, 'I suppose I have seen a good deal in my time, eh?'

'Yes, my Hercules, you have gone through your twelve labours, and saved your poor little Hlesone after them all, when she was chained to the rock, for the ugly sea-monsters to eat, and she will cherish you, and keep you out of scrapes now, for her own sake,' and Pelagia threw her arms round the great bull-neck, and drew it down to her

'Will you hear my saga?' said Wulf impatiently

'Of course we will,' said the Amal, 'anything to pass the time.'

'But let it be about snow,' said Agilmund 'Not about Alruna-wives!'

'About them, too,' said Goderic, 'my mother was one, so I must needs stand up for them'

'She was, boy Do you be her son Now hear, Wolves of the Goths!'

And the old man took up his little lute, or as he would probably have called it, 'fidel,' and began chaunting to his own accompaniment.

Over the camp fires
Drank I with heroes,
Under the Donau bank
Warm in the snow-trench,
Sagamen heard I there,
Men of the Longbeards,
Cunning and ancient,
Honey-sweet voiced
Scaring the wolf-cull,
Scaring the horn-owl out,
Shaking the snow-wreaths
Down from the pine boughs,
Up to the star roof
Rang out their song
Shining how Whul men
Over the ice-floes Stealing from Scanland on Came into Scoring, Shining of Gambara
Frey's beloved
Mother of Ayn
Mother of Thor
Shining of Wendel men,
Aubri and Ayn
How to the Whulfolk
Went they with war words—

'I am my ye, strangers,
And many are we,
Pay us now toll and fee,
Clothing, and rings, and beoves,
Flee at the river's mead
Bide the sharp bull a dawn'

'I am my ye, strangers, work then,
I am my ye, strangers, work then,

'I am my ye, strangers, work then,
I am my ye, strangers, work then,
I am my ye, strangers, work then,

'I am my ye, strangers, work then,
I am my ye, strangers, work then,
I am my ye, strangers, work then,

Out of the morning land,
Over the snow-circles,
In awful Freya came,
Tripping to Scoring
While were the moorlands,
And frozen before her,
But green were the moorlands,
And green were the moorlands,

'I am my ye, strangers, work then,
I am my ye, strangers, work then,
I am my ye, strangers, work then,
I am my ye, strangers, work then,
I am my ye, strangers, work then,

Out of her garments
Shaking the south wind,
Around in the larches
Awaking the throats,
And making chaste housewives all
Long for their heroes home,
Loving and love giving,
Came she to Scoring
Came she to Scoring
Came she to Scoring,
Wist of Valas—

'Vala, why weepst thou?
Far in the wide blue,
High up in the Blinn house,
Heard I thy weeping'

'Stop not thy weeping,
Till one can fight seven,
Sons have I, heroes tall,
First in the sword play,
This day at the Wendels' hands
Eagles must tear them;
While their mothers, thrall weary,
Must grind for the Wendels.'

Wept the Alruna-wife,
Kissed her fair Freya—
Far off in the morning land
High in Vallalle,
A window stands open,
Its sill is the snow-peaks,
Its posts are the water-spouts
Storm rack its timber,
Gold cloud-flakes above it

Are piled for the roofing
Far up to the Elfin-home,
High in the wide-blue.
Smiles out each morning thence
Odin Allfather,
From under the cloud-eaves,
Smiles out on the heroes,
Smiles out on chaste house-wives all,
Smiles on the broad man,
Smiles on the middle work
And there is the sword-lark,
With them is the glory—
So Odin hath sworn it—
Who first in the morning
Shall meet him and greet him.

Still the Alruna wept—
Who then shall greet him?
Women alone are here
Far on the moorlands
Behind the war-lindens,
To wait for the bull's down
Watch Wain to ring all,
One against seven.
Sweetly the Queen laughed—
Hear then my counsel now,
Take to thee, comrade,
Beloved of Freya,
Take thou thy woman folk,
Maidens and wives
Over your ankers
Lace on the white war-horn,
Over your bosoms
Link up the hard maillets,
Over your hips
That long to meet with comrade, —
So war-lindens full bearded
King Odinn shall deem you,
When off the great sea reach
At sunrise ye greet him.

Night's son was driving
His golden-haired horses up
Over the Eastern fells
High flushed the warriors
Smiled from the cloud-eaves out
Allfather Odinn,
Waiting the battle-spout
Frey stood by him
Who are the heroes tall
Lusty limbed Longbeards?
Over the swains' hall
Why cry they to us?
Horns should be crashing fast,
Wolves should be full fed,
Where'er such, mail-bearing,
Swing hurls in the sword-play.

Sweetly laughed Freya—
A name thou hast given them—
Shames neither thee nor thine,
Well can they wear it
Give them the victory,
First have they greeted thee,
Give them the victory,
Yokefellow mine!
Maidens and wives are these—
Wives of the Wights,
Few are their heroes
And far on the war-road,
So over the swains' hall
They cry unto thee.

Royally laughed he then,
Dear was that craft to him,
Odin Allfather,
Shaking the clouds
"Cunning are women all,
Bold and importunate!
Longbeards their name shall be,
Ravens shall think them
Where the women are heroes,
What must the men be like?
There is the victory,
No need of me!"

"There!" said Wulf, when the song was ended; "is that cool enough for you?"

"Rather too cool, ah, Pelagia!" said the Anial, laughing.

"Ay," went on the old man, bitterly enough, "such were your mothers, and such were your sisters, and such your wives must be, if you mean to last much longer on the face of the earth—women who care for something better than good eating, strong drinking, and soft lying."

"All very true, Prince Wulf," said Agilmund, "but I don't like the saga after all. It was a great deal too like what Pelagia here says: those philosophers talk about—right and wrong, and that sort of thing."

"I don't doubt it."

"Now I like a really good saga, about gods and giants, and the fire kingdoms and the snow kingdoms, and the Asir making men and women out of two sticks, and all that."

"Ay," said the Anial, "something like nothing one ever saw in one's life, all stark mad and topsy-turvy, like one's dreams when one has been drunk, something grand which you cannot understand, but which sets you thinking over it all the morning after."

"Well," said Goderic, "my mother was an Alruna woman, so I will not be the first to foul its own nest. But I like to hear about wild beasts and ghosts, ogres, and fire-drakes, and meors—something that one could kill if one had a chance, as one's fathers had."

"Your fathers would never have killed meors," said Wulf, "if they had been—"

"Like us—I know," said the Anial. "Now tell me, prince, you are old enough to be our father, and did you ever see a meor?"

"My brother saw one, in the Northern sea three fathoms long, with the body of a lion-bull, and the head of a cat and the beard of a man, and tusks as long, lying down on its breast, watching for the fishermen, and he struck it with an arrow, so that it fled to the bottom of the sea, and never came up again."

"What is a meor, Agilmund?" asked one of the girls.

"A sea-devil who eats sailors. There used to be plenty of them where our fathers came from, and ogres too, who came out of the fens into the hall at night, when the warriors were sleeping, to suck their blood, and steal along, and steal along, and jump upon you—so."

Pelagia, during the saga, had remained looking into the fountain, and playing with the water-drops, in assumed indifference. Perhaps it was to hide burning blushes, and something very like two hot tears, which fell unobserved into the ripple. Now she looked up suddenly—

"And of course you have killed some of these dreadful creatures, Amalric?"

"I never had such good luck, darling. Our forefathers were in such a hurry with them, that Geda Langobardorum. The metre and language are intended as imitations of those of the earlier Fædla poems."

by the time we were born, there was hardly one left.

'Ay, they were men,' growled Wulf

'As for me,' went on the Amal, 'the biggest thing I ever killed was a snake in the Donan fens. How long was he, prince? You had time to see, for you sat eating your dinner and looking on, while he was trying to crack my bones.'

'Four lathoms,' answered Wulf

'With a wild bull lying by him, which he had just killed. I spoilt his dinner, eh, Wulf?'

'Yes,' said the old grumbler, mollified, 'that was a right good fight.'

'Why don't you make a saga about it, then, instead of about right and wrong, and such things?'

'Because I am turned philosopher. I shall go and hear that Alanna-maiden this afternoon.'

'Well said. Let us go too, young men. It will pass the time, at all events.'

'Oh, no! no! no! do not! you shall not! almost shirked Pelagia.'

'Why not, then, pretty one?'

'She is a witch—she—I will never love you again if you dare to go. Your only reason is that Agilmund's report of her beauty.'

'So? You are afraid of my liking her golden locks better than your black ones?'

'I? Afraid?' And she leapt up, panting with pretty rage. 'Come, we will go too—at once—and brave this nun, who fancies herself too wise to speak to a woman, and too pure to love a man! Look out my jewels! Saddle my white mule! We will go royally. We will not be ashamed of Cupid's livery, my girls—sash on shawl and all! Come, and let us see whether saucy Aphrodite is not a match after all for Pallas Athene and her owl!'

And she darted out of the cloister.

The three younger men burst into a roar of laughter, while Wulf looked on with grim approval.

'So you want to go and hear the philosopher, prince?' said Smid.

'Wheresoever a holy and wise woman speaks, a warrior need not be ashamed of listening. Did not Alaric bid us spare the nuns in Rome, comrade? And though I am no Christian as he was, I thought it no shame for Odin's man to take their blessing, nor will I to take this one's, Smid, son of Troll!'

CHAPTER XIII

THE BOTTOM OF THE ABYSS

'HERE am I, at last!' said Raphael Aben-Ezra to himself. 'Fairly and safely landed at the very bottom of the bottomless, disporting myself on the firm floor of the primeval nothing, and finding my new element, like boys when they begin to swim, not so impracticable after all. No man, angel, or demon, can this day cast it in my teeth that I am weak enough to believe or disbelieve any phenomenon or theory in or concerning heaven or earth; or even that any such heaven, earth, phenomena, or theories exist—or otherwise. . . I trust that is a sufficiently exhaustive statement of my opinions? . . . I am certainly not dogmatic enough to deny—or to assert either—that there are sensations . . . far too numerous for comment . . . but as for proceeding any further, by induction, deduction, analysis, or synthesis, I utterly decline the office of Arachne, and will spin no more cobwebs out of my own inside—if I have any. Sensations? What are they, but parts of oneself—if one has a self? What put this child's fancy into one's head, that there is anything outside of one which produces them? You have exactly similar feelings in your dreams, and you know that there is no reality corresponding to them—No, you don't! How dare you be dogmatic enough to affirm that? Why should not your dreams be as real as your waking thoughts? Why should not your dreams be the reality, and your waking thoughts the dream? What matter which?'

'What matter, indeed? Here have I been staring for years—unless that, too, is a dream, which it very probably is—at every mountebank "man" which ever tumbled and capered on the philosophic tight-rope, and they are every one of them dead dolls, wooden, worked with wires, which are petitions in principle. Each philosopher begs the question in hand, and then marches forward, as brave as a triumph, and pines himself—on proving it all afterwards. No wonder that his theory fits the universe, when he has first clipped the universe to fit his theory. Have I not tried my hand at many? one—starting, too, no one can deny, with the very minimum of chipping, . . . for I suppose one cannot begin lower than at simple "I am I" unless—which is equally demonstrable—at "I am not I." I recollect—or dream—that I offered that sweet dream, Hypatia, to deduce all things in heaven and earth, from the Astronomical Hypotheses to the number of plumes in an archangel's wing, from that one simple proposition, if she would but write me out a demonstration of it first, as some sort of modus operandi for the apex of my inverted pyramid. But she disdained. . . People are apt to disdain what they know they cannot do. "It was an axiom," it was, "like one and one making two."

How cross the sweet dream was, at my telling her that I did not consider that any axiom either, and that one thing and one thing seeming to us to be two things, was no more proof that they really were two, and not three hundred and sixty-two, than a man seeming to be an honest man, proved him not to be a rogue, and at my asking her, moreover, when she appealed to universal experience, how she proved that the combined folly of all fools resulted in wisdom!

"I am I" an axiom, indeed! What right have I to say that I am not any one else? How do I know it? How do I know that there is any one else for me not to be?

I, or rather something, feel a number of sensations, longings, thoughts, fancies—the great devil take them all—fresh ones every moment, and each at war tooth and nail with all the rest; and then on the strength of this infinite multiplicity and contradiction, of which alone I am aware, I am to be illogical enough to stand up, and say, "I by myself I," and swear stoutly that I am one thing, when all I am conscious of is the devil only knows how many things. Of all quaint deductions from experience, that is the quaintest! Would it not be more philosophical to conclude that I, who never saw or felt or heard this which I call myself, am what I have seen, heard, and felt—and no more and no less—that sensation which I call that loose, that dead man, that jakes, those forty thousand two-legged jakes who appear to be running for their lives below there, having got hold of this same notion of their being one thing each—as I choose to fancy in my toothy habit of imputing to them the same disease of thought which I find in myself—namely the word!—The folly of my ancestors—it I ever had any—prevents my having any better expression. Why should I not be all I feel—the sky, those clouds—the whole universe? Hercules! what a creative genius my sensorium must be!—I'll take to writing poetry—a mock-epic, in seventy-two books, entitled "The Universe of Raphael Aben-Ezer," and take Homer's Margites for my model Homer's! Mine! Why must not the Margites, like everything else, have been a sensation of my own? Hypatia used to say Homer's poetry was a part of her—only she could not prove it—but I have proved that the Margites is a part of me—but that I believe my own proof—scepticism forbid! Oh, would to heaven that the said whole disagreeable universe were annihilated, if it were only just to settle by fair experiment whether any of master "I" remained when they were gone! Buzzard and dogmatist! And how do you know that that would settle it? And if it did—why need it be settled?

"I dare say there is an answer put for all this. I could write a pretty one myself in half an hour. But then I should not believe it—not the rejoinder to that—not the denunner to that again. So I am both sleepy and hungry—or rather, sleepiness and hunger are me. Which is it? Heigh ho!" and Raphael finished his meditation by a mighty yawn. This hopeful oration was delivered in a fitting lecture-room. Between the bare walls of a doleful fire-scarred tower in the Campagna of Rome, standing upon a knoll of dry brown grass, ringed with a few grim juncos, blasted and black with smoke, there sat Raphael Aben-Ezer, working out the last formula of the great world problem—"Given Self, to find God." Though the doorless stone archway he could see a long vista of the plain below, covered with broken trees, trampled crops, smoking villas, and all the ugly scars of recent war, far onward to the quiet purple mountains and the silver sea, towards which struggled, far in the distance, long dark lines of moving specks, flowing together, breaking up, stopping short, recoiling back to surge forward by some fresh channel, while now and then a glitter of keen white sparks ran through the dense black masses.

The Count of Africa had thrown for the empire of the world—and lost.

"Brave old Sam!" said Raphael, "how merrily he flashes off the sword-blades yonder, and never cares that every tiny spark brings a death-shriek after it! Why should he? It is no concern of his. Astrologers are fools. His business is to shine, and on the whole, he is one of my few satisfactory sensations. How now? This is questionably pleasant!"

As he spoke, a column of troops came marching across the field, straight towards his retreat.

"It those new sensations of mine find me here, they will infallibly produce in me a new sensation, which will render all further ones impossible. . . Will? What kinder thing could they do for me? Ay—but how do I know that they would do it? What possible proof is there that if a two-legged phantasm pokes a leaden gray phantasm in among my sensations, those sensations will be my last? Is the fact of my turning pile, and lying still, and being in a day or two converted into crows' flesh, my reason why I should not feel? And how do I know that would happen? It seems to happen to retain sensations of my eyeball—or something else—who cares? which I call soldiers, but what possible analogy can there be between what seems to happen to those single sensations called soldiers, and what may or may not really happen to all my sensations put together, which I call me? Should I bear apples if a phantasm seemed to come and plant me? Then why should I die if another phantasm seemed to come and poke me in the ribs?"

"Still I don't intend to deny it. I am no dogmatist. Positively the phantasms are marching straight for my tower! Well, it may be safer to run away, on the chance. But as for losing it long," continued he, rising and cramming a few mouldy crusts into his wallet, "that, like everything else, is past proof. Why—if now, when I have some sort of excuse for fancying myself one thing in one place, I am driven mad with the number of my sensations, what will it be when I am eaten, and turned to dust, and undeniably many things in many places. Will not the sensations be multiplied by—unbearable? I would swear at the thought, if I had anything to swear by." To be transmuted into the sensoria of forty different nasty carrion crows, besides two or three foxes, and a large black beetle! I'll run away, just like anybody else. . . if anybody existed. Come, Bran!

"Bran! where are you? unlucky inseparable sensation of mine? Picking up a dinner already off these dead soldiers? Well, the pity is that this foolish contradictory taste of mine, while it makes me hungry; forbids me to follow your example. Why am I to take lessons from my soldier-phantasms, and not from my canine one? Illogical! Bran! Bran! and he went out and whistled in vain for the dog.

'Bran! unhappy phantom, who will not vanish by night or day, lying on my chest even in dreams, and who would not even let me vanish, and solve the problem—though I don't believe there is any—why did you drag me out of the sea there at Ostia? Why did you not let me become a whole shoal of crabs? How did you know, or I either, that they may not be very jolly fellows, and not in the least troubled with philosophic doubts? But perhaps there were no crabs, but only phantasms of crabs. And, on the other hand, if the crab-phantasms give jolly sensations, why should not the crow-phantasms? So whichever way it turns out, no matter, and I may as well wait here, and seem to become crows, as I certainly shall do—Bran! . . . Why should I wait for her? What pleasure can it be to me to have the feeling of a four legged, bruddled, lop-eared, toad-mouthed thing always been what seem to be my legs? There she is! Where have you been, madam? Don't you see I am in marching order, with staff and wallet ready shouldered? Come!'

But the dog, looking up in his face as only dogs can look, ran toward the back of the ruin, and up to him again, and back again, until he followed her.

'What's this? Here is a new sensation with a vengeance! O storm and cloud of material appearances, were there not enough of you already, that you must add to your number these also! Bran! Bran! Could you find no other day in the year but this, wherein to present my ears with the squeals of—one—two—three—nine blind puppies!'

Bran answered by rushing into the hole where her new family lay tumbling and squalling, bringing out one in her mouth, and laying it at his feet.

'Needless, I assure you. I am perfectly aware of the state of the case already. What! another! Silly old thing!—do you fancy, as the fine ladies do, that burdening the world with noisy likenesses of your precious self, is a thing of which to be proud? Why, she's bringing out the whole litter! . . . What was I thinking of last? Ah—the argument was self-contradictory, was it, because I could not argue without using the very terms which I repudiated! Well . . . And—why should it not be contradictory? Why not? One must face that too, after all. Why should not a thing be true and false also? What harm in a thing's being false? What necessity for it to be true? True! What is truth? Why should a thing be the worse for being illogical? Why should there be any logic at all? Did I ever see a little beast flying about with "Logic" labelled on its back? What do I know of it, but as a sensation of my own mind—if I have any! What proof is that that I am to obey it, and not it me? If a flea bites me I get rid of that sensation; and if logic bothers me, I'll get rid of that too! Phantasms must be taught to vanish courteously. One's only hope of comfort lies in kicking feebly against the tyranny of one's own boring notions and sensations—every philosopher confesses that—and what god is logic, pray, that it is to be the sole exception? . . . What, old lady! I give you fair warning, you must choose this day, like any man, between the ties of family and those of duty.'

Bran seized him by the skirt, and pulled him down towards the puppies, took up one of the puppies and lifted it towards him, and then repeated the action with another.

'You unconscionable old brute! You don't actually dare to expect me to carry your puppies for you?' and he turned to go.

Bran sat down on her tail and began howling. 'Farewell, old dog! you have been a pleasant dream after all . . . But if you will go the way of all phantasms!' And he walked away.

Bran ran with him, leaping and barking, then recollected her family and ran back, tried to bring them, one by one, in her mouth, and then to bring them all at once; and failing sat down and howled.

'Come, Bran! Come, old girl!'

She moved half-way up to him, then half-way back again to the puppies, then towards him again and then suddenly gave it up, and dropping her tail, walked slowly back to the blind supplicants, with a deep reproachful growl.

'* * *!' said Raphael with a mighty oath, 'you are right after all! Here are nine things come into the world, phantasms or not, there it is, I can't deny it. They are something, and you are something, old dog, or at least like enough to something to do instead of it, and you are not I, and as good as I, and they too, for aught I know, and have as good a right to live as I, and by the seven planets and all the rest of it, I'll carry them!'

And he went back, tied up the puppies in his blanket, and set forth, Bran barking, squeaking, wagging, leaping, running between his legs and upsetting him, in her agonies of joy.

'Forward! Whither you will, old lady! The world is wide. You shall be my guide, tutor, queen of philosophy, for the sake of this mere common sense of yours. Forward, you new Hypatia! I promise you I will attend no lectures but yours this day!'

He toiled on, every now and then stepping across a dead body, or clambering a wall out of the road, to avoid some plunging, shrieking horse, or obscene knot of prowling camp followers, who were already stripping and plundering the slain. At last, in front of a large villa, now a black and smoking skeleton, he leaped a wall, and found himself landed on a heap of corpses. . . . They were piled up against the garden fence for many yards. The struggle had been fierce there some three hours before.

'Put me out of my misery! In mercy kill me!' moaned a voice beneath his feet.

Raphael looked down; the poor wretch was slashed and mutilated beyond all hope.

'Certainly, friend, if you wish it,' and he drew his dagger. The poor fellow stretched out his throat, and awaited the stroke with a ghastly smile. Raphael caught his eye, his heart failed him, and he rose.

'What do you advise, Bran?' But the dog was far ahead, leaping and barking impatiently.

'I obey,' said Raphael, and he followed him, while the wounded man called intently and upbraidingly after him.

'He will not have long to wait. Those plunderers will not be as squeamish as I. Strange, now! From Armenian reminiscences I should have fancied myself as free from such tender weakness as any of my Canaanite-slaying ancestors.

And yet by some mere spirit of contradiction, I couldn't kill that fellow, exactly because he asked me to do it.

There is more in that than will fit into the great inverted pyramid of "I am I." Never mind, let me get the dog's lessons by heart first. What next, Bran? Ah! Could one believe the transformation? Why, this is the very town villa which I passed yesterday morning, with the garden chairs standing among the flower-beds, just as the young ladies had left them, and the peacocks and silver pheasants minding about, wondering why their pretty mistresses did not come to feed them. And here is a trampled mass of wreck and corruption for the girls to find, when they venture back from Rome, and complain how horrible war is for breaking down all their shrubs, and how cruel soldiers must be to kill and cook all their poor dear tame turtle-doves! Why not? Why should they lament over other things—which they can just a little mend—and which perhaps need no more mending? Ah! there lies a gallant fellow underneath that fruit-tree!

Raphael walked up to a ring of dead, in the midst of which lay, half sitting against the trunk of the tree, a tall and noble officer in the first bloom of manhood. His cuirass and armour, gorgeously inlaid with gold, were hewn and battered by a hundred blows, his shield was cloven through and through, his sword broken in the stiffened hand which grasped it still. Cut off from his troop, he had made his last stand beneath the tree, knee-deep in the gay scarlet flowers, and there he lay, bestrawed, as if by some mockery—or pity—of mother nature, with faded roses, and golden fruit, shaken from off the boughs in that last deadly struggle. Raphael stood and watched him with a sad cheer.

'Well!—you have said your fancied personality dear! How many dead men?

Eleven! Conquered fellow! Who told you that your one life was worth the eleven which you have taken?

Bran went up to the corpse perhaps from its sitting posture fancying it still living—melted.

the cold chuck, and recoiled with a mournful whine.

'Eh? That is the right way to look at the phenomena, is it? Well, after all, I am sorry for you. . . almost like you. All your wounds in front, as a man's should be. Poor fop! Lais and Thais will never curl those dainty ringlets for you again! What is that has-relied upon your shield? Venus receiving Psyche into the abode of the gods! Ah! you have found out all about Psyche's wings by this time. How do I know that? And yet, why am I, in spite of my common sense -- if I have any -- talking to you as you, and liking you, and pitying you, if you are nothing now, and probably never were anything? Bran! What right had you to pity him without giving your reasons in due form, as Hypatia would have done? Forgive me, sir, however, whether you exist or not, I cannot leave that collar round your neck for these camp-wolves to convert into strong liquor.'

And as he spoke, he bent down, and detached, gently enough, a magnificent necklace.

'Not for myself, I assure you. Like Ats's golden apple, it shall go to the fittest here, Bran.'

And he wreathed the jewels round the neck of the wastrel who, evidently exalted in her own eyes by the burden, leaped and jerked forward again, taking apparently as a matter of course, the road back towards Ostia, by which they had come thither from the sea. And as he followed, careless where he went, he continued talking to himself aloud after the manner of restless self-discontented men.

'And then my talk goes about his dignity and his intellect, and his heavenly parentage and his aspirations after the music, and the beautiful, and the infinite—and everything else unlike himself. How can he prove it? Why, these poor blackguards lying about are very fair specimens of humanity. And how much have they been bothered since they were born with aspirations after anything infinite, except infinite soul wine? To eat, to drink, to destroy a certain number of their species, to reproduce a certain number of the same, two-thirds of whom will die in infancy, a dead waste of pain to their mothers and of expense to their putative sires. . . and then—what says Solomon? What befalls them befalls beasts. As one dies, so dies the other, so that they have all one breath, and a man has no pre-eminence over a beast, for all is vanity. All go to one place, all are of the dust, and turn to dust again. Who knows that the breath of man goes upward, and that the breath of the beast goes downward to the earth? Who, indeed, my most wise ancestor? Not I, certainly. Raphael Aben-Ezra, how art thou better than a beast? What pre-eminence hast thou, not merely over this dog, but over the feras whom thou so wantonly cursest? Man must painfully win house, clothes, fire.

A pretty proof of his wisdom, when every flea has the wit to make my blanket, without any labour of his own, lodge him a great deal better than it lodges me! Man makes clothes, and the fleas live in them. Which is the wiser of the two?

'Ah, but—man is fallen. Well—and the flea is not so much better he than the man, for he is what he was intended to be, and so fulfils the very definition of virtue, which no one can say of us of the red-ochre voin. And even if the old myth be true, and the man only fell, because he was set to do higher work than the flea, what does that prove—but that he could not do it?

'But his arts and his sciences? Apago! The very sound of those grown-up children's rattles turns me sick. One concerted ass in a generation increasing labour and sorrow, and dying after all even as the fool dies, and ten million brutes and slaves, just where their forefathers were, and where their children will be after them, to the end of the force. The thing that has been, it is that which shall be, and there is no new thing under the sun.

'And as for your palace and cities, and temples—look at this Canisagna, and judge. Flea-bites go down after a while and so do they. What are they? But the humps which we human fleas make in the old earth's skin?

Make them? We only cause them, as fleas cause flea bites. What are all the works of man, but a sort of cutaneous abscess in this unhealthy earth-lode, and we a race of larger fleas, running about among its fur, which we call trees? Why should not the earth be an animal? How do I know it is not? Because it is too big? Bah! What is big, and what is little? Because it has not the shape of one?

Look into a fisher-man's net, and see what forms are there! Because it does not speak?

Perhaps it has nothing to say, being too busy. Perhaps it can talk no more sense than we. In both cases it shows its wisdom by holding its tongue. Because it moves in one necessary direction? How do I know that it does? How can I tell that it is not flirting with all the seven spheres at once, at this moment? But if it does so much the wiser of it, if that be the best direction for it. Oh, what a base satire on ourselves and our notions of the fair and fitting, to say that a thing cannot be alive and rational, just because it goes steadily on upon its own road, instead of skipping and scrambling fantastically up and down without method or order, like us and the fleas, from the cradle to the grave! Besides, if you grant, with the rest of the world, that fleas are less noble than we, because they are our parasites, then you are bound to grant that we are less noble than the earth, because we are its parasites. Positively, it looks more probable than anything I have seen for many a day. . . And, by the bye, why should not earthquakes, and floods, and pestilences, be only just so many ways which the cunning old brute earth has of scratching herself when the human fleas and their palace and city bites get too troublesome?

At a turn of the road he was aroused from this profitable meditation by a shriek, the shrillness of which told him that it was a woman's. He looked up, and saw close to him, among the smouldering ruins of a farmhouse, two ruffians driving before them a young girl, with her hands tied behind her, while the poor creature was looking back pitiously after some thing among the ruins, and struggling in vain, bound as she was, to escape from her captors and return.

'Conduct unjustifiable in any fleas,—eh, Bran? How do I know that, though? Why should it not be a piece of excellent fortune for her, if she had but the equanimity to see it? Why—what will happen to her? She will be taken to Rome, and sold as a slave. And in spite of a few discomforts in the transfer, and the prejudice which some persons have against standing an hour on the catasta to be hampered from head to foot in the minimum of clothing, she will most probably end in being far better housed, fed, belizened, and pampered to her heart's desire, than ninety nine out of a hundred of her sister fleas. . . till she begins to grow old, which she must do in any case. . . And if she have not contrived to wheedle her master out of her liberty, and to make up a pretty little purse of savings, by that time why, it is her own fault. Eh, Bran?

But Bran by no means agreed with his view of the case, for after watching the two ruffians, with her head stuck on one side, for a minute or two, she suddenly and silently, after the manner of mastiffs, sprang upon them, and dragged one to the ground.

'Oh! that is the "fit and beautiful," in this case, as they say in Alexandria, is it? Well! Why? You are at least a more practical teacher than ever Hypatia was. Heaven grant that there may be no more of them in the ruins!

And rushing on the second plunderer, he laid him dead with a blow of his dagger, and then turned to the first, whom Bran was hobnobbing down by the throat.

'Slavery, mercy!' shrieked the wretch. 'Take only life!'

'There was a fellow half a mile back begging me to kill him—with which of you two am I to agree?—for you can't both be right.'

'Life! Only life!'

'A carnal appetite, which man must learn to conquer,' said Raphael, as he raised the pommel.

In a moment it was over, and Bran and he rose—Where was the girl? She had rushed back to the ruins, whither Raphael followed her, while Bran ran to the pyre, which he had laid upon a stone, and commenced her maternal cares.

'What do you want, my poor girl?' asked he in Latin. 'I will not hurt you.'

'My father! My father!'

He untied her bruised and swollen wrists, and without stopping to thank him, she ran to a heap of fallen stones and beams, and began digging wildly with all her little strength, breathlessly calling 'Father!'

'Such is the gratitude of flea to flea! What is there, now, in the mere fact of being accustomed to call another person father, and not master, or slave, which should produce such passion as that! . . . Brute habit! . . . What services can the said man render, or have rendered, which make him worth— Here is Bran! . . . What do you think of that, my female philosopher!'

Bran sat down and watched too. The poor girl's tender hands were bleeding from the stones, while her golden tresses rolled down over her eyes, and entangled in her impatient fingers; but still she worked frantically. Bran seemed suddenly to comprehend the case, rushed to the rescue, and began digging too, with all her might.

Raphael rose with a shrug, and joined in the work.

'Hang these brute instincts! They make one very hot. What was that?'

A feeble man rose from under the stones. A human limb was uncovered! The girl threw herself on the place, shrieking in her father's name. Raphael put her gently back and exerting his whole strength, drew out of the ruins a stalwart elderly man, in the dress of an officer of high rank.

He still breathed! The girl lifted up his head and covered him with wild kisses. Raphael looked round for water, found a spring and a broken sherd, and bathed the wounded man's temples till he opened his eyes and showed signs of returning life.

The girl still sat by him, fondling her recovered treasure, and bathing the grizzled face in holy tears.

'It is no business of mine,' said Raphael. 'Come, Bran!'

The girl sprang up, threw herself at his feet, kissed his hands, called him her saviour, her deliverer, sent by God!

'Not in the least, my child! You must thank my teacher the dog, not me.'

And she took him at his word, and threw her soft arms round Bran's neck, and Bran understood it, and wagged her tail, and licked the gentle face lovingly.

'Intolerably absurd, all this!' said Raphael. 'I must be going, Bran.'

'You will not leave us? You surely will not leave an old man to die here!'

'Why not? What better thing could happen to him?'

'Nothing,' murmured the officer, who had not spoken before.

'Ah, God! he is my father!'

'Well?'

'He is my father!'

'Well?'

'You must save him! You shall, I say!'

And she seized Raphael's arm in the imperiousness of her passion.

He shrugged his shoulders but felt, he knew not why, marvellously inclined to obey her.

'I may as well do this as anything else, having nothing else to do. Whither now, sir?'

'Whither you will. Our troops are disgraced, our eagles taken. We are your prisoners by right of war. We follow you.'

'Oh, my fortune! A new responsibility! Why cannot I stir, without live animals, from fleas upward, attaching themselves to me? Is it not enough to have nine blind puppies at my back, and an old brute at my heels, who will persist in saving my life, that I must be burdened over and above with a respectable elderly rebel and his laughter? Why am I not allowed by fate to care for nobody but myself? Sir, I give you both your freedom! The world is wide enough for us all. I really ask no ransom.'

'You seem philosophically disposed, my friend.'

'I? Heaven forbid! I have gone right through that slough, and come out sheer on the other side. For sweeping the last lingering taint of it out of me, I have to thank, not sulphur and exorcisms, but your soldiers and their morning's work. Philosophy is superfluous in a world where ~~we~~ are fools.'

'Do you include yourself under that title?'

'Most certainly, my best sir. Don't fancy that I make any exceptions. If I can in any way prove my folly to you, I will do it.'

'Then help me and my daughter to Ostia.'

'A very fair instance. Well—my dog happens to be going that way, and after all, you seem to have a sufficient share of human imbecility to be a very fit companion for me. I hope, though, you do not set up for a wise man!'

'God knows—no! Am I not of Herachan's army?'

'True, and the young lady here made herself so great a fool about you, that she actually included the very dog.'

'So we three loafs will forth together.'

'And the greatest one, as usual, must help the rest. But I have nine puppies in my family already. How am I to carry you and them?'

'I will take them,' said the girl, and Bran, after looking on at the transfer with a somewhat dubious face, seemed to satisfy herself that it all was right, and put her head contentedly under the girl's hand.

'Eh? You trust her, Bran?' said Raphael, in an undertone. 'I must really emancipate myself from your instructions if you require a similar simplicity in me. Stay! there wanders a mule without a rider, we may as well press him into the service.'

He caught the mule, lifted the wounded man into the saddle, and the cavalcade set forth, turning out of the highroad into a by-lane, which the officer, who seemed to know the country thoroughly, assured him would lead them to Ostia by an unfrequented route.

'If we arrive there before sundown, we are saved,' said he.

'And in the meantime,' answered Raphael, 'between the dog and this dagger, which, as I take care to inform all comers, is delicately poisoned, we may keep ourselves clear of ma-raiders. And yet, what a meddling fool I am !' he went on to himself. 'What possible interest can I have in this unrepentant rebel ! The least evil is, that if we are taken, which we most probably shall be, I shall be crucified for helping him to escape. But even if we get safe off—here is a fresh tie between me and those very brother fleas, to be rid of whom I have chosen beggary and starvation. Who knows where it may end ? Pooh ! The man is like other men. He is certain, before the day is over, to prove ungrateful, or attempt the mountebank-heroic, or give me some other excuse for bidding him good evening. And in the meantime there is something gained in the fact of having so sober a respectability, with a young daughter too, abroad on this fool's errand, which really makes me curious to discover with what variety of flea I am to class him.'

But while Aben-Ezra was talking to himself about the father, he could not help, somehow, thinking about the daughter. Again and again he found himself looking at her. She was, undeniably, most beautiful. Her features were not as regularly perfect as Hypatia's, nor her stature so commanding, but her face shone with a clear and joyful determination, and with a tender and modest thoughtfulness, such as he had never beheld before united in one countenance, and as she stepped along, briskly and lightly, by her father's side, looping up her scattered tresses as she went, laughing at the straggles of her noisy harem, and looking up with rapture at her father's gradually brightening face, Raphael could not help stealing glances after glances, and was surprised to find them returned with a bright, honest, smiling gratitude, which met him full eyed, as free from prudery as it was from coquetry. 'A lady she is,' said he to himself, 'but evidently no city one. There is nature—or something else, there, pure and unadulterated, without any of man's additions or beautifications.' And as he looked, he began to feel it a pleasure such as his weary heart had not known for many a year, simply to watch her.

'Positively there is a foolish enjoyment after all in making other fleas smile. As that I am ! As if I had not drunk all that ditch-water cup to the dogs years ago !'

They went on for some time in silence, till the officer, turning to him—

'And may I ask you, my quaint preserver, whom I would have thanked before but for this foolish faintness, which is now going off, what and who you are ?'

'A flea, sir—a flea—nothing more.'

'But a patrician flea, surely, to judge by your language and manners ?'

'Not that exactly. True, I have been rich, as the saying is, I may be rich again, they tell me, when I am fool enough to choose.'

'Oh if we were but rich !' sighed the girl.

'You would be very unhappy, my dear young lady. Believe a flea who has tried the experiment thoroughly.'

'Ah ! but we could ransom my brother ! and now we can find no money till we get back to Africa.'

'And none then,' said the officer, in a low voice. 'You forget, my poor child, that I mortgaged the whole estate to raise my legion. We must not shrink from looking at things as they are.'

'Ah ! and he is prisoner ! he will be sold for a slave—perhaps—ah ! perhaps crucified, for he is not a Roman ! Oh, he will be crucified !' and she burst into an agony of weeping. Suddenly she dashed away her tears and looked up clear and bright once more. 'No ! forgive me, father ! God will protect His own !'

'My dear young lady,' said Raphael, 'if you really dislike such a prospect for your brother, and are in want of a few dirty coins wherewith to prevent it, perhaps I may be able to find you them in Ostia.'

She looked at him incredulously, as he glanced over his bags, and then, blushing, begged his pardon for her unspoken thoughts.

'Well, as you choose to suppose. But my dog has been so civil to you already, that perhaps she may have no objection to make you a present of that necktie of hers. I will go in the Rabbas and we will make all right, so don't cry. I hate crying, and the pious in quite enough enough for the present tragedy.'

'The Rabbas ! Are you a Jew ?' asked the officer.

'Yes, sir, a Jew. And you, I presume, a Christian. Perhaps you may have scruples about receiving your set his generally more about taking—from one of our stubborn and unbelieving race. Don't be frightened, though, for your conscience, I assure you I am no more a Jew at heart than I am a Christian.'

'God help you then !'

'Some one, or something, has helped me a great deal too much, for three-and-thirty years of paupering. But pardon me, that was a strange speech for a Christian.'

'You must be a good Jew, sir, before you can be a good Christian.'

'Possibly. I intend to be neither—nor a good Pagan either. My dear sir, let us drop the subject. It is beyond me. If I can be as good a brute animal as my dog there—it being first demonstrated that it is good to be good. I shall be very well content.'

The officer looked down on him with a stately, loving sorrow. Raphael caught his eye, and felt that he was in the presence of no common man.

'I must take care what I say here, I suspect or I shall be entangled shortly in a regular Socratic dialogue. And now, sir, may I return your question, and ask who and what are you ? I really have no intention of giving you up to any Carsai, Antiallus, Tiglath Pileser, or other flea-devouring flea. They will fatten well enough without your blood. So I only ask as a student of the great nothing in general, which men call the universe.'

'I was prefect of a legion this morning. What I am now, you know as well as I.'

'Just what I do not. I am in deep wonder at seeing your hilarity, when, by all flea-analogies, you ought to be either howling your fate like Achilles on the shores of Styx, or pretending to grin and bear it, as I was taught to do when I played at Stonem. You are not of that set certainly, but you confessed yourself a fool just now.'

'And it would be long, would it not, before you made one of them do as much? Well, be it so. A fool I am, yet, if God helps us as far as Ostia, why should I not be cheerful?'

'Why should you?'

'What better thing can happen to a fool, than that God should teach him that he is one, when he flattered himself the wisest of the wise? Listen to me, sir. Four months ago I was blessed with health, honour, lands, friends—all but what the least of men could wish. And it, for no reason in the world, I have chosen to risk all these, against the solemn warnings of the wisest friend, and the wisest saint who treats this earth of God's—should I not rejoice to have it proved to me, even by such a lesson as this, that the friend who never deceived me before was right in this case too, and that the God who has checked and turned me for forty years of wild toil and warfare, whenever I dared to do what was right in the sight of my own eyes, has not forgotten me yet, or given up the thankless task of my education?'

'And who, pray, is this peerless friend?'

'Augustine of Hippo.'

'Humph! It had been better for the world in general, if the great dialectician had exerted his powers of persuasion on Heracles himself.'

'He did so, but in vain.'

'I don't doubt it. I know the sleek Count well enough to judge what a flat sermon would lay upon that smooth vulpine determination of his.'

'An instrument in the hands of God, my dear brother. We must obey His call, even to the death,' etc. etc. And Raphael laughed bitterly.

'You know the Count?'

'As well, sir, as I care to know any man.'

'I am sorry for your oversight, then, sir,' said the Prefect severely, 'if it has been able to discern no more than that in so august a character.'

'My dear sir, I do not doubt his excellence—nay, his inspiration. How well he divined the perfectly fit moment for stabbing his old comrade Sticheu! But really, as two men of the world, we must be aware by this time that every man has his price.'

'Oh, hush! hush!' whispered the girl. 'You cannot guess how you pain him. He worships the Count. It was not ambition, as he pretends, but merely loyalty to him, which brought him here against his will.'

'My dear madam, forgive me. For your sake I am silent.'

'For her sake! A pretty speech for me!'

What next?' said he to himself. 'Ah, Bran, Bran, this is all your fault!'

'For my sake! Oh, why not for your own sake? How sad to hurt one—one like you, only suffering and speaking evil!'

'Why then? If fools are fools, and one can safely call them so, why not do it?'

'Ah,—if God was merciful enough to send down His own Son to die for them, should we not be merciful enough not to judge their failings harshly?'

'My dear young lady, spare a worn-out philosopher any new anthropologic theories. We really must push on a little faster, if we intend to reach Ostia to night.'

But, for some reason or other, Raphael suffered no more for a full half-hour.

Long, however, ere they reached Ostia, the night had fallen, and their situation began to be more than questionably safe. Now and then a wolf, slinking across the road towards his ghastly feast, glided like a lank ghost out of the darkness, and into it again, answering Bran's growl with a gleam of his white teeth. Then the voices of some marauding party rang coarse and loud through the still night, and made them hesitate and stop a while. And at last, worst of all, the measured tramp of an imperial column began to roll like distant thunder along the plain below. They were advancing upon Ostia! What if they arrived there before the routed army could rally, and defend themselves long enough to re-embark?

What if a thousand ugly possibilities began to crowd up?

'Suppose we found the gates of Ostia shut, and the Imperialists "youicked outside?" said Raphael half to himself.

'God would protect His own,' answered the girl, and Raphael had no heart to rob her of her hope, though he looked upon their chances of escape as growing smaller and smaller every moment. The poor girl was weary, the mule weary also, and as they crawled along, at a pace which made it certain that the fast passing column would be at Ostia an hour before them, to join the vanguard of the pursuers, and and them in investing the town, she had to lean again and again on Raphael's arm. Her shoes, matted for so rough a journey, had been long since torn off, and her tender feet were marking every step with blood. Raphael knew it by her filtering gait, and remarked, too, that neither sigh nor moan passed her lips. But as for helping her, he could not, and began to curse the fancy which had led him to eschew even sandals as unworthy the self-dependence of a Cyme.

And so they crawled along while Raphael and the Prefect, each guessing the terrible thoughts of the other, were thankful for the darkness which hid their despairing countenances from the young girl; she, on the other hand, chatting cheerfully, almost laughingly, to her silent father.

At last the poor girl stepped on some stone more sharp than usual—and, with a sudden writho and shriek, sank to the ground. Raphael lifted her up, and she tried to proceed, but sank down again. What was to be done?

'I expected this,' said the Prefect, in a slow stately voice. 'Hear me, sir! Jew, Christian, or philosopher, God seems to have bestowed on you a heart which I can trust. To your care I commit this girl—your property, like me, by right of war. Mount her upon this mule. Hasten with her—where you will—for God will be there also. And may He so deal with you as you deal with her henceforth. An old and disgraced soldier can do no more than die.'

And he made an effort to dismount, but fainting from his wounds, sank upon the neck of the mule. Raphael and his daughter caught him in their arms.

'Father! Father! impossible! Cruel! Oh—do you think that I would have followed you hither from Africa, against your own entreaties, to desert you now?'

'My daughter, I command!'

The girl remained firm and sound.

'How long have you learned to disobey me? Lift the old disgraced man down, sir, and leave him to die in the right place—on the battlefield where his general sent him.'

The girl sank down on the road in an agony of weeping. 'I must help myself, I see,' said her father, dropping to the ground. 'Authority vanishes before old age and humiliation. Victoria! has your father no sins to answer for already, that you will send him before his God with your blood too upon his head?'

Still the girl sat weeping on the ground, while Raphael, utterly at his wits' end, tried hard to persuade himself that it was no concern of his.

'I am at the service of either or of both, for life or death, only be so good as to settle it quickly. Hell! here it is settled for us, with a vengeance!'

And as he spoke, the tramp and jingle of horsemen rang along the lane, approaching rapidly.

In an instant Victoria had sprung to her feet—weakness and pain had vanished.

'There is one chance—one chance for him! Lift him over the bank, sir! Lift him over, while I run forward and meet them. My death will delay them long enough for you to save him!'

'Death!' cried Raphael, seizing her by the arm. 'If that were all—'

'God will protect His own,' answered she calmly, laying her finger on her lips, and then breaking from his grasp in the strength of her heroism, vanished into the night.

Her father tried to follow her, but fell on his face, groaning. Raphael lifted him, strove to drag him up the steep bank, but his knees knocked together, a faint sweat seemed to melt every limb. . . . There was a pause, which seemed ages long. . . . Nearer and nearer came the trampling. A sudden gleam of the moon revealed Victoria standing with outspread arms, right before the horses' heads. A heavenly glory seemed to bathe her from head to foot.

or was it tears sparkling in his own eyes? . . . Then the grate and jar of the horse-hoofs on the road, as they pulled up suddenly. . . . He turned his face away and shut his eyes.

'What are you?' thundered a voice.

'Victoria, the daughter of Majoricus the Prefect.'

The voice was low, but yet so clear and calm, that every syllable rang through Aben-Era's tingling ears.

A shout—a shriek—the confused murmur of many voices. He looked up, in spite of himself—a horseman had sprung to the ground, and clasped Victoria in his arms. The human heart of flesh, asleep for many a year, leaped into mad life within his breast, and drawing his dagger, he rushed into the throng—

'Villains! Hellhounds! I will balk you! She shall die first!'

And the bright blade gleamed over Victoria's head.

He was struck down—blinded—half-stunned—but rose again with the energy of madness. What was this? Soft arms around him. Victoria's!

'Save him! spare him! He saved us! Sir! It is my brother! We are safe! Oh, spare the dog! It saved my father!'

'We have mistaken each other, indeed, sir!' said a gay young Tribune, in a voice trembling with joy. 'Where is my father?'

'Fifty yards behind! Down, Bran! Quiet! O Solomon, mine ancestor, why did you not prevent me making such an egregious fool of myself? Why, I shall be forced, in self-justification, to carry through the farce!'

There is no use telling what followed during the next five minutes, at the end of which time Raphael found himself astride of a goodly war horse, by the side of the young Tribune, who carried Victoria before him. Two soldiers in the meantime were supporting the Prefect on his mule, and convincing that stubborn bearer of burdens that it was not quite so unable to trot as it had fancied, by the combined arguments of a drunch of wine and two sword-points, while they heaped their general with blessings, and kissed his hands and feet.

'Your father's soldiers seem to consider themselves in debt to him—not, surely, for taking them where they could best run away?'

'Ah, poor fellows!' said the Tribune, 'we have had as real a panic among us as I ever read of in Arrian or Polybius. But he has been a father rather than a general to them. It is not often that, out of a routed army, twenty gallant men will volunteer to ride back into the enemy's ranks, on the chance of an old man's breathing still.'

'Then you knew where to find us?' said Victoria.

'Some of them knew. And he himself showed us this very by-road yesterday, when we took up our ground, and told us it might be of service on occasion—and so it has been.

'But they told me that you were taken prisoner. Oh, the torture I have suffered for you!'

'Silly child! Did you fancy my father's son would be taken alive? I and the first troop got away over the garden walls, and cut our way out into the plain, three hours ago.'

'Did I not tell you,' said Victoria, leaning toward Raphael, 'that God would protect His own?'

'You did,' answered he, and fell into a long and silent meditation.

CHAPTER XIV

THE ROCKS OF THE SIRENS

THREE four months had been busy and eventful enough to Hypatia and to Philammon, yet the events and the business were of so gradual and uniform a tenor, that it is as well to pass quickly over them, and show what had happened principally by its effects.

The robust and fiery desert-lad was now metamorphosed into the pale and thoughtful student, oppressed with the weight of careful thought and weary memory. But those remembrances were all recent ones. With his entrance into Hypatia's lecture-room, and into the fairy realm of Greek thought, a new life had begun for him, and the Laura, and Pambo, and Aramus, seemed him phantoms from some antenatal existence, which faded day by day before the influx of new and startling knowledge.

But though the friends and scenes of his childhood had fallen back so swiftly, into the far horizon, he was not lonely. His heart found a leveler, if not a healthier home, than it had ever known before. For during those four peaceful and busy months of study there had sprung up between Hypatia and the beautiful boy one of those pure and yet passionate friendships—call them rather, with St. Augustine, by the sacred name of love, which, fair and holy as they are when they link youth to youth, or girl to girl, reach their full perfection only between man and woman. The unselfish adoration with which a maiden may bow down before some strong and holy priest, or with which an enthusiastic boy may cling to the wise and tender matron, who, amid the turmoil of the world, and the pride of beauty, and the cares of wisdom, bends down to him with counsel and encouragement—earth knows no fairer bonds than these, save wedded love itself. And that second relation, motherly rather than sisterly, had bound Philammon with a golden chain to the wondrous maid of Alexandria.

From the commencement of his attendance in her lecture-room she had invited her discourses to what she fancied were his especial spiritual needs, and many a glance of the eye towards him, on any particularly important sentence, set the poor boy's heart beating at that sign that the words were meant for him. But before a month was past, won by the intense attention with which he watched for every utterance of hers, she had persuaded her father to give him a place in the library as one of his pupils, among the youths who were employed there daily in transcribing, as well as in studying, the authors then in fashion.

She saw him at first but seldom—more seldom than she would have wished, but she dreaded the tongue of scandal, heathen as well as Christian, and contented herself with inquiring daily from her father about the progress of the boy. And when at times she entered for a moment the library, where he sat writing, or passed him on her way to the Museum, a look was interchanged, on her part of most gracious approval, and on his of adoring gratitude, which was enough for both. Her spell was working surely, and she was too confident in her own cause and her own powers to wish to hurry that transformation for which she so fondly hoped.

'He must begin at the beginning,' thought she to herself. 'Mathematics and the Parmenides are enough for him as yet. Without a training in the liberal sciences he cannot gain a faith worthy of those gods to whom some day I shall present him, and I should find his Christian ignorance and fanaticism transferred, whole and rude, to the service of those gods whose shrine is unapproachable save to the spiritual man, who has passed through the successive vestibules of science and philosophy.'

But soon, attracted herself, as much as wishing to attract him, she employed him in copying manuscripts for her own use. She sent back his theses and declamations, corrected with her own hand, and Philammon had them by in his little garret at Euclaiemon's house as precious badges of honour, after exhibiting them to the reverential and envious gaze of the little porter. So he toiled on, early and late, counting himself well paid for a week's intense exertion by a single smile or word of approbation, and went home to pour out his soul to his host on the one inexhaustible theme which they had in common—Hypatia and her perfections. He would have rivetted often enough on the same subject to his fellow-pupils, but he shrank not only from their artificial city manners, but also from their morality, for suspecting which he saw but too good cause. He longed to go out into the streets, to proclaim to the whole world the treasure which he had found, and call on all to come and share it with him. For there was no jealousy in that pure love of his. Could he have seen her lavishing on thousands far greater favours than she had conferred on him, he would have rejoiced in the thought that there were so many more blessed beings upon earth, and have loved them all and every one as brothers, for having deserved her notice. Her very beauty, when his first flush of wonder was past, he ceased to mention—ceased even to think of it. Of course she must be beautiful. It was her right, the natural complement of her other graces; but it was to him only what the mother's smile is to the infant, the sunlight to the skylark, the mountain breeze to the hunter—an inspiring element, on which he fed unconsciously. Only when he doubted for a moment some especially striking or fanciful assertion, did he become really aware of the great loveliness of her who made it, and then his heart silenced his judgment with the thought—Could any but true words come out of those perfect lips?—any but royal thoughts take shape within that queenly head? 'Pious fool!' Yet was it not natural enough?

Then, gradually, as she passed the boy, poring over his book, in some alcove of the Musæum Gardens, she would invite him by a glance to join the knot of loungers and questioners who dangled about her and her father, and fancied themselves to be reproducing the days of the Athenian sages amid the graces of another Acadamus. Sometimes, even, she had beckoned him to her side as she sat in some retired arbour, attended only by her father, and there some passing observation, earnest and personal, however lofty and measured, made him aware, as it was intended to do, that she had a deeper interest in him, a livelier sympathy for him, than for the many, that he was in her eyes not merely a pupil to be instructed, but a soul whom she desired to educate. And those delicious gleams of sunlight grew more frequent and more prominent, for by each she satisfied herself more and more that she had not mistaken either his powers or his susceptibilities, and, in each, whether in public or private, Philammon seemed to bear himself more worthily. For over and above the natural ease and dignity which accompanied physical beauty, and the modesty, self-restraint, and deep earnestness which he had acquired under the discipline of the Lyra, his Greek character was developing itself in all its quickness, subtlety, and versatility, until he seemed to Hypatia some young Titian, by the side of the sippant, hasty, and insincere talkers who made up her chosen circle.

But man can no more live upon Platonic love than on the more prolific species of that common ailment, and for the first month Philammon would have gone hungry to his couch full many a night, to his awake from baser causes than philosophic meditation, had it not been for his magnanimous host, who never lost heart for a moment, either about himself, or any other human being. As for Philammon's going out with him to earn his bread, he would not hear of it. Did he suppose that he could meet any of those monkish rascals in the street, without being knocked down and carried off by main force? And besides there was a sort of impatience in allowing so hopeful a student to neglect the 'Divine Ineffable' in order to supply the base necessities of the teeth. So he should pay no rent for his lodgings—positively none, and as for eatables—why, he must himself work a little harder in order to enter for both. Had not all his neighbours their litters of children to provide for, while he, thanks to the immortals, had been far too wise to burden the earth with animals who would add to the ugliness of their father the Tartarian hue of their mother? And after all, Philammon could pay him back when he became a great sophist, and made money, as of course he would some day or other, and in the meantime, something might turn up—things were always turning up for those whom the gods favoured, and besides, he had fully ascertained that on the day on which he first met Philammon, the planets were favourable, the Mercury being in something or other, he forgot what, with Helios, which portended for Philammon, in his opinion, a similar career with that of the glorious and devout Emperor Julian.

Philammon winced somewhat at the hint, which seemed to have an ugly verisimilitude in it, but still, philosophy he must learn, and bread he must eat, so he submitted.

But one evening, a few days after he had been admitted as Theon's pupil, he found, much to his astonishment, lying on the table in his garret, an undeniable glittering gold piece. He took it down to the porter the next morning, and begged him to discover the owner of the lost coin, and return it duly. But what was his surprise, when the little man, amid endless raps and gesticulations, informed him with an air of mystery, that it was anything but lost, that his master's rent had been paid for him, and that by the beauty of the upper powers, a fresh piece of coin would be forthcoming every month! Julian Philammon demanded to know who was his benefactor. Endymion resolutely kept the secret and imprecated a whole Tartarus of unnecessary curses on his wife if she allowed her female gorulity—though the poor creature seemed never to open her lips from morning till night—to betray so great a mystery.

Who was the unknown friend? There was but one person who could have done it. And yet he dared not the thought was too delightful—think it was she. It must have been her father. The old man had asked him more than once about the state of his purse. True, he had always returned evasive answers, but the kind old man must have divined the truth. Ought he not—must he not—go and thank him? No, perhaps it was more courteous to say nothing. If he—she—for of course she had permitted, perhaps advised, the gift—had intended him to thank them, would they have so carefully concealed their own generosity? Be it so, then. But how would he not repay them for it! How delightful to be in her debt for anything—for everything! Would that he could have the enjoyment of owing her existence itself!

So he took the coin, bought into himself a cloak of the most philosophic fashion, and went his way, such as it was, rejoicing.

But his faith in Christianity? What had become of that?

What usually happens in such cases. It was not dead; but nevertheless it had fallen fast asleep for the time being. He did not believe it, he would have been shocked to hear such a thing asserted of him; but he happened to be busy believing something else—geometry, conic sections, cosmogony, psychology, and what not. And so it befell that he had not just then time to believe in Christianity. He recollected at times its existence, but even then he neither affirmed nor denied it. When he had solved the great questions those which Hypatia set forth as the roots of all knowledge—how the world was made, and what was the origin of evil, and what his own personality was, and that being settled—whether he had one, with a few other preliminary matters, then it would be time to return, with his enlarged light, to the study of Christianity, and if, of course, Christianity should be found to be at variance with that enlarged light, as Hypatia seemed to think.

Why, then, what then? He would not think about such disagreeable possibilities. Sufficient for the day was the evil that real possibilities? It was impossible. Philosophy could not mislead. Had not Hypatia defined it, as man's search after the unseen? And if he found the unseen by it, did it not come to just the same thing as if the unseen had revealed itself to him? And he must find it for logic and mathematics could not err. If every step was correct, the conclusion must be correct also, so he must end, after all, in the right path—that is, of course, supposing Christianity to be the right path—and return to fight the Church's battles, with the sword which he had wrested from Goliath the Philistine. But he had not won the sword yet, and in the meanwhile, learning was wearisome work, and sufficient for the day was the good, as well as the evil, thereof.

So, enabled by his gold coin each month to devote himself entirely to study, he became very much what Peter would have coarsely termed a heathen. At first, indeed, he slipped into the Christian churches, from a habit of conscience. But habits soon grow sleepy, the fear of discovery and recapture made his attendance more and more of a labour. And keeping himself apart as much as possible from the congregation, as a lonely and secret worshipper, he soon found himself as separate from them in heart as in daily life. He felt that they, and even more than they, those flowery and bombastic pulpit rhetoricians, who were paid for their sermons by the clapping and cheering of the congregation, were not thinking of, longing after, the same things as himself. Besides, he never spoke to a Christian, for the negroes at his lodgings seemed to avoid him—whether from modesty or terror, he could not tell, and put off thus from the outward 'communion of saints,' he found himself fast parting away from the inward one. So he went no more to church, and looked the other way, he hardly knew why, whenever he passed the Cæsareum, and Cyril, and all his mighty organisation, became to him another world, with which he had even less to do than with those planets over his head, whose mysterious movements, and symbolisms, and influences Hypatia's lectures on astronomy were just opening before his bewitched imagination.

Hypatia watched all this with growing self-satisfaction, and fed herself with the dream that through Philammon she might see her wildest hopes realised. After the manner of women, she crowned him, in her own imagination, with all powers and excellencies which she would have wished him to possess, as well as with those which he actually possessed, till Philammon would have been as much astonished as self-glorified could he have seen the idealised caricature of himself which the sweet enthusiasm had painted for her private enjoyment. They were blissful months those to poor Hypatia. Great, for some reason or other, had neglected to enlighten him, and the Philagema-nave had retired mercifully into the background. Perhaps she should be able now to comprehend all without it. And yet—it was so long to wait! Years might pass before Philammon's education was matured, and with them golden opportunities which might never occur again.

'Ah!' she sighed at times, 'that Julian had lived a generation later! That I could have brought all my hard earned treasures to the feet of the Port of the Sun, and cried, "Take me! Hero, warrior, statesman, sage, priest of the God of Light! Take thy slave! Command her—send her—to martyrdom, if thou wilt!" A pretty price would that have been wherewith to buy the honour of being the mistress of thy apostles, the fellow-labourer of Ambrosius, Maximus, Lactantius, and the choir of sages who upheld the throne of the last true Cæsar!'

CHAPTER XX

NEPHELOCOCUGIA

HYPATIA had always avoided carefully discussing with Philammon any of those points on which she differed from his former faith. She was content to let the divine light of philosophy penetrate by its own power, and educe its own conclusions. But one day, at the very time at which this history reopens, she was tempted to speak more openly to her pupil than she yet had done. Her father had introduced him, a few days before, to a new work of hers on Mathematics, and the delighted and adoring look with which the boy welcomed her, as he met her in the Museum Gardens, pardonably tempted her curiosity to inquire what miracles her own wisdom might have already worked. She stopped in her walk, and motioned her father to begin a conversation with Philammon.

'Well!' asked the old man, with an encouraging smile, 'and how does our pupil like his new —'

'You mean my conic sections, father? It is hardly fair to expect an unbiased answer in my presence.'

'Why so?' said Philammon. 'Why should I not tell you, as well as all the world, the fresh and wonderful field of thought which they have opened to me in a few short hours?'

'What then?' asked Hypatia, smiling, as if she knew what the answer would be. 'In what does my commentary differ from the original text of Apollonius, on which I have so faithfully based it?'

'Oh, as much as a living body differs from a dead one. Instead of mere dry disquisitions on the properties of lines and curves, I found a mine of poetry and theology. Every dull mathematical formula seemed transfigured, as if by a miracle, into the symbol of some deep and noble principle of the unseen world.'

'And do you think that he of Parga did not see as much? or that we can pretend to surpass, in depth of insight, the sages of the elder world? Be sure that they, like the poets, meant only spiritual things, even when they seem to talk only of physical ones, and conceal heaven under an earthly garb, only to hide it from the eyes of the profane, while we, in these degenerate days, must interpret and display each detail to the dull ears of men.'

'Do you think, my young friend,' asked Thoon, 'that mathematics can be valuable to the philosopher otherwise than as vehicles of spiritual truth? Are we to study numbers merely that we may be able to keep accounts, or as Pythagoras did, in order to deduce from their laws the ideas by which the universe, man, Divinity itself, consists?'

'That seems to me certainly to be the nobler purpose.'

'Or conic sections, that we may know better how to construct machinery, or rather to devise from them symbols of the relations of Deity to its various emanations?'

'You use your dialectic like Socrates himself, my father,' said Hypatia.

'If I do, it is only for a temporary purpose. I should be sorry to accustom Philammon to suppose that the essence of philosophy was to be found in those minute investigations of words and analyses of notions, which seem to constitute Plato's chief power in the eyes of those who, like the Christian sophist Augustine, worship his letter while they neglect his spirit, not seeing that those dialogues, which they fancy the shrine itself, are but vestibules——'

'Say rather, veils, father.'

'Veils, indeed, which were intended to baffle the rude gaze of the carnal-minded, but still vestibules, through which the enlightened soul might be led up to the inner sanctuary, to the Hesperid gardens and golden fruit of the Timæus and the oracles. . . And for myself, were but those two books left, I care not whether every other writing in the world perished to-morrow."¹

'You must except Homer, father.'

'Yes, for the herd. . . But of what use would he be to them without some spiritual commentary?'

'He would tell them as little, perhaps, as the circle tells to the carpenter who draws one with his compasses.'

'And what is the meaning of the circle?' asked Philammon.

'It may have infinite meanings, like every other natural phenomenon, and deeper meanings in proportion to the exaltation of the soul which beholds it. But, consider, is it not, as the one perfect figure, the very symbol of the totality of the spiritual world, which, like it, is invisible, except at its circumference, where it is limited by the dead gross phenomena of sensuous matter, and even as the circle takes its origin from one centre, itself unseen,—a point, as Euclid defines it, whereof neither parts nor magnitude can be predicated,—does not the world of spirits revolve round one ahsymal being, unseen and undefinable—in itself, as I have so often preached, nothing, for it is conceivable only by the negation of all properties, even of those of reason, virtue, force, and yet, like the centre of the circle, the cause of all other existences?'

'I see,' said Philammon, for the moment, certainly, the said ahsymal Deity struck him as a somewhat chill and barren notion. But that might be caused only by the dulness of his own spiritual perceptions. At all events, if was a logical conclusion, it must be right.

'Let that be enough for the present. Hereafter you may be—I fancy that I know you will enough to prophecy that you will be—able to recognise in the equilateral triangle inscribed within the circle, and touching it only with its angles, the three supra-sensual principles of existence, which are contained in Deity as it manifests itself in the physical universe, coinciding with its utmost limits, and yet, like it, dependent on that unseen central One which none dare name.'

'Ah!' said poor Philammon, blushing scarlet at the sense of his own dulness, 'I am indeed, not worthy to have such wisdom wasted upon my imperfect apprehension. . . But, if I may dare to ask. . . does not Apollonius regard the circle, like all other curves, as not depending primarily on its own centre for its existence, but as generated by the section of any cone by a plane at right angles to its axis?'

'But must we not draw, or at least conceive a circle, in order to produce that cone? And is not the axis of that cone determined by the centre of that circle?'

Philammon stood rebuked.

'Do not be ashamed, you have only, unwittingly, laid open another, and perhaps, as deep a symbol. Can you guess what it is?'

Philammon puzzled in vain

'Does it not show you this? That, as every conceivable right section of the cone discloses the circle, so in all which is fair and symmetric you will discover Deity, if you but analyse it in a right and symmetric direction!'

'Beautiful!' said Philammon, while the old man added—

'And does it not show us, too, how the one perfect and original philosophy may be discovered in all great writers, if we have but that scientific knowledge which will enable us to extract it!'

'True, my father—but just now, I wish Philammon, by such thoughts as I have suggested, to rise to that higher and more spiritual insight into nature, which reveals her to us as instinct throughout—all fair and noble forms of her at last—with Deity itself, to make him feel that it is not enough to say, with the Christians, that God has made the world, if we make that very assertion an excuse for believing that His presence has been ever since withdrawn from it.'

'Christians, I think, would hardly say that,' said Philammon.

'Not in words. But, in fact, they regard Deity as the maker of a dead machine, which, once made, will move of itself thenceforth, and repudiate as heretics every philosophic thinker, whether Gnostic or Platonist, who, unsatisfied with so dead, barren, and stunted a conception of the glorious all, wishes to honour the Deity by acknowledging His universal presence, and to believe, honestly, the assertion of their own Scriptures, that He lives and moves, and lives His being in the universe.'

Philammon gently answered that the passage in question was worded somewhat differently in the Scripture.

'True. But if the one be true, its converse will be true also. If the universe lives and moves, and has its being in Him, must He not necessarily pervade all things?'

'Why?—Forgive my dulness, and explain.'

'Because, if He did not pervade all things, those things which He did not pervade would be as it were interstices in His being, and in so far, without Him.'

'True, but still they would be within His circumference.'

'Well argued. But yet they would not live in Him, but in themselves. To live in Him they must be pervaded by His life. Do you think it possible—do you think it even reverent to affirm that there can be anything within the minute glory of Deity which has the power of excluding from the space which it occupies that very being from which it draws its worth, and which must have originally pervaded that thing, in order to bestow on it its organisation and its life? Does He retire after creating, from the spaces which He occupied during creation, reduced to the base necessity of making room for His own universe, and endure the suffering—for the analogy of all material nature tells us that it is suffering—of a foreign body, like a thorn within the flesh, subsisting within His own substance? Rather believe that His wisdom and splendour, like a subtle and piercing fire, insinuates itself eternally with restless force through every organised atom, and that were it withdrawn but for an instant from the petal of the meanest flower, gross matter, and the dead chaos from which it was formed, would be all which would remain of its loveliness.

'Yes'—she went on, after the method of her school, who preferred, like most decaying ones, harangues to dialectic, and synthesis to induction.

'Look at yon lotus-flower, rising like Aphrodite from the wave in which it has slept throughout the night, and saluting, with bending swan neck, that sun which it will follow lovingly around the sky. Is there no more there than brute matter, pipes and fibres, colour and shape, and the meaningless life-in-death which men call vegetation? Those old Egyptian priests knew better, who could see in the number and the form of those ivory petals and golden stamens, in that mysterious daily birth out of the wave, in that nightly baptism, from which it rises each morning re-born to a new life, the signs of some divine idea, some mysterious law, common to the flower itself, to the white-robed priests who held it in the temple rites, and to the goddess to whom they both were consecrated. The flower of Isis! Ah!—well. Nature has her sad symbols, as well as her fair ones. And in proportion as a misguided nation has forgotten the worship of her to whom they owed their greatness, for novel and barbaric superstitions, so has her sacred flower grown rarer and more rare, till now—it emblem of the worship over which it used to shed its perfume—it is only to be found in gardens such as these—curiosity to the vulgar, and, to such as me, a lingering monument of wisdom and of glory past away.'

Philammon, it may be seen, was far advanced by this time, for he bore the allusions to Isis without the slightest shudder. Nay—he dared even to offer consolation to the beautiful mourner.

'The philosopher,' he said, 'will hardly lament the loss of a mere outward idolatry. For if, as you seem to think, there were a root of spiritual truth in the symbolism of nature, that cannot die. And thus the lotus-flower must still retain its meaning, as long as its species exists on earth.'

'Idolatry!' answered she, with a smile. 'My pupil must not repeat to me that worn-out Christian calumny. Into whatsoever low superstitions the pious vulgar may have fallen, it is the Christians now, and not the heathens, who are idolaters. They who ascribe miraculous power to dead men's bones, who make temples of charnel-houses, and bow before the images of the meanest of mankind, have surely no right to accuse of idolatry the Greek or the Egyptian, who embodies in a form of symbolic beauty ideas beyond the reach of words!'

'Idolatry! Do I worship the Pharos when I gaze at it, as I do for hours, with loving awe, as the token to me of the all conquering might of Hylas? Do I worship the roll on which Homer's words are written, when I welcome with delight the celestial truths which it unfolds to me, and even prize and love the material book for the sake of the message which it brings? Do you fancy that any but the vulgar worship the image itself, or dream that it can help or hear them? Does the lover mistake his mistress's picture for the living, speaking reality? We worship the idea of which the image is a symbol. Will you blame us because we use that symbol to represent the idea to our own affections and emotions instead of leaving it a barren notion, a vague imagination of our own intellect?

'Then,' asked Philammon, with a faltering voice, yet unable to restrain his animosity, 'then you do reverence the heathen gods?'

Why Hypatia should have felt this question a sore one, puzzled Philammon, but she evidently did feel it as such, for she answered haughtily enough—

'If Cyril had asked me that question, I should have disclaimed to answer. To you I will tell, that before I can answer your question you must learn what those whom you call heathen gods are. The vulgar, or rather those who find it their interest to calumniate the vulgar for the sake of confounding philosophers with them, may fancy them mere human beings, subject like man to the sufferings of pain and love, to the limitations of personality. We, on the other hand, have been taught by the principal philosophers of Greece, by the priests of ancient Egypt, and the sages of Babylon, to recognise in them the universal powers of nature, those children of the all quickening spirit, which are but various emanations of the one primeval unity—say rather, various phases of that unity, as it has been variously conceived, according to the differences of climate and race, by the wise of different nations. And thus, in our eyes, he who reverences the many, worships by that very act, with the highest and fullest adoration, the one of whose perfection they are the partial antitypes, perfect each in themselves, but each the image of only one of its perfections.'

'Why, then,' said Philammon, much relieved by this explanation, 'do you so dislike Christianity? may it not be one of the many methods—'

'Because,' she answered, interrupting him impatiently, 'because it claims itself to be one of those many methods, and stakes its existence on the denial, because it arrogates to itself the exclusive revelation of the Divine, and cannot see, in its self-conceit, that its own doctrines disprove that assumption by their similarity to those of all creeds. There is not a dogma of the Galileans which may not be found, under some form or other, in some of those very religions from which it pretends to disdain borrowing.'

'Except,' said Theon, 'its exaltation of all which is human and low-born, illiterate, and levelling.'

'Except that—'. But look! here comes some one whom I cannot—do not choose to meet. Turn this way—quick!'

And Hypatia, turning pale as death, drew her father with unphilosophic haste down a side-walk.

'Yes,' she went on to herself, as soon as she had recovered her equanimity. 'Were this Galilean superstition content to take its place humbly among the other "religious heresies" of the empire, one might tolerate it well enough, as an anthropomorphic adulation of divine things fitted for the base and foolish herd, perhaps peculiarly fitted, because peculiarly flattering to them. But now—'

'There is Minam again,' said Philammon, 'right before us!'

'Minam?' asked Hypatia severely. 'You know her then? How is that?'

'She lodges at Eudamion's house, as I do,' answered Philammon frankly. 'Not that I ever interchanged, or wish to interchange, a word with so base a creature.'

'Do not! I charge you!' said Hypatia, almost imploringly. But there was now no way of avoiding her, and perhaps Hypatia and her tormentress met face to face.

'One word! one moment, beautiful lady,' began the old woman, with a shivering obeisance. 'Nay, do not push by so cruelly. I have—see what I have for you!' and she held out with a mysterious air, 'The Rainbow of Solomon.'

'Ah! I knew you would stop a moment—not for the ring's sake, of course, not even for the sake of one who once offered it to you—Ah! and where is he now? Didst of love, perhaps? at last, here is his last token to the fairest one, the cruel one. Well, perhaps she is right.'

To be an empress, an empress! Far finer than anything the poor Jew could have offered. But still. An empress need not be above leaving her subject's petition.

All this was uttered rapidly, and in a whirling undertone, with a continual snaky writhing of her whole body, except her eye, which seemed, in the intense fixity of its glare, to act as a fulcrum for all her limbs, and from that eye, as long as it kept its mysterious hold, there was no escaping.

'What do you mean? What have I to do with this ring?' asked Hypatia, half-frightened.

'He who owned it once, offers it to you now. You recollect a little black agate—a paltry thing.'

If you have not thrown it away, as you most likely have, he wishes to redeem it with this opal—a gem surely more fit for such a hand as that.'

'If I gave me the agate, and I shall keep it.'

'But this opal—worth, oh, worth ten thousand gold pieces—in exchange for that paltry trinket? It is not worth one.'

'I am not a dealer, like you, and have not yet learnt to value things by their money price. If that agate had been worth money, I would never have accepted it.'

'Take the ring, take it, my darling,' whispered Theon impatiently, 'it will pay all our debts.'
'Ah, that it will—pay them all,' answered the old woman, who seemed to have mysteriously overheard him.

'What!—my father! Would you, too, counsel me to be so mercenary? My good woman,' she went on, turning to Miriam, 'I cannot expect you to understand the reason of my refusal. You and I have a different standard of worth. But for the sake of the talisman engraved on that agate, if for no other reason, I cannot give it up.'

'Ah! for the sake of the talisman! That is wise, now! That is noble! Take a philosopher! Oh, I will not say a word more. Let the beautiful prophetess keep the agate, and take the opal too, for see, there is a charm in it also! The name by which Solomon compelled the demons to do his bidding. Look! What might you not do now, if you knew how to use that! To—
'er-er-er-er—is with six wings each,
'er-er-er-er—er-er-er-er—you called them,
'er-er-er-er—er-er-er-er—I confess, send me—
Only look at it!'

Hypatia took the tempting bait, and exclaimed it with more anxiety than she would have wished to confess, while the old woman went

'But the wise lady knows how to use the black agate, of course? Ahu-Era told her that did he not?'

Hypatia blushed somewhat, she was ashamed to confess that Ahu-Era had not revealed the secret to her, probably not believing that there was any, and that the talisman had been to her only a curious plyingthing, of which she liked to believe one day that it might possibly have some occult virtue, and the next day to laugh at the notion as unphilosophical and feeble, so she answered, rather severely, that her secrets were her own property.

'Ah, then! she knows it all! the foolwite lady! And the talisman has told her whether Herubai has lost or won Rome by this time, and whether she is to be the mother of a new dynasty of Ptolemies, or to die a virgin, which the Four Angels await! And surely she has had the great demon come to her the day, when she rubbed the flat side, has she not?'

'Go, foolish woman! I am not like you, the dupe of childish superstitions.'

'Childish superstitions! He! he! he!' said the old woman, as she turned to go, with observations more lowly than ever. 'And she has not seen the Angels yet! Ah well! perhaps some day, when she wants to know how to use the talisman, the beautiful lady will condescend to let the poor old Jewess show her the way.'

And Miriam disappeared down an alley, and plunged into the thickest shrubberies, while the three dreamers went on their way.

Little thought Hypatia that the moment the old woman had found herself alone, she had dashed herself down on the turf, rolling and biting at the leaves like an infuriated wild beast.

'I will have it yet! I will have it, if I tear out her heart with it!'

CHAPTER XVI

VENUS AND PALLAS

As Hypatia was passing across to her lecture-room that afternoon, she was stopped midway by a procession of some twenty Goths and dmsels, headed by Pelagia herself, in all her glory of jewels, shawls, and snow-white milk, while by her side rode the Amal, his long legs, like those of Gung Roll the Norseman, all but touching the ground, as he crushed down with his weight a delicate little lady, the best substitute to be found in Alexandria for the long black chargers of his native land.

On they came, followed by a wondering and admiring mob, straight to the door of the Museum, and stopping began to dismount, while their slaves took charge of the mules and horses.

There was no escape for Hypatia, paid forbade her to follow her own suddenly instinct, and to recede among the crowd behind her, and in another moment the Amal had lifted Pelagia from her mule, and the rival beauties of Alexandria stood, for the first time in their lives, face to face.

'May Ah! behind you this day, Hypatia!' said Pelagia with her sweetest smile. 'I have brought my guards to bear somewhat of your wisdom this afternoon. I am anxious to know whether you can teach them anything more worth listening to than the foolish little songs which Aphrodite taught me, when she raised me from the sea-form, as she rose herself, and named me Pelagia.'

Hypatia drew herself up to her stateliest height, and returned no answer.

'I think my bodyguard will well bear comparison with yours. At least they are the juniors and descendants of deities. So it is but fitting that they should enter before your provincials. Will you show them the way?'

'No answer.'

'Then I must do it myself. Come Amal!' and she swept up the steps, followed by the Goths, who put the Alexandrians aside right and left as if they had been children.

'Ah! treacherous wanton that you are!' cried a young man's voice out of the murmuring crowd. 'After having plundered us of every coin out of which you could dupe us, here you are squandering our patronages on barbarians!'

'Give us back our presents, Pelagia,' cried another, 'and you are welcome to your herd of wild bulls!'

'And I will!' cried she, stopping suddenly, and clutched at her chains and bracelets, she was on the point of dashing them among the astonished crowd—

'There! take your gifts! Pelagia and her girls scorn to be debtors to boys, while they are worshipped by men like these!'

But the Amal, who, luckily for the students, had not understood a word of this conversation, seized her arm, asking if she were mad.

'No, no!' panted she, inarticulate with passion. 'Give me gold—every coin you have. These wretches are twitting me with what they gave me before—before—oh Amal, you understand me!' And she clung imploringly to his arm.

'Oh! Heroes! each of you throw his purse among these fellows! they say that we and our ladies are living on their spoils!' And he tossed his purse among the crowd.

In an instant every Goth had followed his example more than one following it up by dashing a bracelet or necklace into the face of some hapless philosopher.

'I have no lady, my young friends,' said old Wulf, in good enough Greek, 'and owe you nothing, so I shall keep my munny, as you might have kept yours, and as you might, too, old Smid, if you had been as wise as I!'

'Don't be stingy, prince, for the honour of the Gotlis,' said Smid, laughing.

'If I take in gold I pay in iron,' answered Wulf, drawing half out of its sheath the long broad blade, at the ominous brown stains of which the studentry recoiled, and the whole party swept into the empty lecture-room, and seated themselves at their ease in the front ranks.

Poor Hypatia! At first she determined not to lecture—then to send for Orestes—then to call on her students to defend the sanctity of the Museum, but pride, as well as prudence, advised her better, to retreat would be to confess herself conquered—to disgrace philosophy—to lose her hold on the minds of all waverers. No! she would go on and brave everything, insults, even violence, and with trembling limbs and a pale cheek, she mounted the tribune and began.

To her surprise and delight, however, her barbarian auditors were perfectly well behaved. Pelagia, in childish good-humour at her triumph, and perhaps, too, determined to show her contempt for her adversary by giving her every chance, enforced silence and attention, and checked the tittering of the girls, for a full half-hour. But at the end of that time the heavy breathing of the lumbering Amal, who had been twice awoken by her, resounded unchecked through the lecture-room, and descended into a snore, for Pelagia herself was as fast asleep as he. But now another censor took upon himself the office of keeping order. Old Wulf, from the moment Hypatia had begun, had never taken his eyes off her face; and again and again the maiden's weak heart had been cheered, as she saw the smile of sturdy intelligence and honest satisfaction which twinkled over that scarred and lustily visage; while every now and then the graybeard wagged approval, until she found herself, long before the end of the oration, addressing herself straight to her new admirer.

At last it was over, and the students behind, who had sat meekly through it all, without the slightest wish to 'upset' the intruders, who had so thoroughly upset them, rose hurriedly, glad enough to get safe out of so dangerous a neighbourhood. But to their astonishment, as well as to that of Hypatia, old Wulf rose also, and stumbling along to the foot of the tribune, pulled out his purse, and laid it at Hypatia's feet.

'What is this?' asked she, half terrified at the approach of a figure more rugged and barbaric than she had ever beheld before.

'My fee for what I have heard to-day. You are a right noble maiden, and may Freya send you a husband worthy of you, and make you the mother of kings!'

And Wulf retired with his party.

Open homage to her rival, before her very face! Pelagia felt quite inclined to hate old Wulf.

But at least he was the only traitor. The rest of the Goths agreed unanimously that Hypatia was a very foolish person, who was wasting her youth and beauty in talking to donkey-riders, and Pelagia remounted her mule, and the Goths their horses, for a triumphal procession homeward.

And yet her heart was sad, even in her triumph. Right and wrong were ideas as unknown to her as they were to hundreds of thousands in her day. As far as her own consciousness was concerned, she was as destitute of a soul as the mule on which she rode. Gifted by nature with boundless frolic and good-humour, wit and cunning, her Greek taste for the physically beautiful and graceful developed by long training, until she had become, without a rival, the most perfect pantomime, dancer, and musician who catered for the luxurious tastes of the Alexandrian theatres, she had lived since her childhood only for enjoyment and vanity, and wished for nothing more. But her new affection, or rather worship, for the huge manhood of her Gothic lover had awoke in her a new object—to keep him—to live for him—to follow him to the ends of the earth, even if he tired of her, ill-used her, despised her. And slowly, day by day, Wulf's sneers had awakened in her a dread that perhaps the Amal might despise her. . . . Why, she could not guess; but what sort of women were those Alrunas of whom Wulf sang, of whom even the Amal and his men spoke with reverence, as something nobler, not only than her, but even than themselves? And what was it which Wulf had recognised in Hypatia which had bowed the stern and coarse old warrior before her in that public homage? . . . it was not difficult to say what. . . . But why should that make Hypatia or any one else attractive? . . . And the poor little child of nature gazed in deep bewilderment at a crowd of new questions, as a butterfly might at the pages of the book on which it has settled, and was sad and discun-tented—not with herself, for was she not Pelagia the perfect?—but with these strange fancies which came into other people's heads.—Why should not every one be as happy as they could? And who knew better than she how to be happy, and to make others happy?

'Look at that old monk standing on the pavement, Amalric! Why does he stare so at me? Tell him to go away.'

The person at whom she pointed, a delicate-featured old man, with a venerable white beard, seemed to hear her, for he turned with a sudden start, and then, to Pelagia's astonishment, put his hands before his face, and burst convulsively into tears.

'What does he mean by behaving in that way? Bring him here to me this moment! I will know!' cried she, petulantly catching at the new object, in order to escape from her own thoughts.

In a moment a Goth had led up the weeper, who came without demur to the side of Pelagia's nunnery.

'Why were you so rude as to burst out crying in my face?' asked she petulantly.

The old man looked up sadly and tenderly, and answered in a low voice, meant only for her ear.

'And how can I help weeping, when I see anything as beautiful as you are destined to the flames of hell for ever?'

'The flames of hell?' said Pelagia, with a shudder. 'What for?'

'Do you not know?' asked the old man, with a look of sad surprise. 'Have you forgotten what you are?'

'I? I never hurt a fly!'

'Why do you look so terrified, my darling? What have you been saying to her, you old villain?' and the Amal raised his whip.

'Oh! do not strike him. Come, come to-morrow, and tell me what you mean.'

'No, we will have no monks within our doors, frightening silly women. Off, sirrah! and thank the lady that you have escaped with a whole skin.' And the Amal caught the bridle of Pelagia's mule, and pushed forward, leaving the old man gazing sadly after them.

But the beautiful sinner was evidently not the object which had brought the old monk of the desert into a neighbourhood so strange and ungenial to his habits; for, recovering himself in a few moments, he hurried on to the door of the Museum, and there planted himself, scanning earnestly the faces of the passers out, and meeting, of course, with his due share of student rivalry.

'Well, old cat, and what mouse are you on the watch for, at the hole's mouth here?'

'Just come inside, and see whether the mouse will not singe your whiskers for you.'

'Here is my mouse, gentlemen,' answered the old monk, with a bow and a smile, as he laid his hand on Philammon's arm, and presented to his astonished eyes the delicate features and high retreating forehead of Arsenius.

'My father,' cried the boy, in the first impulse of affectionate recognition, and then—he had expected some such meeting all along, but now that it was come at last, he turned pale as death.

The students saw his emotion.

'Hands off, old Heantontimoroumenos! He belongs to our guild now! Monks have no more business with souls than with wives. Shall we hustle him for you, Philammon?'

'Take care how you show off, gentlemen! the Gotlis are not yet out of hearing!' answered Philammon, who was learning fast how to give a smart answer, and then, fanning the temper of the young dandies, and shrinking from the notion of any insult to one so revered and so beloved as Arsenius, he drew the old man gently away, and walked up the street with him in silence, dreading what was coming.

'And are these your friends?'

'Heaven forbid! I have nothing in common with such animals but flesh and blood, and a seat in the lecture-room!'

'Of the heathen woman?'

Philammon, after the fashion of young men in fear, rushed desperately into the subject himself, just because he dreaded Arsenius's entering on it quietly.

'Yes, of the heathen woman. Of course you have seen Cyril before you came hither?'

'I have, and—'

'And,' went on Philammon, interrupting him, 'you have been told every lie which prejudice, stupidity, and revenge can invent. That I have trampled on the cross—sacrificed to all the deities in the pantheon—and probably—(and he blushed scarlet)—that that purest and holiest of beings—whip, if she were not what people call a pagan, would be, and deserves to be, worshipped as the queen of saints—that she and I—' and he stopped.

'Have I said that I believed what I may have heard?'

'No, and therefore, as they are all simple and sheer falsehoods, there is no more to be said on the subject. Not that I shall not be delighted to answer any questions of yours, my dearest father—'

'Have I asked any, my child?'

'No. So we may as well change the subject for the present,'—and he began overwhelming the old man with inquiries about himself, Pambos, and each and all of the inhabitants of the Laura, to which Arsenius, to the boy's infinite relief, answered cordially and minutely, and even vouchsafed a smile at some jest of Philammon's on the contrast between the monks of Nitra and those of Sicily.

Arsenius was too wise not to see well enough what all this shippancy meant, and too wise, also, not to know that Philammon's version was probably quite as near the truth as Peter's and Cyril's, but for reasons of his own, merely replied by an affectionate look, and a compliment to Philammon's growth.

'And yet you seem thin and pale, my boy.'

'Study,' said Philammon, 'study. One can not burn the midnight oil without paying some penalty for it. However, I am richly repaid already, I shall be more so hereafter.

'Let us hope so. But who are those Goths whom I passed in the streets just now?'

'Ah! my father,' said Philammon, glad in his heart of any excuse to turn the conversation, and yet half uneasy and suspicious at Arsenius's evident determination to avoid the very object of his visit. 'It must have been you, then, whom I saw stop and speak to Pelagia at the farther end of the street. What words could you possibly have had wherewith to honour such a creature?'

'God knows. Some secret sympathy touched my heart. Alas! poor child! But how came you to know her?'

'All Alexandria knows the sh unless alone in a quiet room,' interrupted a voice at their elbow—none other than that of the little porter, who had been dodging and watching the pair the whole way, and could no longer restrain his longing to meddle. 'And well it had been for many a rich young man had old Miriam never brought her over, in an evil day, from Athens hither.'

'Miriam?'

'Yes, monk, a name not unknown, I am told, in palaces as well as in slave markets.'

'An evil-eyed old Jewess.'

'A Jewess she is, as her name might have informed you, and as for her eyes, I consult them, or used to do so, of course for her injured nation have been long expelled from Alexandria by your fanatic title—as altogether divine and demonic, let the loose imagination of monks fill them what it likes.'

'But how did you know, this Pelagia, my son? She is no fit company for such as you.'

Philammon told, humbly enough, the story of his Nile journey, and Pelagia's invitation to him.

'You did not surely accept it?'

'Heaven forbid that Hypatia's scholar should so degrade himself!'

Arsenius shook his head sadly.

'You would not have had me go?'

'No, boy. But how long hast thou learned to call thyself Hypatia's scholar, or to call it a degradation to visit the most sinful, if thou mightest thereby bring back a lost lamb to the Good Shepherd? Nevertheless, thou art too young for such employment—and she meant to tempt thee doubtless.'

'I do not think it. She seemed struck by my talking Athenian Greek, and having come from Athens.'

'And how long since she came from Athens?' said Arsenius, after a pause. 'Who knows?'

'Just after it was sacked by the barbarians,' said the little porter, who, beginning to suspect a mystery, was peaking and peering like an excited parrot. 'The old damo brought her hither among a cargo of captive boys and girls.'

'The time agrees. Can this Miriam be found?'

'A sapient and courteous question for a monk to ask! Do you not know that Cyril has expelled all Jews four months ago?'

'True, true. . . . Alas!' said the old man to himself, 'how little the rulers of this world guess their own power! They move a finger carelessly, and forget that that finger may crush to death hundreds whose names they never hear!—and every soul of them as precious in God's sight as Cyril's own.'

'What is the matter, my father?' asked Philammon. 'You seem deeply moved about this woman.'

'And she is Miriam's slave?'

'Her freedwoman this many years past,' said the porter. 'The good lady—for reasons doubtless excellent in themselves, though not altogether patent to the philosophic mind—thought good to turn her loose on the Alexandrian republic, to seek what she might devour.'

'God help her! And you are certain that Miriam is not in Alexandria?'

The little porter turned very red, and Philammon did so likewise, but he remembered his promise, and kept it.

'You both know something of her, I can see. You cannot drive an old statesman, sir!' turning to the little porter with a look of authority—'poor monk though he be now. If you think fitting to tell me what you know, I promise you that neither she nor you shall be losers by your confidence in me. If not, I shall find means to disavow it.'

Both stood silent.

'Philammon, my son, and art thou too in league against—no, not against me, against thyself, poor misguided boy?'

'Against myself?'

'Yes! I have said it. But unless you will trust me, I cannot trust you.'

'I have promised.'

'And I, sir statesman, or monk, or both, neither, have sworn by the immortal and the porter, looking very big.

Arsenius joined.

'There are these who hold that an oath by an idol, being nothing, is of itself void. I do not agree with them. If thou thinkest it sin to break thine oath, to thee it is sin. And for thee, my poor child, thy promise is as real, were it made to Iscariot himself. But hear me. Can either of you, by asking this woman, be so far absolved as to give me speech of her? Tell her—that is, if she be in Alexandria, which God grant—all that has passed between us here, and tell her, on the solemn oath of a Christian, that Arsenius, whose name she knows well, will neither injure nor betray her. Will you do this?'

'Arsenius?' said the little porter, with a look of mingled awe and pity.

The old man smiled. 'Arsenius, who was once called the Father of the Emperor. Even she will trust that name.'

'I will go this moment, sir, I will fly!' and off rushed the little porter.

'The little fellow forgots,' said Arsenius, with a smile, 'to how much he has confessed already, and how easy it were now to trace him to the old hag's lair.' Philammon, my son. I have many tears to weep over thee—but they must wait a while, I have thee safe now, and the old man chitcheled his arm. 'Thou wilt not leave thy poor old father? Thou wilt not desert me for the heathen woman?'

'I will stay with you, I promise you, indeed! if—if you will not say unjust things of her.'

'I will speak evil of no one, accuse no one, but myself. I will not say one harsh word to thee, my poor boy. But listen now! Thou knowest that thou camest from Athens. Knowest thou that it was I who brought thee hither?'

'You?'

'I, my son. But when I brought thee to the Laura, it seemed right that thou, as the son of a noble gentleman, shouldst hear nothing of it. But tell me—dost thou recollect father or mother, brother or sister, or anything of thy home in Athens?'

'No.'

'Thanks be to God. But, Philammon, if thou hadst had a sister—hush! And if—I only say if—'

'A sister?' interrupted Philammon. 'Pelagia?'

'God forbid, my son! But a sister thou hadst once—some three years older than thee she seemed.'

'What? did you know her?'

'I saw her but once—on one sad day—Poor children both! I will not sadden you by telling you where and how.'

'And why did you not bring her hither with me? You surely had not the heart to part us?'

'Ah, my son, what right had an old monk with a fair young girl? And, indeed, even had I had the courage, it would have been impossible. There were others, richer than I, to whose covetousness her youth and beauty seemed a precious prize. When I saw her last, she was in company with an ancient Jewess. Heaven grant that this Minna may prove to be the one.'

'And I have a sister!' gasped Philammon, his eyes bursting with tears. 'We must find her! You will help me?—Now—this moment! There is nothing else to be thought of, spoken of, done, henceforth, till she is found!'

'Ah, my son, my son! Better, better, perhaps, to leave her in the hands of God! What if she were dead? To discover that, would be to discover needless sorrow. And what if God grant that it be not so? she had only a name to live, and were dead, worse than dead, in sinful pleasure—'

'We would save her, or die trying to save her! Is it not enough for me that she is my sister?'

Arsenius shook his head. He little knew the strange new light and warmth which his words had poured in upon the young heart beside him.

'A sister! What mysterious virtue was there in that simple word, which made Philammon's brain reel and his heart throb madly? A sister! not merely a friend, an equal, a help-

mate, given by God Himself, for loving whom none, not even a monk, could blame him—Not merely something delicate, weak, beautiful—for of course she must be beautiful—whom he might cherish, guide, support, deliver, die for, and find death delicious. Yes—all that, and more than that, lay in the sacred word. For those divided and partial notions had flitted across his mind too rapidly to stir such passion as moved him now, even the hint of her sin and danger had been heard heedlessly, it heard at all. It was the word itself which bore its own message, its own spell to the heart of the fatherless and motherless foundling, as he faced for the first time the deep, everlasting, divine reality of kindred.

A sister! of his own flesh and blood—born of the same father, the same mother—his, his, for ever! How hollow and fleeting seemed all 'spiritual consolations,' 'spiritual daughterhoods,' inventions of the changing fancy, the wayward will of man! Arsenius—Pamlo—ay, Hypatia herself—what were they to him now? Here was a real relationship.

A sister! What else was worth caring for upon earth?

'And she was at Athens when Pelagia was'—he cried at last—'perhaps knew her—let us go to Pelagia herself!'

'Heaven forbid!' said Arsenius. 'We must wait at least till Minna's answer comes.'

'I can show you her house at least in the meanwhile, and you can go in yourself when you will. I do not ask to enter. Come! I feel certain that my finding her is in some way bound up with Pelagia. Had I not met her on the Nile, had you not met her in the street, I might never have heard that I had a sister. And if she went with Minna, Pelagia must know her—she may be in that very house at this moment!'

Arsenius had his reasons for suspecting that Philammon was but too right. But he contented himself with yielding to the boy's excitement, and set off with him in the direction of the dancer's house.

They were within a few yards of the gate, when hurried footsteps behind them, and voices calling them by name, made them turn, and behold, evidently to the disgust of Arsenius as much as Philammon himself, Peter the Reader and a large party of monks!

Philammon's first impulse was to escape. Arsenius himself caught him by the arm, and seemed inclined to hurry on.

'No!' thought the youth, 'am I not a free man, and a philosopher?' and facing round, he awaited the enemy.

'Ah, young apostate! So you have found him, reverend and ill-used sir. Praised be Heaven for this rapid success!'

'My good friend,' asked Arsenius, in a trembling voice, 'what brings you here?'

'Heaven forbid that I should have allowed your sanctity and age to go forth without some guard against the insults and violence of this wretched youth and his profligate companions.

We have been following you afar off all the morning, with hearts full of filial solicitude.'

'Many thanks, but indeed your kindness has been superfluous. My son here, from whom I have met with nothing but affection, and whom, indeed, I believe far more innocent than report declared him, is about to return peacefully with me. Are you not, Philammon?'

'Alas! my father,' said Philammon, with an effort, 'how can I find courage to say it?—but I cannot return with you.'

'Cannot return?'

'I vowed that I would never again cross that threshold till—'

'And Cyril does. He bade me, indeed he bade me, assure you that he would receive you back as a son, and forgive and forget all the past.'

'Forgo and forget? That is my part—not his. Will he fight me against that tyrant and his crew? Will he proclaim me openly to be an innocent and persecuted man, unjustly beaten and driven forth for obeying his own commands? Till he does that, I shall not forget that I am a free man.'

'A free man!' said Peter, with an imploring smile, 'that remains to be proved, my grey youth, and will need more evidence than that surly philosophic cloak and those well-winked looks which you have adopted since I saw you last.'

'Remains to be proved.'

Arsemus made an imploring gesture to Peter to be silent.

'Nay, sir. As I foretold to you, this one way alone remains, the blame of it, if there be blame, must rest on the unhappy youth whose perversity renders it necessary.'

'For God's sake, spare me!' cried the old man, dragging Peter aside, while Philammon stood astonished, divided between indignation and vague dread.

'Did I not tell you again and again that I never could bring myself to call a Christian man my slave? And him, above all, my spiritual son?'

'And, most reverend sir, whose zeal is only surpassed by your tenderness and mercy, did not the holy patriarch assure you that your scruples were groundless? Do you think that either he or I can have less horror than you have of slavery in itself? Heaven forbid! But when an immortal soul is at stake—when a lost lamb is to be brought back to the fold—surely you may employ the authority which the law gives you for the salvation of that precious charge committed to you? What could be more conclusive than his Holiness's argument this morning? "Christians are bound to obey the laws of this world for conscience' sake, even though, in the abstract, they may disapprove of them, and deny their authority. Then, by pious reasoning, it must be lawful for them to take the advantage which those same laws offer them, when by so doing the glory of God may be advanced!"'

Arsemus still hung back, with eyes brimming with tears, but Philammon himself put an end to the parley.

'What is the meaning of all this? Are you too, in a conspiracy against me? Speak, Arsemus!'

'This is the meaning of it, blinded sinner!' cried Peter. 'That you are by law the slave of Arsemus, lawfully bought with his money in the city of Ravenna, and that he has the power, and, as I trust, for the sake of your salvation, the will also, to compel you to accompany him.'

Philammon recoiled across the pavement, with eyes flashing defiance. A slave! The light of heaven grew black to him. Oh, that Hypatia might never know his shame! Yet it was impossible. Too dreadful to be true.

'You lie!' almost shrieked he. 'I am the son of a noble citizen of Athens. Arsemus told me so, but this moment, with his own lips—'

'Ah, but he bought you—bought you in the public market, and he can prove it!'

'Hear me, hear me, my son!' cried the old man, springing toward him. Philammon, in his fury, mistook the gesture and thrust him fiercely back.

'You son! your slave! Do not insult the name of son by applying it to me. Yes, sir, your slave in body, but not in soul! Ay, save me—dig home the fugitive—scourge him—brand him—chain him in the mill, if you can, but even for that the free heart has a remedy. If you will not let me live as a philosopher, you shall see me die like one!'

'Seize the fellow, my brethren!' cried Peter, while Arsemus, utterly unable to restrain either pity, hid his face and wept.

'Wretches!' cried the boy, 'you shall never take me alive, while I have teeth or nails left. Treat me as a brute beast, and I will defend myself as such!'

'Out of the way there, rascals! Place for the Prefect! What are you squabbling about here, you mammamery monks?' shouted peremptory voices from behind. The crowd parted, and disclosed the apparitors of Orestes, who followed in his robes of office.

A sudden hope flashed before Philammon, and in an instant he had burst through the mob, and was clinging to the Prefect's chariot.

'I am a free-born Athenian, whom these monks wish to kidnap back into slavery! I claim your protection!'

'And you shall have it, right or wrong, my handsome fellow. By Heaven, you are much too good-looking to be made a monk of! What do you mean, you villains, by attempting to kidnap free men? Is it not enough for you to look up every mad girl whom you can dup, but you must—'

'This master is here present, your Excellency, who will swear to the purchase.'

'On to anything else for the glory of God. Out of the way! And take care, you tall scoundrel, that I do not get a handle against you. You have been one of my mixed men for many a month. Off!'

'His master demands the rights of the law as a Roman citizen,' said Peter, pushing forward Arsenius.

'If he be a Roman citizen, let him come and make his claim at the tribunal to-morrow, in legal form. But I would have you remember, ancient sir, that I shall require you to prove your citizenship before we proceed to the question of purchase.'

'The law does not demand that,' quoth Peter. 'Knock that fellow down, apparitor!' Whereat Peter vanished, and an ominous growl rose from the mob of monks.

'What am I to do, most noble sir?' said Philammon.

'Whatever you like, till the third hour to-morrow—if you are fool enough to appear at the tribunal. If you will take my advice, you will knock down those fellows right and left, and run for your life.' And Orestes drove on.

Philammon saw that it was his only chance, and did so, and in another minute he found himself rushing headlong into the archway of Pelagia's house, with a dozen monks at his heels.

As luck would have it, the outer gates, at which the Goths had just entered, were still open, but the inner ones which led into the court beyond were fast. He tried them, but in vain. There was an open door in the wall on his right; he rushed through it, into a long range of stables, and into the arms of Wulf and Smid, who were unsaddling and leading, like true warriors, their own horses.

'Souls of my fathers!' shouted Smid, 'here's our young monk come back! What brings you here head over heels in this way, young curly-pate?'

'Save me from those wretches!' pointing to the monks, who were peeping into the doorway.

Wulf seemed to understand it all in a moment; for, snatching up a heavy whip, he rushed at the fox, and with a few tremendous strokes cleared the doorway, and shut to the door.

Philammon was going to explain and thank, but Smid stopped his mouth.

'Never mind, young one, you are our guest now. Come in, and you shall be as welcome as ever. See what comes of running away from us at first.'

'You do not seem to have benefited much by leaving me for the monks,' said old Wulf. 'Come in by the inner door. Smid! go and turn those monks out of the gateway.'

But the mob, after battering the door for a few minutes, had yielded to the agonised entreaties of Peter, who assured them that if those carnate hemls once broke out upon them, they would not leave a Christian alive in Alexandria. So it was agreed to leave a few to watch for Philammon's coming out, and the rest, balked of their prey, turned the tide of their wrath against the Prefect, and rejoined the mass of their party, who were still hanging round his chariot, ready for mischief.

In vain the hapless shepherd of the people attempted to drive on. The apparitors were frightened and hung back, and without their help it was impossible to force the horses through the mass of tossing arms and beards in front. The matter was evidently growing serious.

'The bitterest ruffians in all Nitria, your Excellency,' whispered one of the guards, with a pale face, 'and two hundred of them at the least. The very same set, I will be sworn, who nearly murdered Dioscurus.'

'If you will not allow me to proceed, my holy brethren,' said Orates, trying to look collected, 'perhaps it will not be contrary to the canons of the Church if I turn back. Leave the horses' heads alone. Why, in God's name, what do you want?'

'Do you fancy we have forgotten Hieracas?' cried a voice from the rear, and at that name, yell upon yell arose, till the mob, gaining courage from its own noise, burst out into open threats. 'Revenge for the blessed martyr Hieracas!' 'Revenge for the wrongs of the Church!' 'Down with the friend of Heathens, Jews, and Barbarians!' 'Down with the favourite of Hypatia!' 'Butcher!'

And the last epithet so smote the delicate fancy of the crowd, that a general cry arose of 'Kill the butcher!' and one furious monk attempted to clamber into the chariot. An apparitor tore him down, and was dragged to the ground in his turn. The monks closed in. The guards, finding the enemy number ten to their one, threw down their weapons in a panic, and vanished, and in another minute the hopes of Hypatia and the gods would have been lost for ever, and Alexandria robbed of the blessing of being ruled by the most finished gentleman south of the Mediterranean, had it not been for unexpected succour, of which it will be time enough considering who and what is in danger, to speak in a future chapter.

CHAPTER XVII

A STRAY GLEAM

THE last blue headland of Sardinia was fading fast on the north-west horizon, and a steady breeze bore before it innumerable ships, the wrecks of Hierachian's armament, plunging and tossing impatiently in their desperate homeward race toward the coast of Africa. Far and wide, under a sky of cloudless blue, the white sails glittered on the glittering sea, as gaily now, above their loads of shame and disappointment, terror and pain, as when, but one short month before, they bore with them only wild hopes and gallant daring. Who can calculate the sum of misery in that hapless flight? And yet it was but one, and that one of the least known and most trivial, of the tragedies of that age of woe, one petty death-spasm among the unnumbered throes which were shaking to dissolution the Babylon of the West. Her time had come. Even as Saint John beheld her in his vision, by agony after agony, she was rotting to her well-earned doom. Tyrannising it luxuriously over all nations, she had sat upon the mystic beast—building her power on the brute animal appetites of her dupes and slaves—but she had duped herself even more than them. She was finding out by bitter lessons that it was 'to the beast, and not to her, that her vassal kings of the earth had been giving their power and strength, and the ferocity and lust which she had pampered so cunningly in them, had become her curse and her destruction. Drunk with the blood of the saints, blinded by her own conceit and jealousy to the fact that she had been crushing and extirpating out of her empire for centuries past all which was noble, purifying, regenerative, divine, she sat impotent and doting, the prey of every fresh adventurer, the slave of her own slaves.

'And the kings of the earth, who had smimed with her, hated the harlot, and made her desolate and naked, and devoured her flesh, and burned her with fire. For God had put into their hearts to fulfil His will, and to agree, and to give their kingdom to the beast, until the words of God should be fulfilled.' Everywhere sensuality, division, hatred, treachery, cruelty, uncertainty, terror, the vials of God's wrath poured out. Where was to be the end of it all? asked every man of his neighbour, generation after generation, and received for answer only, 'It is better to die than to live.'

And yet in one ship out of that sad fleet, there was peace, peace amid shame and terror, amid the groans of the wounded, and the sighs of the starving, amid all but blank despair. The great trememes and quinquemes rushed onward past the lagging transports, careless, in the mad race for safety, that they were leaving the greater number of their comrades defenceless in the rear of the flight; but from one little fishing-craft alone no base enticements, no bitter execrations greeted the passing flesh and roll of their mighty oars. One after another, day by day, they came rushing up out of the northern offing, each like a huge hundred-footed dragon, pausing and quivering, as if with terror, at every loud pulse of its oars, hailing the wild water right and left with the mighty share of its beak, while from the bows some gorgon or chimera, elephant or boar, stared out with brazen eyes toward the coast of Africa, as if it, too, like the human beings which it carried, was dead to every care but that of dastard flight. Past they rushed, one after another, and off the poop some shouting voice chilled all hearts for a moment, with the fearful news that the Emperor's Neapolitan fleet was in full chase. And the soldiers on board that little vessel looked silently and steadfastly into the silent, steadfast face of the old Prefect, and Victoria saw him shudder, and turn his eyes away—and stood up among the rough fighting men, like a godless, and cried aloud that 'the Lord would protect His own', and they behaved her, and were still, till many days and many ships were passed, and the little fishing-craft, outstripped even by the transports and merchantmen, as it strained and crawled along before its single square-sail, was left alone upon the sea.

And where was Raphael Aben-Ezra?

He was sitting, with Bran's head between his knees, at the door of a temporary awning in the vessel's stern, which shielded the wounded men from sun and spray, and as he sat he could hear from within the tent the gentle voices of Victoria and her brother, as they tended the sick like ministering angels, or read to them words of divine hope and comfort—in which his homeless heart felt that he had no share.

'As I live, I would change places now with any one of those poor mangled ruffians, to have that voice speaking such words to me and to believe them.' And he went on perusing the manuscript which he held in his hand.

'Well!' he sighed to himself after a while, 'at least it is the most commendatory, not to say hopeful, view of our destinies with which I have met since I threw away my nurse's belief that the seed of David was fated to conquer the whole earth, and set up a second Roman Empire at Jerusalem, only worse than the present one, in that the devils of superstition and bigotry would be added to those of tyranny and rapine.'

A hand was laid on his shoulder, and a voice asked, 'And what may this so hopeful view be?'

'Ah! my dear General!' said Raphael, looking up. 'I have a poor ball of faw whereon to exercise my culinary powers this morning. Had it not been for that shark who was so luckily deluded last night, I should have been reduced to the necessity of stewing my friend the fat decurion's big boots.'

'They would have been savoury enough, I will warrant, after they had passed under your magical hand.'

'It is a comfort, certainly, to find that after all one did learn some thing useful in Alexandria.' So I will even go forward at once, and employ my artistic skill.'

'Tell me first what it was about which I heard you just now soliloquizing, as so hopeful a view of some matter or other?'

'Honestly— if you will neither betray me to your son and daughter, nor consider me as having in anywise committed myself— it was Paul of Tarsus's notion of the history and destinies of our stiff-necked nation. See what your daughter has persuaded me into reading!'

And he held up a manuscript of the Epistle to the Hebrews. 'It is execrable Greek. But it is sound philosophy, I cannot deny. He knows Plato better than all the ladies and gentlemen in Alexandria put together, if my opinion on the point be worth having.'

'I am a plain soldier, and no judge on that point, sir. He may or may not know Plato, but I am right sure that he knows God.'

'Not too fast,' said Raphael with a smile. 'You do not know, perhaps, that I have spent the last ten years of my life among men who professed the same knowledge!

'Augustine, too, spent the best ten years of his life among such, and yet he is now combating the very errors which he once taught.'

'Having found it, most truly. But you must talk to him yourself, and argue the matter over, with one who can argue. To me such questions are an unknown land.'

'Well. Perhaps I may be tempted to do even that. At least a thoroughly converted philosopher—for poor dear Synesius is half heathen still, I often fancy, and hankers after the wisdom of the Egyptian—will be a curious sight, and to talk with so famous and so learned a man would always be a pleasure, but to argue with him, or any other human being, none whatsoever.'

'Why, then?'

'My dear sir, I am sick of syllogisms, and probabilities, and pros and contras. What do I care if, on weighing both sides, the nineteen pounds weight of questionable arguments against, are outweighed by the twenty pounds weight of equally questionable arguments for? Do you not see that my belief of the victorious proposition will be proportional to the one over balancing pound only, while the whole other nineteen will go for nothing?'

'I really do not.'

'Happy are you, then. I do, from many a sad experience. No, my worthy sir. I want a faith just arguments, one which, whether I can prove it or not to the satisfaction of the lawyers, I believe to my own satisfaction, and act on it as undoubtingly and unreasoningly as I do upon my own newly-rediscovered personal identity. I don't want to possess a faith. I want a faith which will possess me. And if I ever arrived at such a one, believe me, it would be by some such practical demonstration as this very tent has given me.'

'This tent?'

'Yes, sir, this tent, within which I have seen you and your children lead a life of deeds as new to me the Jew, as they would be to Hypatia the Gentile. I have watched you for many a day, and not in vain. When I saw you, an experienced officer, encounter your light with wounded men, I was only surprised. But since I have seen you and your daughter, and, strangest of all, your gay young Alekhades of a man, starving yourselves to feed those poor ruffians—performing for them, day and night, the offices of menial slaves—comforting them, as you men ever comforted me—blaming no one but yourselves, caring for every one but yourselves, achieving nothing but yourselves, and all this without hope of fame or reward, or dream of appeasing the wrath of any god or goddess, but simply because you thought it right. When I saw that, sir, and more which I have seen, and when, reading in this book here, I found most unexpectedly those very grand moral rules which you were practising, seeming to spring unconsciously, as natural results, from the great thoughts, true or false, which had preceded them, then, sir, I began to suspect that the creed which could produce such deeds as I have watched within the last few days, might have on its side not merely a slight preponderance of probabilities, but what we Jews used once to call, when we believed in it—or in anything—the mighty power of God.'

And as he spoke, he looked into the Prefect's face with the look of a man wrestling in some deadly struggle, so intense and terrible was the earnestness of his eye, that even the old soldier shrank before it.

'And therefore,' he went on, 'therefore, sir, beware of your own actions, and of your children's. If, by any folly or baseness, such as I have seen in every human being whom I ever met as yet upon this accursed stage of fools, you shall crush my new-budding hope that there is something somewhere which will make me what I know that I ought to be, and can be—If you shall crush that, I say, by any misdoing of yours, you had better have been the murderer of my firstborn, with such a hate—a hate which Jews alone can feel—will I hate you and yours.'

'God help us and strengthen us!' said the old warrior in a tone of noble humility.

'And now,' said Raphael, glad to change the subject, after this unexpected outburst, 'we must once more seriously consider whether it is wise to hold on our present course. If you return to Carthage, or to Hippo—'

'I shall be belated.'

'Most assuredly. And how much sorer you may consider such an event a gain to yourself, yet for the sake of your son and your daughter—'

'My dear sir,' interrupted the Prefect, 'you mean kindly. But do not, do not tempt me. By the Count's side I have fought for thirty years, and by his side I will die, as I deserve.'

'Victorinus! Victorinus!' cried Raphael, 'help me.' Your father,' he went on, as they came out from the tent, 'is still decided on losing his own head, and throwing away ours, by going to Carthage.'

'For my sake—for our sakes—father!' cried Victorinus, clinging to him.

'And for my sake, also, most excellent sir,' said Raphael, smiling quietly. 'I have no wish to be so uncourteous as to urge any help which I may have seemed to afford you. But I hope that you will recollect that I have a life to lose, and that it is hardly fair of you to imperil it as you intend to do. If you could help or save Herachan, I should be dumb at once. But now, for a mere point of honour to destroy fifty good soldiers, who know not their right hands from their left—shall I ask their opinion?'

'Will you raise a mutiny against me, sir?' asked the old man sternly.

'Why not mutiny against Philip drunk, in behalf of Philip sober? But really, I will obey you . . . only you must obey us . . . What is Hesiod's definition of the man who will neither counsel himself nor be counselled by his friends? . . . Have you no trusty acquaintances in Cyrenaica, for instance?'

The Prefect was silent.

'Oh, hear us, my father! Why not go to Enochus? He is your old comrade—a well-wisher, too, to this . . . this expedition. And recollect, Augustine must be there now. He was about to sail for Berenice, in order to consult Synesius and the Pentapolitan bishops, when we left Carthage.'

And at the name of Augustine the old man paused.

'Augustine will be there, true. And this our friend must meet him. And thus at least I should have his advice. If he thinks it my duty to return to Carthage, I can but do so, after all. But the soldiers!'

'Excellent sir,' said Raphael, 'Synesius and the Pentapolitan landlords—who can hardly call their lives their own, thanks to the Moors—will be glad enough to feed & pay them, or any other brave fellows with arms in their hands, at this moment. And my friend Victorinus, here, will enjoy, I do not doubt, a little wild campaigning against intruding barbarians.'

The old man bowed silently. The battle was won.

The young tribune, who had been watching his father's face with the most intense anxiety, caught at the gesture, and hurrying forward, announced the change of plan to the soldiers. It was greeted with a shout of joy, and in another five minutes the sails were about, the rudder shifted, and the ship on her way towards the western point of Sicily, before a steady north-west breeze.

'Ah!' cried Victoria, delighted. 'And now you will see Augustine! You must promise me to talk to him!'

'This, at least, I will promise, that whatever the great sophist shall be pleased to say, shall meet with a patient hearing from a brother sophist. Do not be angry at the term. Recollect that I am somewhat tired, like my ancestor Solomon, of wisdom and wise men, having found it only too like madness and folly. And you cannot surely expect me to believe in him, while I do not yet believe in God!'

Victoria sighed. 'I will not believe you. Why always pretend to be worse than you are?'

'That kind souls like you may be spared the pain of finding me worse than I seem. There, let us say no more, except that I heartily wish that you would hate me!'

'Shall I try?'

'That must be my work, I fear, not yours. However, I shall give you good cause enough before long, doubt it not.'

Victoria sighed again, and retired into the tent to nurse the sick.

'And now, sir,' said the Prefect, turning to Raphael and his son, 'do not mistake me. I may have been weak, as worn-out and hopeless men are wont to be, but do not think of me as one who has yielded to adversity in fear for my own safety. As God hears me, I desire nothing better than to die, and I only turn out of my course on the understanding that if Augustine will advise, my children hold me free to return to Carthage and meet my fate. All I pray for is, that my life may be spared until I can place my dear child in the safe shelter of a nunnery.'

'A nunnery?'

'Yes, indeed, I have intended ever since her birth to dedicate her to the service of God. And in such times as these, what better lot for a defenceless girl?'

'Pardon me!' said Raphael, 'but I am too dull to comprehend what benefit or pleasure your Deity will derive from the celibacy of your daughter. Except, indeed, on one supposition, which, as I have some faint remnants of reverence and decency reawakening in me just now, I must leave to be uttered only by the pure lips of sexless priests.'

'You forget, sir, that you are speaking to a Christian.'

'I assure you, no! I had certainly been forgetting it till the last two minutes, in your very pleasant and rational society. There is no danger henceforth of my making so silly a mistake.'

'Sir,' said the Priest, reddening at the undisguised contempt of Raphael's manner.

'When you know a little more of St. Paul's Epistles, you will cease to insult the opinions and feelings of those who obey them, by sacrificing their most precious treasures to God.'

'Oh, it is Paul of Tarsus, then, who gives you the advice! I thank you for informing me of the fact, for it will save me the trouble of any future study of his works. Allow me, therefore, to return by your hands this manuscript of his with my thanks from me to the daughter of yours, by whose perpetual imprisonment you intend to give pleasure to your Deity.' Henceforth the less communication which passes between me and any member of your family, the better.' And he turned away.

'But, my dear sir!' said the honest soldier, really chagrined, 'you must not!—we owe you too much, and love you too well, to part thus for the caprice of a moment. If any word of mine has offended you—forget it, and forgive me, I beseech you!' and he caught both Raphael's hands in his own.

'My very dear sir,' answered the Jew quietly, 'let me ask the same forgiveness of you, and believe me, for the sake of past pleasant passages, I shall not forget my promise about the mortgage.'

But—here we must part. To tell you the truth, I half an hour ago was fearfully near becoming neither more nor less than a Christian. I had actually deluded myself into the fancy that the Deity of the Galileans might be, after all, the God of our old Hebrew forefathers—of Adam and Eve, of Abraham and David, and of the rest who believed that children and the fruit of the womb were an heritage and gift which cometh of the Lord—and that Paul was right—actually right—in his theory that the church was the development and fulfilment of our old national polity. I must thank you for opening my eyes to a mistake which, had I not been besotted for the moment, every monk and nun would have contradicted by the mere fact of their existence, and reserve my nascent faith for some dirty who takes no delight in seeing his creatures stultify the primary laws of their being. Farewell!

And while the Prefect stood petrified with astonishment, he retired to the further extremity of the dock, muttering to himself—

'Did I not know all along that this gleam was too sullen and too bright to last? Did I not know that he, too, would prove himself like all the rest—an ass? Paul! to have looked for common sense on such a night as this! Back to chaos again, Raphael Aben-Ezer, and spin ropes of sand to the end of the farcical!'

And mixing with the soldiers, he exchanged no word with the Prefect and his children, till they reached the port of Brevince, and then putting the necklace into Victoria's hands, vanished among the crowds upon the quay, no one knew whither.

CHAPTER XVIII

THE PERFECT TESTED

WHEN we last sight of Philammon, his destiny had linked him once more among his old friends the Goths, in search of two important elements of human comfort, freedom and a sister. The former he found at once, in a large hall where sundry Goths were lounging and toying, into the nearest corner of which he slipped, and stood, his late terror and rage forgotten altogether in the old new and absorbing thought. His sister might be in that house! and yielding to so sweet a dream, he began fancying to himself which of all those gay maidens she might be who had become in one moment more dear, more great to him, than all things else in heaven or earth. That fair-haired, rounded Italian? That fierce, humorous, aquiline-faced Jewess? That delicate, swart, sidelong-eyed Copt? No. She was Athenian, like himself. That tall, lazy Greek girl, then, from beneath whose sleepy lids flashed, once an hour, sudden lightnings, revealing depths of thought and feeling uncultivated, perhaps even unsuspected, by their possessor? Her? Or that, her seeming sister? Or the next? Or—Was it Pelagia herself, most beautiful and most sinful of them all? Fearful thought! He blushed scarlet at the bare imagination. yet why, in his secret heart, was that the most pleasant hypothesis of them all? And suddenly flashed across him that observation of one of the girls on board the boat, on his likeness to Pelagia. Strange, that he had never recollected it before! It must be so! and yet on what a slender thread, woven of scattered hints and surmises, did that 'must' depend! He would be sane! he would wait, he would have patience. Patience, with a sister yet unfound, perhaps perishing? Impossible!

Suddenly the train of his thoughts was changed perforce—

'Come! come and see! There's a fight in the streets,' called one of the dunces down the stairs, at the highest pitch of his voice.

'I shan't go,' yawned a huge fellow, who was lying on his back on a sofa.

'Oh come up, my hero,' said one of the girls. 'Such a charming riot, and the Prefect himself in the middle of it! We have not had such a one in the street this month.'

'The princes won't let me knock any of these donkey-riders on the head, and seeing other people do it only makes me furious. Give me the wine-jug—curse the gals! she has run up stairs!'

The shouting and tramping came nearer, and in another minute Wulf came rapidly down stairs, through the hall into the hall-moat, and into the presence of the Anai.

'Prince! here is a chance for us. These rascally Goths are murdering their Prefect under our very windows.'

'The lying cat! Save him right for cheating us. He has plenty of guards. Why can't the fool take care of himself?'

'They have all run away, and I saw some of them hiding among the mob. As I live, the man will be killed in two minutes more.'

'Why not?'

'Why should he, when we can save him and win his favour for ever? The men hugers are nothing for a fight; it's a bad plan not to give hounds blood now and then, or they lose the knack of hunting.'

'Well, it wouldn't take five minutes.'

'And heroes should show that they can forgive when an enemy is in distress.'

'Very true! Like an Anai too!' And the Anai sprang up and shouted to his men to follow him.

'Good bye, my pretty one. Why, Wulf, cried he, as he burst out into the court, 'here's our monk again! By Odin, you're welcome, my handsome boy! come along and fight too, young fellow, what were those arms given you for?'

'He is my man,' said Wulf, laying his hand on Philammon's shoulder, 'and blood he shall taste.' And out the three hurried, Philammon, in his present reckless mood, ready for anything.

'Bring your whips. Never mind swords. Those rascals are not worth it,' shouted the Anai, as he hurried down the passage brandishing his heavy thong, some ten feet in length, threw the gate open, and the next moment recoiled from a dense rush of people who surged in and surged out again as rapidly as the Goths, with the combined force of his weight and arm, hewed his way straight through them, felling a wretch at every blow, and followed up by his terrible companions.

They were but just in time. The four white blood-horses were plunging and rolling over each other, and Orestes reeling in his chariot, with a stream of blood running down his face, and the hands of twenty wild monks clutching at him. 'Monks again!' thought Phlammion, and as he saw among them more than one hateful face, which he recollected in 'yri's courtyard on that fatal night, a flush of fierce revenge ran through him.

'Mercy!' shrieked the miserable Prefect—'I am a Christian! I swear that I am a Christian! the Bishop Atticus baptized me at Constantinople!'

'Down with the butcher! down with the heathen tyrant, who refuses the adoration on the Gospels rather than he reconciled to the patriarch! Tear him out of the chariot!' yelled the monks.

'The craven hound!' said the Amal, stopping short, 'I won't help him!' But in an instant Wulf rushed forward, and struck right and left, the monks recoiled, and Phlammion, burning to prevent so shameful a scandal to the faith to which he still clung convulsively, sprang into the chariot and caught Orestes in his arms.

'You are safe, my lord, don't struggle,' whispered he, while the monks flew on him. A stone or two struck him, but they only quickened his determination, and in another moment the whistling of the whips round his head, and the yell and backward rush of the monks, told him that he was safe. He carried his burden safely within the doorway of Pelagius's house, into the crowd of peeping and shrieking damsels, where twenty pairs of the prettiest hands in Alexandria seized on Orestes, and drew him into the court.

'Like a second Hylas, carried off by the nymphs!' sniggered he, as he vanished into the harem, to reappear in five minutes, his head bound up with silk handkerchiefs, and with as much of his usual impudence as he could muster.

'Your Excellency—heroes all—I am your devoted slave. I owe you life itself, and more, the valour of your succour is only surpassed by the deliciousness of your cure. I would gladly undergo a second wound to enjoy a second time the services of such hands, and to see such feet busying themselves on my behalf.'

'You wouldn't have said that five minutes ago,' quoth the Amal, looking at him very much as a bear might at a monkey.

'Never mind the hands and feet, old fellow, they are none of yours!' bluntly observed a voice from behind, probably Smid's, and a laugh ensued.

'My saviours, my brothers!' said Orestes, politely ignoring the laughter. 'How can I repay you? Is there anything in which my office here enables me—I will not say to reward, for that would be a term beneath your dignity as free barbarians—but to gratify you?'

'Give us three days' pillage of the quarter,' shouted some one.

'Ah, true valour is apt to underrate obstacles, you forget your small numbers.'

'I say,' quoth the Amal—'I say, take care, Prefect.—If you mean to tell me that we forty couldn't cut all the throats in Alexandria in three days, and yours into the bargain, and keep your soldiers at bay all the time—'

'Half of them would join us!' cried some one. 'They are half our own flesh and blood after all!'

'Pardon me, my friends, I do not doubt it a moment. I know enough of the world never to have found a sheep-dog yet who would not, on occasion, help to make away with a little of the mutton which he guarded. Eh, my venerable sir?' turning to Wulf with a knowing bow.

Wulf chuckled grimly, and said something to the Amal in German about being civil to guests.

'You will pardon me, my heroic friends,' said Orestes, 'but, with your kind permission, I will observe that I am somewhat faint and disturbed by late occurrences. To trespass on your hospitality further would be an impertinence. If, therefore, I might send a slave to find some of my apartments—'

'No, by all the gods!' roared the Amal, 'you're my guest now, my lady's at least. And no one ever went out of my house sober yet if I could help it. Set the cooks to work, my men! The Prefect shall feast with us like an emperor, and we'll send him home to-night as drunk as he can wish. Come along, your Excellency, we're rough fellows, we Goths, but by the Valkyrs, no one can say that we neglect our guests!'

'It is a sweet compulsion,' said Orestes, as he went in.

'Stop, by the bye! Didn't one of you men catch a monk?'

'Here he is, prince, with his elbows safe behind him.' And a tall, baggavil, half-naked monk was dragged forward.

'Capital! bring him in. His Excellency shall judge him while dinner's cooking, and Smid shall have the hanging of him. He hurt nobody in the scuffle, he was thinking of his dinner.'

'Some rascal bit a piece out of my leg, and I tumbled down,' grumbled Smid.

'Well, pay out this fellow for it, then. Bring a chair, slaves! Here, your Highness, sit there and judge.'

'Two chairs!' said some one, 'the Amal shan't stand before the emperor himself.'

'By all means, my dear friends. The Amal and I will act as the two Cæsars, with divided empire. I presume we shall have little difference of opinion as to the hanging of this worthy.'

'Hanging's too quick for him.'

'Just what I was about to remark—there are certain judicial formalities, considered generally to be conducive to the stability, if not necessary to the existence, of the Roman empire—'

'I say, don't talk so much,' shouted a Goth, 'If you want to have the hanging of him yourself, do. We thought we would save you trouble.'

'Ah, my excellent friend, would you rob me of the delicate pleasure of revenge? I intend to spend at least four hours to-morrow in killing this pious martyr. He will have a good time to think, between the beginning and the end of the rack.'

'Do you hear that, master monk?' said Smid, chucking him under the chin, while the rest of the party seemed to think the whole business an excellent joke, and divided their remarks openly enough between the Prefect and his victim.

'The man of blood has said it. I am a martyr,' answered the monk in a dogged voice.

'You will take a good deal of time in becoming one.'

'Death may be long, but glory is everlasting.'

'True. I forgot that, and will save you the said glory, if I can help it, in a year or two. Who was it struck me with the stone?'

No answer.

'Tell me, and this moment he is in my hands; I pardon you freely.'

The monk laughed. 'Pardon? Pardon me eternal bliss, and the things unspeakable, which God has prepared for those who love Him? Tyrant and butcher! I struck thee, thou second Diocletian—I hurled the stone! I, Ammonius. Would to heaven that it had smitten thee through, thou Sisera, like the nail of Isai the Kenite!'

'Thanks, my friend. Heroes, you have a cellar for monks as well as for wine! I will trouble you with this hero's psalm singing to-morrow, and send my attendants for him in the morning.'

'If he begins howling when we are in bed, your men won't find much of him left in the morning,' said the Amal. 'But here come the slaves, announcing dinner.'

'Stay,' said Orates, 'there is one more with whom I have an account to settle—that young philosopher there.'

'Oh, he is coming in, too. He never was drunk in his life, I'll warrant, poor fellow, and it's high time for him to begin.' And the Amal laid a good-natured bear's paw on Philammon's shoulder, who hung back in perplexity, and cast a piteous look towards Wulf.

Wulf answered it by a shake of the head which gave Philammon courage to stammer out a courteous refusal. The Amal swore an oath at him which made the cloister ring again, and with a quiet shove of his heavy hand, sent him staggering half across the court, but Wulf interposed.

'The boy is mine, prince. He is no drunkard, and I will not let him become one. Would to heaven,' added he, under his breath, 'that I could say the same to some others. Send us out our supper here, when you are done. Half a sheep or so will do between us, and enough of the strongest to wash it down with. Smid knows my quantity.'

'Why in heaven's name are you not coming in?'

'That mob will be trying to burst the gates again before two hours are out, and as some one must stand sentry, it may as well be a man who will not have his ears stopped up by wine and women's kisses. The boy will stay with me.'

So the party went in, leaving Wulf and Philammon alone in the outer hall.

Then the two sat in some half hour, casting stealthy glances at each other, and wondering perhaps, each of them vainly enough, what was going on in the opposite brain. Philammon, though his heart was full of his sister, could not help noticing the air of deep sadness which hung about the scarred and weather-beaten features of the old warrior. The grimness which he had remarked on their first meeting seemed to be now changed to a settled melancholy. The furrows round his mouth and eyes had become deeper and sharper. Some perpetual indignation seemed smouldering in the knitted brow and protruding upper lip. He sat there silent and motionless for some half hour, his chin resting on his hands, and they again upon the butt of his axe, apparently in deep thought, and listening with a silent sneer to the clinking of glasses and dishes within.

Philammon felt too much respect, both for his age and his stately vulgarity, to break the silence. At last some louder burst of merriment than usual aroused him.

'What do you call that?' said he, speaking in Greek.

'Folly and vanity.'

'And what does she there—the Alruna—the prophet-woman, call it?'

'Whom do you mean?'

'Why, the Greek woman whom we went to hear talk this morning.'

'Folly and vanity.'

'Why can't she cure that Roman hairdresser there of it, then?'

Philammon was silent. 'Why not, indeed?'

'Do you think she could cure any one of it?'

'Oh what?'

'Of getting drunk, and wasting their strength and their fame, and their hard-won treasures upon eating and drinking, and fine clothes, and bad women.'

'She is most pure herself, and she preaches purity to all who hear her.'

'Curse preaching! I have preached for these four months.'

'Perhaps she may have some more winning arguments—perhaps—'

'I know. Such a beautiful bit of flesh and blood as she is might get a hearing, when a grizzled old head-splitter like me was called a dotard. Eh? Well. It's natural.'

A long silence.

'She is a grand woman. I never saw such a one, and I have seen many. There was a prophetic once, lived in an island in the Wisers-stream—and when a man saw her, even before she spoke a word, one longed to crawl to her feet on all fours, and say, "There, tread on me, I am not fit for you to wipe your feet upon." And many a warrior did it. Perhaps I may have done it myself, before now. And this one is strangely like her. She would make a prince's wife, now.'

Philammon started. What new feeling was it, which made him indignant at the notion?

'Beauty? What's beauty without soul? What's beauty without wisdom? What's beauty without chastity? Beast! fool! wallowing in the mire which every hug has fouled!'

'Like a jewel of gold in a swine's snout, so is a fair woman who is without discretion.'

'Who said that?'

'Solomon, the king of Israel.'

'I never heard of him. But he was a right Sagaman, whoever said it. And she is a pure maiden, that other one?'

'Spotless as the Idesed Virgin, Philammon was going to say—but checked himself. There were sad recollections about the words.'

Wulf sat silent for a few minutes, while Philammon's thoughts revolved at once to the new purpose for which alone life seemed worth having. To find his sister! That one thought had in a few hours changed and matured the boy into the man. Hitherto he had been only the leaf before the wind, the puppet of every new impression, but now circumstance, which had been leading him along in such soft fetters for many a month, was become his deadly foe, and all his energy and cunning, all his little knowledge of man and of society, rose up sturdily and shrewdly to fight in this new cause. Wulf was now no longer a phenomenon to be wondered at, but an instrument to be used. The broken hints which he had just given of discontent with Pelagia's presence inspired the boy with sudden hope, and cautiously he began to hint at the existence of persons who would be glad to remove her. Wulf caught at the notion, and replied to it with searching questions, till Philammon, finding plain speaking the better part of cunning, told him openly the whole events of the morning, and the mystery which Arsenius had half revealed, and then shuddered with mingled joy and horror, as Wulf, after rummaging over the matter for a weary five minutes, made answer—

'And what if Pelagia herself were your sister?'

Philammon was bursting forth in some passionate answer, when the old man stopped him and went on slowly, looking him through and through—

'Because, when a penniless young monk claims kin with a woman who is drinking out of the wine-cups of the Cæsars, and filling a place for a share of which kings' daughters have been thankful—and will be again before long—why then, though an old man may be too good-natured to call it all a lie at first sight, he can't help supposing that this young monk has an eye to his own personal profit, eh?'

'My profit?' cried poor Philammon, starting up. 'Good God! what object on earth can I have, but to rescue her from this infamy to purity and holiness?'

He had touched the wrong chord.

'Infamy? you accursed Egyptian slave!' cried the jernice, starting up in his turn, red with passion, and clatching at the whip which hung over his head. 'Infamy? As if she, and you too, ought not to consider yourselves blest in her being allowed to wash the feet of an Amal!'

'Oh, forgive me!' said Philammon, terrified at the hints of his own clumsiness. 'But you forget—you forget, she is not married to him!'

'Married to him? A free-woman? No, thank Freya! he has not fallen as low as that, at least—and never shall, if I kill the witch with my own hands. A free-woman!'

Poor Philammon! And he had been told but that morning that he was a slave. He hid his face in his hands, and burst into an agony of tears.

'Come, come,' said the testy warrior, softened at once. 'Woman's tears don't matter, but somehow I never could bear to make a man cry. When you are cool, and have learnt common courtesy, we'll talk more about this. So! Hush, enough is enough. Here comes the supper, and I am as hungry as Luke.'

And he commenced devouring like his name-sake, 'the gray beast of the wood,' and forcing, in his rough hospitable way, Philammon to devour also, much against his will and stomach.

'There I feel happier now!' quoth Wulf, at last. 'There is nothing to be done in this accursed place but to eat. I got no fighting or hunting. I hate women as they hate me. I don't know anything, indeed, that I don't hit except eating and singing. And now, what with those girls' vile minims and flutes, no idle ears to listen to a true rattling war-song. There they are at it now, with their cat-mewing, squealing all together like a set of stallions on a foggy morning! We'll have a song too, to drown the noise.' And he burst out with a wild rich melody, acting, in his mouth gestures and a suppressed tone of voice, the sense which the words denoted—

An elk looked out of the pine forest,
He snuffed up east, he snuffed down west,
Stealthily and still.

Hestmate and his horns were heavy with snow,
I laid my arrow across my bow,
Stealthily and still.

And then quickening his voice, as his whole face blazed up into fierce excitement—

The bow it rattled, the arrow flew,
It smote his black bones through and through,
Hurrah!

I sprang at his throat like a wolf of the wood,
And I warmed my hands in the smoking blood, Hurrah!

And with a shout that echoed and rang from wall to wall, and pealed away above the roofs, he leapt to his feet with a gesture and look of savage frenzy which made Philammon recoil. But the passion was gone in an instant, and Wulf sat down again chuckling to himself.

'There—that is something like a warrior's song. That makes the ~~old~~ blood spin along again! But this debauching furnace of a climate! no man can keep his muscles, or his courage, or his money, or anything else in it. May the gods curse the day when first I saw it.'

Philammon said nothing, but sat utterly rigid at an outbreak so unlike Wulf's usual quiet reserve and stately self-restraint, and shuddering at the thought that it might be an instance of that demonic possession to which the barbarians were supposed by Christians and by Neo-Platonists to be peculiarly subject. But the horror was not yet at its height, for in another minute the doors of the women's court flew open, and, attracted by Wulf's shout, out poured the whole Bacchanalian crew, with Orontes, crowned with flowers, and led by the Amal and Pelagia, rushing in the midst, wine-cup in hand.

'There is my philosopher, my preserver, my patron saint!' hiccupped he. 'Bring him to my arms, that I may encircle his lovely neck with pearls of India, and barbaric gold.'

'For God's sake let me escape,' whispered he to Wulf, as the rout rushed upon him. Wulf opened the door in an instant, and he dashed through it. As he went, the old man held out his hand—

'Come and see me again, boy! Me only. The old warrior will not hurt you.'

There was a kindly tone in the voice, a kindly light in the eye, which made Philammon promise to obey. He glanced one look back through the gateway as he fled, and just saw a wild whirl of Goths and girls, spinning madly round the court in the world-old Tenton waltz, while, high above their heads, in the uplifted arms of the mighty Amal, was tossing the beautiful figure of Pelagia, tearing the garland from her floating hair to fling the dancers with its ruses. And that night he his sister! He hid his face and fled, and the gate shut out the revellers from his eyes, and it is high time that it should shut them out from ours also.

Soon four hours more had passed. The revellers were sleeping off their wine, and the moon shone bright and cold across the court, when Wulf came out, carrying a heavy jar of wine, followed by Sind, a goblet in each hand.

'Here, comrade, out into the middle, to catch a breath of night-air. Are all the fools asleep?'

'Every mother's son of them. Ah! this is refreshing after that room. What a pity it is that all men are not born with heads like ours!'

'Very sad indeed,' said Wulf, filling his goblet.

'What a quantity of pleasure they lose in this life! There they are, snoring like hogs. Now, you and I are good to finish this jar, at least.'

'And another after it, if our talk is not over by that time.'

'Why, are you going to hold a council of war?'

'That is as you take it. Now, look here, Sind. Whomsoever I cannot trust, I suppose I may trust you, eh?'

'Well,' quoth Sind sulkily, putting down his goblet, 'that is a strange question to ask of a man who has marched, and hungered, and plundered, and conquered, and been well beaten by your side for five-and-twenty years, through all lands between the Wesel and Alexandria.'

'I am growing old, I suppose, and so I suspect every one. But taken to me, for between wine and all temper out it must come. You saw that Ahuna-woman?'

'Of course.'

'Well?'

'Well?'

'Why, did not you think she would make a wife for my son?'

'Well?'

'And why not for our Amal?'

'That's his concern as well as hers, and hers as well as ours.'

'She ought she not to think herself only too much honoured by marrying a son of Odin? Is she going to be more dainty than Placidia?'

'What was good enough for an emperor's daughter must be good enough for her.'

'Good enough? And Adolf only a Bili, while Amal is a full-blooded Amal—Odin's son by both sides?'

'I don't know whether she would understand that.'

'Then we would make her. Why not carry her off, and marry her to the Amal whether she chose or not? She would be well content enough with him in a wick, I will warrant.'

'But there is Pelagia in the way.'

'Put her out of the way, then.'

'Impossible.'

'It was this morning a week hence it may not be. I heard a promise made to night which will do it, if there be the spirit of a Goth left in the poor besotted lad whom we know of.'

'Oh, he is all right at heart, never fear him. But what was the promise?'

'I will not tell till it is claimed. I will not be the man to shame my own nation and the blood of the gods. But if that drunken Praetor recollects it—why let him recollect it. And what is more, the monk boy who was here to-night—'

'Ah, what a well-grown lad that is wasted!'

'More than suspects—and it is his story is true, I more than suspect too—that Pelagia is his sister.'

'His sister! But what of that?'

'He wants, of course, to carry her off and make a nun of her.'

'You would not let him do such a thing to the poor child?'

'If folks get in my way, Smid, they must go down. So much the worse for them! but old Wulf was never turned back yet by man or beast, and he will not be now.'

'After all, it will serve the hussy right. But Amalric?'

'Out of sight, out of mind.'

'But they say the prefect means to marry the girl.'

'He? That scented ape? She would not be such a wretch.'

'But he does intend, and she intends too. It is the talk of the whole town. We should have to put him out of the way first.'

'Why not? Easy enough, and a good rid-dance for Alexandria. Yet if we made away with him we should be forced to take the city too, and I doubt whether we have hands enough for that.'

'The guards might join us. I will go down to the barracks and try them, if you choose, to-morrow. I am a boon-companion with a good many of them already. But after all, Prince Wulf—of course you are always right, we all know that—but what's the use of marrying this Hypatia to the Amal?'

'Use?' said Wulf, smiting down his goblet on the pavement. 'Use? you jaubind old hamster-rit, who think of nothing but filling your own cheek-pouches—to give him a wife worthy of a hero, as he is, in spite of all—a wife who will make him sober instead of drunk, wise instead of a fool, daring instead of a sluggard—a wife who can command the rich people for us, and give us a hold here, which if once we get, let us see who will break it! Why, with those two ruling in Alexandria, we might be masters of Africa in three months. We'd sail to Spain for the Wendels, to move on Carthage, we'd send up the Adriatic for the Longbeards to land in Pentapolis, we'd sweep the whole coast without losing a man, now it is drained of troops by that fool Heraclian's Roman expedition, make the Wendels and Longbeards shake hands here in Alexandria, draw lots for their shares of the coast, and then—'

'And then what?'

'Why, when we had settled Africa, I would call out a crew of picked heroes, and sail away south for Asgard—I'd try that Red Sea this time—and see Odin face to face, or the searching for him.'

'Oh!' groaned Smid. 'And I suppose you would expect me to come too, instead of letting me stop halfway, and settle there among the dragons and elephants. Well, well, wise men are like moorlands—ride as far as you will on the sound ground, you are sure to come upon a soft place at last. However, I will go down to the guards to-morrow, if my head don't ache.'

'And I will see the boy about Pelagia. Drink to our plot!'

And the two old iron-heads drank on, till the stars paled out and the eastward shadows of the cloister vanished in the blaze of dawn.

CHAPTER XIX

JEWS AGAINST CHRISTIANS

THE little porter, after having carried Arsenius's message to Miriam, had run back in search of Philammon and his foster-father, and not finding them, had spent the evening in such frantic rushings to and fro, as produced great doubts of his sanity among the people of the quarter. At last hunger sent him home to supper, at which meal he tried to find vent for his excited feelings in his favourite employment of beating his wife. Whereon Miriam's two Syrian slave-girls, attracted by her screams, came to the rescue, threw a pail of water over him, and turned him out of doors. He, nothing daunted, likened himself smilingly to Socrates conquered by Xanthippe, and, philosophically yielding to circumstances, hopped about like a tame magpie for a couple of hours at the entrance of the alley, pouring forth a stream of light railery on the passers-by, which several times endangered his personal safety, till at last Philammon, hurrying breathlessly home, rushed into his arms.

'Hush! Hither with me! Your star still prospers. She calls for you.'

'Who?'

'Miriam herself. Be secret as the grave. You she will see and speak with. The message of Arsenius she rejected in language which it is unnecessary for philosophic lips to repeat. Come, but give her good words—as are fit to an enchantress who can stay the stars in their courses, and command the spirits of the third heaven.'

Philammon hurried home with Eudamon. Little cared he now for Hypatia's warning against Miriam. Was he not in search of a sister?

'So, you wretch, you are back again!' cried one of the girls, as they knocked at the outer door of Miriam's apartments. 'What do you mean by bringing young men here at this time of night?'

'Better go down, and beg pardon of that poor wife of yours. She has been weeping and praying for you to her crucifix all the evening, you ungrateful little ape!'

'Female superstitions—but, I forgive her. . . . Peace, barbarian women! I bring this youthful philosopher hither by your mistress's own appointment.'

'He must wait, then, in the ante-room. There is a gentleman with my mistress at present.'

So Philammon waited in a dark, dingy ante-room, luxuriously furnished with faded tapestry, and divans which lined the walls; and fretted and fidgeted, while the two girls watched him over their embroidery out of the corners of their eyes, and agreed that he was a very stupid person for showing no inclination to return their languishing glances.

In the meanwhile, Miriam, within, was listening, with a smile of grim delight, to a swarthy and weather-beaten young Jew.

'I knew, mother in Israel, that all depended on my pace, and night and day I rode from Ostia toward Tarentum, but the messenger of the unencumbered was better mounted than I, I therefore bribed a certain slave to lame his horse, and passed him by a whole stage on the second day. Nevertheless, by night the Philistine had caught me up again, the evil angels helping him, and my soul was mad within me.'

'And what then, Jonathan Bar-Zabudah?'

'I bethought me of Ehud, and of Joah also, when he was pursued by Asahel, and considered much of the lawfulness of the deed, not being a man of blood. Nevertheless, we were together in the darkness, and I smote him.'

Miriam clapped her hands.

'Then putting on his clothes, and taking his letters and credentials, as was but reasonable, I passed myself off for the messenger of the emperor, and so rode the rest of that journey at the expense of the heathen, and I hereby return you the balance saved.'

'Never mind the balance. Keep it, thou worthy son of Jacob. What next?'

'When I came to Tarentum, I sailed in the galley which I had chartered from certain sea robbers. Valiant men they were, nevertheless, and kept true faith with me. For when we had come halfway, rowing with all our might, behold another galley coming in our wake and about to pass us by, which I knew for an Alexandrian, as did the captain also, who assured me that she had come from hence to Brundisium with letters from Orestes.'

'Well?'

'It seemed to me both base to be passed, and more base to waste all the expense wherewith you and our elders had charged themselves, so I took counsel with the man of blood, offering him over and above our bargain, two hundred gold pieces of my own, which please to pay to my account with Rabbi Ezekiel, who lives by the watergate in Pelusium. Thru the pirates, taking counsel, agreed to run down the enemy, for our galley was a sharp-beaked Liburnian, while theirs was only a messenger trireme.'

'And you did it?'

'Else had I not been here. They were delivered into our hands, so that we struck them full in mid-length, and they sank like Pharaoh and his host.'

'So perish all the enemies of the nation,' cried Miriam. 'And now it is impossible, you say, for fresh news to arrive for these ten days?'

'Impossible, the captain assured me, owing to the rising of the wind, and the signs of southerly storm.'

'Here, take this letter for the Chief Rabbi, and the blessing of a mother in Israel. Thou hast played the man for thy people, and thou shalt go to the grave full of years and honours, with men-servants and maid-servants, gold and silver, children and children's children, with thy foot on the necks of heathens, and the blessing of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to eat of the goose which is fattening in the desert, and the Leviathan which beth in the great sea, to be meat for all true Israelites at the last day.'

And the Jew turned and went out, perhaps, in his simple fanaticism, the happiest man in Egypt at that moment.

He passed out through the ante-chamber, leering at the slave-girls, and scowling at Philammon; and the youth was ushered into the presence of Miriam.

She sat, coiled up like a snake on a divan writing busily in a tablet upon her knees, while on the cushions beside her glittered splendid jewels, which she had been fidgeting over as a child might its toys. She did not look up for a few minutes, and Philammon could not help, in spite of his impatience, looking round the little room and contrasting its dirty splendour, and heavy odour of wine, and food, and perfumes, with the sunny grace and cleanliness of Greek houses. Against the wall stood presses and chests fretted with fantastic Oriental carving, illuminated rolls of parchment lay in heaps in a corner, a lamp of strange form hung from the ceiling, and shed a dim and hazy light upon an object which chilled the youth's blood for a moment—a bracket against the wall, on which, in a plate of gold engraved with mystic signs, stood the mummy of an infant's head, one of those scaphim, from which, as Philammon knew, the sorcerers of the East professed to evoke marvellous responses.

At last she looked up, and spoke in a shrill, harsh voice.

'Well, my fair boy, and what do you want with the poor old proscribed Jewess? Have you coveted yet any of the pretty things which she has had the wit to make her slave demons save from the Christian robbers?'

Philammon's tale was soon told. The old woman listened, watching him intently with her burning eye, and then answered slowly—

'Well, and what if you are a slave?'

'Am I one, then? Am I?'

'Of course you are. Arsenius spoke truth. I saw him buy you at Ravenna, just fifteen years ago. I bought your sister at the same time. She is two-and-twenty now. You were four years younger than her, I should say.'

'Oh heavens! and you know my sister still? Is she Pelagia?'

'You were a pretty boy,' went on the hag, apparently not hearing him. 'If I had thought you were going to grow up as beautiful and as clever as you are, I would have bought you myself. The Goths were just marching, and Arsenius gave only eighteen gold pieces for you—or twenty. I am growing old, and forget everything, I think. But there would have been the expense of your education, and your sister cost me in training—oh what sums? Not that she was not worth the money—no, no, the darling!'

'And you know where she is? Oh tell me—in the name of mercy tell me!'

'Why, then?'

'Why, then? Have you not the heart of a human being in you? Is she not my sister?'

'Well? You have done very well for fifteen years without your sister—why can you not do as well now? You don't recollect her—you don't love her?'

'Not love her? I would die for her—die for you if you will but help me to see her!'

'You would, would you? And if I brought you to her, what then? What if she were Pelagia herself, what then? She is happy enough now, and rich enough. Could you make her happier or richer?'

Can you ask? I must—I will reclaim her from the infamy in which I am sure she lives.'

'Ah ha, sir monk! I expected as much. I know, none knows better, what those fine words mean. The burnt child dreads the fire, but the burnt old woman quenches it, you will find. Now listen. I do not say that ~~you~~ shall not see her. I do not say that Pelagia herself is not the woman whom you seek—but—you are in my power. Don't frown and pout. I can deliver you as a slave to Aisenius when I choose. One word from me to Orestes, and you are in fetters as a fugitive.'

'I will escape,' cried he fiercely.

'Escape me?' She laughed, pointing to the tower. 'Me, who, if you fled beyond Kit on dived to the depths of the ocean, could make those dead lips confess where you were, and command demons to bear you back to me upon their wings? Escape me? Better to obey me, and see your sister.'

Philammon shuddered, and submitted. 'The spell of the woman's eye, the terror of her words, which he half believed, and the agony of longing, conquered him, and he gasped out—'

'I will obey you—only—only—'

'Only you are not quite a man yet but half a monk still, eh? I must know that before I help you, my pretty boy. Are you a monk still or a man?'

'What do you mean?'

'Ah, ha, ha!' laughed she shrilly. 'And these Christian dogs don't know what a man means? Are you a monk, then? leaving the man alone, as above your understanding?'

'I—I am a student of philosophy.'

'But no man?'

'I am a man, I suppose.'

'I don't, if you had been, you would have been making love like a man to that heathen woman many a month ago.'

'I—to her?'

'Yes, I—to her!' said Miriam, coarsely imitating his tone of shocked humility. 'I, the poor penniless boy-scholar, to her, the great, rich, wise, worshipped she-philosopher, who holds the sacred keys of the inner shrine of the east wind—and just because I am a man, and the handsomest man in Alexandria, and she a woman, and the varnest woman in Alexandria, and therefore I am stronger than she, and can twist her round my finger, and bring her to her knees at my feet when I like, as soon I open my eyes, and discover that I am a man. Eh, boy? Did she ever teach you that among her mathematics and metaphysics, and goddess and goddesses?'

Philammon stood blushing scarlet. The sweet poison had entered, and every vein glowed with it for the first time in his life. Miriam saw her advantage.

'There, there, don't be frightened at your new lesson. After all, I liked you from the first moment I saw you, and asked the truth about you, and I got an answer—such an answer! You shall know it some day. At all events, it set the poor old soft-hearted Jewess on throwing away her money. Did you ever guess from whom your monthly gold piece came?'

Philammon stifled, and Miriam burst into loud, shrill laughter.

'From Hypatia? I'll warrant! From the fine Greek woman of course. You shall find that you are never thinking of the poor old Jewess.'

'And did you? did you?' gasped Philammon.

'Have I to thank you, then, for that strange necessity?'

'Not to thank me, but to obey me, for mind, I can prove your debt to me, every shill, and claim it if I choose. But don't ban. I won't be hard on you, just because you are in my power. I hate every one who is not so. As soon as I have a hold on them, I begin to love them. Old folks like children, are fond of their own playthings.'

And I am yours, then?' said Philammon weakly.

'You are indeed, my beautiful boy,' answered she, looking up with so insinuating a smile that he could not be angry. 'After all, I know how to toss my balls gently—and for these forty years I have only lived to make young folks happy, so you need not be afraid of the poor soft-hearted old woman. Now you saved Orestes's life yesterday.'

'How did you find out that?'

'I? I know everything. I know what the swallows say when they pass each other on the wing, and what the fishes think of in the summer sea. You, too, will be able to guess some day, without the tripod's help. But in the meantime you must enter Orestes's service. Why?—What are you hesitating about? Do you not know that you are high in his favour? He will make you secretary, raise you to be chamberlain some day, if you know how to make good use of your talent.'

Philammon stood in astonished silence, and at last 'Servant to that man? What care I for him in his honours? Why do you tantalise me thus? I have no wish on earth but to see my sister.'

'You will be far more likely to see her if you belong to the court of a great officer—perhaps more than an officer—than if you remain a penniless monk. Not that I believe you. You only wish on earth, eh? Do you not care, then, over to see the fair Hypatia again?'

'I? Why should I not see her? Am I not her pupil?'

'She will not have pupils much longer, my child. If you wish to hear her wisdom—and much good may it do you—you must go for it henceforth somewhat nearer, to Orestes's palace than the lecture-room is. And you start. Have I found you an argument now? No—ask no questions. I explain nothing to monks. But take these letters, to-morrow morning at the third hour go to Orestes's palace, and ask for his secretary, P than the Chidder. Say boldly that you bring important news of state, and then follow your star—it is a fairer one than you fancy. Go! obey me, or you see no sister.'

Philostratus felt himself trapped, but, after all, what might not this strange woman do for him? It seemed, if not his only path, still his nearest path to Pelagia, and in the meanwhile he was in the hog's power, so he must submit to his fate, so he took the letters and went out.

'And so you think that you are going to have her?' chuckled Minus to himself, when Philostratus went out. 'To make a point of her, eh? a nun, or a she hermit, to set her to oppose your God by crowding on all points among the nuns for twenty years, with a chain round her neck and a bag of her milk, turning herself all the while the brute of the Nazarene? And you think that old Minus is going to give her up to you for this? No, no, sir monk! Better she were dead! Follow your duny, but—follow it, is the donkey does the grass which his driver offers him, always an inch from his nose. You in my power! and Orestes in my power! I must negotiate that new loan to-morrow, I suppose. I shall never be paid. The dog will turn me, after all! How much is it, now? Let me see.' And she began humming in her ear more, over lands and notes of hand. 'I shall never be paid, but power—oh, power! To see those heathen slaves and Christian hounds plotting and quarrelling, and fancying themselves the masters of the world, and never dreaming that we are pulling the strings, and that they are our puppets! We, the children of the promises—'we, The Nation—we, the seed of Abraham! Poor fools! I could almost pity them, as I think of their times when Messiah came, and they had out who were the true lords of the world, after all! He must be the Emperor of the South, though, that Orestes, he must, though I have to lend him Raphael's jewels to make him so. For he must marry the Greek woman. He shall. She hates him, of course. So much the deeper revenge for me. And she loves that monk. I saw it in her eyes there in the garden. So much the better for my, too. He will dangle willingly enough at Orestes's heels for the sake of being near her—poor fool! We will make him secretary, or chamberlain. He is wit enough for it, they say, or for anything. So Orestes and he shall be the two jaws of my pincers, to squeeze what I want out of that Greek Jezebel.

And then, then for the black agate!'

Was the end of her speech a bathos? Perhaps not, for as she spoke the last word, she drew from her bosom, where it hung round her neck by a chain, a broken talisman, exactly similar to the one which she coveted so fiercely, and looked at it long and lovingly. Kissed it—wep over it—spoke to it—fooded it in her arms as a mother would a child—murmured over it smatches of lullabies, and her grim, withered features grew softer, purer, grainer, and rose cannibled, for a moment, to their long lost might have been, to that personal ideal which every soul brings with it into the world, which shines, dim and potential, in the face of every sleeping babe, before it has been scarred, and distorted, and entrusted in the long tragedy of life. Soberly she was, ponder, and slave dealer, stepped to the lips in falsehood, treachery, and variance, yet that paltry stone brought home to her some thought, true, spiritual, unpalpable, unmeasurable, before which all her treasures and all her ambition were as worthless in her own eyes as they were in the eyes of the angels of God.

But little did Minus think that at the same moment a heavy, clownish monk was standing in Cyril's private chamber, and, indulged with the special honour of a cup of good wine in the patriarch's very presence, was telling to him and Arsennus the following history.

'So I, finding that the laws had chartered this private snip, went to the master thereof, and finding favour in his eyes hired myself to teach him, being sure, from what I had overheard from the Jews, that she was destined to bring the news to Alexandria as quickly as possible. Therefore fulfilling the work which his Holiness had entrusted to my incapacity, I endeavoured, and toiled continually among the Jews, and being muckilled in such libelous received many curses and stripes in the course of the church, the which I must now add to my account hereafter. Moreover, Satan entered into me, desiring to slay me, and almost tore me asunder, so that I vomited much and belched all manner of mud. Nevertheless, I toiled on valiantly, being such as I am vomiting continually, till the heathens were moved with wonder, and forbore to beat me, giving me strong liquors in pity. Whetore I rowed all the more valiantly day and night, trusting that by my unworthiness the cause of the Catholic Church might be in some slight wise assisted.'

'And so it is, quoth Cyril. 'Why do you not sit down, man?'

'Pardon me,' quoth the monk, with a piteous gesture, 'of sitting as of all carnal pleasure, cometh satiety at the last.'

'And now,' said Cyril, 'what reward am I to give you for your good service?'

'It is reward enough to know that I have done good service. Nevertheless if the holy patriarch be so inclined without reason, there is an ancient Christian, my mother according to the flesh——'

'Come to me to-morrow, and she shall be well seen to. And mind—look to it, if I make you not a deacon of the city when I promote Peter.'

The monk kissed his superior's hand and withdrew. Cyril turned to Argemius, betrayed for once into gentility by his delight, and smiting his thigh—

'We have beaten the heathen for once, eh?' And then, in the usual artificial tone of an ecclesiastic—'And what would my father recommend in furtherance of the advantage so mercifully thrown into our hand?'

Argemius was silent.

'I,' went on Cyril, 'should be inclined to announce the news this very night, in my sermon.'

Argemius shook his head.

'Why not? why not?' asked Cyril impatiently.

'Better to keep it secret till others tell it. Reserved knowledge is always reserved strength, and if the man, as I hope he does, not, intends evil to the Church, let him commit himself before you use your knowledge against him. True, you may have a scruple of conscience as to the lawfulness of allowing a sin which you might prevent. To me it seems that the sin lies in the will rather than in the deed, and that sometimes—I only say sometimes—it may be a means of saving the sinner to allow his root of iniquity to bear fruit, and fill him with his own devices.'

'Dangerous doctrine, my father.'

'Take all sound doctrine—a saviour of life or of death, according as it is received. I have not said it to the multitude, but to a discerning brother. And even politically speaking let him commit himself, if he be really plotting rebellion, and then speak, and smite his Babel tower.'

'You think, then, that he does not know of Herachian's detestable deed?'

'If he does, he will keep it secret from the people, and our chances of turning them suddenly will be nearly the same.'

'Good. After all, the existence of the Catholic Church in Alexandria depends on this struggle, and it is well to be wary. Be it so. It is well for me that I have you for an adviser.'

And thus Cyril, usually the most impatient and intractable of plotters, gave in, as wise men should, to a wiser man than himself, and made up his mind to keep the secret, and to command the monk to keep it also.

Philammon, after a sleepless night, and a welcome visit to the public baths, which the Roman tyranny, wiser in its generation than modern liberty, provided so liberally for its victims, set forth to the Prefect's palace, and gave his message, but Orestes, who had been of late astonishing the Alexandrian public by an unwonted display of alacrity, was already in the adjoining Basilica. Thither the youth was conducted by an attendant, and led up the centre of the enormous hall, gorgeous with frescoes and coloured marbles, and surrounded by aisles and galleries, in which the inferior magistrates were hearing causes, and doing such justice as the complicated technicalities of Roman law chose to mete out. Through a crowd of anxious loungers the youth passed to the apex of the upper end, to which the Prefect's throne stood empty, and then turned into a side chamber, where he found himself alone with the secretary, a portly Claudius emmich, with a sleek pale face, small pug's eyes, and an enormous turban. The man of pen and paper took the letter, opened it with solemn deliberation, and then, springing to his feet, darted out of the room in most undignified haste, leaving Philammon to wait and wonder. In half an hour he returned, his little eyes growing big with some great idea.

'Youth! your star is in the ascendant, you are the fortunate bearer of fortunate news! His Excellency himself commands your presence. And the two went on.'

In another chamber, the door of which was guarded by armed men, Orestes was walking up and down in high excitement, looking somewhat the worse for the events of the past night, and making occasional appeals to a gold goblet which stood on the table.

'Ha! No other than my preserver himself! Boy, I will make your fortune. Miriam says that you wish to enter my service.'

Philammon, not knowing what to say, thought the best answer would be to bow as low as he could.

'Ah, ha! Graceful, but not quite according to etiquette. You will soon teach him, eh, Secretary? Now to business. Hand me the notes to sign and seal. To the Prefect of the Stationeries—'

'Here, your Excellency.'

'To the Prefect of the Corn market—how many wheat ships have you ordered to be unladen?'

'Two, your Excellency.'

'Well, that will be large enough for the time being. To the Defender of the Plebs—the devil break his neck!'

'He may be trusted, most noble, he is intensely jealous of Cyril's influence. And moreover, he owes my insignificance much money.'

'Good! Now the notes to the Gaol-masters, about the gladiators.'

'Here, your Excellency.'

'To Hypatia. No! I will honour my bride elect with my own illustrious presence. As I live, here is a morning's work for a man with a racking headache!'

'Your Excellency has the strength of seven. May you live for ever!'

And really, Orestes's power of getting through business, when he chose, was surprising enough. A cold head and a colder heart make many things easy.

But Philammon's whole soul was fired on those words. 'His humble elect!'. Was it that Miriam's hints of the day before had raised some selfish vision, or was it pity and horror at such a fate for her—for his idol!—But he passed five minutes in a dream, from which he was awakened by the sound of another and still dearer name.

'And now, for Pelagia. We can but try.'

'Your Excellency might offend the Goth.'

'Curse the Goth! If he will have his choice of all the beauties in Alexandria, and be count of Pentapolis if he likes. But a spectacle I must have, and no one but Pelagia can dance Venus Anadyomene.'

Philammon's blood rushed to his heart, and then back again to his brow, as he reeled with horror and shame.

'The people will be mad with joy to see her on the stage once more. Little they thought, the brutes, how I was plotting for their amusement, even when as drunk as Silenus.'

'Your nobility only lives for the good of your slaves.'

'Here, boy! So fair a lady requires a fair messenger. You shall enter on my service at once, and carry this letter to Pelagia. Why—why do you not come and take it?'

'To Pelagia?' gasped the youth. 'In the theatre? Publicly? Venus Anadyomene?'

'Yes, fool! Were you, too, drunk last night after all?'

'She is my sister!'

'Well, and what of that? Not that I believe you, you villain! So!' said Orestes, who comprehended the matter in an instant. 'Appear here!'

The door opened, and the guard appeared.

'Here is a good boy who is inclined to make a fool of himself. Keep him out of harm's way for a few days. But don't hurt him, for, after all, he saved my life yesterday, when you would have run away.'

And, without further ado, the hapless youth was collared, and led down a vaulted passage into the guard room, amid the jeers of the guard, who seemed only to owe him a grudge by his yesterday's prowess, and showed great alarm in fitting him with a heavy set of manacles, which done, he was thrust head foremost into a cell of the prison, locked in, and left to his meditations.

CHAPTER XX

SHE STOOPS TO CONQUER

'Oh, fairest Hypatia, conceive yourself struck in the face by a great stone, several hundred howling wretches leaping up at you like wild beasts—two minutes more, and you are torn limb from limb. What would even you do in such a case?'

'Let them tear me limb from limb, and die as I have lived.'

'Ah, but—When it came to fact, and death was staring you in the face?'

HY.

'And why should man fear death?'

'Ahem! No, not death, of course, but the act of dying. That may be, surely, under such circumstances, to say the least, disagreeable. If our ideal, Julian the Great, found a little dissimulation necessary, and was even a better Christian than I have ever pretended to be, till he found himself able to throw off the mask, why should not I? Consider me as a lower being than yourself—one of the herd, if you will, but a penitent member thereof, who comes to make the fullest possible reparation by doing any desperate deed on which you may choose to put him, and prove myself as able and willing, if once I have the power, as Julian himself.'

Such was the conversation which passed between Hypatia and Orestes half an hour after Philammon had taken possession of his new abode.

Hypatia looked at the Prefect with calm purification, not unmixed with scorn and fear.

'And pray what has produced this sudden change in your Excellency's earnestness? For four months your promises have been lying fallow.' She did not confess how glad she would have been at heart to see them lying fallow still.

'Because—This morning I have news, which I tell to you the first as a complacent. We will take care that all Alexandria knows it before sundown. Heretician has conquered!'

'Conquered!' cried Hypatia, springing from her seat.

'Conquered, and utterly destroyed—the emperor's forces at Ostia. So says a messenger on whom I can depend. And even if the news should prove false, I can prevent the contrary report from spreading, or what is the use of being perfect? You demand? Do you not see that if we can keep the notion alive but a week our cause is won?'

'How so?'

'I have treated already with all the officers of the city, and every one of them has acted like a wise man, and given me a promise of help, conditional of course on Heretician's success, being as tired as I am of that priest-ridden court at Byzantium. Moreover, the stationaries are mine already. So are the soldiers all the way up the Nile. Ah! you have been fancying me idle for these four months, but—You forget that you yourself were the prize of my toil. Could I be a sluggard with that goal in sight?'

Hypatia shuddered, but was silent, and Orestes went on—

'I have laden several of the wheat ships for enormous cargoes of bread, though those rascally monks of Tiberne had nearly forestalled my benevolence, and I was forced to take a deacon or two, buy up the stock they had sent down, and retail it again as my own. It is really most officious of them to persist in feeding gratuitously half the poor of the city! What possible business have they with Alexandria?'

'The wish for popularity, I presume.'

H

'Just so, and then what hudd can the government have on a set of rogues whose stomachs are filled without our help?'

'Julian made the same complaint to the high priest of Galatia, in that priceless letter of his.'

'Ah, you will set that all right, you know, shortly. Then again, I do not fear Cyril's power just now. He has injured himself deeply, I am happy to say, in the opinion of the wealthy and educated, by expelling the Jews. And as for his mob, exactly at the right moment, the deities—there are no monks here, so I can attribute my blessings to the right source—have sent us such a boon as my putting them into as good a humour as we need.'

'And what is that?' asked Hypatia.

'A white elephant.'

'A white elephant?'

'Yes,' he answered, mistaking or ignoring the tone of her answer. 'A real, live, white elephant, a thing which has not been seen in Alexandria for a hundred years.' It was passing through with two tame tigers, as a present to the boy at Byzantium, from some red-winded knight of the Hyperborean Taprobane, or other no man's land in the far East. I took the liberty of lying an embargo on them, and after a little argumentation and a few hundred talents elephant and tigers are at our service.'

'And of what service are they to be?'

'My dearest madam—Conceive. How can we win the mob without a show?'

When were there more than two ways of gaining either the whole or part of the Roman Empire—by force of arms or force of timidity? Can even you invent a third? The former is unpleasantly existing, and hardly practicable just now. The latter remains, and, thanks to the white elephant, may be triumphantly successful. I have to exhibit something every week. The people are getting tired of that pantomime, and since the Jews were driven out, the fellow has grown stupid and lazy, having lost the more enthusiastic hall of his spectators. As for horse racing, they are sick of it. Now, suppose we announce, for the earliest possible day—a spectacle—such a spectacle as never was seen before in this generation. You and I, I as exhibitor, you as representative—for the time being only—of the Vestals of old—sit side by side.

Some worthy friend has his instructions, when the people are beside themselves with rapture, to cry, "Long live Orestes Caesar!"

Another reminds them of Heracleus's victory—another compares your name with mine the people applaud. Some Mark Antony steps forward, salutes me as Imperator, Augustus—what you will—the cry is taken up—I refuse as mockly as Julius Caesar himself—I am compelled, blushing, to accept the honour—I rise, make an oration about the future independence of the southern continent—union of Africa and Egypt—the empire no longer to be divided into Eastern and Western, but Northern and Southern. Shouts of applause, at two drachmas per man, shake the skies. Everybody believes that everybody else approves, and follows the lead. And the thing is won.'

'And pray,' asked Hypatia, crushing down her contempt and despair, 'how is this to bear on the worship of the gods?'

'Why?—why?—if you thought that people's minds were sufficiently prepared, you might rise in your turn, and make an oration—you can conceive one. Set forth how these spectacles, formerly the glory of the empire, had withered under Galilean superstition. Show the only path toward the full enjoyment of eye and ear was a frank return to those deities, from whose worship they originally sprang, and connected with which they could alone be enjoyed in their perfection.'

But I need not teach you how to do that which you have so often taught me. So now to consider our spectacle, which, next to the largess, is the most important part of our plans. I ought to have exhibited to them the monk who so nearly killed me yesterday. That would indeed have been a triumph of the laws over Christianity. He and the wild beasts might have given the people ten minutes' amusement. But wrath corrupted judgment, and the fellow has been crucified these two hours. Suppose, then, we had a little exhibition of gladiators. They are forbidden by law, certainly.

'Thank Heaven, they are.'

'But do you not see that is the very reason why we, to assert our own independence, should employ them?'

'No! they are gone. Let them never reappear to disgrace the earth.'

'My dear lady, you must not in your present character say that in public, lest Cyril should be importunate enough to remind you that Christian emperors and bishops put them down.'

Hypatia bit her lip, and was silent.

'Well, I do not wish to urge anything unpleasant to you. If we could but contrive a few martyrdoms! But I really fear we must wait a year or two longer, in the present state of public opinion, before we can attempt that.'

'Wait? wait for ever? Did not Julian and he must be our model—forbid the persecution of the Galileans, considering them sufficiently punished by their own atheism and self-tormenting superstition?'

Another small error of that great man. He should have remembered that for three hundred years nothing, not even the gladiators themselves, had been found to put the mob in such good humour as to see a few Christians, especially young and handsome women, burned alive, or thrown to the lions.'

Hypatia bit her lip once more. 'I can hear no more of this, sir. You forget that you are speaking to a woman.'

'Most supreme wisdom,' answered Orestes, in his blandest tone, 'you cannot suppose that I wish to pain your ears. But allow me to observe, as a general theorem, that if one wishes to effect any purpose, it is necessary to use the means, and on the whole, those which have been tested by four hundred years' experience will be the safest. I speak as a plain practical statesman—but surely your philosophy will not dissent!

Hypatia looked down in painful thought. What could she answer? Was it not too true? and had not Orestes fast and experienced on his side?

'Well, if you must, but I cannot have gladiators. Why not a—one of those battles with wild beasts? They are disgusting enough, but still they are less inhuman than the others, and you might surely take precautions to prevent the men being hurt.'

'Ah! that would indeed be a scentless rose! If there is neither danger nor bloodshed, the charm is gone. But really wild beasts are too expensive just now, and if I kill down my present menagerie, I can afford no more. Why not have something which costs no money, like prisoners?'

'What! do you rank human beings below brutes?'

'Heaven forbid! But they are practically less expensive. Remember, that without money we are powerless, we must husband our resources for the cause of the gods.'

Hypatia was silent.

'Now, there are fifty or sixty Libyan prisoners just brought in from the desert. Why not let them fight an equal number of soldiers? They are rebels to the empire, taken in war.'

'Ah, then,' said Hypatia, catching at any thread of self-justification, 'then lives are forfeit in any case.'

'Of course. So the Christians could not complain of us for that. Did not the most Christian Emperor Constantine set some three hundred German prisoners to butcher each other in the amphitheatre of Treves?'

'But they refused, and died like heroes, each falling on his own sword.'

'Ah! those Germans are always unmanageable. My guards, now, are just as stiff-necked. To tell you the truth, I have asked them already to exhibit their prowess on these Libyans, and what do you suppose they answered?'

'They refused, I hope.'

'They told me in the most insolent tone that they were men, and not stage-players, and hired to fight, and not to butcher. I expected a Socratic dialogue after such a display of dialectic, and bowed myself out.'

'They were right.'

'Not a doubt of it, from a philosophic point of view, from a practical one they were great pelants, and I an ill-used master. However, I can find unfortunate and misunderstood heroes enough in the prisons, who, for the chance of their liberty, will acquit themselves valiantly enough; and I know of a few old gladiators still lingering about the wire-shops, who will be proud enough to give them a week's training. So that may pass. Now for some lighter species of representation to follow—something more or less dramatic.'

'You forget that you speak to one who trusts to be, as soon as she has the power, the high-priestess of Athens, and who in the meanwhile is bound to obey her tutor Julian's commands to the priests of his day, and imitate the Galileans as much in their abhorrence for the theatre as she hopes hereafter to do in their care for the widow and the stranger.'

'Far be it from me to impugn that great man's wisdom. But allow me to remark, that to judge by the present state of the empire, one has a right to say that he failed.'

'The Sun-God whom he loved took him to himself, too early, by a hero's death.'

'And the monument he was removed, the wave of Christian barbarism rolled back again into its old channel.'

'Ah! had he but lived twenty years longer!'

'The Sun-God, perhaps, was not so solicitous as we are for the success of his high-priest's project.'

Hypatia reddened—was Orestes, after all, laughing in his sleeve at her and her hopes?

'Do not blaspheme!' she said solemnly.

'Heaven send! I only offer one possible explanation of a plain fact. The other is, that as Julian was not going quite the right way to work to restore the worship of the Olympians, the Sun-God found it expedient to withdraw him from his post, and now sits in his place Hypatia the philosopher, who will be wise enough to avoid Julian's error, and not copy the Galileans too closely, by imitating a severity of morals at which they are the only true and natural adepts.'

'So Julian's error was that of being too virtuous? If it be so, let me copy him, and fail like him. The fault will then not be mine, but fate's.'

'Not in being too virtuous himself, nor at needless likeness of Athens, but in trying to make others so. He forgot one half of Juvenal's great dictum about "Panem et Circenses" as the absolute and overruling necessities of rulers. He tried to give the people the bread without the games. And what thanks he received for his enormous munificence, let himself and the good folks of Antioch tell—you just quoted his Misopogon—'

'Ay—the lament of a man too pure for his age.'

'Exactly so. He should rather have been content to keep his purity to himself, and have gone to Antioch not merely as a philosophic high priest, with a beard of questionable whiteness, to offer sacrifices to a god in whom—forgive me—nobody in Antioch had believed for many a year. If he had made his entrance with ten thousand gladiators, and an white elephant, lent a theatre of ivory and glass in Daphnia, and proclaimed games in honour of the Sun, or of any other member of the Pantheon—'

'He would have acted unworthily of a philosopher.'

'But instead of that one priest dragging up, poor devil, through the wet grass to the deserted altar with his solitary goose under his arm, I o would have had every goose in Antioch—forgive me stealing a pun from Aristodanus—running open-mouthed to worship any god, known or unknown—and to see the sights.

'Well,' said Hypatia, yielding perforce to Orestes's cutting arguments. 'Let us then restore the ancient glories of the Greek drama—let us give them a trilogy of Æschylus or Sophocles.'

'Too calm, my dear madam. The Eumenides might do certainly, or Philoctetes, if we could but put Philoctetes to real pain, and make the spectators sure that he was yelling in good earnest.'

'Disgusting!'

'But necessary, like many disgusting things.'

'Why not try the Prometheus?'

'A magnificent field for stage effect, certainly. What with those ocean nymphs in their winged chariot, and Ocean on his griffin. But I should hardly think it safe to reintroduce Zeus and Hermes to the people under the somewhat ugly light in which Æschylus exhibits them.'

'I forgot that,' said Hypatia. 'As Orestes's trilogy will be best, after all.'

'Best? perfect—divine! Ah, that it were to be my fate to go down to posterity as the happy man who once more revived Æschylus's masterpieces on a Hecatan stage! But—Is there not, begging the pardon of the great tragedian, too much reserve in the Agamemnon for our modern taste?—if we could have the birth scene represented on the stage, and an Agamemnon who could be really killed—though I would not insist on that, because a good actor might make it a reason for refusing the part—but still the murder ought to take place in public.'

'Shocking! an outrage on all the laws of the drama. Does not even the Roman Horæ lay down as a rule this—Ver pugna coram populo Mædæ trucidat?'

'Fairest and wisest, I am as willing a pupil of the dear old Æquean as any man living—even to the furnishing of my chamber, of which fact the Empress of Africa may some day assume herself. But we are not now discussing the art of poetry, but the art of reigning, and, after all, while Horæ was sitting in his easy chair, giving his countrymen good advice, a parvenu, who knew somewhat better than his whit teeth admitted, was exulting forty thousand gladiators at his mother's funeral.'

'But the canon has its foundation in the eternal laws of beauty. It has been accepted and observed.'

'Not by the people for whom it was written. The learned Hypatia has surely not forgotten, that within sixty years after the Art Poetica was written, Annaus Seneca, or whosoever wrote that very bad tragedy called the Mædæ, found it so necessary that she should, in despite of Horæ, kill her children before the people, that he actually made her do it!'

Hypatia was still silent—foiled at every point, while Orestes ran on with provoking glibness.

'And consider, too, even if we dare alter

Æschylus a little, we could find no one to act him.'

'Ah, true! fallen, fallen days!'

'And really, after all, omitting the questionable compliment to me, as candidate for a certain dignity, of having my namesake kill his mother, and then be hunted over the stage by furies—'

'But Apollo vindicates and punishes him at last. What a noble occasion that last scene would give for winning them back to their old gods for the good!'

'True, but at present the majority of spectators will believe more strongly in the horrors of matricide and incest than in Apollo's power to dispense therewith. So that I fear must be one of your labours of the future.'

'And it shall be,' said Hypatia. But she did not speak cheerfully.

'Do you not think, moreover,' went on the tempter, 'that those old tragedies might give somewhat too gloomy a notion of those deities whom we wish to reintroduce—I beg pardon, to honour? The history of the house of Athens is hardly more cheerful, in spite of its beauty, than one of Cyril's sermons on the day of judgment, and the Pantans prepared for happier rich people.'

'Well,' said Hypatia, more and more listlessly, 'it might be more prudent to show them just the finer and more grateful side of the old Myths. Certainly the great age of Athenian tragedy had its playful reverse in the old comedy.'

'And in certain Dionysæ sports and processions which—' '—in order to awaken a proper devotion for the gods in those who might not be able to appreciate Æschylus and Sophocles.'

'You would not introduce them?'

'I have feared to—give us but a substitute for them as we can.'

'And are we to degrade ourselves because the masses are degraded?'

'Not in the least. For my own part, the whole business, like the catering for the weekly pantomimes, is as good a bore to me as it could have been to Julian himself. But, my dearest madam—"Pantom and Circuses" they must be put into good humour, and there is but one way—by "the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eye, and the pride of life," as a certain Christian correctly defines the time-honoured Roman method.'

'Put them into good humour? I wish to frustrate them wretch for the service of the god. If we must have comic representations, we can only have them conjoined to tragedy, which, as Aristotle defines it, will justify their allusions by pity and terror.'

Orestes smiled.

'I certainly can have no objection to so good a purpose. But do you not think that the battle between the gladiators and the Lalæ will have done that sufficiently beforehand? I can conceive nothing more fit for that end, unless it be Nero's method of scolding his guards among the spectators themselves, and throwing them down to the wild beasts in the arena. How thoroughly punished by pity and terror must every worthy shopkeeper have been, when he sat musing whether he might not follow his fat wife into the claws of the nearest lion!

'You are pleased to be?' 'My, sir,' said Hypatia, hardly able to conceal her disgust.

'My dearest bride elect, I only meant the most harmless of reductioes ad absurdum of an abstract canon of Aristotle, with which I, who am a Platonist after my mistress's model, do not happen to agree. But do, I beseech you, I implore, not by me, but by your own wisdom. You cannot bring the people to appreciate your designs at the first sight. You are too wise, too pure, too lofty, too far-sighted for them. And therefore you must get power to compel them to listen, after all, found it necessary to compel it he had lived seven years more he would have found it necessary to persecute.'

'The gods forbid that! that such a necessity should ever arise here!'

'The only way to ward it, believe me, is to diminish its tendency. After all, it is too then good.'

'True,' sighed Hypatia. 'Have your way, sir.'

'Believe me, you shall have yours in turn. I ask you to be ruled by me now, only that you may be in a position to rule me and Africa hereafter.'

'And such an Africa! Well, if they be born low and earthly, they must, I suppose, be treated as such, and the fault of such a necessity is Nature's, and not ours. Yet it is most degrading!—But still, if the only method by which the philosophic few can assume their rights, is the divinely appointed rulers of the world is by indulging those lower beings whom they govern for their good—why be it so? It is no worse necessary than many another which the servant of the gods must endure in days like these.'

'Ah,' said Orestes, refusing to hear the sigh, or to see the bitterness of the lip which welcomed the speech—now Hypatia is herself again, and my counsellor, and giver of deep and celestial reasons for all things it which poor I can only snatch and guess by vulgar cunning. So now for our lighter entertainment. What shall it be?'

'What you will, provided it be not, as most sad are, unfit for the eyes of modest women. I have no skill in catering for folly.'

'A pantomime, then? We may make that as grand and as significant as we will, and expend too on it all our treasures in the way of gawds and wild beasts.'

'As you like.'

'Just consider, too, what a scope for mythologic learning a pantomime affords. Why not have a triumph of some deity? Could I commit myself more boldly to the service of the gods! Now—who shall it be?'

'Pallas—unless, as I suppose, she is too modest and too sober for your Alexandrians?'

'Yes—it does not seem to me that she would be appreciated—it all events for the present. Why not try Aphrodite? Christians as well as Pagans will thoroughly understand her, and I know no one who would not degrade the virgin goddess by representing her, except a certain lady, who has already, I hope, consented to sit in that very character, by the side of her too much honoured slave, and one Pills is enough at a time in any theatre.'

Hypatia shuddered. He took it all for granted, 'then—and claimed her conditional promise to the uttermost. Was there no escape? She begged to spring up and rush away, into the streets, into the desert—anything to break the hideous net which she had wound around herself. And yet—was it not the cause of the gods—the one object of her? And after all, it be the intent was to be her emperor, she at least was to be an empress—and do what she would—and half in money, and half in the attempt to land herself perfectly into that which she knew that she must go through, and forget herself in activity, she answered cheerfully as she could.

'Then, my goddess, thou must wait the pleasure of these base ones.' At least the young Apollo will have them as even for them.'

'Ah, but who will represent him? This puny generation does not produce such lights as Pyllades and Bathyllus—except among the Goths. Besides, Apollo must have grandeur, and our Greek race has unlearned itself so shamefully with these Egyptians, that our great troops is as dark as Andromeda, and we should have to apply again to those cursed Goths, who have nearly, with a low 'all the honour, and nearly all the money and the power, as I will, I suspect have the rest of it before I can shake out of this wicked world, because they have not in my, but quite, all the courage. No—shall we ask a Goth to dance Apollo? for we can get none else.'

Hypatia smiled in spite of herself at the notion. That would be too shameful. I must forego the god of light himself if I am to see him in the person of a clumsy German.'

'Then why not try my despatch and report of Aphrodite? Suppose we had her triumph—dancing with a dance of Venus Anadyomene. Surely that is a graceful myth enough.'

'As a myth, but on the stage in reality.'

'Not worse than what this Christian era has been looking at for many a year. We shall incur any danger of corrupting morality, be sure.'

Hypatia blushed.

'Then you must not ask for my help.'

'Or for your presence at the spectacle? For that be sure is a necessary point. You are too great a person, my dearest madam, in the eyes of these good folks to be allowed to absent yourself on such an occasion. If my little stratagem succeeds, it will be half owing to the fact of the people knowing that in crowning me, they crown Hypatia. Come now—do you not see that as you must needs be present at their harmless scrip of mythology, taken from the authentic and undoubted histories of those very gods whose worship we intend to restore, you will consult your own comfort most in agreeing to it cheerfully, and in lending me your wisdom towards arranging it? Just conceive now, a triumph of Aphrodite, entering preceded by wild beasts led in chains by Cupids, the white elephant and all—what a held for the plastic art! You might have a thousand groupings, dispersals, regroupings, in as perfect fest-relief style as those of any Sophoclean drama. Allow me only to take this paper and pen—

And he began sketching rapidly group after group.

'Not so ugly, surely?'

'They are very beautiful, I cannot deny,' said poor Hypatia.

'Ah, sweetest Empress! you forget sometimes that I, too, world worn as I am, on a Greek, with as intense a love of the beautiful as even you yourself have. Do not fancy that every violation of correct taste does not torture me as keenly as it does you. Some day, I hope, you will have learned to pity and to excuse the wretched compromise between that which ought to be and that which can be, in which we helpless statesmen must struggle on, half-stunted, and wholly misunderstood—Ah, well! Look, now, at these fawns and dryads among the shrubs upon the stage, pausing in startled wonder at the first blast of music which proclaims the exit of the goddess from her temple.'

'The temple? Why, where are you going to exhibit?'

'In the Theatre, of course. Where else pantomimes?'

'But will the spectators have time to move all the way from the Amphitheatre after that—there—'

'The Amphitheatre? We shall exhibit the Labyrinth, too, in the Theatre.'

'Combats in the Theatre sacred to Dionysos?'

'My dear lady'—penitently—'I know it is an offence against all the laws of the drama.'

'Oh, worse than that! Consider what an impiety toward the god, to desecrate his altar with bloodshed?'

'Fairrest devotee, recollect that, after all, I may fairly borrow Dionysos's altar in this my extreme need, so I saved its very existence for him, by preventing the magistrates from filling up the whole orchestra with benches for the patricians, after the barbarous Roman fashion. And besides, what possible sort of representation, or misrepresentation, has not been exhibited in every theatre of the empire for the last four hundred years? Have we not had tumblers, conjurers, allegories, martyrdoms, marriages, elephants on the tight-rope, learned horses, and learned asses too, if we may trust Apuleius of Madaura, with a good many other spectacles of which we must not speak in the presence of a vestal? It is an age of execrable taste, and we must act accordingly.'

'Ah!' answered Hypatia, 'the first step in the downward career of the drama began when the successors of Alexander dared to profane theatres which had re-echoed the choruses of Sophocles and Euripides by degrading the altar of Dionysos into a stage for pantomimes!'

'Which your pure mind must, doubtless, consider not so very much better than a little fighting. But, after all, the Ptolemies could not do otherwise. You can only have Sophoclean dramas in a Sophoclean age, and thus was no more of one than ours is, and so the drama died a natural death, and when that happens to man or thing, you may weep over it if you will, but you must, after all, bury it, and get something else in its place—except, of course, the worship of the gods.'

'I am glad that you except that, at least,' said Hypatia, somewhat bitterly. 'But why not use the Amphitheatre for both spectacles?'

'What can I do? I am over head and ears in debt already, and the Amphitheatre is half in ruins, thanks to that fanatic edict of the late emperor against gladiators. There is no time or money for repairing it, and besides, how pitiful a poor hundred of combatants will look in an arena built to hold two thousand! Consider, my dearest lady, in what fallen times we live!'

'I do, indeed!' said Hypatia. 'But I will not see the altar polluted by blood. It is the desecration which it has undergone already which has provoked the god to withdraw the poetic inspiration.'

'I do not doubt the fact. Some curse from Heaven, certainly, has fallen on our poets, to judge by their exceeding badness. Indeed, I am inclined to attribute the same vagaries of the water-drinking monks and nuns, like those of the Atrive women, to the same celestial anger. But I will see that the sanctity of the altar is preserved, by confining the combat to the stage. And as for the pantomime which will follow, if you would only fall in with my fancy of the triumph of Aphrodite, Dionysos would hardly refuse his altar for the glorification of his own lady's love.'

'Ah! that myth is a lie, and in my opinion a degraded one.'

'Be it so, but recollect, that another myth makes her, and not without reason, the mother of all living beings. Be sure that Dionysos will have no objection, or any other god either, to allow her to make her children feel her conquering might, for they all know well enough, that if we can once get her well worshipped here, all Olympus will follow in her train.'

'That was spoken of the celestial Aphrodite whose symbol is the tortoise, the emblem of domestic modesty and chastity, not of that baser Pandemic one.'

'Then we will take care to make the people aware of whom they are admiring by exhibiting in the triumph whole legions of tortoises, and you yourself shall write the chant, while I will see that the chorus is worthy of what it has to sing. No more squeaking double flute and a pair of boys—but a whole army of cyclops and graces, with such troubles and such bass-voices! It shall make Cyril's ears tingle in his palace!

'The chant! A noble office for me, truly! That is the very part of the absurd spectacle to which you used to say the people never dreamed of attending. All which is worth settling you seemed to have settled for yourself before you deigned to consult me.'

'I said so? Surely you must mistake. But if any hired poetaster's chant do pass unheeded, what has that to do with Hypatia's eloquence and science, glowing with the fields inspiration of Athene, Phoebus, and Dionysos? And as for having arranged beforehand—my adorable mistress, what more delicate compliment could I have paid you!'

'I cannot say that it seems to me to be one.'

'How? After saying you were trouble which I could, and racking my overburdened wit for stage effects and practicals, have I not brought hither the darling children of my own brain, and laid them down ruthlessly, for life or death, before the judgment-seat of your lofty and unsparring criticism?'

Hypatia felt herself tricked—but there was no escape now.

'And who, pray, is to disengage herself and me, as Venus Anadyomene?'

'Ah! that is the most exquisite article in all my bill of fare! What if the kind gods have punished me to exact a promise from—whom, think you?'

'What care I? How can I tell?' asked Hypatia, who suspected and decided that she could tell.

'Pelagia herself!'

Hypatia rose angrily.

'This, sir, at least, is too much! It was not enough for you, it seems, to claim, or rather to take for granted, so imperiously, so imperiously, a conditional promise—weakly, weakly made, in the vain hope that you would help forward aspirations of mine which you have let lie fallow for months—in which I do not believe that you sympathise now!—It was not enough for you to declare yourself publicly yesterday a Christian, and to come hither this morning to flatter me into the belief that you will do so ten days hence, to restore the worship of the gods whom you have abjured! It was not enough to plan without me all those movements in which you told me I was to be your fellow-counsellor—the very condition which you yourself offered!—It was not enough for you to command me to sit in that theatre, as your host, your jester, your victim, blushing and shuddering at sights unfit for the eyes of gods and men—but, over and above all this, I must assist in the renewed triumph of a woman who has laughed down my teaching, scolded away my scholars, braved me in my very lecture-room—who for four years has done more than even Cyril himself to destroy all the virtue and truth which I have toiled to sow—and toiled in vain!

Oh, beloved gods! where will end the tortures through which your worthy must witness for you to a fallen man?'

And, in spite of all her pain, and of Orestes's presence, her eyes blid with scolding tears.

Orestes's eyes had sunk before the vehemence of her just passion, but as she added the last sentence in a softer and sadder tone, he raised them again, with a look of sorrow and entreaty, as his heart whispered.

'Fool!—fanatic! But she is too beautiful! Wm her I must and will!'

'Ah! dearest, noblest Hypatia! What have I done? Unthinking fool that I was! In the wish to save you trouble. In the hope that I could show you, by the aptness of my own plans, that my political statesmanship was not altogether an unworthy helpmate for your loftier wisdom—with that I am, I have offended you, and I have ruined the cause of those very gods for whom, I swear, I am ready to sacrifice myself as ever you can be!'

The last sentence had the effect which it was meant to have.

'Ruined the cause of the gods?' asked she, in a startled tone.

'Is it not ruined without your help? And what am I to understand from your words but that, hapless man that I am! you leave me and then leave me forth to our own unassisted strength?'

The unassisted strength of the gods is omnipotence.

'Be it so. But—why is Cyril, and not Hypatia, master of the masses of Alexandria this day? Why but because he and his have fought, and suffered, and died too, many a hundred of them, for their god, omnipotent as they believe him to be? Why are the old gods forgotten in my quest for truth? for forgotten they are!'

Hypatia trembled from head to foot, and Orestes went on more blindly than ever.

'I will not ask in answer to that question of mine. All I entreat is forgiveness for—what for I know not—but I have sinned, and that is enough for me. What if I have been too impatient, too hasty? Are you not the prize for which I strive? And will not the preciousness of the victor's wreath excuse some impatience in the struggle for it? Hypatia has forgotten who and what the gods have made her—she has not even consulted her own mirror when she blames one of her numerous admirers for a forwardness which ought to be rather imputed to him as a virtue!'

And Orestes stole meekly such a glance of adoration, that Hypatia blushed, and turned her face away.

After all, she was woman. And she was a fanatic.

And Orestes's voice was as melodious, and his manner as graceful as ever charmed the heart of woman.

'But Pelagia?' she said, at last, recovering herself.

'Would that I had never seen the creature!'

But, after all, I really fancied that in doing what I have done I should gratify you'

'Me?'

'Surely if revenge be sweet, as they say, it could hardly find a more delicate satisfaction than in degradation of one who——'

'Revenge, sir? Do you dream that I am capable of so base a passion?'

'I? Pallas forbid!' said Orestes, finding himself on the wrong path again. 'But recollect that the allowing this spectacle to take place might rid you for ever of an unpleasant—I will not say rival.'

'How, then?'

'Will not her reappearance on the stage, after all her proud professions of contempt for it, do something towards reducing her in the eyes of this scandalous little town to her true and native level? She will hardly dare thenceforth to go about passing herself as the consort of a god-descended hero, or thrusting herself unbidden into Hypatia's presence, as if she were the daughter of a consul.'

'But I cannot—I cannot allow it even to her. After all, Orestes, she is a woman. And can I, philosopher as I am, help to degrade her even one step lower than she lies already?'

Hypatia had all but said 'a woman even as I am' but Neo-Platonic philosophy taught her better, and she checked the hasty assertion of anything like a common sex or common humanity between two beings so antipodal.

'Ah,' rejoined Orestes, 'that unlucky word degrade! Unthinking that I was, to use it, forgetting that she herself will be no more degraded in her own eyes, or any one's else, by hearing again the plaudits of those "dear Macclellans," on whose breath she has lived for years, than a peacock when he displays his train. Unbounded vanity and self-conceit are not unpleasant passions, after all, for their victim. After all, she is what she is, and her being so is no fault of yours. Oh, it must be! indeed it must!'

Poor Hypatia! The bait was too delicate, the tempter too wily, and yet she was ashamed to speak aloud the philosophic dogma which flashed a ray of comfort and resignation through her mind, and reminded her that after all there was no harm in allowing lower natures to develop themselves freely in that direction which Nature had appointed for them, and in which only they could fulfil the laws of their being, as necessary varieties in the manifold whole of the universe. So she cut the interview short with—

'If it must be, then I will now retire, and write the ode. Only, I refuse to have any communication whatsoever with—I am ashamed of even mentioning her name. I will send the ode to you, and she must adapt her dance to it as best she can. By her taste, or fancy rather, I will not be ruled.'

'And I,' said Orestes, with a profusion of thanks, 'will retire to rack my faculties over the "dispositions." On this day week we exhibit—and conquer! Farewell, queen of wisdom! Your philosophy never shows to better advantage than when you thus wisely and gracefully subordinate that which is beautiful in itself to that which is beautiful relatively and practically.'

He departed, and Hypatia, half dreading her own thoughts, sat down at once to labour at the ode. Certainly it was a magnificent subject. What etymologies, cosmogonies, allegories, myths, symbolism, between all heaven and earth, might she not introduce—if she could but banish that figure of Pelagia dancing to it all, which would not be banished, but hovered, like a spectre, in the background of all her imaginations. She became quite angry, first with Pelagia, then with herself, for being weak enough to think of her. Was it not positive debilitation of her mind to be haunted by the image of so debilitated a being? She would purify her thoughts by prayer and meditation. But to whom of all the gods should she address herself? To her chosen favourite, Athena? She who had promised to be present at that spectacle? Oh, how weak she had been to yield! And yet she had been snared into it—snared—there was no doubt of it—by the very man whom she had fancied that she could guide and mould to her own purposes. He had guided and moulded her now against her self-respect, her compassion, her innate sense of right. Already she was sore toiled. True, she had submitted to be so for a great purpose. But suppose she had to submit again hereafter—always henceforth? And what mole the thought more poignant was, her knowledge that he was right, that he knew what to do, and how to do it. She could not help admiring him for his address, his quickness, his clear practical insight, and yet she despised, mistrusted, and hated him. But what if his were the very qualities which were destined to succeed? What if her power and loftiness, her resolutions—now, alas! broken—never to act but on the deepest and holiest principles and by the most sacred means, were destined never to exert themselves in practice, except conjointly with miserable stratagems and evasions such as these? What if sacrifices and not philosophy and religion, were the appointed rulers of mankind? Illudens thought! And yet—she who had all her life tried to be self-dependent, originaive, to face and crush the hostile mob of circumstance and custom, and do battle single-handed with Christianity and a fallen age—how was it that in her first important and critical opportunity of action she had been dumb, irresolute, passive, the victim, at last, of the very corruption which she was to exterminate? She did not know yet that those who have no other means for regenerating a corrupted time than dogmatic pedantries concerning the dead and unreturning past, must end, in practice, by borrowing insincerely, and using dishonestly, the very weapons of that novel age which they deprecate, and 'sewing new cloth into old garments,' till the rent become patent and inmurable. But in the meanwhile, such meditations as these drove from her mind for that day both Athens, and the ode, and philosophy, and all things but—P'clagga the wanton.

In the meanwhile, Alexandrian politics flowed onward in their usual pure and quiet course. The public buildings were placarded with the news of Heracian's vic— and groups of loungers expressed, humbly enough, their utter indifference as to who might rule at Rome or even at Byzantium. Let Heracian or Honorius be emperor, the capitals must be fed, and while the Alexandrian wheat-trade was unimpaired, what matter who received the tribute? Certainly, as some friends of Orestes found means to suggest, it might not be a bad thing for Egypt, if she could keep the tribute in her own treasury, instead of sending it to Rome without any adequate return, save the presence of an expensive army. Alexandria had been once the metropolis of an independent empire. Why not again? Then came enormous largesses, at once, proving, more satisfactorily to the mob than to the shipowners, that Egyptian wheat was better employed at home than abroad. Nay, there were even rumours of a general amnesty for all prisoners, and as, of course, every evil-doer had a kind of friend who considered him an injured martyr, all parties were well content, on their own accounts, at least, with such a move.

And so Orestes's bubble swelled and grew, and glittered every day with fresh poetic splendour, while Hypatia sat at home, with a heavy heart, writing her ode to Venus Lament, and substituting to Orestes's daily visions.

One cloud, indeed, not without spirals of wind and rain, disfigured that sky which the Prefect had invested with such serenity by the simple expedient, well known to politicians, of painting it bright blue, since it would not assume that colour of its own accord. For, a day or two after Annonius's execution, the Prefect's guards informed him that the corpse of the crucified man, with the cross on which it hung, had vanished. The Nitrian monks had come down in a body, and carried them off before the very eyes of the sentinels. Orestes knew well enough that the fellows must have been bribed to allow the theft, but he dare not say so to men on whose good humour his very life might depend, so, stammering the affront as best he could, he vowed fresh vengeance against Cyril, and went on his way. But, behold!—within four-and-twenty hours of the theft, a procession of all the masculinity, followed by all the pety, of Alexandria, —monks from Nitria counted by the thousand, —priests, deacons, archdeacons, Cyril himself, in full pontificals, and borne aloft in the midst, upon a splendid bier, the missing corpse, its nail-pierced hands and feet left uncovered for the jutting gaze of the Church.

Under the very palace windows, from which Orestes found it expedient to retire for the time being, out upon the quays, and up the steps of the Casareum, debiled that new portent, and in another half hour a servant entered, breathlessly, to inform the shepherd of people that his victim was lying in state in the centre of the nave, a martyr duly canonised, —Annonius now no more, but henceforth Theodosius the wonderful, on whose heroic virtues and more heroic faithfulness unto the death, Cyril was already deserting from the pulpit, amid thunders of applause at every allusion to his life at the brook Kishon, Sennacherib in the house of Nisroch, and the rest of the princes of this world who come to nought.

Here was a storm! To order a cohort to enter the church and bring away the body was easy enough to make them do it, in the face of certain death, not so easy. Besides, it was too early yet for so desperate a move as would be involved in the violation of a church. So Orestes added this fresh item to the long column of accounts which he intended to settle with the patriarch, raised for half an hour in the name of all divinities, saints, and martyrs, Christian and Pagan, and wrote off a lamentable history of his wrongs and sufferings to the very Byzantine court against which he was about to rebel, in the comfortable assurance that Cyril had sent, by the same post, a counter statement, contradicting it in every particular.

Never mind. In case he failed in settling it was as well to be able to prove his allegiance up to the latest possible date, and the more completely the two statements contradicted each other, the longer it would take to sift the truth out of them, and thus so much time was gained, and so much the more chance, meantime, of a new leaf being turned over in that sublime oracle of politicians—the Chapter of Accidents. And for the time being, he would make a pathetic appeal to respectability and moderation in general, of which Alexandria, when some hundred thousand tradesmen and merchants had property to lose, possessed a goodly share.

Respectability responded promptly to the appeal, and loyal addresses and deputations of condolence flowed in from every quarter, expressing the extreme sorrow with which the citizens had beheld the late disturbances of civil order, and the contempt which had been so unfortunately evinced for the constituted authorities—but taking, nevertheless, the liberty to remark, that while the extreme danger to property which might ensue from the further exasperation of certain classes, prevented their taking those active steps on the side of tranquillity to which their feelings inclined them, the known piety and wisdom of their esteemed patriarch made it presumptuous in them to offer any opinion on his present conduct, beyond the expression of their firm belief that he had been unfortunately misinformed as to those sentiments of affection and respect which his excellency the Prefect was well known to entertain towards him. They ventured, therefore, to express a humble hope that, by some mutual compromise, to define which would be an unwarrantable intrusion on their part, a happy reconciliation would be effected, and the staltnity of law, property, and the Catholic Faith ensured. All which Orestes heard with blandest smiles, while his heart was black with curses, and Cyril answered by a very violent though a very true and practical harangue on the text, 'How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of heaven.'

So respectability and moderation met with their usual hapless fate, and, soundly cursed by both parties, in the vain attempt to please both, wisely left the higher powers to settle their own affairs, and went home to their desks and counters, and did a very brisk business all that week on the strength of the approaching festival. One hapless innkeeper only tried to carry out in practice the principles which the disputation from his guild had so eloquently advocated, and being convicted of giving away bread in the morning to the Nitrian monks, and wine in the evening to the Prefect's guards, had his tavern gutted, and his head broken by a joint plebeianism of both the parties whom he had conciliated, who afterwards fought a little together, and then, luckily for the general peace, mutually ran away from each other.

Cyril in the meanwhile, though he was doing a foolish thing, was doing it wisely enough. Thence might arise, and respectability might deplore, those nightly sermons, which shook the mighty arcades of the Cæsareum, but they could not answer them. Cyril was right and knew that he was right. Orestes was a scoundrel, hateful to God, and to the enemies of God. The middle classes were lukewarm covetous towards the whole system of government was a swindle and an injustice, although his words were read with crying, 'Lord, how long?' The fierce bishop had only to thunder forth text on text, from every book of scripture, old and new, in order to array on his side not merely the common sense and right feeling, but the bigotry and ferocity of the masses.

In vain did the good Arsenius represent to him not only the scandal but the unrighteousness of his now canonisation. 'I must have fiol, my good father,' was his answer, 'where-with to keep alight the flame of zeal. If I am to be silent as to Horem's defeat, I must give them some other irritant, which will put them in a proper temper to act on that defeat, when they are told of it. If they hate Orestes, does he not deserve it? Even if he is not altogether as much in the wrong in this particular case as they fancy he is, are there not a thousand other crimes of his which deserve their abhorrence even more? At all events, he must proclaim the empire, as you yourself say, or we shall have no handle against him. He will not dare to proclaim it if he knows that we are aware of the truth. And if we are to proclaim the truth in reserve, we must have something else to serve meanwhile as a substitute for it.'

And poor Arsenius submitted with a sigh, as he saw Cyril making a fresh step in that alluring path of evil-doing that good might come, which led him in after years into many a fearful sin, and left his name disgraced, perhaps for ever, in the judgment of generations, who know as little of the pandemonium against which he fought, as they do of the intense belief which sustained him in his warfare; and who have therefore neither understanding nor pardon for the occasional outbursts and errors of a man no worse, even if no better, than themselves.

CHAPTER XXI

THE SQUIRREL-MONK

IN a small and ill-furnished upper room of a battiled country house, sat Synesius, the Bishop of Cyrene.

A goblet of wine stood beside him, on the table, but it was untasted. Slowly and sadly, by the light of a tiny lamp, he went on writing a verse or two, and then burying his face in his hand, while hot tears dropped between his fingers on the paper, till a servant entering, announced Raphael Alan-bura.

Synesius rose, with a gesture of surprise, and hurried towards the door. 'No, ask him to come hither to me. To pass through those deserted rooms at night is more than I can bear.' And he waited for his guest at the chamber door, and as he entered, caught both his hands in his, and tried to speak, but his voice was choked within him.

'Do not speak,' said Raphael gently, leading him to his chair again. 'I know all.'

'You know all? And are you, then, so unlike the rest of the world, that you alone have come to visit the bereaved and the desolate in his misery?'

'I am like the rest of the world, after all, for I came to you on my own selfish errand to seek comfort. Would that I could give it myself! But the servants told me all, below.'

And yet you persisted in seeing me, as if I could help you? Alas! I can help no one now. Here I am at last, utterly alone, utterly helpless. As I came from my mother's womb, so shall I return again. My last child—my last and furthest gone after the rest—Thank God, that I have had even a day's peace wherein to lay him by his mother and his brothers, though He alone knows how long the beloved graves may remain unruled. Let it have been shame enough to sit here in my lonely tower and watch the ashes of my Spartan ancestors, the sons of Heracles himself, my glory and my pride, smouldering that I was I cast to the winds by barbarian plunderers. When wilt thou make an evil, O Lord, and slay me?'

'And how did the poor boy die?' asked Raphael, in hope of soothing sorrow by enticing it to vent itself in words.

'The pestilence—What other fate can we expect, who breathe an air tainted with corpses, and sit under a sky darkened with carrion birds?'

But I could endure even that, if I could work, if I could help. But to sit here, imprisoned now for months between these hateful towers, night after night to watch the sky, reel with burning homesteads, day after day to have my ears ring with thunders of the dying and the captives—for they have begun now to murder every male down to the baby at the breast—and to feel myself utterly fettered, impotent, sitting here like some palsied idiot, waiting for my end! I long to rush out, and fall fighting, sword in hand—but I am their last, their only hope. The governors can nothing for our supplications. In vain hate I memorised Cæcilius and Innocent, with what little eloquence my misery has not stunted in me. But there is no resolution, no humanity left in the land. The soldiery are scattered in small garrisons, employed entirely in protecting the private property of their officers. The Ausonians defy them piecemeal, and, armed with their spears, actually have begun to chastise fortified towns, and now there is nothing left for us, but to pray that, like Ilysses we may be discovered the last. What am I doing? I am selfishly pouring out my own sorrows, instead of listening to yours.

'Ay, friend, you are talking of the sorrows of your country, not of your own. As for me, I have no sorrow—only an despair which, being unmedicable, may well wait. But you—oh, you must not stay here. Why not escape to Alexandria?'

'I will die at my post as I have lived, the father of my people. When the last man comes, and Cyrene itself is besieged, I shall return thither from my present outpost and the conquerors shall find the bishop in his place before the altar. There I have offered for years the unbloody sacrifice to him, who will perhaps require of me a bloody one, that so the sight of an altar polluted by the murder of his priest, may end the sin of Ptolemy in woe and arouse him to avenge his slaughtered sheep. There, we will talk no more of it. This, at least, I have left in my power, to make you welcome. And after supper you shall tell me what brings you hither.'

And the good bishop, calling his servant, set to work to show his guest such hospitality as the invaders had left in his power.

Raphael's useful insight had not deserted him when, in his utter perplexity, he went, almost instinctively, straight to Symonius. The Bishop of Cyrene, in judge from the charming private letters which he has left, was one of those many-sided, volatile, restless men, who taste joy and sorrow, if not deeply or permanently, yet abundantly and passionately. He lived, as Raphael had told Orestes, in a whirlwind of good deeds, meddling and toiling for the mere pleasure of action, and as soon as there was nothing to be done, which, till lately, had happened seldom enough with him, paid the penalty for past excitement in fits of melancholy. A man of magniloquent and flowery style, not without a vein of self-conceit, yet withal of overflowing kindness, ray humour, and unflinching courage, both physical and moral, with a very clear practical faculty, and a very muddy speculative one—though, of course, like the rest of the world, he was especially proud of his own weakest side, and professed the most passionate affection for philosophic meditation, while his detractors hinted, not without a show of reason, that he was far more of an adept in soldiering and dog-breaking than in the mysteries of the unseen world.

To him Raphael betook himself, he hardly knew why, certainly not for philosophic consolation, perhaps because Symonius was, as Raphael used to say, the only Christian from whom he had ever heard a hearty laugh, perhaps because he had some wayward hope, unconfessed even to himself, that he might meet it Symonius's house the very companion from whom he had just fled. He was fluttering round Victoria's new and strange ballroom like a moth round the candle, as he confessed, after supper, to himself, and now he was comforted, on the chance of being able to sing his wings once more.

Not that his confession was extracted without much trouble to the good old man, who, seeing it mine that Raphael had some weight upon his mind, which he longed to tell, and yet was either too suspicious or too proud to tell, set himself to ferret out the secret, and forgot all his sorrows for the time, as soon as he found a human being to whom he might do good. But Raphael was inexplicably wayward and unlike himself. All his smooth and shallow personage, even his shallow satiric humour, had vanished. He seemed parched by some inward fever, restless, moody, abrupt, even peevish, and Symonius's curiosity rose with his disappointment, as Raphael went on obstinately declining to consult the very physician before whom he presented himself as patient.

'And what can you do for me, if I did tell you?'

'Then allow me, my very dear friend, to ask this. As you deny having visited me on my own account, on what account did you visit me?'

'Can you ask? To enjoy the society of the most finished gentleman of Ptolemais.'

'And was that worth a week's journey in perpetual danger of death?'

As for danger of death, that weighs little with a man who is careless of life. And as for the week's journey, I did a dream one night, on my way, which made me question whether I were wise in troubling a Christian bishop with any thoughts or questions which relate merely to poor human beings like myself, who marry and are given in marriage.'

'You forget, friend, that you are speaking to one who has married, and loved—and lost.'

'I did not. But you see how rude I am growing. I am no fit company for you, or any man. I believe I shall end by turning robber-chief, and heading a party of Anshurians.

'But,' said the patient Synesius, 'you have forgotten your dream all this while.'

'Forgotten?—I did not promise to tell it you—did I?'

'No, but as it seems to have contained some sort of accusation against my capacity, do you not think it but fair to tell the accused what it was?'

Raphael smiled.

'Well then, Suppose I had dreamt this. That a philosopher, an academic, and a believer in nothing and in no man, had met at Hermonce certain rabbis of the Jews, and heard them reading and expounding a certain book of Solomon—the Song of Songs. You, as a learned man, know into what sort of trumpery allegory they would contrive to twist it, how the lede's eyes were to mean the scribes who were full of wisdom, as the pools of Heshbon were of water, and her stature spreading like a palm-tree, the priests who spread out their hands when blessing the people, and the left hand ~~of the Jews~~ should be under her head, the Tephilin which these old pearls wore on their Mit wrists, and the right hand which should hold her, the Mezuzah which they fixed in the right side of their doors to keep off devils, and so forth.'

'I have heard such silly Cabbalisms, certainly.'

'You have? Then suppose that I went on, and saw in my dream how this same academic and unbeliever, being himself also a Hebrew of the Hebrews, snatched the roll out of the rabbis' hands, and told them that they were a party of fools for trying to set forth what the book might possibly mean, before they had found out what it really did mean, and that they could only find out that by looking honestly at the plain words to see what Solomon meant by it. And then, suppose that this same apostate Jew, this member of the synagogue of Satan, in his carnal and lawless imaginations, had waxed eloquent with the eloquence of devils, and told them that the book set forth, to those who had eyes to see, how Solomon the great king, with his threescore queens, and fourscore concubines, and virgins without number, forgets all his seraglio and his luxury in pure and noble love for the unweild, who is but one, and how as his eyes are opened to see that God made the one man for the one woman, and the one woman in the one man, even as it was in the garden of Eden, so all his heart and thoughts become pure, and gentle, and simple, how the song of the birds, and the scent of the grapes, and the spicy southern gales, and all the simple country pleasures of the glens of Lebanon, which he shares with his own vine-dressers and slaves, become more precious in his eyes than all his palaces and artificial pomp, and the man feels that he is in harmony, for the first time in his life, with the universe of God, and with the mystery of the seasons, that within him, as well as without him, the winter is past, and the rain is over and gone, the flowers appear on the earth, and the voice of the turtle is heard in the land. And suppose I saw in my dream how the rabbis, when they heard those wicked words, stopped their ears with one accord, and ran upon that son of Belial and cast him out, because he blasphemed their sacred books by his evil interpretations. And suppose—I only say suppose—that I saw in my dream how the poor man said in his heart, "I will go to the Christians, they acknowledge the sacredness of this same book, and they say that then God taught them that 'in the beginning God made man, male and female.' Perhaps they will tell me whether this Song of Songs does not, as it seems to me to do, show the passage upwards from brutal polygamy to that monogamy which they so sedulously commend, and agree with me, that it is because the song preaches this that it has a right to take its place among the holy writings?" You, as a Christian bishop, should know what answer such a man would receive.

You are silent? Then I will tell you what answer he would receive in my dream. "O blasphemous and a mad man, who pervertest Holy Scripture into a cloak for thine own licentiousness, as if it spoke of man's base and sensual affections, know that this book is to be spiritually interpreted of the marriage between the soul and its Creator, and that it is from this very book that the Catholic Church derives her strongest arguments in favour of holy virginity, and the glories of a celibate life."

Synesius was still silent.

'And what do you think I saw in my dream that that man did when he found these Christians enforcing, as a necessary article of practice, as well as of faith, a lawless and bawdy bishp metried, borrowed from that very Neo-Platonism out of which he had just fled for his life? He cursed the day he was born, and the hour in which his father was told, "Thou hast gotten a man-child," and said, "Philosophers, Jews, and Christians, farewell for ever and a day! The coarsest words of your most sacred books mean anything or nothing, as the wind may suit your fancies, and there is neither truth nor reason under the sun. What better is there for a man, than to follow the example of his people, and to turn farmer, and money-gather, and exposer of seeds in his turn, even as his father was before him?"'

Synesius remained a while in deep thought, and at last—

'And yet you came to me?'

'I did, because you have loved and married; because you have stood out manfully against this strange modern insanity, and refused to give up, when you were made a bishop, the wife whom God had given you. You, I thought, could solve the riddle for me, if any man could.'

'Alas, friend! I have begun to distrust, of late, my power of solving riddles. After all, why should they be solved? What matters one more mystery in a world of mysteries? "If thou marry, thou hast not sinned," are St. Paul's own words, and let them be enough for us.

Do not ask me to argue with you, but to help you. Instead of puzzling me with deep questions, and tempting me to set up my private judgment, as I have done too often already, against the opinion of the Church, tell me your story, and test my sympathy rather than my intellect. I shall feel with you and work for you, doubt not, even though I am unable to explain to myself why I do it.

'Then you cannot solve my riddle?'

'Let me help you,' said Synesius with a sweet smile, 'to solve it for yourself. You need not try to deceive me. You have a love, an undivided, who is but one. When you possess her, you will be able to judge better whether your interpretation of the Song is the true one, and if you still think that it is, Synesius, at least, will have no quarrel against you. He has always claimed for himself the right of philosophising in private, and he will allow the same liberty to you, whether the mule do or not.'

'Then you agree with me? Of course you do!'

'Is it fair to ask me whether I accept a novel interpretation, which I have only heard five minutes ago, delivered in a somewhat hasty and rhetorical form?'

'You are shirking the question,' said Raphael peevishly.

'And what if I am? Tell me, don't think most self-tormenting or men. Can I help you in practice even though I choose to leave you to yourself in speculation?'

'Well, then, if you will have my story told, and judge for yourself of Christian commonsense hurriedly, as if ashamed of his own confession, and yet compelled, in spite of himself, to pronounce it, he told Synesius all, from his first meeting with Victoria to his escape from her at Berenice.

The good bishop, to Aben Ezra's surprise, seemed to treat the whole matter as infinitely amusing. He chuckled, smote his hand on his thigh, and nodded approval at every passage—perhaps to give the speaker courage—perhaps because he really thought that Raphael's prospects were considerably less desperate than he imagined.

'If you laugh at me Synesius I am silent. It is quite enough to endure the humiliation of telling you that I am confounded it'—like any boy of sixteen.

'Laugh at you? with you, you mean. A coward? Fool, fool! The old Prefect has enough sense, I will warrant him, not to refuse a good match for his child.'

'You forget that I have not the honour of being a Christian.'

'Then we'll make you one. You won't let me convert you, I know, you always used to gibe and jeer at my philosophy. But Augustine comes to-morrow.'

'Augustine?'

'He does indeed; and we must be off by day-break, with all the armed men we can muster, to meet and escort him, and to hunt, of course, going and coming, for we have had no food this fortnight, but what our own dogs and hounds have furnished us. He shall take you in hand, and cure you of all your Judaism in a week, and then just leave the rest to me, I will manage it somehow or other. It is sure to come right. No, do not be hushful. It will be real amusement to a poor wretch who can find nothing else to do—Hugho! And as for lying under an obligation to me, why we can square that by your lending me three or four thousand gold pieces—Heaven knows I want them!—on the certainty of never seeing them again.'

Raphael could not help laughing in his turn.

'Synesius is himself still, I see, and not unworthy of his ancestor Hercules. And though he shrinks from cleansing the Argive stable of my soul, paws like the war horse in the valley at the hope of undertaking any lesser labours in my behalf. But, my dear generous bishop, this matter is more serious, and I, the subject of it, have become more serious also, than you fancy. Consider by the uncorrupt honour of your Spartan forefathers, Agas, Brasidas, and the rest of them, don't you think that you are, in your hasty kindness, tempting me to behave in a way which they would have called somewhat cowardly?'

'How then, my dear man? You have a very honourable and praiseworthy desire, and I am willing to help you to compass it.'

'Do you think that I have not cast about before now for more than one method of compassing it for myself? My good man, I have been tempted a dozen times already to turn Christian—but there has risen up in me the strangest fancy about conscience and honour.'

'I never was scrupulous before, Heaven knows—I am not ~~scrupulous~~ now—except about her. I cannot disavow before her. I dare not look in her face when I had a lie in my tight hand. She looks through me—like clear-eyed awful goddess. I never was ashamed in my life till my eyes met hers.'

'But if you really became a Christian?'

'I cannot. I should suspect my own motives. Here is another of these absurd self-anatomising scruples which have risen up in me. I should suspect that I had changed my creed because I wished to change it—that if I was not deceiving her I was deceiving myself. If I had not loved her it might have been different—but now—just because I do love her, I will not, I dare not listen to Augustine's arguments, or my own thoughts on the matter?'

'Most wayward of men!' cried Synesius, half peevishly. 'You seem to take some perverse pleasure in throwing yourself into the waves again, the instant you have climbed a rock of refuge.'

'Pleasure! Is there any pleasure in feeling oneself at death-grips with the devil? I had given up believing in him for many a year. . . . And behold, the moment that I awaken to any thing noble and right, I find the old serpent alive and strong at my throat! No wonder that I suspect him, you, myself—I, who have been tempted, every hour in the last week, temptations to become a devil. Ay, he went on, raising his voice, as all the fire of his intense Eastern nature flashed from his black eyes, 'to be a devil! From my childhood till now never have I known what it was to desire and not to possess. It is not often that I have had to trouble any poor Naboth for his vineyard—but when I have taken a fancy to it, Naboth has always found it wiser to give way. And now—Do you fancy that I have not had a dozen hellish plots flashing across me in the last week? Look here! This is the mortgage of her father's whole estate I bought if—whether by the instigation of Satan or of God—a banker in Bereuce, the very day I left them, and now they, and every straw which they possess, are in my power. I can run them—sell them as slaves—betray them to death as rebels—and last, but not least, cannot I hire a dozen worthy men to carry her off, and cut the Gordian knot most simply and summarily? And yet I dare not! I must be pure to approach the pure, and righteous, to kiss the feet of the righteous. Whence came this new conscience to me I know not—but come it has, and I dare no more do a base thing toward her, than I dare toward a God, if there be one. This very mortgage—I hate it, curse it, now that I possess it—the tempting devil!

'Burn it,' said Synesius quietly.

'Perhaps I may. At least, used it never shall be. Compel her? I am too proud, or too honourable, or something or other, even to solicit her. She must come to me, till me with her own lips that she loves me, that she will take me, and make me worthy of her. She must have mercy on me, of her own free will, or—let her pine and die in that accursed prison, and then a scratch with the trusty old dagger for her father, and another for myself, will save him from any more superstitions, and me from any more philosophic doubts, for a few sons of ages, till we start again in new lives—he, I suppose, as a jackass, and I as a baboon. What matter? but unless I possess her by fair means, God do so to me, and more also, if I attempt base ones!'

'God be with you, my son, in the noble warfare!' said Synesius, his eyes shining with kindly tears.

'It is no noble warfare at all. It is a base coward fear, in one who never before feared man or devil, and is now fallen low enough to be afraid of a helpless girl!'

'Not so,' cried Synesius, in his turn, 'it is a noble and a holy fear. You fear her goodness. Could you see her goodness, much less fear it, were there not a Divine Light within you which showed you what, and how awful, goodness was? Tell me no more, Raphael Aben-Ezia, that you do not fear God, for he who fears Virtue, fears Him whose likeness Virtue is. Go on—go on. Be brave, and His strength will be made manifest in your weakness.'

It was late that night before Synesius compelled his guest to retire, after having warned him not to disturb himself if he heard the alarm-bell ring, as the house was well garrisoned, and having set the water-clock by which he and his servants measured their respective watches. And then the good bishop, having disposed his sentinels, took his station on the top of his tower, close by the warning bell, and as he looked out over the broad lands of his forefathers, and prayed that their dissolution might come to an end at last, he did not forget to pray for the dissolution of the guest who slept below, a happier and more healthy slumber than he had known for many a week. For before Raphael lay down that night, he had torn to shreds Majorinus's mortgage, and left a lighter and a better man as he saw the running temptation consuming scrap by scrap in the lamp flame. And then, wearied out with fatigue of body and mind, he forgot Synesius, Victoria, and the rest, and seemed to himself to wander all night among the vine-clad glens of Lebanon, amid the gardens of Idus, and the beds of spices, while shepherds' music lured him on and on, and gushy voices, chanting the mystic hymn of his mighty ancestor, rang soft and hushed through his weary brain.

Before sunrise the next morning, Raphael was facing forth gallantly, well armed and mounted, by Synesius's side, followed by four or five brace of tall brush-tailed greyhounds, and by the faithful Brian, whose lup ears and howl-jaws, unique in that kind of prick-ears and fox-noses, formed the absorbing subject of conversation among some twenty smart retainers, who, aimed to the teeth for chess and war, rode behind the bishop on half-starved, raw-boned horses, mired by desert training and bad times to do the minimum of work upon the minimum of food.

For the first few miles they rode in silence, through ruined villages and desolated farms, from which here and there a single inhabitant peeped forth tentatively, to pour his tale of woe into the ears of the hapless bishop, and then, instead of asking alms from him, to exhibit his acceptance of some poultry remnant of grain or poultry, which had escaped the hands of the marauders, and as they clung to his hands, and blessed him as their only hope and stay, poor Synesius heard patiently again and again the same purposeless tale of woe, and mingled his tears with theirs, and then spurred his horse on impatiently, as if to escape from the sight of misery which he could not relieve, while a voice in Raphael's heart seemed to ask him—'Why was thy wealth given to thee, but that thou mightest dry, if but for a day, such tears as these?'

And he fell into a meditation which was not without its fruit in due season, but which lasted till they had left the enclosed country, and were climbing the slopes of the low rolling hills, over which lay the road from the distant sea. But as they left the signs of war behind them, the volatile temper of the good bishop began to rise. He patted his hounds, chatted to his men, discoursed on the most probable quarter for finding game, and exhorted them cheerfully enough to play the man, as their chance of having anything to eat at night depended entirely on their prowess during the day.

'Ah!' said Raphael at last, glad of a pretext for breaking his own chain of painful thought, 'there is a vein of your land-salt. I suspect that you were all at the bottom of the sea once, and that the old Earth-shaker Neptune, tired of your bad ways, gave you a lift one morning, and set you up as dry land, in order to be rid of you.'

'It may really be so. They say that the Argonauts returned back through this country from the Southern Ocean, which must have been therefore far nearer us than it is now, and that they carried their mystic vessel over these very hills to the Syrtis. However, I have forgotten all about the sea thoroughly enough since that time. I well remember my first astonishment at the side of a gully in Alexandria, and the roar of laughter with which my fellow students greeted my not unreasonable remark, that it looked very like a centipede.'

'And do you recollect, too, the argument which I had once with your steward about the pickled fish which I brought you from Egypt, and the way in which, when the jar was opened, the servants shrieked and ran right and left, declaring that the fish-bones were the spines of poisonous serpents?'

'The old fellow is as obstinate as ever, I assume you, in his dislike of salt water. He torments me continually by asking me to tell him the story of my shipwreck, and does not leave me after all, though he has heard it a dozen times. "Sir," he said to me solemnly, after you were gone, "will that strange gentleman pretend to persuade me that anything eatable can come out of his great pond there at Alexandria, when every one can see that the best fountain in the country never breeds anything but frogs and leeches?"'

As he spoke they left the last field behind them, and entered upon a vast sheet of breezy down, speckled with shrubs and copse, and split here and there by rocky glens ending in fertile valleys once thick with farms and homesteads.

'Here,' cried Synesius, 'are our hunting-grounds. And now for one hour's forgetfulness, and the joys of the noble art. What could old Homer have been thinking of when he forgot to number it among the pursuits which are glorious to heroes, and make men illustrious, and yet could land in those very words the foinn?'

'The foinn?' said Raphael. 'I never saw it yet make men anything but rascals.'

'Brazen-faced rascals, my friend. I detect the whole brood of lawyers, and never meet one without turning him into ridicule; effeminate pettifoggers, who shudder at the very sight of roast venison, when they think of the dangers by which it has been procured. But it is a cowardly age, my friend—a cowardly age. Let us forget it, and ourselves.'

'And even philosophy and Hypatia?' said Raphael archly.

'I have done with philosophy. To fight like a Hercules, and to die like a bishop, is all I have left—except Hypatia, the perfect, the wise.' I tell you, friend, it is a comfort to me, even in my deepest misery, to recollect that the corrupt world yet holds one being so divine—'

And he was running on in one of his high-flown tirades of his old, when Raphael checked him.

'I fear our common sympathy on that subject is rather weakened. I have begun to doubt lately nearly as much as I doubt philosophy.'

'Not her virtue?'

'No, friend, nor her beauty, nor her wisdom, simply her power of making me a better man. A selfish cynicism, you will say. Be it so. What a noble horse that is of yours!'

'He has been—how long?—but worn out now, like his master and his master's fortunes.'

'Not so, certainly, the colt on which you have done me the honour to mount me.'

'Ah, my poor boy's pet! You are the first person who has crossed him since—'

'Is he of your own breeding?' asked Raphael, trying to turn the conversation.

'A cross between that white Nisera which you sent me, and one of my own mares.'

'Not a bad cross, though he keeps a little of the bull head and greyhound flank of your Africans.'

'So much the better, friend. Give me home-bone and endurance for this rough down country. Your delicate Niseras are all very well for a few minutes over those flat sands of Egypt, but here you need a horse who will go forty miles a day over rough and smooth, and dine thankfully off thistles at night. Ah, poor little man!—as a jerboa spring up from a tuft of bushes at his feet—' I fear you must help to fill our soup-kettle in these hard times.'

And with a dexterous sweep of his long whip, the worthy bishop entangled the jerboa's long legs, whisked him up to his saddle-bow, and delivered him to the groom and the game bag.

'Kill him at once. Don't let him squeak, boy!—he cries too like a child.'

'Poor little wretch!' said Raphael. 'What more right, now, have we to eat him than he to eat us?'

'Fh? If he can eat us, let him try. How long have you joined the Mammals?'

'Have no fears on that score. But, as I told you, since my wonderful conversion by Brim, the dog, I have begun to hold dumb animals in respect, as probably quite as good as myself.'

'Then you need a further conversion, friend Raphael, and to learn what is the dignity of man, and when that arrives, you will learn to believe, with me, that the life of every beast upon the face of the earth would be a cheap price to pay in exchange for the life of the meanest human being.

'Yes, if they be required for food—but really, to kill them for our amusement!'

'Friend, when I was still a heathen, I recollect well how I used to haggle at that story of the cutting of the fig-tree, but when I learnt to know what man was, and that I had been all my life mistaking for a part of nature that race which was originally, and can be again, made in the likeness of God, then I began to see that it were well if every fig-tree upon earth were cursed, if the spirit of one man could be taught thereby a single lesson. And so I speak of these, my darling field-sports, on which I have not been ashamed, as you know, to write a book.'

'And a very charming one yet you were still a pagan, recollect, when you wrote it.'

'I was, and then I followed the chase by mere nature and inclination. But now I know I have a right to follow it, because it gives me endurance, promptness, courage, self-control, as well as health and cheerfulness; and therefore Ah! a fresh ostrich-track!'

And stopping short, Synesius began picking slowly up the hillside.

'Back!' whispered he, at last. 'Quietly and silently. Lie down on your horse's neck, as I do, or the long-necked rogues may see you. They must be close to us over the brow. I know that favourite grassy slope of old Round under you hill, or they will get wind of us, and then farewell to them!'

And Synesius and his groom entered on, hanging each to their horse's necks by an arm and a leg, in a way which Raphael endeavoured in vain to imitate.

Two or three minutes of breathless silence brought them to the edge of the hill, where Synesius halted, peered down a moment, and then turned to Raphael, his face and limbs quivering with delight, as he held up two fingers, to denote the number of the hinds.

'Out of arrow-range! Slip the dogs, Syzyx!'

And in another minute Raphael found himsself galloping headlong down the hill, while two magnificent ostriches, their outspread plumes waving in the bright breeze, their necks stooped almost to the ground, and their long legs flashing out behind them, were sweeping away before the grey hounds at a pace which no mortal horse could have held for ten minutes.

'Baby that I am still!' cried Synesius, tears of excitement glittering in his eyes, while Raphael gave himself up to the joy, and forgot even Victoria, in the breathless rush over rock and bush, sandhill and watercourse.

'Take care of that dry torrent-bed! Hold up, old horse! This will not last two minutes more. They cannot hold their pace against this breeze. Well tried, good dog, though you did miss him! Ah, that my boy were here! There—they double. Spread right and left, my children, and ride at them as they pass!'

And the ostriches, unable, as Synesius said, to keep their pace against the breeze, turned sharp on their runners, and beating the air with outspread wings, came down the wind again, at a rate even more wonderful than before.

'Ride at him, Raphael—ride at him, and turn him into those bushes!' cried Synesius, sitting an arrow to his bow.

Raphael obeyed, and the bird swerved into the low scrub, the well-trained horse leapt at him like a cat; and Raphael, who dare not trust his skill in archery, struck with his whip at the long neck as it struggled past him, and felled the noble quarry to the ground. He was in the act of springing down to secure his prize, when a shout from Synesius stopped him.

'Are you mad? He will kick out your heart! Let the dogs hold him!'

'Where is the other?' asked Raphael, pointing.

'Where he ought to be. I have not missed; running shot for years a month!'

'Really, you rival the Emperor Commodus himself.'

'Ah! I tried his fancy of crescent-headed arrows once, and decapitated an ostrich or two tolerably—but they are only fit for the amputation—they will not lie safely in the quiver on horseback, I find. But what is that?' And he pointed to a cloud of white dust, about a mile down the valley. 'A herd of antelope! If so, God is indeed gracious to us! Come down—whichever they are, we have no time to lose!'

And collecting his scattered forces, Synesius pushed on rapidly towards the object which had attracted his attention.

'Antelopes!' cried one.

'Wild horses!' cried another.

'Fame ones, rather!' cried Synesius, with a gesture of wrath. 'I saw the flesh of him!'

'The Anserinus!' And a yell of rage rang from the whole troop.

'Will you follow me, children?'

'To death!' shouted they.

'I know it. Oh that I had seven hundred of you, as Abraham had! We would see then whether these scoundrels did not share, within a week, the fate of Chedorbamer!'

'Happy man, who can actually trust your own slaves!' said Raphael, as the party galloped on, tightening their girths and getting ready their weapons.

'Slaves! If the law gives me the power of selling one or two of them who are not yet wise enough to be trusted to take care of themselves, it is a fact which both I and they have long forgotten. Their fathers grew gray at my father's table, and God grant that they may grow gray at mine! We eat together, work together, hunt together, fight together, jest together, and weep together. God help us all! for we have but one common weal. Now—do you make out the enemy, boys?'

'Anserinus, your Holiness. The same party who tried Myrsinitis last week. I know them by the helmets which they took from the Markmen.'

'And with whom are they fighting?'

No one could see. Fighting they certainly were, but their victims were beyond them, and the party galloped on.

'That was a smart business at Myrsintus. The Ausurians appeared while the people were at morning prayers. The soldiers, of course, ran for their lives, and hid in the caverns, leaving the matter to the priests.'

'If they were of your presbytery, I doubt not they proved themselves worthy of their diocesan.'

'Ah, if all my priests were but like them! or my people either!' and Synesius, chatting quietly in full gallop, like a true son of the saddle. They offered up prayers for victory, called out at the head of the peasants, and met the Moors in a narrow pass. Their then hearts failed them a little. Faustis, the deacon, makes them a speech, charges the leader of the robbers, like young David, with a stone, beats his brains out therewith, strips him in the Homeric fashion, and vents the Ausurians with the leader's sword, returns and erects a trophy in due heroic form, and saves the whole valley.

'You should make him archdeacon.'

'I would send him and his townfolk round the province, if I could, crowned with laurel, and proclaim before them at every market place, "These are men of God." With whom in these Ausurians be dealing? Peasants would have been all killed long ago, and soldiers would have run away long ago. It is truly a potent in this country to see a fight last ten minutes. Who can they be? I see them now, and hearing now like men too. They are all on foot but two, and we have not a cohort of infantry left for in my mile round.'

'I know who they are!' cried Raphael, suddenly striking spurs into his horse. 'I will swear in that armour among a thousand. And there is a hint in the midst of them. On! and light, men, if you ever fought in your lives!'

'Softly!' cried Synesius. 'Trust an old soldier, and perhaps alas! that he should have to say it—the best left in this wretched country. Round by the hollow, and take the barbarians suddenly in flank. They will not see us then till we are within twenty paces of them. Ah! you have a thing or two to learn yet, Alen-Esa.'

And chuckling at the prospect of action, the gallant bishop wheeled his little troop and in five minutes more dashed out of the copse with a shout and a flight of arrows, and rushed into the thickest of the fight.

Our cavalry skirmish must be very like another. A crash of horses, a flashing of sword-blades, five minutes of blind confusion, and then those who have not been knocked out of their saddles by their neighbours' knees, and have not cut off their own horses' heads instead of their enemies', find themselves, they know not how, either running away or being run away from—not one blow in ten having taken effect on either side. And even so Raphael, having made vain attempts to cut down several Moors, found himself standing on his head in an altogether undignified posture, among innumerable horses' legs, in all possible frantic motions. To avoid one was to get in the way of another, so he philosophically sat still, speculating on the sensation of having his brains kicked out, till the cloud of legs vanished, and he found himself kneeling abjectly opposite the nose of a mule, on whose back sat, utterly unmoved, a tall and reverend man, in episcopal costume. The stranger, instead of bursting out laughing, as Raphael did, solemnly lifted his hand, and gave him his blessing. The Jew sprang to his feet, heedless of all such courtesies, and, looking round, saw the Ausurians galloping off up the hill in scattered groups, and Synesius standing close by him, waving a bloody sword.

'Is the litter safe?' were his first words.

'Safe, and so are all. I gave you up for killed, when I saw you run through with that lance.'

'Run through? I am as sound in the back as a crocodile,' said Raphael, laughing.

'Probably the fellow took the butt instead of the point,' he said. 'So goes a civilly subtle. I saw you hit three or four fellows running with the flat of your sword.'

'Ah, that explains,' said Raphael, 'why, I thought myself one of the best swordsmen on the Armenian frontier.'

'I suspect that you were thinking of some one besides the Moors,' said Synesius, archly pointing to the litter. And Raphael, for the first time for many a year, blushed like a boy of fifteen, and then turned haughtily away, and remounted his horse, saying, 'Chumsy fool that I was!'

'Thank God rather that you have been kept from the shedding of blood,' said the stranger bishop, in a soft, deliberate voice, with a peculiar clear and delicate intonation. 'It God have given us the victory, why grudge His living spirit my other of His creatures least's ourselves?'

'Because there are so many the more of them left to ravish, burn and slay,' answered Synesius. Nevertheless, I am not going to argue with Augustine.

Augustine. Raphael looked intently at the man, a tall, delicate featured personage, with a lofty and narrow forehead, scarred like his cheeks with the deep furrows of many a doubt and war. Resolute, gentle but unbending was expressed in his thin close-set lips and his clear quiet eye, but the calm of his mighty countenance was the calm of a worn-out volcano, over which centuries must pass before the earthquake-rents be filled with kindly soil, and the cinder slopes grow green with grass and flowers. The Jew's thoughts, however, were soon turned into another channel by the hearty embraces of Majoricus and his son.

'We have caught you again, you traitor!' said the young Tribune, 'you could not escape us, you see, after all.'

'Rather,' said the father, 'we owe him a second debt of gratitude for a second deliverance.'

We were right hard bested when you rode up.

'Oh, he brings nothing but good with him whenever he appears, and then he pretends to be a bird of ill-omen,' said the light-hearted Tribune, putting his arm round her.

Raphael was in his secret heart not sorry to find that his old friends bore him no grudge for his caprice, but all he answered was—

'Pray thank any one but me, I have, as usual, proved myself a fool. But what brings you here, like Gods and Men? It is contrary to all probabilities. One would not admit so astonishing an incident, even in the modern drama.'

'Contrary to none whatsoever, my friend. We found Augustine at Beroni, in act to set off to Synesius—we—one of us, that is, were certain that you would be found with him, and we decided on acting as Augustine's guard, for none of the dastardly garrison dare stir out.'

'One of us,' thought Raphael, '—which one?' And, conquering his pride, he asked, as carelessly as he could, for Victoria.

'She is there in the litter, poor child,' said her father in a serious tone.

'Surely not ill!'

'Alas! either the overwrought excitement of months of heroism broke down when she found us safe at last, or some stroke from God—'

Who can tell what I may not have deserved?—But she has been utterly prostrated in body and mind, ever since we parted from you at Beroni.

The blunt soldier little guessed the meaning of his own words. But Raphael, as he heard, felt a pang shoot through his heart, too keen for him to discern whether it sprang from joy or from despair.

'Come,' cried the cheerful voice of Synesius, 'come, Aben-Ezza, you have knelt for Augustine's blessing already, and now you must enter into the fruition of it. Come, you two philosophers must know each other. Most holy, I entreat you to preach to this friend of mine, at once the wisest and the foolishest of men.'

'Only the latter,' said Raphael, 'but open to any speech of Augustine's, at least when we are safe home, and game enough for Synesius's new guests killed.'

And turning away, he rode silent and sullen by the side of his companions, who began at once to consult together as to the plans of Majoricus and his soldiers.

In spite of himself, Raphael soon became interested in Augustine's conversation. He entered into the subject of Cyrenian misrule and ruin as heartily and shrewdly as any man of the world, and when all the rest were at a loss, the prompt practical hint which cleared up the difficulty was certain to come from him. It was by his advice that Majoricus had brought his soldierly brother, it was his proposal that they should be employed for a fixed period in defending these remote southern boundaries of the province, he checked the impetuosity of Synesius, cheered the despair of Majoricus, appealed to the honour and the Christianity of the soldiers, and seemed to have a word—and that the right word—for every man, and after a while, Aben-Ezza quite forgot the stiffness and deliberation of his manner, and the quaint use of Scripture texts in far-fetched illustrations of every opinion which he propounded. It had seemed at first a mere affectation, but the arguments which it was employed to enforce were in themselves so moderate and so rational, that Raphael began to feel, little by little, that his apparent pedantry was only the result of a wish to refer every matter, even the most vulgar, to some deep and divine rule of right and wrong.

'But you forget all this while, my friends,' said Majoricus at last, 'the danger which you men by sheltering proclaimed rebels.'

'The King of kings has forgiven you rebellion, in that while. He has punished you by the loss of your lands and honours. He has given you your life for a prey in this city of refuge. It remains for you to bring forth worthy fruits of penitence, of which I know none better than those which John the Baptist commanded to the soldiers of old, "Do no violence to any man, and be content with your wages."'

'As for rebels and rebellion,' said Synesius, 'they are matters unknown among us, for where there is no king there can be no rebellion. Whosoever will help us against Ausurius is loyal in our eyes. And as for our political creed, it is simple enough—namely, that the emperor never dies, and that his name is Agamemnon, who fought at Troy, which any of my grooms will prove to you syllogistically enough to satisfy Augustine himself. As thus—'

'Agamemnon was the greatest and the best of kings.'

'The emperor is the greatest and the best of kings.'

'Therefore, Agamemnon is the emperor, and conversely.'

'It had been well,' said Augustine, with a grave smile, 'if some of our friends had held the same doctrine, even at the expense of their legs.'

'Or if,' answered Synesius, 'they believed with us, that the emperor's chamber-lain is a clever old man, with a bald head like my own, Ulysses by name, who was rewarded with the prefecture of all lands south of the Mediterranean, for putting out the Cyclops's eye two years ago. However, enough of this. But you see, you are not in any extreme danger of informers and informers. . . . The real difficulty is, how you will be able to obey Augustine, by being content with your wages—far, lowering his voice, 'you will get literally none.'

'It will be as much as we deserve,' said the young Tribune, 'but my fellows have a trick of eating—'

'They are welcome, then, to all deer and ostriches which they can catch. But I am not only penniless, but reduced myself to live, like the Læstrygons, on meat and nothing else, all crops and stocks for miles round being either burnt or carried off.

'E nullo nihil!' said Augustine, having nothing else to say. But here Raphael woke up on a sudden with—

'Did the Constantinian wheat-ships go to Rome?'

'No, Orastes stopped them when he stopped the Alexandrian convoy.'

'Then the Jews have the wheat, trust them for it, and what they have I have. There are certain moneys of mine lying at interest in the scaports, which will set that matter to rights for a month or two. Do you have an escort to-morrow, and I will haul wheat.'

But, most generous of friends, I can neither repay your interest nor principal.

'It is so. I have spent so much money during the last thirty years in doing nothing but evil, that it is hard if I may not at last spend a little in doing good—I bless his Holiness of Hippo thinks it wrong for you to accept the good will of an infidel.'

'Which of these three,' said Augustine, 'was neighbour to him who fell among thieves, but he who had mercy on him? Verily, my friend Raphael Abou Ezra, thou art not far from the kingdom of God.'

'Of which God?' asked Raphael shyly.

'Of the God of thy forefather Abraham, whom thou shalt hear us worship this evening, if He will. Synesius, have you a church wherein I can perform the evening service, and give a word of exhortation to those my children?'

Synesius sighed. 'There is a ruin, which was last month a church.'

'And is now still. Man did not place there the presence of God, and man cannot expel it.'

And so, sending out hunting parties right and left in chase of everything which had animal life, and jacking up before night till a tolerably abundant supply of game, they went homewards, where Victoria was entrusted to the care of Synesius's old stewardess, and the soldiery were marched straight into the church, while Synesius's servants, to whom the Latin service would have been unintelligible, busied themselves in cooking the still water gruel.

Strongly enough it seemed to Raphael that evening to hear, among those smoke-grimed pillars and fallen rafters, the grand old Hebrew psalms of his nation ring abed, to the very chants, too, which were said by the rabbis to have been used in the Temple-worship of Jerusalem. There, and the invocations, thanksgivings, blessings, the very ordinary ceremonial itself, were all Hebrew, robust of the thoughts, the words of his own ancestors. This lesson from the book of Proverbs, which Augustine's deacon was reading in Latin—the blood of the man who wrote these words was flowing in Abou-Ezra's veins. Was it a mistake, an hypocrisy? or were they indeed worshipping, as they fancied, the Ancient One who spoke face to face with his forefathers, the Archetype of man, the friend of Abraham and of Israel?

And now the sermon began, and as Augustine stood for a moment in prayer in front of the ritual altar, every furrow in his worn face lit up by a ray of moonlight which streamed in through the broken roof, Raphael waited impatiently for his speech. What would he, the rhimed disbeliever, the ancient teacher of heathen rhetoric, the courtly and learned student, the ascetic celibate and theosophist, have to say to those coarse war-worn soldiers, Thaurians and Markmen, Gauls and Belgians, who sat watching there, with those sad earnest faces? What one thought or feeling in common could there be between Augustine and his congregation?

At last, after signing himself with the cross, he began. The subject was one of the psalms which had just been read—a battle-psalm, concerning Moab and Amalek, and the old border wars of Palestine. What would he make of that?

He seemed to start finely enough, in spite of the exquisite grace of his voice, and manner and language, and the epigrammatic fineness of every sentence. He spent some minutes over the inscription of the psalm, allegorised it—made it mean something which it never did mean in the writer's mind, and which it, as Raphael well knew, never could mean in his interpretation was founded on a sheer mis-translation. He pinned on the Latin version, derived the meaning of Hebrew words from Latin etymologies. And as he went on with the psalm itself, the common sense of David seemed to evaporate in mysticism. The most realistic and unbiassed illustrations drawn from the commonest objects, alternated with mysterious theosophic dogma. When was that beginning for which he was so famed? Where was that treasure for the old Hebrew Scriptures which he professed? He was to ring David is all is Hypatia used to treat Homer—worse even than old Philo did, when in the home life of the old Fathers, and in the nightly acts of Moses and Joshua, he could find nothing but spiritual allegories wherewith to pump the private experiences of the secluded theosophist. And Raphael felt very much inclined to get up and go away, and still more inclined to say, with a sob, in his haste, 'All men are fools.'

And yet, what an illustration that last was! No more time, but a real deep glow into the working of the material universe, is symbolic of the spiritual and immaterial. And not drawn, as Hypatia was, exclusively from some sublime or portentous phenomenon, but from some dog, or kettle, or fishwife, with a homely insight worthy of old Socrates himself. How personal he was becoming, too! No long bursts of declamation, but dramatic dialogue and interrogation, by hints and unexpected hits it once and the other most common place soldier's failing. And yet each pithy rebuke was put in a universal, comprehensive form, which made Raphael himself wince—which might, he thought, have made any man or woman either, wince in like manner. Well, whether or not Augustine knew truths for all men, he at least knew sins for all men, and for himself as well as his hearers. There was no denying that He was a real man, right or wrong. What he rebuked in others, he had felt in himself, and lought it to the death-grip, as the flash and quiver of that worn face proclaimed.

But yet, why were the Edomites, by an utterly mistaken pun on their name, to signify one sort of sin, and the Ammonites another, and the Amalekites another? What had that to do with the old psalm? What had it to do with the present auditory? Was not this the wildest and lowest form of that unreal, subliming, mystic pedantry, of which he had sickened long ago in Hypatia's lecture room, till he fled to Brian, the dog, for honest practical realities?

No. Gradually, as Augustine's hints became more practical and pointed, Raphael saw that there was in his mind a most real and organic connection, true or false, in what seemed at first mere arbitrary allegory. Amalekites, personal sins, Assurban robbers, and ravishers, were to him only so many different forms of one and the same evil. He who helped any of them fought against the righteous God; he who fought against them fought for that God, but he must conquer the Amalekites within, if he expected to conquer the Amalekites without. Could the legions permanently put down the lust and greed around them, while their own hearts were enslaved to lust and greed within? Would they not be helping it by example, while they pretended to crush it by sword-strokes? Was it not a mockery, an hypocrisy? Could God's blessing be on it? Could they restore unity and peace to the country while there was neither unity nor peace within them? What had produced the helplessness of the people, the ineffectuality of the military, but inward helplessness, inward weakness? They were weak against Moors, because they were weak against enemies more deadly than Moors. How could they fight for God outwardly, while they were fighting against him inwardly? He would not go forth with their hosts. How could He, when He was not among their hosts? He, a spirit, must dwell in their spirits. . . . And then the shout of a king would be among them, and one of them should chase a thousand. Or if not, if both people and soldiers required still further chastening and humbling—what matter, provided that they were chastened and humbled? What matter if their faces were confounded, if they were thereby driven to seek His Name, who alone was the Truth, the Light, and the Life? What if they were slain? Let them have conquered the inward enemies, what matter to them if the outward enemies seemed to prevail for a moment? They should be recompensed at the resurrection of the just, when death was swallowed up in victory. It would be seen then who had really conquered in the eyes of the just God—they, God's ministers, the defenders of peace and justice, or the Assurians, the enemies thereof.

. . . And then, by some quaintest turn of fancy, he introduced a word of pity and hope, even for the wild Moorish robbers. It might be good for them to have succeeded thus far; they might learn from their Christian captives, purified by affliction, truths which those captives had forgotten in prosperity. And, again, it might be good for them, as well as for Christians, to be confounded and made like chaff before the wind, that so they too might learn His Name. And so on, through and in spite of all conceits, allegories, overstrained interpretations, Augustine went on evolving from the Psalms, and from the past, and from the future, the assertion of a Living, Present God, the eternal enemy of discord, injustice, and evil, the eternal helper and deliverer of those who were enslaved and crushed thereby in soul or body. It was all most strange to Raphael. Strange in its utter unlikeness to any teaching, Platonist or Hebrew, which he had ever heard before, and stranger still in its agreement with those teachings, in the instinctive ease with which it seemed to unite and justify them all by the testimony of some one idea—and what that might be, his Jewish prejudices could not prevent his seeing, and yet would not allow him to acknowledge. But, however, he might reckon with Hebrew Jews, however he might long to persuade himself that Augustine was building up a sound and right practical structure on the foundation of a sheer lie, he could not help watching, at first with envy, and then with honest pleasure, the faces of the rough soldiers, as they gradually lighted up into fixed attention, into cheerful and solemn resolve.

'What wonder?' said Raphael to himself, 'what wonder, after all? He has been speaking to these wild beasts as to men and saints, he has been telling them that God is as much with them as with prophets and psalmists. I wonder if Hypatia, with all her beauty, could have touched their hearts as he has done?'

And when Raphael rose at the end of this strange discourse, he felt more like an old Hebrew than he had done since he sat upon his nurse's knee, and heard legends about Solomon and the Queen of Sheba. What if Augustine were right after all? What if the Jehovah of the old Scriptures were not merely the national patron of the children of Abraham, as the Rabbis held, not merely, as Philo held, the Divine Wisdom which inspired a few elect sages, even among the heathen; but the Lord of the whole earth, and of the nations thereof?—And suddenly, for the first time in his life, passages from the psalms and prophets flashed across him, which seemed to assert this. What else did that whole book of Daniel and the history of Nebuchadnezzar mean—if not that? Philo's latitudinarianism had long ago cured him of the Rabbinical notion of the Babylonian conqueror as an incarnate devil, devoted to Tophet, like Sennacherib before him. He had long in private admired the man, as a magnificent human character, a fairer one, in his eyes, than either Alexander or Julius Cæsar. What if Augustine had given him a hint which might justify his admiration? . . . But more.

What if Augustine were right in going even further than Philo and Hypatia? What if this same Jehovah, Wisdom, Logos, call Him what they might, were actually the God of the spirits, as well as of the bodies of all flesh? What if he was as near—Augustine said that He was—to the horrors of those wild Markmen, Gauls, Thracians, as to Augustine's own heart? What if He were—Augustine said He was—yearning after, enlightening, leading home to Himself, the souls of the poorest, the most brutal, the most sinful?—What if He loved man as man, and not merely one favoured race or one favoured class of minds? And in the light of that hypothesis, that strange story of the Cross of Calvary seemed not so impossible after all. But then, ecstacy and asceticism, utterly non-human as they were, what had they to do with the theory of a human God?

And filled with many questionings, Raphael was not sorry to have the matter brought to an issue that very evening in Synesius's sitting-room. Majoricus, in his blunt, soldierlike way, set Raphael and Augustine at each other without circumlocution, and Raphael, after trying to smile and push-pooch away the subject, was tempted to make a jest on a winning fallacious conceit of Augustine's—found it more difficult than he thought to trip up the sonorous and wily logician, lost his temper a little—a sign, perhaps, of returning health in a sceptic and soon found himself fighting desperately, with Synesius backing him, apparently for the mere pleasure of seeing a battle, and Majoricus making him more and more cross by the impetuous dogmatic faith with which he lanced at one Gordian knot after another, till Augustine had to save himself from his friends by tripping the good Prefect gently up, and leaving him miles behind the disputants, who argued on and on, till broad daylight shone in, and the sight of the degradation below recalled all parties to more material weapons, and a sterner warfare.

But little thought Raphael Aben-Ezra, as he sat there, calling up every resource of his wit and learning, in the hope, half malicious, half honestly cautious, of upsetting the sage of Hippo, and forgetting all heaven and earth in the delight of battle with his peers, that in a neighbouring chamber, her tender limbs outspread upon the floor, her face buried in her dishevelled locks lay Victoria, wrestling all night long for him in prayer and bitter tears, as the murmur of busy voices reached her eager ears, longing in vain to catch the sense of words, on which hung now her hopes and bliss—how utterly and entirely, she had never yet confessed to herself, though she dare confess it to that Son of Man to whom she prayed, as to One who fit with tenderness and insight beyond that of a brother, a father, even of a mother, for her maiden's blushes and her maiden's woes.

CHAPTER XXII

PANDEMONIUM

BUT where was Philammon all that week?

For the first day or two of his imprisonment he had raved like some wild beast entrapped. His new-found purpose and energy, thus suddenly damped back and checked, boiled up in frantic rage. He tore at the bars of his prison, he rolled himself, shrieking, on the floor. He called in vain on Hypatia, on Pelagia, on Arcadius—on all but God. Pray he could not, and dare not, for to whom was he to pray? To the stars?—to the Abysses and the Plurimities?

Alas! as Augustine said once, bitterly enough, of his own Manichean teachers, Hypatia had taken away the living God, and given him instead the four elements. And in utter bewilderment and hopeless terror he implored the pity of every guard and gaoler who passed along the corridor, and begged them, as brothers, fathers, men, to help him. Moved it once by his agony and by his exceeding beauty, the rough Thracians, who knew enough of their employer's character to have little difficulty in believing his victim to be innocent, listened to him and questioned him. But when they offered the very help which he implored, and asked him to tell his story, the poor boy's tongue clave to the roof of his mouth. How could he publish his sister's shame? And yet she was about to publish it herself. And instead of words, he met their condolences with fresh agonies, till they gave him up as mad, and, tired by his violence, compelled him, with blows and curses, to remain quiet, and so the week wore out in dull and stupefied despair, which trembled on the very edge of idocy. Night and day were alike to him. The food which was thrust in through his grate remained untasted, hour after hour, day after day, he sat upon the ground, his head buried in his hands, half-dying from mere exhaustion of body and mind. Why should he care to stir, to eat, to live? He had but one purpose in heaven and earth and that one purpose was impossible.

At last his cell-door grated on its hinges. 'Up, my mad youth!' cried a rough voice. 'Up, and thank the favour of the gods, and the bounty of our noble—ahem!—Prefect. To day he gives freedom to all prisoners. And I suppose a pretty boy like you may go about your business, as well as uglier rascals.'

Philammon looked up in the gaoler's face with a dim half-comprehension of his meaning.

'Do you hear?' cried the man with a curse. 'You are free. Jump up or I shut the door again, and your one chance is over.'

'Did she dance Venus Anadyomene?'

'She! Who?'

'My sister! Pelagia!'

'Heaven only knows what she has not danced in her time! But they say she dances to day once more. Quick! out, or I shall not be ready in time for the sports. They began an hour hence. Free admission into the theatre to-day for all—rogues and honest men, Christians and heathens—Chore the boy! he's as mad as ever!

So indeed Philammon scorned, for, springing suddenly to his feet, he rushed out past the gaoler, upsetting him into the corridor, and fled wildly from the prison among the crowd of liberated ruffians, ran from the prison house, from home to the baths, from the baths to the theatre, and was soon pushing his way, regardless of etiquette, towards the lower tiers of benches, in order, he hardly knew why, to place himself as near as possible to the very sight which he dreaded and abhorred.

As fate would have it, the passage by which he had entered opened close to the Prefect's chamber of state, where sat Orestes, gorgeous in his robes of office, and by him—to Philammon's surprise and horror—Hypatia herself!

More beautiful than ever, her forehead sparkling like Juno's own, with a lofty tower of jewels, her white Ionic robe half hidden by a crimson shawl, there sat the vestal, the philosopher. What did she there? But the boy's eager eyes, accustomed but too well to note every light and shade of feeling which crossed that face, saw in a moment how wan and haggard was its expression. She wore a look of constraint, of half-terrible self-resolve, as of a martyr—and yet not an undoubting martyr, for as Orestes turned his head at the stir of Philammon's intrusion, and flashing with anger at the sight, unthought how fiercely back, Hypatia turned too, and as her eyes met her pupil's she blushed crimson, and started, and seemed in act to motion him back also, and then, recollecting herself, whispered something to Orestes which quelled his wrath, and composed herself, or rather sank into her place again, as one who was determined to abide the worst.

A knot of gay young gentlemen, Philammon's fellow-students, pulled him down among them, with welcome and laughter, and before he could collect his thoughts, the curtain in front of the stage had fallen, and the sport began.

The scene represented a background of desert mountains, and on the stage itself, before a group of temporary huts, stood huddled together the black Libyan prisoners, some fifty men, women, and children, bedizened with gaily leathers and girdles of tasselled leather, brandishing their spears and targets, and glaring out with white eyes on the strange scene before them, in childish awe and wonder.

Along the front of the stage a wattle battlement had been erected, while below, the hypocaustum had been painted to represent rocks, thus completing the rough imitation of a village among the Libyan hills.

Amid breathless silence, a herald advanced, and proclaimed that these were prisoners taken in arms against the Roman senate and people, and therefore worthy of immediate death; but that the Prefect, in his exceeding clemency toward them, and especial anxiety to afford the greatest possible amusement to the obedient and loyal citizens of Alexandria, had determined, instead of giving them at once to the beasts, to allow them to fight for their lives, promising to the survivors a free pardon if they acquitted themselves valiantly.

The poor wretches on the stage, when this proclamation was translated to them, set up a barbaric yell of joy, and brandished their spears and targets more fiercely than ever.

But their joy was short. The trumpets sounded the attack—a body of gladiators, equal in number to the savages, marched out from one of the two great side passages, made their obeisance to the applauding spectators, and planting their scaling-ladders against the front of the stage, mounted to the attack.

The Libyans fought like tigers, yet from the first, Hypatia, and Philammon also, could see that their promised chance of life was a mere mockery. Their tight darts and naked limbs were no match for the heavy swords and complete armour of their brutal assailants, who endured carelessly a storm of blows and thrusts on heads and faces protected by visored helmets; yet so fierce was the valour of the Libyans, that even they recoiled twice, and twice the scaling ladders were hurled down again, while more than one gladiator lay below, rolling in the death agony.

And then burst forth the sleeping devil in the hearts of that great barbarised multitude. Yet upon yell of savage triumph, and still more savage disappointment, rang from every tier of that vast ring of seats, at each blow and parry, onslaught and repulse, and Philammon saw with horror and surprise that luxury, refinement, philosophic culture itself, were no safeguards against the infection of blood-hirstiness. Gay and delicate ladies, whom he had seen three days before smothering delight at Hypatia's heavenward aspirations, and some, too, whom he seemed to recollect in Christian churches spring from their seats, waved their hands and handkerchiefs, and clapped and shouted to the gladiators. For, thus, there was no doubt as to which side the favour of the spectators inclined. With taunts, jeers, upbraiding, entreaties, the hired ruffians were urged on to their work of blood. The poor wretches heard no voice raised in their favour—nothing but contempt, hatred, eager lust of blood, glared from those thousands of pitiless eyes, and, broken-hearted, despairing, they flung and drew back one by one. A shout of triumph greeted the gladiators as they climbed over the battlement, and gained a footing on the stage. The wretched blacks broke up, and fled wildly from corner to corner, looking vainly for an outlet.

And then began a butchery. Some fifty men, women, and children were cooped together in that narrow space. And yet Hypatia's countenance did not falter. Why should it? What were their numbers, beside the thousands who had perished year by year for centuries, by that and far worse deaths, in the amphitheatres of that empire, for that faith delicate line and grace of the beautiful maiden figures, while Hephestus turned toward the curtain, and seemed to await impatiently the forthcoming of the goddess.

Every lip was breathless with expectation as the flutes swelled louder and nearer, horns and cymbals took up the harmony, and, to a triumphant burst of music, the curtain rose, and a simultaneous shout of delight burst from ten thousand voices.

The scene behind represented a magnificent temple, half hidden in an artificial wood of tropic trees and shrubs, which filled the stage. Kannas and Dryads peeped laughing from among their stems, and gorgeous birds, tethered by unseen threads, fluttered and sang among their branches. In the centre an over-arching avenue of palms led from the temple doors to the front of the stage, from which the mimic battlements had disappeared, and had been replaced, in those few moments, by a broad slope of smooth green sward, leading down into the orchestra, and fringed with myrtles, roses, myrtle trees, poppies, and emerson hyacinths, studded with the like blood of Adonis.

The folding doors of the temple opened slowly, the crash of instruments resounded from within, and, preceded by the musicians, came forth the triumph of Aphrodite, and passed down the slope, and down the outer ring of the orchestra.

A splendid car, drawn by white oxen, bore the rarest and grandest of foreign flowers and hints, which young girls, dressed as Hours and Seasons, strewed in front of the procession and among the spectators.

A long line of beautiful youths and maidens, crowned with garlands and robed in scales of purple gauze, followed by two and two a pair carried or led a pair of wild animals, captives of the conquering might of Beauty.

Foremost were borne, on the wrists of the actors, the birds especially sacred to the goddess—doves and sparrows, wrens and swallows, and a pair of gigantic Indian tortoises, rich ridden by a lovely nymph, showed that Orestes had not forgotten our wish, at least, of his intended bride.

Then followed strange birds from India, parakeets, peacocks, pheasants silver and golden, bustards and ostriches—the latter, hestridden each by a tiny enjod, were led on in golden leashes, followed by antelopes and oryxes, elks from beyond the Danube, four-horned rams from the Isles of the Hyperborean Ocean, and the strange hybrid of the Libyan hills, believed by all spectators to be half-bull half-horse. And then a miriad of delighted awe ran through the theatre, as bears and leopards, lions and tigers, fettered in heavy chains of gold, and made gentle for the occasion by narcotics, paced sedately down the slope, obedient to their beautiful guides, while behind them, the unwieldy bulk of two double horned rhinoceroses, from the far south, was overtopped by the long slender necks and large soft eyes of a pair of giraffes, such as had not been seen in Alexandria for more than fifty years.

A cry arose of 'Orestes! Orestes! Health to the illustrious Prefect! Thanks for his liberty!' And a loud voice or two among the crowd cried, 'Hail to Orestes! Hail, Emperor of Africa!' But there was no response.

'The rose is still in the bud,' whispered Orestes to Hypatia. He rose, bowed and bowed the crowd into silence, and then, after a short pantomimic exhibition of rapturous gratitude and humility, pointed triumphantly to the palm avenue, among the shadows of which appeared the wonder of the day—the huge tusks and trunk of the white elephant himself.

There it was at last! Not a doubt of it! A real elephant, and yet as white as snow. Sight never seen before in Alexandria—never to be seen again! 'Oh, thrice blest men of Macedonia!' shouted some worthy on high, 'the gods are bountiful to you this day!' And all mouths and eyes confirmed the opinion, as they opened wide and set water to drink in the inexhaustible joy and glory.

On he paced solemnly, while the whole theatre resounded to his heavy tread, and the Fauns and Dryads led in train. A choir of nymphs swung round him hand in hand, and sang, as they danced along, the conquering might of Beauty, the triumph of breasts and men and deities. Skimming parties of little winged cupids sprang themselves over the orchestra, from left to right, and pelted the spectators with perfumed comfits, shot among them from their tiny bows arrows of fragrant sandal-wood, or swung smoking censers, which laden the air with intoxicating odours.

The procession came on down the slope, and the elephant approached the spectators, his tusks were wreathed with roses and myrtles, his ears were jewelled with splendid earrings, a jewelled frontlet hung between his eyes, Eros himself, a lovely winged boy, sat on his neck, and guided him with the point of a golden arrow. But what precious thing was it which that child formed car upon his back contained? The goddess! Pelagos Aphrodite herself!

Yes, whiter than the snow-white elephant more rosy than the pink tipped shell on which she lay, among crimson cushions and silver gauze, there shone the goddess, thrilling all hearts with those delicious smiles, and glances of the bashful playful eyes, and grateful wavings of her tiny hand, as the whole theatre rose with one accord, and ten thousand eyes were concentrated on the unequalled loveliness beneath them.

Twice the procession passed round the whole circumference of the orchestra, and then returning from the foot of the slope towards the central group around Hephestus, deployed right and left in front of the stage. The lions and tigers were led away into the side passages, the youths and maidens combined themselves with the gentler animals into groups lessening gradually from the centre to the wings, and stood expectant, while the elephant came forward, and knelt behind the platform destined for the goddess.

The valves of the shell closed. The Graces unloosed the fastenings of the car. The elephant turned his trunk over his back, and, guided by the hands of the girls, grasped the shell, and lifting it high in air, deposited it on the steps at the back of the platform.

Hephaestus humped forward, and, with his most uncouth gestures, signified the delight which he had in bestowing such a sight upon his faithful uterine of Alexandria, and the unspeakable enjoyment which they were to expect from the mystic dance of the goddess, and then retired, leaving the Graces to advance in front of the platform, and with their arms twined round each other, began Hyppatia's song of invocation.

As the first strophe died away, the valves of the shell reopened, and discovered Aphrodite crouching on one knee within. She raised her head, and gazed around the vast circle of seats. A mild surprise was on her countenance, which quickened into delightful wonder, and bashfulness struggling with the sense of new enjoyment and new powers. She glanced downward at herself, and smiled, astonished at her own loveliness, then upward at the sky, and scoured wildly, with an awful joy, to spring up into the boundless void. Her whole figure dilated, she seemed to drink in strength from every object which met her in through the universe around, and slowly, from among the shells and seaweeds, she rose to her full height, the mystic cestus glittering round her waist, in deep festoons of emeralds and pearls, and stepped forward upon the marble sea-floor, wringing the dripping perfume from her locks, as Aphrodite rose of old.

For the first minute the crowd was too breathless with pleasure to think of applause. But the goddess seemed to require due homage, and when she folded her arms across her bosom, and stood motionless for an instant, as if to demand the worship of the universe, every tongue was loosed, and a thunderous clap of 'Aphrodite!' rang out across the roofs of Alexandria, and strayed Cyril in his chamber at the Serapeum, and weary innkeepers on distant sand hills, and dozing mariners far out at sea.

And then began a miracle of art, such as was only possible among a people of the free and exquisite physical training, and the delicate aesthetic perception of those old Greeks, even in their most fallen days. A dance, in which every motion was a word, and rest as eloquent as motion, in which every attitude was a fresh motive for a sculptor of the purest school, and the highest physical activity was manifested, not as in the coarser comic pantomimes, in fantastic bounds and unnatural distortions, but in perpetual delicate modulations of a stately and self-restraining grace. The artist was for the moment transformed into the goddess. The theatre, and Alexandria, and the gorgeous pageant beyond, had vanished from her imagination, and therefore from the imagination of the spectators, under the constraining inspiration of her art, and they and she alike saw nothing but the lonely sea around Cythera, and the goddess hovering above its emerald mirror, rayed forth on sea, and air, and shore, beauty, and joy, and love.

Phanamon's eyes were bursting from his head with shame and horror, and yet he could not hate her, not even despise her. He would have done so, had there been the faintest trace of human feeling in her countenance to prove that some germ of moral sense lingered within; but even the hint bluish and the downcast eye with which she had entered the theatre were gone, and the only expression on her face was that of intense enjoyment of her own activity and skill, and satisfied vanity, as of a petted child.

Was she accountable? A reasonable soul, capable of right or wrong at all? He hoped not. He would trust not. And still Pelagia danced on, and for a whole age of agony, he could see nothing in heaven or earth but the bewitching maze of those white feet, as they twinkled over their white image in the marble mirror. At last it was over. Every limb suddenly collapsed, and she stood drooping in soft self-satisfied fatigue, awaiting the burst of applause which rang through Phanamon's ears, proclaiming to heaven and earth, as with a mighty trumpet-blast, his sister's shame.

The elephant rose, and moved forward to the side of the slab. His back was covered with crimson cushions, on which it seemed Aphrodite was to return without her shell. She folded her arms across her bosom, and stood smiling, as the elephant gently wreathed his trunk around her waist, and lifted her slowly from the slab, in act to place her on his back.

The little feet, clung, half fearfully together, had just risen from the marble.—The elephant started, dropped his delicate burden lightly on the slab, looked down, raised his forefoot, and throwing his trunk into the air, gave a shrill scream of terror and disgust.

The foot was red with blood—the young boy's blood—which was soaking and bubbling up through the fresh sand where the elephant had trodden, in a round, dark, purple spot.

Phanamon could bear no more. Another moment and he had tumbled down through the dense mass of spectators, clearing rank after rank of seats by the sheer strength of madness, leaped the balustrade into the orchestra below, and rushed across the space to the foot of the platform.

'Pelagia! Sister! My sister! Have mercy on me! on yourself! I will hide you! Save you! and we will flee together out of this infernal place! this world of devils! I am your brother! Come!'

She looked at him one moment with wide, wild eyes.—The truth flashed on her—

'Brother!'

And she sprang from the platform into his arms. A vision of a lofty window in Athens, looking out over far olive-yards and gardens, and the bright roofs and basins of the Piræus, and the broad blue sea, with the purple peaks of Ægina beyond all . . . And a dark-eyed boy, with his arm around her neck, pointed laughing to the twinkling masts in the far harbour, and called her sister. The dead soul woke within her, and with a wild cry she recoiled from him in an agony of shame, and covering her face with both her hands, sank down among the blood-stained sand.

A yell, as of all hell broke loose, rang along that vast circle—

'Down with him!' 'Away with him!' 'Crucify the slave!' 'Give the barbarian to the beasts!' 'To the beasts with him, noble Prefect!' A crowd of attendants rushed upon him, and many of the spectators sprang from their seats, and were on the point of leaping down into the orchestra.

Philemon turned upon them like a lion at bay, and clear and loud his voice rose through the roar of the multitude.

'Ay! murder me as the Romans murdered Saint Telemachus! Slaves as besotted and accursed as your besotted and accursed tyrants! Lower than the beasts whom you employ as your butchers! Murder and let go fitly hand in hand, and the throne of my sister's shame is well built on the blood of innocents! Let my death end the devil's sacrifice, and fill up the cup of your iniquity!'

'To the beasts!' 'Make the elephant trample him to powder!'

And the huge brute, guided on by the attendants, rushed on the youth, while Eias leaped from his neck, and fled weeping up the slope.

He caught Philemon in his trunk and raised him high in air. For an instant the great bellowing ocean of heads spun round and round. He tried to breathe off prayer, and shut his eyes—Pelagia's voice rang sweet and clear, even in the shrillness of intense agony—

'Spare him! He is my brother! Forgive him, men of Macedonia! For Pelagia's sake—Yon Pelagia! One boon—only this one!'

And she stretched her arms imploringly toward the spectators, and then clasping the huge knees of the elephant, called maddly to it in terms of passionate entreaty and endearment.

The men wavered. The brute did not. Quietly he lowered his trunk, and set down Philemon on his feet. The monk was saved. Breathless and dizzy, he found himself hurried away by the attendants, dragged through dark passages, and hurled out into the street, with curses, warnings, and congratulations, which fell on an unheeding ear.

But Pelagia kept her face still hidden in her hands, and rising, walked slowly back, crushed by the weight of some tremendous awe, across the orchestra, and up the slope; and vanished among the palms and oleanders, regardless of the applause and entreaties, and jeers, and threats, and curses, of that great multitude of sinful slaves.

For a moment all Orestes's spells seemed broken by this unexpected catastrophe. A cloud, whether of disgust or of disappointment, hung upon every brow. More than one Christian rose hastily to depart, touched with real remorse and shame at the horrors of which they had been the willing witnesses. The common people behind, having glistened their curiosity with all that there was to see, began openly to murmur at the cruelty and heathenry of it. Hypatia, utterly unnerved, hid her face in both her hands. Orestes alone rose with the crisis. Now, or never, was the time for action, and stepping forward, with his most graceful obeisance, waved his hand for silence, and began his well-studied oration.

'Let me not, O men of Macedonia, suppose that you can be disturbed from that equanimity which befits politicians, by so light an accident as the caprice of a dancer. The spectacle which I have had the honour and delight of exhibiting to you—(Roars and applause from the liberated prisoners and the young gentlemen) and on which it seemed to me you have deigned to look with not altogether unkindly eyes—(Fresh applause, in which the Christian mob, relenting, began to join)—is but a pleasant prelude to three more serious business for which I have drawn you here together. Other testimonials of my good intentions have not been wanting in the release of suffering innocents, and in the largesse of food, the growth and natural property of Egypt, destined by your late tyrants to pamper the luxury of a distant court. Why should I boast?—yet even now this hour is weary, these limbs fail me, worn out in ceaseless efforts for your welfare, and in the perpetual administration of the strictest justice. For a time has come in which the Macedonian race, whose boast is the gorgeous city of Alexander, must rise again to the political pre-eminence which they held of old, and becoming once more the masters of one-third of the universe, be treated by their rulers as freemen, citizens, heroes, who have a right to choose and to employ their rulers.

'Rulers, did I say? Let us forget the world, and substitute in its place the more philosophical terms of ministers. To be your minister—the servant of you all—To sacrifice myself, my leisure, health, life, if need be, to the one great object of securing the independence of Alexandria—This is my work, my hope, my glory—longed for through weary years now for the first time possible by the fall of the late puppet Emperor of Rome. Men of Macedonia, remember that Honorius reigns no more! An African sits on the throne of the Cæsars! Herakleus, by one decisive victory, has gained, by the favour of Heaven, the imperial purple, and a new era opens for the world. Let the conqueror of Rome balance his account with that Byzantine court, so long the incubus of our Trans-Mediterranean wealth and civilisation, and let a free, independent, and united Africa rally round the palaces and docks of Alexandria, and find there its natural centre of polity and of prosperity.'

A roar of hired applause interrupted him and not a few, half for the sake of his compliments and fine words, half from a natural wish to be on the right side—namely, the one which happened to be in the ascendant for the time being—joined.

The city authorities were on the point of crying, 'Imperator Orestes,' but thought better of it, and waited for some one else to cry first—being respectable. Whereon the Prefect of the Guards, being a man of some presence of mind, and also not in anywise respectable, picked up the Prefect of the docks with the point of his dagger, and bade him, with a fearful threat, take care how he played traitor. The worthy burcher roared incontinently—whether with pain or patriotism, and the whole array of respectabilities—having found a Curtius who would leap into the gulf, joined in unanimous chorus, and saluted Orestes as Emperor, while Hypatia, amid the shouts of her aristocratic scholars, rose and knelt before him, withering inwardly with shame and despair, and entreating him to accept that titelage of Greek commerce, supremacy, and philosophy which was forced on him by the unanimous voice of an adoring people.

'It is false!' shouted a voice from the highest tiers, appropriated to the women of the lower classes, which made all turn their heads in bewilderment.

'False! false! you are tricked! He is tricked! Herachian was utterly routed at Ostia, and is fled to Carthage, with the emperor's fleet in chase.'

'She hes! Drag the beast down!' cried Orestes, utterly thrown off his balance by the sudden check.

'She? He! I, a monk, brought the news! Cyril has known it—every Jew in the Delta has known it, for a week just! So perish all the cunninges of the Lord, caught in their own snare!'

And bursting desperately through the women who surrounded him, the monk vanished. An awful silence fell on all who heard. For a minute every man looked in his neighbour's face as if he longed to cut his throat, and get rid of one witness, at least, of his treason. And then arose a tumult, which Orestes in vain attempted to subdue. Whether the populace believed the monk's words or not, they were panic-stricken at the mere possibility of their truth. Horses with denzing, protesting, appealing, the would-be emperor had at last to summon his guards around him and Hypatia, and make his way out of the theatre as best he could, while the multitude melted away like snow before the rain, and poured out into the streets in eddying and roaring streams, to find every church placarded by Cyril with the particulars of Herachian's ruin.

CHAPTER XXIII

NEMESIS

THAT evening was a hideous one in the palace of Orestes. His agonies of disappointment, rage, and terror were at once so shameful and so fearful, that none of his slaves dare approach him, and it was not till late that his confidential secretary, the Chaldean eunuch, driven by terror of the exasperated Catholics, ventured into the tiger's den, and represented to him the immediate necessity for action.

What could he do? He was committed—Cyril only knew how deeply. What might not the wily archbishop have discovered? What might not he pretend to have discovered? What accusations might he not send off on the spot to the Byzantine Court?

'Let the gates be guarded, and no one allowed to leave the city,' suggested the Chaldee.

'Keep in monks? as well keep in rats! No, we must send off a counter-report, instantly.'

'What shall I say, your Excellency?' quoth the ready scribe, pulling out pen and inkhorn from his sash.

'What do I care? Any lie which comes to hand. What in the devil's name are you here for at all, but to invent a lie when I want one?'

'True, my lord, and the worthy set nimbly down to his paper—but did not proceed rapidly.'

'I don't see anything that would suit the emergency, unless I stated, with your august leave, that Cyril, and not you, celebrated the gladiatorial exhibition, which might hardly appear credible.'

Orestes burst out laughing, in spite of himself. The sleek Chaldee smiled and parried in return. The victory was won, and Orestes, somewhat more master of himself, began to turn his vulpine cunning to the one absorbing question of the saving of his worthless neck.

'No, that would be too good. Write, that we had discovered a plot on Cyril's part to incorporate the whole of the African churches (mind and speech Carthage and Hippo) under his own jurisdiction, and to throw off allegiance to the Patriarch of Constantinople, in case of Herachian's success.'

The secretary purred delighted approval, and scribbled away now with right good heart.

'Herachian's success, your Excellency.'

'We of course desired, by every means in our power, to gratify the people of Alexandria, and, as was our duty, to excite by every lawful method their loyalty toward the throne of the Cesars (never mind who sat on it) at so critical a moment.'

'So critical a moment.'

'But as faithful Catholics, and abhorring, even in the extremest need, the sin of Uzzah, we dreaded to touch with the unsanctified hands of laymen the consecrated ark of the Church, even though for its preservation.'

'Its preservation, your Excellency.'

'We, therefore, as civil magistrates, felt bound to confine ourselves to those means which were already allowed by law and custom to our jurisdiction, and accordingly made use of those largesses, spectacles, and public execution of rebels, which have unhappily appeared to his holiness the patriarch (too ready, perhaps, to find a cause of complaint against faithful adherents of the Byzantine See) to partake of the nature of those ghastly exhibitions, which are equally abhorrent to the spirit of the Catholic Church, and to the charity of the sainted emperors by whose pious edicts they have been long since abolished.

'Your Excellency is indeed great—but pardon your slave's remark—my simplicity is of opinion that it may be asked why you did not inform the Augusta Pulchra of Cyril's conspiracy?'

'Say that we sent a messenger off three months ago, but that—Make something happen to him, stupid, and save me the trouble.'

'Shall I kill him by Arabs in the neighbourhood of Palmyra, your Excellency?'

'Let me see—No. They may make inquiries there. Drown him at sea. Nobody can ask questions of the sharks.'

'Foundered between Tyre and Crete, from which sad calamity only one man escaped on a raft, and being picked up, after three weeks' exposure to the fury of the elements, by a returning wheat-ship—By the way, most noble, what am I to say about those wheat-ships not having even sailed?'

'Head of Augustus! I forgot them utterly. Say that—say that the plague was making such ravages in the harbour quarter that we feared carrying the infection to the seat of the empire, and let them sail to-morrow.'

The secretary's face lengthened.

'My fidelity is compelled to remark, even at the risk of your just indignation, that half of them have been unloaded again in your munificent largesses of the last two days.'

Orestes swore a great oath.

'Oh, that the numb had but one throat, that I might give them an emetic! Well, we must buy more corn, that's all.'

The secretary's face grew longer still.

'The Jews, most august—'

'What of them?' yelled the hapless Prefect.

'Have they been forestalling?'

'My assiduity has discovered this afternoon that they have been buying up and exporting all the provisions which they could obtain.'

'Scoundrels! Then they must have known of Heraclian's failure!'

'Your sagacity has, I fear, divined the truth. They have been betting largely against his success for the last week, both in Canopus and Pelusium.'

'For the last week! Then Miriam betrayed me knowingly! And Orestes broke forth again into a paroxysm of fury.

'Here—call the tribune of the guard! A hundred gold pieces to the man who brings me the witch alive!'

'She will never be taken alive.'

'Dead, then—in any way! Go, you Chaldees hound! What are you hesitating about?'

'Most noble lord,' said the secretary, prostrating himself upon the floor, and kissing his master's feet in an agony of fear. 'Remember, that if you touch one Jew you touch all! Remember the bonds! Remember the—the—your own most august reputation, in short.'

'Get up, brute, and don't grovel there, but tell me what you mean, like a human being! If old Miriam is once dead, her bonds die with her, don't they?'

'Alas, my lord, you do not know the customs of that accursed folk. They have a damnable practice of treating every member of their nation as a brother, and helping each other and faithfully without reward; whereby they are enabled to plunder all the rest of the world, and thrive themselves, from the least to the greatest. Don't fancy that your bonds are in Miriam's hands. They have been transferred months ago. Your real creditors may be in Carthage, or Rome, or Byzantium, and they will attack you from thence, while all that you would find if you seized the old witch's property, would be papers, useless to you, belonging to Jews all over the empire, who would rise as one man in defence of their money. I assure you, it is a net without a bottom. If you touch me you touch all. And besides, my diligence, expecting some such command, has already taken the liberty of making inquiries as to Miriam's place of abode, but it appears, I am sorry to say, utterly unknown to any of your Excellency's servants.'

'You lie!' said Orestes. 'I would much sooner believe that you have been warning the hag to keep out of the way.'

Orestes had spoken, for that once in his life, the exact truth. The secretary, who had his own private dealings with Miriam, felt every particular atom of his skin shudder at those words, and had he had hair on his head, it would certainly have betrayed him by standing visibly on end. But as he was, luckily for him, close shaven, his turban remained in its proper place, as he meekly replied—

'Alas! a faithful servant can feel no keener sorrow than the careless suspicion of that sin before whose rays he daily prostrates his—'

'Confound your periphrases! Do you know where she is?'

'No!' cried the wretched secretary, driven to the last extremity, and confirmed the negation with such a string of oaths, that Orestes stopped his volubility with a kick, borrowed of him, under threat of torture, a thousand gold pieces as largess to the solihery, and ended by concentrating the stationaries round his own palace, for the double purpose of protecting himself in case of a riot, and of increasing the chances of the said riot, by leaving the distant quarters of the city without police.

'If Cyril would but make a fool of himself, now that he is in the full-blown pride of victory—the rascal!—about that Ammonius, or about Hypatia, or anything else, and give me a real handle against him! After all, truth works better than lying now and then. Oh, that I could poison him! But one can't bribe those ecclesiastics, and as for the dagger, one could not hire a man to be torn in pieces by monks. No, I must just sit still, and see what Fortune's dice may turn up. Well, your pedants like Aristides or Epaminondas—thank Heaven, the race of them has died out long ago!—might call this no very creditable piece of provincial legislation, but after all, it is about as good as any now going, or likely to be going till the world's end, and one can't be expected to strike out a new path. I shall stick to the wisdom of my predecessors, and—oh, that Cyril may make a fool of himself to-night!

And Cyril did make a fool of himself that night, for the first and last time in his life, and suffers for it, as wise men are wont to do when they err, to this very day and hour. But how much Orestes gained by his father's false move cannot be decided till the end of this story, perhaps not even then.

CHAPTER XXIV

LOST LAMBS

AND PHILAMMON!

For a long while he stood in the street outside the theatre, too much stunned to determine on any course of action, and, ere he had recovered his self-possession, the crowd began to pour from every outlet, and filling the street, swept him away in its stream.

Then, as he heard his sister's name, in every tone of pity, contempt, and horror, mingle with their angry exclamations, he awoke from his dream, and, hursting through the mob, made straight for Pelagia's house.

It was fast closed, and his repeated knocks at the gate brought only, after long waiting, a surly negro face to a little wicket.

He asked eagerly and instinctively for Pelagia, of course she had not yet returned. For Wulf he was not within. And then he took his station close to the gateway, while his heart beat loud with hope and dread.

At last the Goths appeared, forcing their way through the mob in a close column. There were no hitters with them. Where, then, were Pelagia and her girls? Where, too, was the hated figure of the Anax and Wulf, and Smid? The man came on, led by Goderie and Agalmond, with folded arms, knitted brows, downcast eyes, a stern disgust, not unmingled with shame on every countenance, told Philammon afresh of his sister's infamy.

Goderie passed him close, and Philammon summoned up courage to ask for Wulf.

Pelagia he had not courage to name.

'Out, Greek hound! we have seen enough of your accursed race to-day! What? are you trying to follow us in?' And the young man's sword flashed from its sheath so swiftly, that Philammon had but just time enough to spring back into the street, and wait there, in an agony of disappointment and anxiety, as the gates shut together again, and the house was as silent as before.

For a miserable hour he waited, while the mob thickened instead of flowing away, and the scattered groups of chattering began to form themselves into masses, and parade the streets with shouts of 'Down with the heathen!' 'Down with the idolaters!' 'Vengeance on all blaspheming hatlots!'

At last the steady tramp of legionaries, and in the midst of the glittering lines of armed men—oh, joy!—a string of hitters!

He sprang forward, and called Pelagia's name again and again. Once he fancied he heard an answer—but the soldiers thrust him back.

'She is safe here, young fool, and has been and been seen quite enough to-day already. Back!'

'Let me speak to her!'

'That is her business. Ours is now to see her home safe!'

'Let me go in with you, I beseech!'

'If you want to go in, knock for yourself when we are gone. If you have any business in the house, they will open to you, I suppose. Out, you interfering puppy!'

And a blow of the spear butt in his chest sent him rolling back into the middle of the street, while the soldiers, having delivered up their charge, returned with the same stolid indifference. In vain Philammon, returning, knocked at the gate—times and threats from the negro were all the answer which he received, and at last, worn into desperation, he waded away, up one street and down another, struggling in vain to form some plan of action for himself, until the sun was set.

Wearily he went homewards at last. Once the thought of Miriam crossed his mind. It was a disgusting alternative to ask help of her, the very author of his sister's shame. But yet she at least could obtain for him a sight of Pelagia, she had promised as much. But then the condition which she had appended to her help! To see his sister, and yet to leave her as she was!—Horrible contradiction! But could he not employ Miriam for his own ends?—outwit her!—deceive her!—for it came to that. The temptation was intense, but it lasted only a moment. 'Could he dole so pure a cause by falsehood?' And hurrying past the Jewess's door, hardly daring to look at it, lest the temptation should return, he darted upstairs to his own little chamber, hastily flung open the door, and stopped short in astonishment.

A woman, covered from head to foot in a large dark veil, stood in the centre of the chamber.

'Who are you? This is no place for you!' cried he, after a minute's pause. She replied only by a shudder and a sob. . . . He caught sight, beneath the folds of the veil, of a too well-known sallow shawl, and springing upon her like the lion on the lamb, clasped to his bosom his sister.

The veil fell from her beautiful forehead. She gazed into his eyes one moment with a look of tranced inquiry, and saw nothing there but love. And clinging heart to heart, brother and sister mingled holy kisses, and strained nearer and nearer still, as if to satisfy their last lingering doubts of each other's kin.

Many a minute passed in silent joy. Philammon dare not speak, he dare not ask her what brought her thither—dare not wake her to recollect the frightful present by questions of the past, of his long-forgotten parents, their home, her history. And, after all, was it not enough for him that he held her at last? her, there by her own will—the lost lamb returned to him?—and their tears mingled as their cheeks were pressed together.

At last she spoke.

'I ought to have known you, I believe I did know you from the first day.' When they mentioned your likeness to me, my heart leapt up within me, and a voice whispered, 'but I would not hear it.' I was ashamed—ashamed to acknowledge my brother, for whom I had sought and longed for years. I was ashamed to think that I had a brother. Ah, God! and ought I not to be ashamed?'

And she broke from him again, and threw herself on the floor.

'Trample upon me, curse me! anything but part me from him!'

Philammon had not the heart to answer her, but he made an involuntary gesture of sorrowful dissent.

'No! Call me what I am—what he called me just now! but do not take me away! Strike me, as he struck me! anything but parting!'

'Struck you? The curse of God be on him!'

'Ah, do not curse him!—not him! It was not a blow, indeed! only a jerk—a touch—and it was my fault—all mine. I angered him. I upbraided him—I was mad. Oh, why did he deceive me? Why did he let me dance?—command me to dance?'

'Command you?'

'He said that we must not break our words. He would not hear me, when I told him that we could deny having promised. I said that promises made over the wine need never be kept.'

Who ever heard of keeping them? And Orestes was drunk, too. But he said that I might teach a Goth to be what I liked, except a liar. Was not that a strange speech?'

'And Wulf bade him be strong, and blast him for it.'

'He was right,' sobbed Philammon.

'Then I thought he would love me for abusing him, though I loathed it!—Oh, God, how I loathed it! But how could I fancy that he did not like my doing it? Who ever heard of any one doing of their own will what they did not like?'

Philammon sobbed again, as the poor civilised savage artlessly opened to him all her moral darkness. What could he say? He knew what to say. The disease was so utterly patent, that any of Cyril's school-children could have supplied the remedy. But how to speak it? how to tell her, before all things, as he longed to do, that there was no hope of her muzzling the Aimal, and, therefore, no peace for her till she left him.

'Then you did hate the—the—' and he, at last, catching at some gleam of light.

'Hate it? Do I not belong, body and soul, to him?—him only? And yet—Oh, I must tell you all! When I and the girls began to practise, all the old feelings came back—the love of being admired, and applauded, and cheered, and dandied is so delicious! so delicious to feel that you are doing anything beautiful perfectly, and better than every one else! And he saw that I liked it, and despised me for it. And, deceitful! he little guessed how much of the pains which I took were taken to please him, to do my best to fascinate him, to win admiration, only that I might take it home and throw it all at his beloved feet, and make the world say once more, "She has all Alexandria to worship her, and yet she cares but that one Goth more than her—!" But he deceived me, true man that he is! He wished to enjoy my smirks to the last moment, and then to cast me off, when I had once given him an excuse.

'Too cowardly to upbraid me, he let me run myself, to save him the trouble of running me. Oh, men, men! all alike! They love us for their own sakes, and we love them for love's sake. We live by love, we die for love, and yet we never find it, but only selfishness dressed up in love's mask.

And then we take up with that, poor, fond, self-blinded creatures that we are!—and in spite of the poisoned hearts around us, persuade ourselves that our latest esp's egg, at least, will hatch into a dove, and that though all men be faithless, our own traitor can never change, for he is more than man!'

'But he has deceived you! You have found out your mistake. Leave him, then, as he deserves.'

Pelagia looked up, with something of a tender smile. 'Poor darling! little do you know of love!'

Philammon, utterly bewildered by this new and strangest phase of human passion, could only gasp out.

'But do you not love me, too, my sister?'

'Do I not love you? But not as I love him! Oh, hush, hush! you cannot understand yet! And Pelagia hid her face in her hands, while convulsive shudderings ran through every limb.

'I must do it! I must! I will dare everything, stoop to everything for love's sake! Go to her! to the wise woman—to Hypatia! She loves you! I know that she loves you! She will hear you, though she will not me!'

'Hypatia! Do you know that she was sitting there unmoved at—in the theatre?'

'She was forced! Orestes compelled her!'

Miriam told me so. And I saw it in her face. As I passed beneath her, I looked up, and she was as pale as ivory, trembling in every limb. There was a dark hollow round her eyes—she had been weeping, I saw. And I sneered in my mind self-conceit, and said, "She looks as if she was going to be brushed, not married!" But now, now!—Oh, go to her! Tell her that I will give her all I have—jewels, money, dresses, house! Tell her that I—I—entreat her pardon, that I will crawl to her feet myself and ask it, if she requires!—Only let her teach me—teach me to be wise and good, and honoured, and respected, as she is! Ask her to tell a poor broken-hearted woman her secret. She can make old Wulf, and him, and Orates even, and the magistrates, respect her. Ask her to teach me how to be like her, and to make him respect me again, and I will give her all an!"

Philammon hesitated. Something within warned him, as the Demon used to warn Socrates, that his errand would be bootless. He thought of the theatre, and of that firm, compressed lip, and forgot the hollow eye of misery which accompanied it, in his wrath against his lately worshipped idol.

"Oh, go! go! I tell you it was against her will. She told for me—I saw it!—Oh, God!—when I did not feel for myself!" And I hated her, because she seemed to despise me in my fool's triumph! She cannot despise me now in my misery. Go! Go! or you will drive me to the agony of going myself."

"There was but one thing to be done. 'You will wait, then, here! You will not leave me again?'

"Yes. But you must be quick! If he finds out that I am away, he may fancy. Ah, heaven! let him kill me, but never let him be jealous of me! Go now! this moment! Take this as an earnest—the cestus which I wore there. Horrid thing! I hate the sight of it! But I brought it with me on purpose, or I would have thrown it into the canal. There, say it is in earnest—only an earnest—of what I will give her!"

In ten minutes more Philammon was in Hypatia's hall. The household seemed full of terror and disturbance, the hall was full of soldiers. At last Hypatia's favourite maid passed, and knew him. Her mistress could not speak with any one. Where was Theon, then? He, too, had shut himself up. Never mind. Philammon must, would speak with him. And he pleaded so passionately and so sweetly, that the soft-hearted damsel, unable to resist so handsome a suppliant, undertook his errand, and led him up to the library, where Theon, pale as death, was pacing to and fro, apparently half beside himself with terror.

Philammon's breathless message fell at first upon unheeding ears.

"A new pupil, sir! Is this a time for pupils, when my house, my daughter's life, is not safe? Wretch that I am! And have I led her into the snare? I, with my vain ambition and covetousness! Oh, my child! my child! my one treasure! Oh, the double curse which will light upon me, if—"

"She asks for but one interview."

"With my daughter, sir? Pelagia! Will you insult me? Do you suppose, even if her own pity should so far tempt her to degrade herself, that I could allow her so to contaminate her purity?"

"Your terror, sir, excuses your rudeness."

"Rudeness, sir? the rudeness lies in your intruding on us at such a moment!"

"Then this, perhaps, may, in your eyes at least, excuse me in my turn." And Philammon held out the cestus. "You are a better judge of its value than I. But I am commissioned to say, that it is only an earnest of what she will give willingly and at once, even to the half of her wealth, for the honour of becoming your daughter's pupil." And he laid the jewelled girdle on the table.

The old man halted in his walk. The emeralds and pearls shone like the galaxy. He looked at them, and walked on again more slowly. What might be their value? What might it not be? At least, they would pay all his debts.

And after hovering to and fro for another minute before the hut, he turned to Philammon. "If you would promise to mention the thing to no one—"

"I will promise."

"And in case my daughter, as I have a right to expect, shall refuse—"

"Let her keep the jewels. Their owner has harmed, thank God, to despise and hate them! Let her keep the jewels—and my curse! For God do so to me, and more also, if I ever see her face again!"

The old man had not heard the latter part of Philammon's speech. He had seized his hat as greedily as a crocodile, and hurried off with it into Hypatia's chamber, while Philammon stood expectant, possessed with a new and fearful doubt. "Degrade herself!" "Contaminate her purity!" It that notion were to be the hint of all her philosophy! If selfishness, pride, Pharisaism, were all its outcome! Why—had they not been its outcome already? When had he seen her helping, even pitying, the poor, the outcast? When had he heard from her one word of real sympathy for the sorrowing, for the sinful? He was still lost in thought when Thron re-entered, bringing a letter.

"From Hypatia to her well-beloved pupil!"

"I pity you—how should I not! And more I thank you for this your request, for it shows me that my unwilling presence at the hideous pageant of to-day has not alienated from me a soul of which I had cherished the noblest hopes, for which I had sketched out the loftiest destiny. But how shall I say it? Ask yourself whether a change—apparently impossible—must not take place in her for whom you plead, before she and I can meet. I am not so inhuman as to blame you for having asked me, I do not even blame her for being what she is. She does but follow her nature, who can be angry with her, if destiny have informed so far an animal with a too gross and earthly spirit? Why weep over her? Dust she is, and unto dust she will return while you, to whom a more divine spark was allotted at your birth, must rise, and surmounting, leave below you one only connected with you by the unreal and fleeting bonds of fleshly kin.

Philammon crushed the letter together in his hand, and strode from the house without a word.

The philosopher had no gospel, then, for the harlot? No word for the sinner, the degraded? Destiny forsooth! She was to follow her destiny, and be base, miserable, self-condemned. She was to crush the voice of conscience and reason, as often as it awoke within her, and compel herself to believe that she was bound to be that which she knew herself bound not to be. She was to shut her eyes to that present palpable misery which was preaching to her, with the voice of God Himself, that the wages of sin are death. Dust she was, and unto dust she will return! Oh, glorious hope for her, for him, who felt as if an eternity of bliss would be worthless, if it parted him from his new found treasure! Dust she was, and unto dust she must return!

Hark ye Hypatia! If she must needs misapprehend the fashion of her school, a text or two here and there from the Hebrew Scriptures, what suicidal fantasy set her on quoting that one? For now, upon Philammon's memory flashed up in letters of light, old words forgotten for months—and ere he was aware, he found himself repeating aloud and passionately, 'I believe in the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting,' and then clear and fair arose before him the vision of the God incarnate, as He lay at meat in the Pharisee's house, and of her who washed His feet with tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head. And from the depths of his agonised heart arose the prayer, 'Blessed Magdalene, intercede for her!'

So high he could rise, but not beyond. For the notion of that God man was revealing fast to more and more awful abyssal heights, in the minds of a generation who were so getting His love in His power, and practically losing sight of His humanity in their eager doctrinal assertion of His Divinity. And Philammon's heart re-echoed the spirit of his age, when he felt that for an apostate like himself it were presumptuous to entreat for any light or help from the fountain-head itself. He who had denied his Lord, he who had voluntarily cut himself off from the communion of the Catholic Church—how could he restore himself? How could he appease the wrath of Him who died on the cross, save by years of bitter supplication and self-punishment?

'Fool! Vain and ambitious fool that I have been! For this I threw away the faith of my childhood! For this I listened to words at which I shuddered, crushed down my own doubts and doubts, tried to persuade myself that I could reconcile them with Christianity—that I could make a lie fit into the truth! For this I puffed myself up in the vain hope of becoming not as other men are—superior, forsooth, to my kind! It was not enough for me to be a man made in the image of God, but I must needs become a god myself, knowing good and evil—And here is the end! I call upon my fine philosophy to help me once, in one real practical human struggle, and it folds its arms and sits serene and silent, smiling upon my misery! Oh! fool, fool, thou art filled with the fruit of thy own devices! Back to the old faith! Home again, thou wanderer! And yet how home? Are not the gates shut against me? Perhaps against her too. What if she, like me, were a baptized Christian?'

Terrible and all but hopeless that thought flashed across him, as in the first revelation of his conscience he plunged utterly and implicitly back again into the faith of his childhood, and all the dark and cruel theories popular in his day rose up before him in all their terrors. In the innocent simplicity of the Laura he had never felt their force, but he felt them now. If Pelagia were a baptized woman, what was before her but unceasing penance? Before her, as before him, a life of cold and hunger, groans and tears, loneliness and hideous soul-sackening uncertainty. Life was a dungeoning for them both henceforth. Be it so! There was nothing else to believe in. No other rock of hope in earth or heaven. That at least promised a possibility of forgiveness, of unobdurate, of virtue, of reward—ay, of everlasting bliss and glory, and even if she missed of that, better for her the cell in the desert than a life of self-contented impurity! If that latter were her destiny, as Hypatia said, she should at least be fighting against it, defying it, cursing it! Better virtue with hell, than sin with heaven! And Hypatia had not even promised her a heaven. The resurrection of the flesh was the carnal notion for her refined and lofty creed. And so, his four months' dream swept away in a moment, he hurried back to his chamber, with one fixed thought before him—the desert, a cell for Pelagia, another for himself. There they would repent, and pray, and mourn out life side by side, if perhaps God would have mercy upon their souls. Yet—perhaps, she might not have been baptized after all. And then she was safe. Like other converts from paganism, she might become a catechumen, and go on to baptism, where the mystic water would wash away in a moment all the past, and she would begin life afresh, in the spotless robes of innocence. Yet he had been baptized, he knew from Arsenius, before he left Athens, and she was older than he. It was all but impossible yet he would hope, and breathless with anxiety and excitement, he ran up the narrow stairs and found Miriam standing outside, her hand upon the bolt, apparently inclined to dispute his passage.

'Is she still within?'

'What if she be?'

'Let me pass into my own room.'

'Yours? Who has been paying the rent for you, these four months past? You! What can you say to her? What can you do for her? Young pedant, you must be in love yourself before you can help poor creatures who are in love.'

But Philammon pushed past her so fiercely, that the old woman was forced to give way, and with a sinister smile she followed him into the chamber.

Pelagia sprang towards her brother

'Will she?—will she see me?'

'Let us talk no more of her, my beloved,' said Philammon, laying his hands gently on her trembling shoulders, and looking earnestly into her eyes. 'Better that we two should work out our deliverance for ourselves, without the help of strangers. You can trust me.'

'You! And can you help me? Will you teach me?'

'Yes, but not here.'

'We must escape—'

Nay, hear me, one moment! dearest sister, hear me! Are you so happy here that you can conceive of no better place? And—and, oh, God! that it may not be true after all—but is there not a hell hereafter?'

Pelagia covered her face with her hands—'The old monk warned me of it!'

'Oh, take his warning.'

And Philammon was bursting forth with some such words about the lake of fire and brimstone as he had been accustomed to hear from Pambo and Arcemus, when Pelagia interrupted him—

'Oh, Miriam! Is it true? Is it possible? What will become of me?' almost shrieked the poor child.

'What if it were true?—Let him tell you how he will save you from it,' answered Miriam quietly.

'Will not the Gospel save her from it—unbelieving Jew? Do not contradict me! I can save her.'

'If she does what?'

'Can she not repent? Can she not mortify these base affections? Can she not be forgiven? Oh, my Pelagia! forgive me for having dreamed one moment that I could make you a philosopher, when you may be a saint of God, a—'

He stopped short suddenly, as the thought about baptism flashed across him, and in a faltering voice asked, 'Are you baptized?'

'Baptized?' asked she, hardly understanding the term.

'Yes—by the bishop—in the church.'

'Ah,' she said, 'I remember now. . . . When I was four or five years old. . . . A tank, and women undressing. . . . And I was bathed thrice, and an old man dipped my head under the water three times. . . . I have forgotten what it all meant—it was so long ago. I wore a white dress, I know, afterwards.'

Philammon recoiled with a groan.

BY.

'Unhappy child! May God have mercy on you!'

'Will He not forgive me, then? You have forgiven me. He?—He must be more good even than you—Why not?'

'He forgave you then, freely, when you were baptized, and there is no second pardon unless—'

'Unless I leave my lover!' shrieked Pelagia.

'When the Lord forgave the blessed Magdalene freely, and told her that her faith had saved her—did she live on in sin, or even in the pleasures of this world? No! though God had forgiven her, she could not forgive herself. She fled forth into the desert, and there, naked and barefoot, clothed only with her hair, and feeding on the herb of the field, she stayed fasting and praying till her dying day, never seeing the face of man, but visited and comforted by angels and archangels. And if she, she who never fell again, needed that long penance to work out her own salvation—oh, Pelagia, what will not God require of you, who have broken your baptismal vows, and defiled these hute robes, which the tears of penance only can wash clean once more!'

'But I did not know! I did not ask to be baptized! Cruel, cruel parents, to bring me to it! And God! Oh, why did He forgive me so soon? And to go into the deserts! I dare not! I cannot! See me, how delicate and tender I am! I should die of hunger and cold! I should go mad with fear and loneliness! Oh! brother, brother, is this the Gospel of the Christians? I came to you to be taught how to be wise, and good, and respected, and you tell me that all I can do is to live this horrible life of torture here, on the chance of escaping torture for ever! And how do I know that I shall escape it? How do I know that I shall make myself miserable enough? How do I know that He will forgive me after all? Is this true, Miriam? Tell me, or I shall go mad!'

'Yes,' said Miriam, with a quiet sneer. 'This is the gospel and good news of salvation, according to the doctrine of the Nazarenes.'

'I will go with you!' cried Philammon. 'I will go! I will never leave you! I have my own sins to wash away!—Happy for me if I ever do it!—And I will build you a cell near mine, and kind men will teach us, and we will pray together night and morning, for ourselves and for each other, and weep out our weary lives together—'

'Better end them here, at once!' said Pelagia, with a gesture of despair, and dashed herself down on the floor.

Philammon was about to lift her up, when Miriam caught him by the arm, and in a hurried whisper—'Are you mad? Will you ruin your own purpose? Why did you tell her this? Why did you not wait—give her hope—time to collect herself—time to wean herself from her lover, instead of terrifying and disgusting her at the outset, as you have done? Have you a man's heart in you? No word of comfort for that poor creature, nothing but hell, hell, hell—See to your own chance of hell first ! It is greater than you fancy !

'It cannot be greater than I fancy.'

'Then see to it. For her, poor darling !—why, even we Jews, who know that all you Gentiles are doomed to Gehenna alike, have some sort of hope for such a poor untaught creature as that.'

'And why is she untaught ? Wretch that you are ! You have had the training of her ! You brought her up to sin and shame ! You drove from her recollection the faith in which she was baptized !'

'So much the better for her, if the recollection of it is to make her no happier than it does already. Better to wake unexpectedly in Gehenna when you die, than to endure over and above the dread of it here. And as for leaving her untaught, on your own showing she has been taught too much already. Wiser it would be in you to curse your parents for having had her baptized, than me for giving her ten years' pleasure before she goes to the pit of Tophet. Come now, don't be angry with me. The old Jewess is your friend, revile her as you will. She shall marry this Goth.'

'An Arian heretic !'

'She shall convert him and make a Catholic of him, if you like. At all events, if you wish to win her, you must win her my way. You have had your chance, and spoiled it. Let me have mine. Pelagia, darling ! Up, and be a woman ! We will find a philtre downstairs to give that ungrateful man, that shall make him more mad about you, before a day is over than ever you were about him.'

'No !' said Pelagia, looking up. 'No love-potions ! No poisons !'

'Poisons, little fool ! Do you doubt the old woman's skill ? Do you think I shall make him lose his wits, as Calistophyria did to her lover last year, because she would trust to old Megra's drugs, instead of coming to me !'

'No ! No drugs, no magic ! He must love me really, or not at all ! He must love me for myself, because I am worth loving, because he honours, worships me, or let me die. I, whose boast was, even when I was basest, that I never needed such mean tricks, but conquered like Aphrodite, a queen in my own right ! I have been my own love charm : when I cease to be that, let me die !'

'One as mad as the other !' cried Miriam, in utter perplexity. 'Hush ! what is that tramp upon the stairs ?'

At this moment heavy footsteps were heard ascending the stairs. All three stopped aghast. Philammon, because he thought the visitors were monks in search of him ; Miriam, because she thought they were Orestes's guards in search of her, and Pelagia, from vague dread of anything and everything.

'Have you an inner room ?' asked the Jewess.

'None.'

The old woman set her lips firmly, and drew her dagger. Pelagia wrapped her face in her cloak, and stood trembling, bowed down, as if expecting another blow. The door opened, and in walked, neither monks nor guard, but Wulf and Smid.

'Hildday, young monk !' cried the latter worthy, with a loud laugh. 'Veils here, too, eh ! At your old trade, my worthy portress of hell-gate ! Well, walk out now, we have a little business with this young gentleman.'

And slipping past the unsuspecting Goths, Pelagia and Miriam hurried downstairs.

'The young one, at least, seems a little ashamed of her errand. Now, Wulf, speak low ; and I will see that no one is listening at the door.'

Philammon faced his unexpected visitors with a look of angry inquiry. What right had they, or any man, to intrude at such a moment on his misery and disgrace ! But he was disarmed the next instant by old Wulf, who advanced to him, and looking him fully in the face with an expression which there was no mistaking, held out his broad, brown hand.

Philammon grasped it, and then covering his face with his hands, burst into tears.

'You did right. You are a brave boy. If you had died, no man need have been ashamed to die your death.'

'You were there, then ?' sobbed Philammon.

'We were.'

'And what is more,' said Smid, as the poor boy writhed at the admission, 'we were mightily minded, some of us, to have leapt down to you and cut you a passage out. One man, at least, whom I know of, felt his old blood as hot for the minute as a four-year-old's. The foul curs ! And to hoot her, after all ! Oh that I may have one good hour's hewing at them before I die !'

'And you shall !' said Wulf. 'Boy, you wish to get this sister of yours into your power.'

'It is hopeless—hopeless ! She will never leave her—the Amal !'

'Are you so sure of that ?'

'She told me so with her own lips not ten minutes ago. That was she who went out as you entered !'

A curse of astonishment and regret burst from Smid.

'Had I but known her ! By the soul of my fathers, she should have found that it was easier to come here than to go home again !'

'Hush, Smid ! Better as it is. Boy, if I put her into your power, dare you carry her off ?'

Philammon hesitated one moment.

'What I dare you know already. But it would be an unlawful thing, surely, to use violence.'

'Settle your philosopher's doubts for yourself. I have made my offer. I should have thought that a man in his senses could give but one answer, much more a mad monk.'

'You forget the money matters, prince,' said Smid, with a smile.

'I do not. But I don't think the boy so mean as to hesitate on that account.'

'He may as well know, however, that we promise to send all her trumpery after her, even to the Amal's presents. As for the house, we won't trouble her to lend it us longer than we can help. We intend shortly to move into more extensive premises, and open business on a grander scale, as the shopkeepers say,—eh, prince!

'Her money!—That money! God forgive her!' answered Philammon. 'Do you fancy me base enough to touch it? But I am resolved! Tell me what to do, and I will do it.'

'You know the lane which runs down to the canal, under the left wall of the house!'

'Yea.'

'And a door in the corner tower, close to the landing-place!'

'I do.'

'Be there, with a dozen stout monks, to-morrow, an hour after sundown, and take what we give you. After that, the concern is yours, not ours.'

'Monks!' said Philammon. 'I am at open feud with the whole order.'

'Make friends with them, then,' shortly suggested Smid.

Philammon writhed inwardly. 'It makes no difference to you, I presume, whom I bring?'

'No more than ~~it~~ does whether or not you pitch her into the canal, and put a hurdle over her when you have got her,' answered Smid, 'which is what a Goth would do, if he were in your place.'

'Do not vex the poor lad, friend. If he thinks he can mend her instead of punishing her, in Freya's name, let him try. You will be there, then? And mind, I like you. I liked you when you faced that great river-hog. I like you better now than ever; for you have spoken to-day like a Sagaman, and dared like a hero. Therefore mind, if you do not bring a good guard to-morrow night, your life will not be safe. The whole city is out in the streets, and Odin alone knows what will be done, and who will be alive, eight-and-forty hours hence. Mind you!—The mob may do strange things, and they may see still stranger things done. If you once find yourself safe back here, stay where you are, if you value her life or your own. And—if you are wise, let the men whom you bring with you be monks, though it cost your proud stomach—'

'That's not fear, prince! You are telling too much!' interrupted Smid, while Philammon gulped down the said proud stomach, and answered, 'Be it so!'

'I have won my bet, Smid,' said the old man, chuckling, as the two tramped out into the street, to the surprise and fear of all the neighbours, while the children clapped their hands, and the street dogs felt it their duty to bark lustily at the strange figures of their unwonted visitors.

'No play, no pay, Wulf. We shall see to-morrow.'

'I knew that he would stand the trial! I knew he was right at heart!'

'At all events, there is no fear of his ill-using the poor thing, if he loves her well enough to go down on his knees to his sworn foes for her.'

'I don't know that,' answered Wulf, with a shake of the head. 'These monks, I hear, fancy that their God likes them the better the more miserable they are—so, perhaps they may fancy that he will like them all the more, the more miserable they make other people. However, it's no concern of ours.'

'We have quite enough of our own to see to just now. But mind, no play, no pay.'

'Of course not. How the streets are filling! We shall not be able to see the guards to-night, if this mob thickens much more.'

'We shall have enough to do to hold our own, perhaps. Do you hear what they are crying there? "Down with all heathens! Down with barbarians!" That means us, you know.'

'Do you fancy no one understands Greek but yourself? Let them come. It may give us an excuse. And we can hold the house a week.'

'But how can we get speech of the guards?'

'We will slip round by water. And, after all, deeds will win them better than talk. They will be forced to fight on the same side as we, and most probably be glad of our help, for if the mob attacks any one, it will begin with the Prefect.'

'And then—Curse their shouting! Let the soldiers once find our Amal at their head, and they will be ready to go with him a mile, where they meant to go a yard.'

'The Goths will, and the Markmen, and those Dacians, and Thracians, or whatever the Romans call them. But I hardly trust the Huns.'

'The curse of heaven on their pudding faces and pigs' eyes! There will be no love lost between us. But there are not twenty of them scattered in different troops, one of us can thrash three of them, and they will be sure to side with the winning party. Besides, plunder, plunder, comrades! When did you know a Hun turn back from that, even if he were only on the scent of a lump of tallow?'

'As for the Gauls and Latins,' went on Wulf meditatively, 'they belong to any man who can pay them.'

'Which we can do, like all wise generals, one penny out of our own pocket, and nine out of the enemy's. And the Amal is staunch.'

'Staunch as his own hounds, now there is something to be done on the spot. His heart was in the right place after all. I knew it all along. But he could never in his life see four-and-twenty hours before him. Even now if that Pelagia gets him under her spell again, he may throw down his sword, and fall as fast asleep as ever.'

'Never fear; we have settled her destiny for her, as far as that is concerned. Look at the mob before the door! We must get in by the postern-gate.'

'Got in by the sewer, like a rat! I go my own way. Draw, old hammer and tongs! or run away!

'Not this time' And sword in hand, the two marched into the heart of the crowd, who gave way before them like a flock of sheep.

'They know their intended shepherds already,' said Smid. But at that moment the crowd, seeing them about to enter the house, raised a yell of 'Goths! Heathens! Barbarians!' and a rush from behind took place.

'If you will have it, then!' said Wulf. And the two long bright blades flashed round and round their heads, redder and redder every time they swung aloft. The old men never even checked their steady walk, and knocking at the gate, went in, leaving more than one lifeless corpse at the entrance.

'We have put the coal in the thatch, now, with a vengeance,' said Smid, as they wiped their swords inside.

'We have. Get me out a boat and half a dozen men, and I and Goderic will go round by the canal to the palace, and settle a thing or two with the guards.'

'Why should not the Ainalaf, and offer our help himself to the Prefect?'

'What? Would you have him after that turn against the hound? For troth and honour's sake, he must keep quiet in the matter.'

'He will have no objection to keep quiet—trust him for that! But don't forget Sigman Moneybag, the best of all orators,' called Smid laughingly after him, as he went off to man the boat.

CHAPTER XXV

SEEKING AFTER A SIGN

'WHAT answer has he sent back, father?' asked Hypatia, as Theon re-entered her chamber, after delivering that hapless letter to Philammon.

'Insolent that he is! he tore it to fragments and fled forth without a word.'

'Let him go, and desert us like the rest, in our calamity!'

'At least, we have the jewels.'

'The jewels? Let them be returned to their owner. Shall we defile ourselves by taking them as wages for anything—above all, for that which is unperformed?'

'But, my child, they were given to us freely. He bade me keep them, and—and, to tell you the truth, I must keep them. After this unfortunate failure, be sure of it, every creditor we have will be clamouring for payment.'

'Let them take our house and furniture, and sell us as slaves, then. Let them take all, provided we keep our virtue.'

'Sell us as slaves? Are you mad?'

'Not quite mad yet, father,' answered she with a sad smile. 'But how should we be worse than we are now, were we slaves? Raphael Aben-Ezra told me that he obeyed my precepts, when he went forth as a houseless beggar, and shall I not have courage to obey them myself, if the need come? The thought of his endurance has shamed my luxury for this many a month. After all, what does the philosopher require but bread and water, and the clear brook in which to wash away the daily stains of his earthly prison-house? Let what is fated come. Hypatia struggles with the stream no more!'

'My daughter! And have you given up all hope? So soon disheartened! What! Is this paltry accident to sweep away the purposes of years? Orestos remains still faithful. His guards have orders to garrison the house for as long as we shall require them.'

'Send them away, then. I have done no wrong, and I fear no punishment.'

'You do not know the madness of the mob, they are shouting your name in the streets already, in company with Pelagia's.'

Hypatia shuddered. Her name in company with Pelagia's! And to this she had brought herself!

'I have deserved it! I have sold myself to a lie and a disgrace! I have stooped to truckle, to intrigue! I have bound myself to a sordid trickster! Father! never mention his name to me again! I have leagued myself with the impure and the bloodthirsty, and I have my reward! No more politics for Hypatia from henceforth, my father; no more orations and lectures, no more pearls of Divine wisdom cast before swine. I have sinned in divulging the secrets of the Immortals to the mob. Let their follow their natures! Feel that I was, to fancy that my speech, my plots, could raise them above that which the gods had made them!'

'Then you give up our lectures? Worse and worse! We shall be ruined utterly!'

'We are ruined utterly already. Orestos! There is no help in him. I know the man too well, my father, not to know that he would give us up to-morrow to the fury of the Christians were his own base life—even his own baser office—in danger.'

'Too true—too true! I fear,' said the poor old man, wringing his hands in perplexity.

'What will become of us,—of you, rather? What matter what happens to the useless old star-gazer? Let him die! To-day or next year is alike to him. But you,—you! Let us escape by the canal. We may gather up enough, even without these jewels, which you refuse, to pay our voyage to Athens, and there we shall be safe with Plutarch, he will welcome you—all Athens will welcome you—we will collect a fresh school—and you shall be Queen of Athens, as you have been Queen of Alexandria!'

'No, father. What I know, henceforth I will know for myself only. Hypatia will be from this day alone with the Immortal Gods!'

'You will not leave me?' cried the old man, terrified.

'Never on earth!' answered she, bursting into real human tears, and throwing herself on his bosom. 'Never—never' father of my spirit as well as of my flesh!—the parent who has trained me, taught me, educated my soul from the cradle to use her wings!—the only human being who never misunderstood me—never thwarted me—never deceived me!’

‘My priceless child! And I have been the cause of your ruin!’

‘Not you!—a thousand times not you! I only am to blame! I tampered with worldly politics. I tempted you on to fancy that I could effect what I so rashly undertook. Do not accuse yourself unless you wish to break my heart! We can be happy together yet—A palm-leaf hut in the desert, dates from the grove, and water from the spring—the monk dares be miserable alone in such a dwelling, and cannot we dare to be happy together in it?’

‘Then you will escape?’

‘Not to-day. It were base to flee before danger comes. We must hold out at our post to the last moment, even if we dare not die at it like heroes. And to-morrow I go to the lecture-room,—to the beloved Museum, for the last time, to take farewell of my pupils. Unworthy as they are, I owe it to myself and to philosophy to tell them why I leave them.’

‘It will be too dangerous—indeed it will!’

‘I could take the guards with me, then. And yet—no. They shall never have occasion to impute fear to the philosopher. Let them see her go forth as usual on her errand, strong in the courage of innocence, secure in the protection of the gods. So, perhaps, some sacred awe, some suspicion of her divineness, may fall on them at last.’

‘I must go with you.’

‘No, I go alone. You might meet danger where I am safe. After all, I am a woman. And, fierce as they are, they will not dare to harm me.’

The old man shook his head.

‘Look now,’ she said smilingly, laying her hands on his shoulders, and looking into his face.

‘You tell me that I am beautiful, you know, and beauty will tame the lion. Do you not think that this face might disarm even a monk?’

And she laughed and blushed so sweetly, that the old man forgot his fears, as she intended that he should, and kissed her and went his way for the time being, to command all manner of hospitalities to the soldiers, whom he prudently determined to keep in his house as long as he could make them stay there, in pursuance of which wise purpose he contrived not to see a great deal of pleasant flirtation between his valiant defenders and Hypatia’s maids, who, by no means so prudish as their mistress, welcomed as a rare boon from heaven an afternoon’s chat with twenty tall men of war.

So they jested and laughed below, while old Theon, having brought out the very best old wine, and actually proposed in person, by way of mending matters, the health of the Emperor of Africa, locked himself into the library, and comforted his troubled soul with a tough problem of astronomy, which had been haunting him the whole day, even in the theatre itself. But Hypatia sat still in her chamber, her face buried in her hands, her heart full of many thoughts, her eyes of tears. She had smiled away her father’s fears, she could not smile away her own.

She felt, she hardly knew why, but she felt as clearly as if a god had proclaimed it to her bodily ears, that the crisis of her life was come, that her political and active career was over, and that she must now be content to be for herself, and in herself alone, all that she was, or might become. The world might be regenerated—but not in her day,—the gods restored, but not by her. It was a fearful discovery,—and yet hardly a discovery. Her heart had told her for years that she was hoping against hope,—that she was struggling against a stream too mighty for her. And now the moment had come when she must either be swept helpless down the current, or, by one desperate effort, win firm land, and let the tide roll on its own way henceforth. Its own way! Not the way of the gods, at least, for it was sweeping their names from off the earth. What if they did not care to be known? What if they were weary of worship and reverence from mortal men, and, self-sufficing in their own perfect bliss, recked nothing for the weal or woe of earth? Must it not be so? Had she not proof of it in everything which she believed? What did Isis care for her Alexandria? What did Athens care for her Athens? And yet Homer and Hesiod, and those old Orphic singers, were of another mind.

Whence got they that strange fancy of gods counselling, warring, intermarrying, with mankind, as with some kindred tribe?

‘Zeus, father of gods and men!’ Those were words of hope and comfort! But were they true? Father of men? Impossible!—not father of Pelagia, surely. Not father of the base, the foul, the ignorant.

Father of heroic souls, only, the poets must have meant. But where were the heroic souls now? Was she one? If so, why was she deserted by the upper powers in her utter need? Was the heroic race indeed extinct? Was she merely assuming, in her self-conceit, an honour to which she had no claim? Or was it all a dream of these old singers? Had they, as some bold philosophers had said, invented gods in their own likeness, and palmed off on the awe and admiration of men their own fair phantoms? . . . It must be so. If there were gods, to know them was the highest bliss of man. Then would they not teach men of themselves, unveil their own loveliness to a chosen few, even for the sake of their own honour, if not, as she had dreamed once, from love to those who bore a kindred flame to theirs? . . . What if there were no gods? What if the stream of fate, which was sweeping away their names, were the only real power? What if that old Pyrrhonic notion were the true solution of the problem of the Universe? What if there were no centre, no order, no rest, no goal—but only a perpetual flux, a down-rushing change?

And before her dizzying brain and heart arose that awful vision of Lucrotius, of the homeless Universe falling, falling, for ever from nowhence toward nowhither through the unending ages, by causeless and unceasing gravitation, while the changes and efforts of all mortal things were but the jostling of the dust-atoms amid the everlasting storm. . .

It could not be! There was a truth, a virtue, a beauty, a nobleness, which could never change, but which were absolute, the same for ever. The God-given instinct of her woman's heart rebelled against her intellect, and, in the name of God, denied its lie. . . Yes,—there was virtue, beauty. And yet—might not they, too, be accidents of that enchantment, which man calls mortal life, temporary and mutable accidents of consciousness; brilliant sparks, struck out by the clashing of the dust-atoms? Who could tell?

There were those once who could tell. Did not Plotinus speak of a direct mystic intuition of the Deity, an enthusiasm without passion, a still intoxication of the soul, in which she rose above life, thought, reason, herself, to that which she contemplated, the absolute and first One, and united herself with that One, or, rather, became aware of that union which had existed from the first moment in which she emanated from the One? Six times in a life of sixty years had Plotinus risen to that height of mystic union, and known himself to be a part of God. Once had Porphyry attained the same glory. Hypatia, though often attempting, had never yet succeeded in attaining to any distinct vision of a being external to herself; though practice, a firm will, and a powerful imagination, had long since made her an adept in producing, almost at will, that mysterious trance, which was the preliminary step to supernatural vision. But her delight in the brilliant, and, as she held, divine imaginations, in which at such times she revelled, had been always checked and chilled by the knowledge that, in such matters, hundreds inferior to her in intellect and in learning,—ay, saddest of all, Christian monks and nuns, boasted themselves her equals,—indeed, if their own account of their visions was to be believed, her superiors—by the same methods which she employed. For by celibacy, rigorous fasts, perfect bodily quiescence, and intense contemplation of one thought, they, too, pretended to be able to rise above the body into the heavenly regions, and to behold things unspeakable, which nevertheless, like most other unspeakable things, contrived to be most carefully detailed and housed abroad. . . And it was with a half feeling of shame that she prepared herself that afternoon for one more, perhaps one last attempt, to scale the heavens, as she recollected how many an illiterate monk and nun, from Constantinople to the Thebaid, was probably employed at that moment exactly as she was. Still, the attempt must be made. In that terrible abyss of doubt, she must have something palpable, real; something beyond her own thoughts, and hopes, and speculations, whereon to rest her weary faith, her weary heart. . . Perhaps this time, at least, in her extremest need, a god might vouchsafe some glimpse of his own beauty. . . Athene might pity at last. . . Or, if not Athene, some archetype, angel, demon. . . And then she shuddered at the thought of those evil and deceiving spirits, whose delight it was to delude and tempt the votaries of the gods, in the forms of angels of light. But even in the face of that danger, she must make the trial once again. Was she not pure and spotless as Athene's self? Would not her innate purity enable her to discern, by an instinctive antipathy, those foul beings beneath the fairest mask? At least, she must make the trial. . .

And so, with a look of intense humility, she began to lay aside her jewels and her upper robes. Then, baring her bosom and her feet, and shaking her golden tresses loose, she laid herself down upon the couch, crossed her hands upon her breast, and, with upturned ecstatic eyes, waited for that which might befall.

There she lay, hour after hour, as her eye gradually kindled, her bosom heaved, her breath came fast. But there was no more sign of life in those straight still limbs, and listless feet and hands, than in Pygmalion's ivory bride, before she bloomed to human flesh and blood. The sun sank towards his rest, the roar of the city grew louder and louder without, the soldiers revelled and laughed below: but every sound passed through unconscious ears, and went its way unheeded. Faith, hope, reason itself, were staked upon the result of that daring effort to scale the highest heaven. And, by one continuous effort of her practised will, which reached its highest virtue, as mystics hold, in its own suicide, she chained down her senses from every sight and sound, and even her mind from every thought, and lay utterly self-resigned, self-emptied, till consciousness of time and place had vanished, and she seemed to herself alone in the abyss.

She dared not reflect, she dared not hope, she dared not rejoice, lest she should break the spell. Again and again had she broken it at this very point, by some sudden and tumultuous yielding to her own joy or awe, but now her will held firm. . . She did not feel her own limbs, hear her own breath. . . A light bright mist, an endless network of glittering filins, coming, going, uniting, resolving themselves, was above her and around her. . . Was she in the body or out of the body? . . .

The network faded into an abyss of still clear light. . . A still warm atmosphere was around her, thrilling through and through her. She breathed the light, and floated in it, as a mote in the mid-day beam. . . And still her will held firm.

Far away, miles, and eons, and abysses away, through the interminable depths of glory, a dark and shadowy spot. It neared and grew. . .

A dark globe, grined with rainbows. . . . What might it be? She dared not hope. . . . It came nearer, nearer, nearer, touched her. . . . The centre quivered, flickered, took form—a face. . . . A god's! No—Pelagia's.

Beautiful, sad, craving, reproachful, indignant, awful. . . . Hypatia could bear no more, and sprang to her feet with a shriek, to experience in its full bitterness the fearful revulsion of the mystic, when the human reason and will which he has spurned reassert their God-given rights, and after the intoxication of the imagination, come its prostration and collapse.

And this, then, was the answer of the gods? The phantom of her whom she had despised, exposed, spurned from her? 'No, not their answer—the answer of my own soul! Fool that I have been! I have been exerting my will most while I pretended to resign it most! I have been the slave of every mental desire, while I tried to trample on them! What if that net work of light, that blaze, that globe of darkness, have been, like the face of Pelagia, the phantoms of my own imagination—ay, even of my own senses! What if I have mistaken for Deity my own self? What if I have been my own light, my own abyss! . . . Am I not my own abyss, my own light—my own darkness?' And she smiled bitterly as she said it, and throwing herself again upon the couch, buried her head in her hands, exhausted equally in body and in mind.

At last she rose, and sat, careless of her dishevelled locks, gazing out into vacancy. 'Oh for a sign, for a token! Oh for the golden days of which the poets sang, when gods walked among men, fought by their side as friends! And yet . . . are these old stories credible, pious, even modest? Does not my heart revolt from them? Who has shared more than I in Plato's contempt for the foul deeds, the degrading transformations, which Homer imputes to the gods of Greece? Must I believe them now? Must I stoop to think that gods, who live in a region above all sense, will deign to make themselves palpable to those senses of ours which are whole sons of existence below them? Degrade themselves to the base accidents of matter? Yes! That, rather than nothing! Be it even so. Better, better, better, to believe that Ares fled shrieking and wounded from a mortal man—better to believe in Zeus's adulteries and Hermes's thefts—than to believe that gods have never spoken face to face with men! Let me think, lest I go mad, that beings from that unseen world for which I hunger have appeared, and held communion with mankind, such as no reason or sense could doubt—even though those beings were more capricious and baser than ourselves! In there, after all, an unseen world? Oh for a sign, a sign!'

Haggard and dizzy, she wandered into her 'chamber of the gods', a collection of antiquities, which she kept there rather as matters of taste than of worship. All around her they looked out into vacancy with their white soulless eyeballs, their dead motionless beauty, those cold dreams of the buried generations. Oh that they could speak, and set her heart at rest! At the lower end of the room stood a Pallas, completely armed with ægis, spear, and helmet, a gem of Athenian sculpture, which she had bought from some merchants after the sack of Athens by the Goths. There it stood severely fair; but the right hand, alas! was gone, and there the maimed arm remained extended, as if in sad mockery of the faith of which the body remained, while the power was dead and vanished.

She gazed long and passionately on the image of her favourite goddess, the ideal to which she had longed for years to assimilate herself, till—was it a dream? was it a frolic of the dying sunlight? or did those lips really bend themselves into a smile?

Impossible! No, not impossible. Had not, only a few years before, the image of Hecate smiled on a philosopher? Were there not stories of moving images, and winking pictures, and all the material miracles by which a dying faith strives desperately—not to deceive others—but to persuade itself of its own sanity? It had been—it might be—it was!—

No! there the lips were, as they had been from the beginning, closed upon each other in that stony self-collected calm, which was only not a snare. The wonder, if it was one, had passed, and now—did her eyes play her false, or were the snakes round that Medusa's head upon the shield all writhing, grinning, glaring at her with stony eyes, longing to stiffen her with terror into their own likeness?

No! that, too, passed. Would that even it had stayed, for it would have been a sign of life! She looked up at the face once more, but in vain—the stone was stone, and ere she was aware, she found herself clasping passionately the knees of the marble.

'Athene! Pallas! Adore! Ever Virgin! Absolute reason, springing unbegotten from the nameless One! Hear me! Athene! Have mercy on me! Speak, if it be to curse me! Thou who alone wieldest the lightnings of thy father, wield them to strike me dead, if thou wilt, only do something—something to prove thine own existence—something to make me sure that anything exists beside this gross miserable matter, and my miserable soul. I stand alone in the centre of the universe! I fall and sicken down the abyss of ignorance, and doubt, and boundless blank and darkness! Oh, have mercy! I know that thou art not this! Thou art everywhere and in all things! But I know that this is a form which pleases thee, which symbolises thy nobleness! I know that thou hast deigned to speak to those who—Oh! what do I know! Nothing! nothing! nothing!'

And she clung there, bedewing with scalding tears the cold feet of the image, while there was neither sign, nor voice, nor any that answered.

On a sudden she was startled by a rustling near; and, looking round, saw close behind her the old Jewess.

'Cry aloud!' hissed the hag, in a tone of bitter scorn, 'cry aloud, for she is a goddess. Either she is talking, or pursuing, or she is on a journey, or perhaps she has grown old, as we all shall do some day, my pretty lady, and is too cross and lazy to stir. What! her naughty doll will not speak to her, will it not? or even open its eyes, because the wires are grown rusty? Well, we will find a new doll for her, if she chooses.'

'Begone, hag! What do you mean by intruding here?' said Hypatia, springing up, but the old woman went on coolly—

'Why not try the fair young gentleman over there?' pointing to a copy of the Apollo which we call Belvedere—'What is his name? Old maids are always cross and jealous, you know. But he—he could not be cruel to such a sweet face as that. Try the fair young lad! Or, perhaps, if you are bashful, the old Jewess might try him for you!'

These last words were spoken with so marked a significance, that Hypatia, in spite of her disgust, found herself asking the hag what she meant. She made no answer for a few seconds, but remained looking steadily into her eyes with a glance of fire, before which even the proud Hypatia, as she had done once before, quailed utterly, so deep was the understanding, so dogged the purpose, so fearless the power, which burned within those withered and shrunken sockets.

'Shall the old witch call him up, the fair young Apollo, with the beauty-bloom upon his chin? He shall come! He shall come! I warrant him he must come, civilly enough, when old Miriam's finger is once held up.'

'To you! Apollo, the god of light, obey a Jewess!'

'A Jewess! And you a Greek?' almost yelled the old woman. 'And who are you who ask? And who are your gods, your heroes, your devils, you children of yesterday, compared with us? You, who were a set of half-naked savages squabbling about the siege of Troy, when our Solomon, amid splendours such as Rome and Constantinople never saw, was controlling demons and ghosts, angels and arch-angels, principalities and powers, by the ineffable name! What science have you that you have not stolen from the Egyptians and Chaldees? And what had the Egyptians which Moses did not teach them? And what have the Chaldees which Daniel did not teach them? What does the world know but from us, the fathers and the masters of magic—us, the lords of the inner secrets of the universe! Come, you Greek baby—as the priests in Egypt said of your forefathers, always children, craving for a new toy, and throwing it away next day—come to the fountain-head of all your paltry wisdom! Name what you will see, and you shall see it!'

Hypatia was cowed; for of one thing there was no doubt,—that the woman utterly believed her own words, and that was a state of mind of which she had seen so little, that it was no wonder if it acted on her with that overpowering sympathetic force, with which it generally does, and perhaps ought to, act on the human heart. Besides, her school had always looked to the ancient nations of the East for the primeval founts of inspiration, the mysterious lore of mightier races long gone by. Might she not have found it now!—

The Jewess saw her advantage in a moment, and ran on, without giving her time to answer—

'What sort shall it be, then? By glass and water, or by the moonlight on the wall, or by the sieve, or by the meal? By the cymbals, or by the stars? By the table of the twenty-four elements, by which the Empire was promised to Theodosius the Great, or by the sacred counters of the Assyrians, or by the sapphire of the Hecate sphere? Shall I threaten, as the Egyptian priests used to do, to tear Osiris again in pieces, or to divulge the mysteries of Isis? I could do so, if I chose, for I know them all and more. Or shall I use the ineffable name on Solomon's seal, which we alone, of all the nations of the earth, know? No; it would be a pity to waste that upon a heathen. It shall be by the sacred wafer. Look here!—here they are, the wonder-working atoms! Eat no food this day, except one of these—very three hours, and come to me to-night at the house of your porter, Endamion, bringing with you the black ugate, and then—why then, what you have the heart to see, you shall see!'

Hypatia took the wafer, hesitating—

'But what are they?'

'And you profess to explain Homer? When did I hear the other morning lecturing away so glibly on the repentance which Helen gave the heroes, to fill them with the spirit of joy and love, how it was an allegory of the inward inspiration which flows from spiritual beauty, and all that!—pretty enough, fair lady; but the question still remains, what was it? and I say it was this. Take it and try, and then confess, that while you can talk about Helen, I can set her; and know a little more about Homer than you do, after all!'

'I cannot believe you! Give me some sign of your power, or how can I trust you?'

'A sign?—A sign! Kneel down then there, with your face toward the north; you are over tall for the poor old cripple.'

'I! I never knelt to human being!'

'Then consider that you kneel to the hand some idol there, if you will—but kneel!'

And, constrained by that glittering eye, Hypatia knelt before her.

'Have you faith? Have you desire? Will you submit? Will you obey? Self-will and pride see nothing, know nothing. If you do not give up yourself, neither God nor devil will care to approach. Do you submit?'

'I do! I do!' cried poor Hypatia, in an agony of curiosity and self-distrust, while she felt her eye quivering and her limbs loosening more and more every moment under that intolerable fascination.

The old woman drew from her bosom a crystal, and placed the point against Hypatia's breast. A cold shiver ran through her. The witch waved her hands mysteriously round her head, muttering from time to time, 'Down! down, prond spirit!' and then placed the tips of her skinny fingers on the victim's forehead. Gradually her eyelids became heavy, again and again she tried to raise them, and dropp'd them again before those fixed glaring eyes. and in another moment she lost consciousness.

When she awoke, she was kneeling in a distant part of the room, with dishevelled hair and garments. What was it so cold that she was clapping in her arms? The flet of the Apollo! The hag stood by her, chuckling to herself and clapping her hands.

'How came I here? What have I been doing?'

'Saying such pretty things!—paying the fair youth these such compliments, as he will not be rude enough to forget in his visit to-night. A charming prophetic trance you have had! Ah ha! you are not the only woman who is wiser asleep than awake! Well, you will make a very pretty Cassandra—or a Clyta, if you have the sense. It lies with you, my fair lady. Are you satisfied now? Will you have any more signs? Shall the old Jewess blast those blue eyes blind to show 'at she knows more than the heathens?'

'Oh, I believe you—I believe,' cried the poor exhausted maiden. 'I will come, and yet—'

'Ah! yes! You had better settle first how he shall appear.'

'As he wills!—let him only come! only let me know that he is a god. Abamnon said that gods appeared in a clear, steady, unbearable light, amid a choir of all the lesser deities, archangels, principalities, and heroes, who derive their life from them.'

'Abamnon was an old fool, then. Do you think young Phœbus ran after Daphne with such a mob at his heels? or that Jovi, when he swam up to Leda, headed a whole Nile-flock of ducks, and plover, and curlew? No, he shall come alone—to you alone, and then you may choose for yourself between Cassandra and Clyta. . . Farewell. Do not forget your wafers, or the agate either, and talk with no one between now and sunset. And then—my pretty lady!'

And laughing to herself, the old hag glided from the room.

Hypatia sat trembling with shame and dread. She, as a disciple of the more purely spiritualistic school of Porphyry, had always looked with aversion, with all but contempt, on those theurgic arts which were so much lauded and employed by Iamblicus, Abamnon, and those who clung lovingly to the old priestly rites of Egypt and Chaldaea. They had seemed to her vulgar toys, tricks of legerdemain, suited only for the wonder of the mob. . . She began to think of them with more favour now. How did she know that the vulgar did not require signs and wonders to make them believe! . . . How, indeed! for did she not want such herself? And she opened Abamnon's famous letter to Porphyry, and read earnestly over, for the twentieth time, his subtle justification of magic, and felt it to be unanswerable. Magic? What was not magical? The whole universe, from the planets over her head to the meanest pebble at her feet, was utterly mysterious, ineffable, miraculous, influencing and influenced by affinities and repulsions as unexpected, as unfathomable, as those which, as Abamnon said, drew the gods towards those sounds, those objects, which, either in form, or colour, or chemical properties, were symbolic of, or akin to, themselves. What wonder in it, after all? Was not love and hatred, sympathy and antipathy, the law of the universe? Philosophers, when they gave mechanical explanations of natural phenomena, came no nearer to the real solution of them. The mysterious 'Why?' remained untouched.

All their analyses could only darken with big words the plain fact that the water hated the oil with which it refused to mix, the lime loved the acid which it eagerly received into itself, and, like a lover, grew warm with the rapture of affection. Why not? What might had we to deny sensation, emotion, to them, any more than to ourselves? Was not the same universal spirit stirring in them as in us? And was it not by virtue of that spirit that we thought, and felt, and loved?—Then why not they, as well as we? If the one spirit permeated all things, if its all-energising presence linked the flower with the crystal as well as with the demon and the god, must it not link together also the two extremes of the great chain of being? And even the nameless One itself to the smallest creature which bore its creative impress? What greater miracle in the attraction of a god or an angel, by material incense, symbols, and spells, than in the attraction of one soul to another by the material sounds of the human voice? Was the affinity between spirit and matter implied in that, more miraculous than the affinity between the soul and the body,—than the retention of that soul within that body by the breathing of material air, the eating of material food? Or even, if the physicians were right, and the soul were but a material product or energy of the nerves, and the sole law of the universe the laws of matter, then was not magic even more probable, more rational? Was it not far by every analogy to suppose that there might be other, higher beings than ourselves, obedient to those laws, and therefore possible to be attracted, even as human beings were, by the laws of material sights and sounds? If spirit pervaded all things, then was magic probable; if nothing but matter had existence, magic was morally certain. All that remained in either case was the test of experience. . . And had not that test been applied in every age, and asserted to succeed? What more rational, more philosophic action than to try herself those methods and ceremonies which she was assured on every hand had never failed but through the ignorance or unfitness of the neophyte! . . . Abaddon must be right. . . She dared not think him wrong; for if this last hope failed, what was there left but to eat and drink, for to-morrow we die!

CHAPTER XXVI

MIRIAM'S PLOT

HE who has worshipped a woman, even against his will and conscience, knows well how storm may follow storm, and earthquake earthquake, before his idol be utterly overthrown. And so Philammon found that evening, as he sat pondering over the strange chances of the day, for, as he pondered, his old feelings towards Hypatia began, in spite of the struggles of his conscience and reason, to revive within him. Not only pure love of her great loveliness, the righteous instinct which bids us welcome and honour beauty, whether in man or woman, as something of real worth—divine, heavenly, ay, though we know not how, in a most deep sense eternal, which makes our reason give the lie to all merely logical and sentimental maunderings of moralists about 'the fleeting hues of this our painted clay', telling men, as the old Hebrew Scriptures tell them, that physical beauty is the deepest of all spiritual symbols, and that though beauty without discretion be the jewel of gold in the swine's snout, yet the jewel of gold it is still, the sacrament of an inward beauty, which ought to be, perhaps hereafter may be, fulfilled in spirit and in truth. Not only this, which whispered to him—and who shall say that the whisper was of the earth, or of the lower world?—'She is too beautiful to be utterly evil', but the very defect in her creed which he had just discovered, drew him towards her again. She had no Gospel for the Magdalene, because she was a Pagan.

That, then, was the fault of her Paganism, not of herself. She felt for Pelagia, but even if she had not, was not that, too, the fault of her Paganism? And for that Paganism who was to be blamed? She! . . . Was he the man to affirm that? Had he not seen scandals, stupidities, brutalities, enough to shake even his faith, educated a Christian? How much more excuse for her, more delicate, more acute, more lofty than he, the child, too of a heathen father? Her perfections, were they not her own?—her defects, those of her circumstances! And had she not welcomed him, guarded him, taught him, honoured him? Could he turn against her?—above all now in her distress—perhaps her danger? Was he not bound to her, if by nothing else, by gratitude? Was not he, of all men, bound to believe that all she required to make her perfect was conversion to the true faith? . . . And that first dream of converting her arose almost as bright as ever. Then he was checked by the thought of his first utter failure. . . . At least, if he could not convert her, he could love her, pray for her. . . . No, he could not even do that; for to whom could he pray? He had to repent, to be forgiven, to humble himself by penitence, perhaps for years, ere he could hope to be heard even for himself, much less for another. . . . And so backwards and forwards swayed his hope and purpose, till he was roused from his ineditatigh by the voice of the little porter summoning him to his evening meal, and recollecting, for the first time, that he had tasted no food that day, he went down, half unwillingly, and ate.

But as he, the porter, and his negro wife were sitting silently and sadly enough together, Miriam came in, apparently in high good humour, and lingered a moment on her way to her own apartments upstairs.

'Eh? At supper? And nothing but lentils and water-melon, when the flesh-pots of Egypt have been famous any time these two thousand years. Ah! but times are changed since then!

You have worn out the old Hebrew hints, you miserable Gentiles, you, and got a Cress instead of a Joseph! Hist, you hussies!' cried she to the girls upstairs, clapping her hands loudly. 'Here! bring us down one of those roast chickens, and a bottle of the wine of wines—the wine with the green seal, you careless daughters of Midian, you, with your wits running on the men, I'll warrant, every minute I've been out of the house! Ah, you'll smart for it some day—you'll smart for it some day, you daughters of Adam's first wife!'

Down came, by the hands of one of the Syrian slave-girls, the fowl and the wine.

'There, now, we'll all sup together. Wine, that maketh glad the heart of man!—Youth, you were a monk once, so you have read all about that, eh? and about the best wine which goes down sweetly, causing the lips of them that are asleep to speak. And rare wine it was, I warrant, which the blessed Solomon had in his little country cellar up there in Lebanon. We'll try if this is not a very fair substitute for it, though. Come, my little man-monkey, drink, and forget your sorrow! You shall be temple-sweeper to Beelzebub yet, I promise you. Look at it there, creaming and curdling, the darling! purring like a cat at the very thought of touching human lips! As sweet as honey, as strong as fire, as clear as amber! Drink, ye children of Gehenna, and make good use of the little time that is left you between this and the unquenchable fire!'

And tossing a cup of it down her own throat, as if it had been water, she watched her companions with a meaning look, as they drank.

The little porter followed her example gallantly. Philammon looked, and longed, and sipped blushing and bashfully, and tried to fancy that he did not care for it; and sipped again, being willing enough to forget his sorrow also for a moment, the negress refused with fear and trembling—'She had a vow on her.'

'Satan possess you and your vow! Drink, you coal out of Tophet! Do you think it is poisoned! You, the only creature in the world that I should not enjoy ill-using, because every one else ill-uses you already without my help! Drink, I say, or I'll turn you pea-green from head to foot!

The negress put the cup to her lips, and contrived, for her own reasons, to spill the contents unobserved.

'A very fine lecture that of the Lady Hypatia's the other morning, on Helen's nepenthe,' quoth the little porter, growing philosophic as the wine-fumes rose. 'Such a power of extracting the cold water of philosophy out of the bottomless pit of Mythus, I never did hear. Did you ever, my Philammonidion?'

'Aha! she and I were talking about that half an hour ago,' said Miriam.

'What! have you seen her?' asked Philammon, with a flutter of the heart.

'If you mean, did she mention you,—why, then, yes!'

'How!—how!'

'Talked of a young Phoebus Apollo—without mentioning names, certainly, but in the most sensible, and practical, and hopeful way—the wisest speech that I have heard from her this twelvemonth.'

Philammon blushed scarlet.

'And that,' thought he, 'is a dispute of what passed this morning!—Why, what is the matter with our host!'

'He has taken Solomon's advice, and forgotten his sorrow.'

And so, indeed, he had, for he was sleeping sweetly, with open lack-lustre eyes, and a mandarin smile at the ceiling; while the negress, with her head fallen on her chest, seemed equally unconscious of their presence.

'We'll see,' quoth Miriam, and taking up the lamp, she held the flame unceremoniously to the arm of each of them, but neither winced nor stirred.

'Surely your wine is not drugged!' said Philammon, in trepidation.

'Why not? What has made them beasts, may make us angels. You seem none the less lively for it! Do I!'

'But drugged wine!'

'Why not? The same who made wine made poppy-juice. Both will make man happy. Why not use both!'

'It is poison!'

'It is the nepenthe, as I told Hypatia, whereof she was twaddling mysticism this morning. Drink, child, drink! I have no mind to put you to sleep to-night! I want to make a man of you, or rather, to see whether you are one!'

And she drained another cup, and then went on, half talking to herself—

'Ay, it is poison; and music is poison, and woman is poison, according to the new creed, Pagan and Christian; and wine will be poison, and meat will be poison, some day; and we shall have a world full of mad Nebuchadnezzars, eating grass like oxen. It is poisonous, and brutal, and devilish, to be a man, and not a monk, and an eunuch, and a dry branch. You are all in the same line, Christians and philosophers, Cyril and Hypatia! Don't interrupt me, but drink, young fool!—Ay, and the only man who keeps his manhood, the only man who is not ashamed to be what God has made him, is your Jew. You will find yourselves in want of him after all, some day; you besotted Gentiles, to bring you back to common sense and common manhood.—In want of him and his grand old books, which you despise while you make idols of them, about Abraham, and Jacob, and Moses, and David, and Solomon, whom you call saints, you miserable hypocrites, though they did what you are too dainty to do, and had their wives and their children, and thanked God for a beautiful woman, as Adam did before them, and their sons do after them—Drink, I say—and believed that God had really made the world, and not the devil, and had given them the lordship over it, as you will find out to your cost some day!'

Philammon heard, and could not answer, and on she rambled.

'And music, ho! Our priests were not afraid of sackbut and psaltery, dulcimer and trumpet, in the house of the Lord, for they knew who had given them the cunning to make them. Our prophets were not afraid of calling for music, when they wished to prophesy, and letting it soften and raise their souls, and open and quicken them till they saw into the inner harmony of things, and beheld the future in the present, for they knew who made the melody and harmony, and made them the outward symbols of the inward song which runs through sun and stars, storm and tempest, thrilling his word—in that these sham philosophers the heathen are wiser than those Christian monks. Try it!—try it! Come with me! Leave these sleepers here, and come to my rooms. You long to be as wise as Solomon. Then get at wisdom as Solomon did, and give your heart first to know folly and madness. You have read the Book of the Preacher!'

Poor Philammon! He was no longer master of himself. The arguments—the wine—the terrible spell of the old woman's voice and eye, and the strong overpowering will which showed out through them, dragged him along in spite of himself. As if in a dream, he followed her up the stairs.

'There, throw away that stupid, ugly, shapeless philosopher's cloak. So! You have on the white tunic I gave you! And now you look as a human being should. And you have been to the baths to-day! Well—you have the comfort of feeling now like other people, and having that alabaster skin as white as it was created, instead of being tanned like a brute's hide. Drink, I say! Ay—what was that face, that figure, made for? Bring a mirror here, hussy! There, look in that and judge for yourself! Were those lips rounded for nothing? Why were those eyes set in your head, and made to sparkle bright as jewels, sweet as mountain honey? Why were those curls laid ready for soft fingers to twine themselves among them, and look all the whiter among the glossy black knots? Judge for yourself!

Alas! poor Philammon!

'And after all,' thought he, 'is it not true, as well as pleasant?'

'Sing to the poor boy, girls!—sing to him! and teach him for the first time in his little ignorant life, the old road to inspiration!'

One of the slave-girls sat down on the divan, and took up a double flute, while the other rose, and accompanying the plaintive dreamy air with a slow dance, and delicate twinklings of her silken armlets and anklets, and the sistrum which she held aloft, she floated gracefully round and round the floor and sang—

Why were we born but for bliss?

Why are we ripe, but to fall?
Dream not that duty can bar thee from beauty,
Like water and sunshine, the hurloom of ill

Lips were made only to kiss,

Hands were made only to toy,
Eyes were made only to lure on the lonely,
The longing, the loving, and drown them in joy.

Alas, for poor Philammon! And yet no! The very poison brought with it its own antidote, and, shaking off by one strong effort of will the spell of the music and the wine, he sprang to his feet.

'Never! If love means no more than that if it is to be a mere delicate self-indulgence, worse than the brute's, because it requires the prostration of nobler faculties, and a selfishness the more huge in proportion to the greatness of the soul which is crushed inward by it—then I will have none of it! I have had my dream—yes! but it was of one who should be at once my teacher and my pupil, my debtor and my queen—who should lean on me, and yet support me—supply my defects, although with lesser light, as the old moon fills up the circle of the new—labour with me side by side in some great work—rising with me for ever as I rose, and this is the base substitute! Never!'

Whether or not this was unconsciously forced into words by the vehemence of his passion, or whether the old Jewess heard, or pretended to hear, a footstep coming up the stair, she at all events sprang instantly to her feet.

'Hist! Silence, girls! I hear a visitor! What mad maiden has come to beg a love-charm of the poor old witch at this time of night? Or have the Christian bloodhounds tracked the old house of Judah to her den at last? We'll see!'

And she drew a dagger from her girdle, and stepped boldly to the door.

As she went out she turned—

'So! my brave young Apollo! You do not admire simple woman? You must have something more learned and intellectual and spiritual, and so forth. I wonder whether Eve, when she came to Adam in the garden, brought with her a certificate of proficiency in the seven sciences? Well, well—like must after like. Perhaps we shall be able to suit you after all. Vaniah, daughters of Midian!'

The girls vanished accordingly, whispering and laughing, and Philammon found himself alone. Although he was somewhat soothed by the old woman's last speech, yet a sense of terror, of danger, of coming temptation, kept him standing sternly on his feet, looking warily round the chamber, lest a fresh siren should emerge from behind some curtain or heap of pillows.

On one side of the room he perceived a doorway, filled by a curtain of gauze, from behind which came the sound of whispering voices. His feet, growing with the general excitement of his mind, rose into anger as he began to suspect some snare; and he faced round towards the curtain, and stood like a wild beast at bay, ready, with uplifted arm, for all evil spirits, male or female.

'And he will show himself! How shall I arrest him?' whispered a well-known voice—could it be Hypatia's? And then the guttural Hebrew accent of the old woman answered—

'As you spoke of him this morning—'

'Oh! I will tell him all, and he must—he must have mercy! But he!—so awful, so glorious!—'

What the answer was, he could not hear; but the next moment a sweet heavy scent, as of narcotic gums, filled the room—mutterings, of incantations—and then a blaze of light, in which the curtain vanished, and disclosed to his astonished eyes, enveloped in a glory of luminous smoke, the hag standing by a tripod, and, kneeling by her, Hypatia herself, robed in pure white, glittering with diamonds and gold, her lips parted, her head thrown back, her arms stretched out in an agony of expectation.

In an instant, before he had time to stir, she had sprung through the blaze, and was kneeling at his feet.

'Phœbus! beautiful, glorious, ever young! Hear me! only a moment! only this once!'

Her drapery had caught fire from the tripod, but she did not heed it. Philammon instinctively clasped her in his arms, and crushed it out, as she cried—

'Have mercy on me! Tell me the secret! I will obey thee! I have no self—I am thy slave! Kill me, if thou wilt, but speak!'

The blaze sank into a soft, warm, mellow gleam, and beyond it what appeared?

The negro-woman, with one finger upon her lips, as with an imploring, all but despairing look, she held up to him her little crucifix.

He saw it. What thoughts flashed through him, like the lightning bolt, at that blessed sign of infinite self-sacrifice, I say not; let those who know it judge for themselves. But in another instant he had spurned from him the poor deluded maiden, whose idolatrous ecstasies he saw instantly were not meant for himself, and rushed desperately across the room, looking for an outlet.

He found a door in the darkness—a room—a window—and in another moment he had leapt twenty feet into the street, rolled over, bruised and bleeding, rose again like an Antæus, with new strength, and darted off towards the archbishop's house.

And poor Hyppatia lay half senseless on the floor, with the Jews watching her bitter tears—not merely of disappointment, but of utter shame. For as Philammon fled she had recognised those well-known features, and the veil was lifted from her eyes, and the hope and the self-respect of Theon's daughter were gone for ever.

Her righteous wrath was too deep for upbraidings. Slowly she rose; returned into the inner room, wrapped her cloak deliberately around her, and went silently away, with one look at the Jewess of solemn scorn and defiance.

'Ah! I can afford a few sulky looks to-night!' said the old woman to herself, with a smile, as she picked up from the floor the prize for which she had been plotting so long—Raphael's half of the black agate.

'I wonder whether she will miss it! Perhaps she will have no fancy for its company any longer, now that she has discovered what over-palpable arrangements appear when she rubs it. But if she does try to recover it—why—let her try her strength with mine—or, rather, with a Christian mob.'

And then, drawing from her bosom the other half of the talisman, she fitted the two pieces together again and again, fingering them over, and poring upon them with tear-brimming eyes, till she had satisfied herself that the fracture still fitted exactly, while she murmured to herself from time to time—'Oh, that he were here! Oh, that he would return now—now! It may be too late to-morrow! Stay—I will go and consult the teraph, it may know where he is.'

And she departed to her incantations, while Hyppatia threw herself upon her bed at home, and filled the chamber with a long, low wailing, as of a child in pain, until the dreary dawn broke on her shame and her despair. And then she rose, and rousing herself for one great effort, calmly prepared a last oration, in which she intended to bid farewell for ever to Alexandria and to the schools.

Philammon meanwhile was striding desperately up the main street which led towards the Serapeum. But he was not destined to arrive there as soon as he had hoped to do. For ere he had gone half a mile, behold a crowd advancing towards him blocking up the whole street.

The mass seemed endless. Thousands of torches flared above their heads, and from the heart of the procession rose a solemn chant, in which Philammon soon recognised a well-known Catholic hymn. He was half minded to turn up some by-street, and escape meeting them. But on attempting to do so, he found every avenue which he tried similarly blocked up by a tributary stream of people, and, almost ere he was aware, was entangled in the vanguard of the great column.

'Let me pass!' cried he in a voice of entreaty.

'Pass, thou heathen!'

In vain he protested his Christianity.

'Origenist, Donatist, heretic! Whither should a good Catholic be going to-night, save to the Cæsareum!'

'My friends, my friends, I have no business at the Cæsareum!' cried he, in utter despair.

'I am on my way to seek a private interview with the patriarch, on matters of importance.'

'Oh, liar! who pretends to be known to the patriarch, and yet is ignorant that this night he visits at the Cæsareum the most sacred corpse of the martyr Ammonius!'

'What! Is Cyril with you!'

'He and all his clergy.'

'Better so, better in public,' said Philammon to himself, and, turning, he joined the crowd.

Onward, with chant and dirge, they swept out through the Sun-gate, upon the harbour esplanade, and wheeled to the right along the quay, while the torchlight bathed in a red glare the great front of the Cæsareum, and the tall obelisks before it, and the masts of the thousand ships which lay in the harbour on their left, and last, but not least, before the huge dim mass of the palace which bounded the esplanade in front, a long line of glittering helmets, cuirasses, behind a barrier of cables which stretched from the shore to the corner of the museum.

There was a sudden halt, a low ominous growl, and then the mob pressed onward from behind, surged up almost to the barrier. The soldiers dropped the points of their lances, and stood firm. Again the mob recoiled, again surged forward. fiercer cries arose, some of the boldest stooped to pick up stones—but, luckily, the pavement was too firm for them. Another moment, and the whole soldiery of Alexandria would have been fighting for life and death against fifty thousand Christians.

But Cyril had not forgotten his generalship. Reckless as that night's events proved him to be about arousing the passions of his subjects, he was yet far too wary to risk the odium and the danger of a night attack, which, even if successful, would have cost the lives of hundreds. He knew well enough the numbers and the courage of the enemy, and the certainty that, in case of a collision, no quarter would be given or accepted on either side. Beside, if a battle must take place—and that, of course, must happen sooner or later—it must not happen in his presence and under his sanction. He was in the right now, and Orestes in the wrong, and in the right he would keep—at least till his express to Byzantium should have returned, and Orestes was either proscribed or superseded. So looking forward to some such chance as this, the wary prelate had schooled his aides-de-camp, the deacons of the city, and went on his way up the steps of the Cæsareum, knowing that they could be trusted to keep the peace outside.

And they did their work well. Before a blow had been struck, or even an insult passed on either side, they had burst through the front rank of the mob, and by stent threats of excommunication, enjoined not only peace, but absolute silence until the sacred ceremony which was about to take place should be completed, and enforced their commands by marching up and down like sentries between the hostile ranks for the next weary two hours, till the very soldiers broke out into expressions of admiration, and the tribune of the cohort, who had no great objection, but also no great wish, to fight, paid them a high-flown compliment on their laudable endeavours to maintain public order, and received the somewhat ambiguous reply, that the 'weapons of their warfare were not carnal, that they wrestled not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers,'—an answer which the tribune, being now somewhat sleepy, thought it best to leave unexplained.

In the meanwhile, there had passed up the steps of the Temple a gorgeous line of priests, among whom glittered, more gorgeous than all, the stately figure of the pontiff. They were followed close by thousands of monks, not only from Alexandria and Nitria, but from all the adjoining towns and monasteries. And as Philammon, unable for some half hour more to force his way into the church, watched their endless stream, he could well believe the boast which he had so often heard in Alexandria, that one half of the population of Egypt was at that moment in 'religious orders.'

After the monks, the laity began to enter but even then so vast was the crowd, and so dense the crush upon the steps, that before he could force his way into the church, Cyril's sermon had begun.

—'What went ye out for to see? A man clothed in soft raiment? Nay, such are in kings' palaces, and in the palaces of prefects who would needs be emperors, and cast away the Lord's bonds from them—of whom it is written, that He hath sitteth in the heavens laugheth them to scorn, and taketh the wicked in their own snare, and maketh the devices of princes of none effect. Ay, in king's palaces, and in theatres too, where the rich of this world, poor in faith, deny their covenant, and defile their baptismal robes that they may do honour to the devourers of the earth. Woe to them who think that they may partake of the cup of the Lord and the cup of devils. Woe to them who will praise with the same mouth Aphrodite the fiend, and her of whom it is written that He was born of a pure Virgin. Let such be excommunicate from the cup of the Lord, and from the congregation of the Lord, till they have purged away their sins by penance and by almsgiving. But for you, ye poor of this world, rich in faith, you whom the rich despise, hale before the judgment seats, and blaspheme that holy name whereby ye are called—what went ye out into the wilderness to see? A prophet?—Ay, and more than a prophet—a martyr! More than a prophet, more than a king, more than a prefect, whose theatre was the sands of the desert, whose throne was the cross, whose crown was bestowed, not by heathen philosophers and daughters of Satan, deceiving men with the works of their fathers, but by angels and archangels; a crown of glory, the victor's laurel, which grows for ever in the paradise of the highest heaven. Call him no more Ammonius, call him Thaumastus, wonderful! Wonderful in his poverty, wonderful in his zeal, wonderful in his faith, wonderful in his fortitude, wonderful in his death, most wonderful in the manner of that death. Oh thrice blessed, who has merited the honour of the cross itself! What can follow, but that one so honoured in the flesh should also be honoured in the life which he now lives, and that from the virtue of these thrice-holy limbs the leper should be cleansed, the dumb should speak, the very dead be raised? Yes, it were impiety to doubt it. Consecrated by the cross, this flesh shall not only rest in hope but work in power. Approach, and be healed! Approach, and see the glory of the saints, the glory of the poor. Approach, and learn that that which man despises, God hath highly esteemed, that that which man rejects, God accepts, that that which man punishes, God rewards. Approach, and see how God hath chosen the foolish things of this world to confound the wise, and the weak things of this world to confound the strong. Man abhors the cross. The Son of God condescended to endure it! Man tramples on the poor: The Son of God hath not where to lay His head. Man passes by the sick as useless. The Son of God chooses them to be partakers of His sufferings, that the glory of God may be made manifest in them. Man curses the publican, while he employs him to fill his coffers with the plunder of the poor. The Son of God calls him from the receipt of custom to be an apostle, higher than the kings of the earth. Man casts away the harlot like a faded flower, when he has tempted her to become the slave of sin for a season; and the Son of God calls her, the defiled, the despised, the forsaken, to Himself, accepts her tears, blesses her offering, and declares that her sins are forgiven, for she hath loved much, while to whom little is forgiven the same loveth little.

Philammon heard no more. With the passionate and impulsive nature of a Greek fanatic, he burst forward through the crowd, towards the steps which led to the choir, and above which, in front of the altar, stood the corpse of Ammonius, enclosed in a coffin of glass, beneath a gorgeous canopy; and never stopping till he found himself in front of Cyril's pulpit, he threw himself upon his face upon the pavement, spread out his arms in the form of a cross, and lay silent and motionless before the feet of the multitude.

There was a sudden whisper and rustle in the congregation—but Cyril, after a moment's pause, went on—humiliation, and penance, and the broken and the contrite heart; and tells thee that only as long as thou dost well unto thyself will he speak well of thee: the Son of God says that he that humbleth himself, even as this our penitent brother, he it is who shall be exalted. He it is of whom it is written that his father saw him afar off, and ran to meet him, and bade put the best robe on him, and a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet, and make merry and be glad with the choir of angels who rejoice over one sinner that repenteth. Arise, my son, whosoever thou art, and go in peace for this night, remembering that he who said, "My belly cleaveth unto the pavement," hath also said, "Rejoice not against me, Satan, mine enemy, for when I fall I shall arise!"

'Man, in his pride and self-sufficiency, despises

A thunder-clap of applause, surely as pardonable as any an Alexandrian church ever heard, followed this dexterous, and yet most righteous, turn of the patriarch's oratory: but Philammon raised himself slowly and fearfully to his knees, and blushing scarlet endured the gaze of ten thousand eyes.

Suddenly, from beside the pulpit, an old man sprang forward, and clasped him round the neck. It was Arsenius.

"My son! my son!" sobbed he, almost aloud. "Slave, as well as son, if you will!" whispered Philammon. "One boon from the patriarch, and then home to the Barra for ever!"

"Oh, twice-blest night," rolled on above the deep rich voice of Cyril, "which beholds at once the coronation of a martyr and the conversion of a sinner; which increases at the same time the ranks of the church triumphant, and of the church militant, and pierces celestial essences with a twofold rapture of thanksgiving, as they welcome on high a victorious, and on earth a repentant, brother!"

And at a sign from Cyril, Peter the Reader stepped forward, and led away, gently enough, the two weepers, who were welcomed as they passed by the blessings, and prayers, and tears even of those fierce fanatics of Nitinia Nay, Peter himself, as he turned to leave them together in the sacristy, held out his hand to Philammon.

"I ask your forgiveness," said the poor boy, who plunged eagerly and with a sort of delight into any and every self-abasement.

"And I accord it," quoth Peter, and returned to the church, looking, and probably feeling, in a far more pleasant mood than usual.

CHAPTER XXVII

THE PRODIGAL'S RETURN

ABOUT ten o'clock the next morning, as Hypatia, worn out with sleepless sorrow, was trying to arrange her thoughts for the farewell lecture, her favourite maid announced that a messenger from Synesius waited below. A letter from Synesius! A gleam of hope flashed across her mind. From him, surely, might come something of comfort, of advice. Ah! if he only knew how sorely she was bestead!

"Let him send up his letter!"

"He refuses to deliver it to any one but yourself. And I think,"—added the damsel, who had, to tell the truth, at that moment in her purse a substantial reason for so thinking—"I think it might be worth your ladyship's while to see him."

Hypatia shook her head impatiently.

"He seems to know you well, madam, though he refuses to tell his name: but he bade me put you in mind of a black agate—I cannot tell what he meant—of a black agate, and a spirit which was to appear when you rubbed it."

Hypatia turned pale as death. Was it Philammon again? She felt for the talisman—it was gone! She must have lost it last night in Miriam's chamber. "Now she saw the true purpose of the old hag's plot— . . . deceived, tricked, doubly tricked! And what new plot was this?"

"Tell him to leave the letter, and begone. My father! What! Who is this! Whom are you bringing to me at such a moment?"

And as she spoke, Theon ushered into the chamber no other than Raphael Aben-Ezra, and then retired.

He advanced slowly towards her, and falling on one knee, placed in her hand Synesius's letter.

Hypatia trembled from head to foot at the unexpected apparition. Well, at least he could know nothing of last night and its disgrace. But not daring to look him in the face, she took the letter and opened it. If she had hoped for comfort from it, her hope was not realised.

"Synesius to the Philosopher."

"Even if Fortune cannot take from me all things, yet what she can take she will. And yet of two things, at least, she shall not rob me—to prefer that which is best, and to succour the oppressed. Heaven forbid that she should overpower my judgment, as well as the rest of me! Therefore I do hate injustice, for that I can do: and my will is to stop it, but the power to do so is among the things of which she has bereaved me—before, too, she bereaved me of my children."

"Once, in old times, Milesian men were strong."

And there was a time when I, too, was a comfort to my friends, and when you used to call me a blessing to every one except myself, as I squandered for the benefit of others the favour with which the great regarded me. . . . My hands they were—then. . . . But now I am left desolate of all: unless you have any power. For you and virtue I count among those good things, of which none can deprive me. But you always have power, and will have it, surely, now—using it as nobly as you do.

"As for Nicæus and Philolaus, two noble youths, and kinsmen of my own, let it be the business of all who honour you, both private men and magistrates, to see that they return possessors of their just rights.'¹

'Of all who honour me!' said she, with a bitter sigh: and then looked up quickly at Raphael, as if fearful of having betrayed herself. She turned deadly pale. In his eyes was a look of solemn pity, which told her that he knew—not all!—surely not all!

'Have you seen the—Miriam?' gasped she, rushing desperately at that which she most dreaded.

'Not yet. I arrived but one hour ago; and Hypatia's welfare is still more important to me than my own.'

'My welfare? It is gone!'

'So much the better. I never found mine till I lost it.'

'What do you mean?'

Raphael lingered, yet without withdrawing his gaze, as if he had something of importance to say, which he longed and yet feared to utter. At last—

'At least, you will confess that I am better dressed than when we met last. I have returned, you see, like a certain demoniac of Galilee, about whom we used to argue, clothed—and perhaps also in my right mind. God knows!'

'Raphael! are you come here to mock me? You know—you cannot have been here an hour without knowing—that but yesterday I dreamed of being'—and she drooped her eyes—'an empress, that to-day I am ruined, to-morrow, perhaps, proscribed. Have you no speech for me but your old sarcasms and ambiguities?'

Raphael stood silent and motionless.

'Why do you not speak? What is the meaning of this sad, earnest look, so different from your former self? You have something strange to tell me!'

'I have,' said he, speaking very slowly. 'What—what would Hypatia answer if, after all, Aben-Ezra said like the dying Julian, "The Galilean has conquered"?''

'Julian never said it! It is a monkish calumny.'

'But I say it!'

'Impossible!'

'I say it!'

'As your dying speech? The true Raphael Aben-Ezra, then, lives no more!'

'But he may be born again!'

'And die to philosophy, that he may be born again into barbaric superstition! Oh worthy metempsychosis! Farewell, sir!' And she rose to go.

'Hear me!—hear me patiently this once, noble, beloved Hypatia! One more sneer of yours, and I may become again the same case-hardened fiend which you knew me of old—to all, at least, but you. Oh, do not think me ungrateful, forgetful! What do I not owe to you, whose pure and lofty words alone kept amouldering in me the dim remembrance that there was a Right, a Truth, an unseen world of spirits, after whose pattern man should aspire to live!'

She paused, and listened in wonder. What faith had she of her own! She would at least hear what he had found.

'Hypatia, I am older than you—wiser than you, if wisdom be the fruit of the tree of knowledge. You know but one side of the medal, Hypatia, and the fairer, I have seen its reverse as well as its obverse. Through every form of human thought, of human action, of human sin and folly, have I been wandering for years, and found no rest—as little in wisdom as in folly, in spiritual dreams as in sensual brutality. I could not rest in your Platonism—I will tell you why hereafter. I went on to Stoicism, Epicurism, Cynicism, Scepticism, and in that lowest deep I found a lower depth, when I became sceptical of Scepticism itself.'

'There is a lower deep still,' thought Hypatia to herself, as she recollected last night's magic, but she did not speak.

'Then in utter abasement, I confessed myself lower than the brutes, who had a law, and obeyed it, while I was my own lawless God, devil, harpy, whirlwind. I needed even my own dog to awaken in me the brute consciousness of my own existence, or of anything without myself. I took her, the dog, for my teacher, and obeyed her, for she was wiser than I. And she led me back—the poor dumb beast—like a God-sent and God-obeying angel, to human nature, to mercy, to self-sacrifice, to belief, to worship—to pure and wedded love.'

Hypatia started. And in the struggle to hide her own bewilderment, answered almost without knowing it—

'Wedded love? Wedded love? Is that, then, the paltry bait by which Raphael Aben-Ezra has been tempted to desert philosophy?'

'Thank Heaven!' said Raphael to himself. 'She does not care for me, then! If she had, pride would have kept her from that sneer.'

'Yes, my dear lady,' answered he aloud, 'to desert philosophy, to search after wisdom, because wisdom itself had sought for me, and found me. But, indeed, I had hoped that you would have approved of my following your example for once in my life, and resolving, like you, to enter into the estate of wedlock.'

'Do not sneer at me!' cried she, in her turn, looking up at him with shame and horror, which made him repent of uttering the words. 'If you do not know—you will soon, too soon! Never mention that hateful dream to me, if you wish to have speech of me more!'

A pang of remorse shot through Raphael's heart. Who but he himself had plotted that evil marriage! But she gave him no opportunity of answering her, and went on hurriedly—

'Speak to me rather about yourself. What is this strange and sudden betrothal! What has it to do with Christianity? I had thought that it was rather by the glories of celibacy—gross and superstitious as their notions of it are—that the Galileans tempted their converts’

‘So had I, my dearest lady,’ answered he, as, glad to turn the subject for a moment, and perhaps a little nettled by her contemptuous tone, he resumed something of his old arch and careless manner. ‘But—there is no accounting for man’s agreeable inconsistencies—one morning I found myself, to my astonishment, seized by two bishops, and betrothed, whether I chose or not, to a young lady who but a few days before had been destined for a nunnery.’

‘Two bishops?’

‘I speak simple truth. The one was syncretist of course,—that most incoherent and most benevolent of busybodies chose to betray me behind my back—but I will not trouble you with that part of my story. The real wonder is that the other episcopal match-maker was Augustine of Hippo himself!’

‘Anything to bribe a convert,’ said Hypatia contemptuously.

‘I assure you, no. He informed me, and he also, openly and unconvincingly enough, that he thought us very much to be pitied for so great a fall. But as we neither of us seemed to have any call for the higher life of celibacy, he could not press it on us. We should have trouble in the flesh. But if we married we had not sinned. To which I answered that my humility was quite content to sit in the very lowest ranks, with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.’

He replied by an encomium on virginity, in which I seemed to hear again the voice of Hypatia herself.

‘And sneered at it inwardly, as you used to sneer at me.’

‘Really I was in no sneering mood at that moment, and whatsoever I may have felt inclined to reply, he was kind enough to say for me and himself the next minute.’

‘What do you mean?’

‘He went on, to my utter astonishment, by such a eulogium on wedlock as I never heard from Jew or heathen, and ended by advice to young married folk so thoroughly excellent and to the point, that I could not help telling him, when he stopped, what a pity I thought it that he had not himself married, and made some good woman happy by putting his own recipes into practice. And at that, Hypatia, I saw an expression on his face which made me wish for the moment that I had bitten out this impudent tongue of mine, before I so rashly touched some deep old wound.’

‘That man touched some deep old wound. . . That man has wept bitter tears ere now, be sure of it.’

But he turned the conversation instantly, like a well-bred gentleman as he is, by saying, with the sweetest smile, that though he had made it a solemn rule never to be a party to making up any marriage, yet in one case Heaven had so plainly pointed us out for each other, etc. etc., that he could not refuse himself the pleasure. . . and ended by a blessing as kindly as ever came from the lips of man.

‘You seem wonderfully taken with the sophist
BY.

of Hippo,’ said Hypatia impatiently, ‘and forget, perhaps, that his opinions, especially when, as you confess, they are utterly inconsistent with themselves, are not quite as important to me as they seem to have become to you.’

‘Whether he be consistent or not about marriage,’ said Raphael, somewhat proudly, ‘I care little. I went to him to tell me, not about the relation of the sexes, on which point I am probably as good a judge as he—but about God, and on that subject he told me enough to bring me back to Alexandria, that I might undo, if possible, somewhat of the wrong which I have done to Hypatia.’

‘What wrong have you done me?’ . . . You are silent? Be sure, at least, that whatsoever it may be, you will not wipe it out by trying to make a proselyte of me!’

‘Be not too sure of that. I have found too great a treasure not to wish to share it with Theon’s daughter.’

‘A treasure!’ said she, half scornfully.

‘Yes, indeed. You recollect my last words, when we parted, there below a few months ago?’

Hypatia was silent. One terrible possibility at which he had hinted flashed across her memory for the first time since, . . . but she spurned proudly from her the heaven sent warning.

‘I told you that, like Diogenes, I went forth to seek a man. Did I not promise you, that when I had found one you should be the first to hear of him? And I have found a man.’

Hypatia waved her beautiful hand. ‘I know whom you would say that crucified one lie it so. I want not a man, but a god.’

‘What sort of a god, Hypatia? A god made up of our own intellectual notions, or rather of negations of them—of infinity and eternity, and invisibility, and impassibility—and why not of immortality, too, Hypatia? For I recollect we used to agree that it was a carnal degrading of the Supreme One to predicate of Him so merely human a thing as virtue.’

Hypatia was silent.

‘Now I have always had a sort of fancy that what we wanted, as the first predicate of our Absolute One, was that He was to be not merely an infinite God—whatever that meant, which I suspect we did not always see quite clearly—or an eternal one—or an omnipotent one—or even merely a one God at all, none of which predicates, I fear, did we understand more clearly than the first—but that He must be a righteous God—or rather, as we used sometimes to say, that He was to have no predicate—Righteousness itself. And all along, I could not help remembering that my old sacred Hebrew books told me of such a one, and feeling that they might have something to tell me which—’

‘Which I did not tell you! And thus, then, caused your air of reserve, and of sly superiority over the woman whom you mocked by calling her your pupil! I little suspected you of so truly Jewish a jealousy! Why, oh why, did you not tell me this?

'Because I was a beast, Hypatia, and had all but forgotten what this righteousness was like, and was afraid to find out lest it should condemn me. Because I was a devil, Hypatia, and hated righteousness, and neither wished to see you righteous, nor God righteous either, because then you would both have been unlike myself. God be merciful to me a sinner.'

She looked up in his face. The man was changed as if by miracle—and yet not changed. There was the same gallant consciousness of power, the same subtle and humorous twinkle in those strong ripe Jewish features and those glittering eyes, and yet every line in his face was softened, sweetened, the mask of sneering fauconess was gone—impugning tenderness and earnestness beamed from his whole countenance. The chrysalis case had fallen off, and disclosed the butterfly within. She sat looking at him, and passed her hand across her eyes, as if to try whether the apparition would not vanish. He, the subtle—he, the mocker—he, the Laicist of Alexandria—he whose depth and power had awed her, even in his most polluted days. And this was the end of him.

'It is a freak of cowardly superstition. Those Christians have been frightening him about his sins and their Tartarus.'

She looked again into his bright, clear, fearless face, and was ashamed of her own calumny. And this was the end of him—of Syneus—of Augustine—of learned and unlearned, Goth and Roman. The great flood would have its way, then. Could she alone fight against it?

She could! Would she submit?—She? Her will should stand firm, her reason free, to the last—to the death if need be. And yet last night!—last night!

At last she spoke, without looking up.

'And what if you have found a man in that crucified one? Have you found in him a God also?'

'Does Hypatia recollect Glaucon's definition of the perfectly righteous man? How, without being guilty of one unrighteous act, he must labour his life long under the imputation of being utterly unrighteous, in order that his disinterestedness may be thoroughly tested, and by proceeding in such a course, arrive inevitably, as Glaucon says, not only in Athens of old, or in Judaea of old, but, as you yourself will agree, in Christian Alexandria at this moment, at—do you remember, Hypatia?—bonds, and the scourge, and lastly, at the cross itself. If Plato's idea of the righteous man be a crucified one, why may not mine also? If, as we both—and old Bishop Clements, too—as good a Platonist as we, remember—and Augustine himself, would agree, Plato in specking those strange words, spoke not of himself, but by the Spirit of God, why should not others have spoken by the same Spirit when they spoke the same words?'

'A crucified man. Yes. But a crucified God, Raphael! I shudder at the blasphemy.'

'So do my poor dear fellow-countrymen. And they the more righteous in their daily doings, Hypatia, on account of their fancied reverence for the glory of One who probably knows best how to preserve and manifest His own glory? But you assent to the definition? Take care!' said he, with one of his arch smiles, 'I have been fighting with Augustine, and have become of late a terrible dialectician. Do you assent to it?'

'Of course—it is Plato's.'

'But do you assent merely because it is written in the book called Plato's, or because your reason tells you that it is true? You will not tell me. Tell me this, then, at least. Is not the perfectly righteous man the highest specimen of man?'

'Surely,' said she half carelessly, but not unwilling, like a philosopher and a Greek, as a matter of course, to embark in anything like a word battle, and to shut out sadder thoughts for a moment.

'Then must not the Autanthropos, the archetypal and ideal man, who is more perfect than any individual specimen, be perfectly righteous also?'

'Yes.'

'Suppose, then, for the sake of one of those pleasant old games of ours, an argument, that he wished to manifest his righteousness to the world. The only method for him, according to Plato, would be Glaucon's, of calumny and persecution, the scourge and the cross?'

'What words are these, Raphael? Maternal scourges and crosses for an eternal and spiritual idea?'

'Did you ever yet, Hypatia, consider at leisure what the archetype of man might be like?'

Hypatia studied, as at a new thought, and confessed as every Neo-Platonist would have done—that she had never done so.

'And yet our master, Plato, bids us believe that there was a substantial archetype of each thing, from a flower to a nation, eternal in the heavens. Perhaps we have not been faithful Platonists enough heretofore, my dearest tutor. Perhaps, being philosophers, and somewhat of Platonists to boot, we began all our lucubrations as we did our prayers, by thanking God that we were not as other men were, and so misread another passage in the Republic, which we used in pleasant old days to be fond of quoting.'

'What was that?' asked Hypatia, who became more and more interested every moment.

'That philosophers were men.'

'Are you mocking me? Plato defines the philosopher as the man who seeks after the objects of knowledge, while others seek after those of opinion.'

'And most truly. But what if, in our eagerness to assert that wherein the philosopher differed from other men, we had overlooked that in which he resembled other men, and so forgot that, after all, man was a genus whereof the philosopher was only a species !

Hypatia sighed

'Do you not think, then, that as the greater contains the less, and the archetype of the genus that of the species, we should have been wiser if we had speculated a little more on the archetype of man as man, before we meddled with a pair of that archetype,—the archetype of the philosopher ? . . . Certainly it would have been the easier course, for there are more men than philosophers, Hypatia, and every man is a real man, and a fair subject for examination, while every philosopher is not a real philosopher—our friends the Academics, for instance, and even a Neo-Platonist or two whom we know ! You seem impatient. Shall I cease ?'

'You mistook the cause of my impatience,' answered she, looking up at him with her great sad eyes 'Go on'

'Now—for I am going to do terribly scholastic—is it not the very definition of man, that he is, alone of all known things, a spirit temporarily united to an animal body ?'

'Enchanted in it, as in a dungeon, rather,' said she sighing

'Be it so if you will. But—must we not say that the archetype—the very man—that if he is the archetype, he too will be for must have been, once at least, temporarily enchanted into an animal body ?' 'You are silent. I will not press you. Only ask you to consider at your leisure whether Plato may not justify somewhat from the charge of absurdity the fisherman of Gahlee, when he said that he in whose image man is made was made flesh, and dwelt with him bodily there by the lake-side at Tiberias, and that he beheld His Glory, the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father.'

'That last question is a very different one. God made flesh ! My reason revolts at it.'

'Old Homer's reason did not.'

Hypatia started, for she recollected her yesterday's cravings after those old, pulpy, and human deities. And—'Go on,' she cried eagerly 'Tell me, then—This archetype of man, if it exists anywhere, it must exist eternally in the mind of God ! At least, Plato would have so said ?'

'Yes'

'And derive its existence immediately from Him ?'

'Yes.'

'But a man is one willing person, unlike to all others.'

'Yes.'

'Then this archetype must be such.'

'I suppose so.'

'But possessing the faculties and properties of all men in their highest perfection.'

'Of course.'

'How sweetly and obediently my late teacher becomes my pupil !'

Hypatia looked at him with her eyes full of tears.

'I never taught you anything, Raphael.'

'You taught me most, beloved lady, when you least thought of it. But tell me one thing more. Is it not the property of every man to be a son ? For you can conceive of a man as not being a father, but not as not being a son.'

'Be it so.'

'Then this archetype must be a son also.'

'Whose son, Raphael ?'

'Why not of "Zeus, father of gods and men" ? For we agreed that it—we will call it he, now, having agreed that it is a person—could owe its existence to none but God Himself.'

'And what then ?' said Hypatia, fixing those glorious eyes full on his face, in an agony of doubt, but yet, as Raphael declared to his dying day, all hope and joy

'Well, Hypatia, and must not a son be of the same species as his father ? "Eagles," says the poet, "do not beget doves." Is the word son anything but an empty and false metaphor, unless the son be the perfect and equal likeness of his father ?'

'Heroes beget sons worse than themselves,' says the poet.

'We are not talking now of men as they are, whom Homer's Zeus calls the most wretched of all the beasts of the field, we are talking—are we not ?—of a perfect and archetypal Son, and a perfect and archetypal Father, in a perfect and eternal world, wherein is neither growth, decay, nor change, and of a perfect and archetypal generation, of which the only definition can be, that he begets its perfect like !'

You are silent. Be so, Hypatia. We have gone up too far into the abysses

And so they both were silent for a while. And Raphael thought solemn thoughts about Victoria, and about ancient signs of Isaiah's, which were to him none the less prophecies concerning The Man whom he had found, because he prayed and trusted that the same signs might be repeated to himself, and a child given to him also, as a token that, in spite of all his business, 'God was with him.'

But he was a Jew, and a man. Hypatia was a Greek, and a woman—and for that matter, so were the men of her school. To her, the relations and duties of common humanity shone with none of the awful and divine meaning which they did in the eyes of the converted Jew, awakened for the first time in his life to know the meaning of his own scriptures, and become an Israelite indeed. And Raphael's dialectic, too, though it might silence her, could not convince her. Her creed, like those of her fellow-philosophers, was one of the fancy and the religious sentiment, rather than of the reason and the moral sense. All the brilliant cloud-world in which she had revolved for years,—cosmogonies, emanations, atomies, symbolisms, hierarchies, abysses, eternities, and the rest of it—though she could not rest in them, not even believe in them—though they had vanished into thin air at her most utter need,—yet—they were too pretty to be lost sight of for ever, and, struggling against the growing conviction of her reason, she answered at last—

'And you would have me give up, as you seem to have done, the sublime, the beautiful, the heavenly, for a dry and barren chain of dialectic—in which, for aught I know,—for after all, Raphael, I cannot cope with you—I am a woman—a weak woman!'

And she covered her face with her hands

'For aught you know, what?' asked Raphael gently

'You may have made the worse appear the better reason'

'So said Aristophanes of Socrates. But hear me once more, beloved Hypatia. You refuse to give up the beautiful, the sublime, the heavenly? What if Raphael Aben-Ezra, at least, had never found them till now? Recollect what I said just now—What if our old Beautiful, and Sublime, and Heavenly, had been the sheerest materialism, notions spun by our own brains out of the impressions of pleasant things, and high things, and low things, and awful things, which we had seen with our bodily eyes? What if I had discovered that the spiritual is not the intellectual, but the moral, and that the spiritual world is not, as we used to make it, a world of our own intellectual abstractions, or of our own physical emotions, religious or other, but a world of righteous or unrighteous persons? What if I had discovered that one law of the spiritual world, in which all others were contained, was righteousness, and that disharmony with that law, which we called unspirituality, was not being vulgar, or clumsy, or ill-taught, or unmagmatic, or dull, but simply being unrighteous? What if I had discovered that righteousness, and it alone, was the beautiful righteousness, the sublime, the heavenly, the Godlike—ay, God Himself? And what if it had dawned on me, as by a great sunrise, what that righteousness was like? What if I had seen a human being, a woman, too, a young weak girl, showing forth the glory and the beauty of God? Showing me that the beautiful was to mingle unshrinking, for duty's sake, with all that is most foul and loathsome, that the sublime was to stoop to the most menial offices, the most outwardly-degrading self-denials, that to be heavenly was to know that the commonest relations, the most vulgar duties, of earth, were God's commands, and only to be performed aright by the help of the same spirit by which He rules the Universe, that righteousness was to love, to help, to suffer for—if need be, to die for—those who, in themselves, seem fitted to arouse no feelings except indignation and disgust? What if, for the first time, I trust not for the last time, in my life, I saw this vision; and at the sight of it my eyes were opened, and I knew it for the likeness and the glory of God? What if I, a Platonist, like John of Galilee, and Paul of Tarsus, yet, like them, a Hebrew of the Hebrews, had confessed to myself—If the creature can love thus, how much more its archetype? If weak woman can endure thus, how much more a Son of God? If for the good of others, man has strength to sacrifice himself in part, God will have strength to sacrifice Himself utterly. If He has not done it, He will do it or He will be less beautiful, less sublime, less heavenly, less righteous than my poor conception of Him, ay, than this weak playful girl! Why should I not believe those who tell me that He has done it already? What if their evidence be, after all, only probability? I do not want mathematical demonstration to prove to me that when a child was in danger his father saved him—neither do I here. My reason, my heart, every faculty of me, except this stupid sensuous experience, which I find deceiving me every moment, which cannot even prove to me my own existence, accepts that story of Calvary as the most natural, most probable, most necessary of earthly events, assuming only that God is a righteous Person, and not some dream of an all-pervading necessary spirit—nonsense which, in its very terms, confesses its own materialism'

Hypatia answered with a forced smile,

'Raphael Aben-Ezra has deserted the method of the severe dialectician for that of the eloquent lover'

'Not altogether,' said she, smiling in return. 'For suppose that I had said to myself, We Platonists agree that the sight of God is the highest good.'

Hypatia once more shuddered at last night's recollections

'And if He be righteous, and righteousness be—as I know it to be—identical with love, then He will desire that highest good for men far more than they can desire it for themselves.

Then He will desire to show Himself and His own righteousness to them. Will you make answer, dearest Hypatia, or shall I? or does your silence give consent? At least let me go on to say this, that if God do desire to show His righteousness to men, His only perfect method, according to Plato, will be that of calumny, persecution, the scourge, and the cross, that so He, like Glaucon's righteous man, may remain for ever free from any suspicion of selfish interest, or weakness of endurance. Am I deserting the dialectic method now, Hypatia?

You are still silent? You will not hear me, I see. At some future day, the philosopher may condescend to lend a kinder ear to the words of her greatest debtor. . . . Or, rather, she may condescend to hear, in her own heart, the voice of that Archetypal Man, who has been loving her, guiding her, helping her with every perfection of body and of mind, inspiring her with all pure and noble longings, and only asks of her to listen to her own reason, her own philosophy, when they proclaim Him as the giver of them, and to impart them freely and humbly, as He has imparted them to her, to the poor, and the brutish, and the sinful, whom He loves as well as He loves her. . . . Farewell!'

'Stay!' said she, springing up: 'whither are you going?'

'To do a little good before I die, having done much evil. To farm, plant, and build, and rescue a little corner of Ormuz's earth, as the Persians would say, out of the dominion of Ahri-man. To fight Assurian robbers, feed Thracian mercenaries, save a few widows from starvation, and a few orphans from slavery. Perhaps to leave behind me a son of David's line, who will be a better Jew, because a better Christian, than his father. . . We shall have trouble in the flesh, Augustine tells us. But, as I answered him, I really have had so little thereof yet, that my fair share may probably be rather a useful education than otherwise. Farewell!'

'Stay!' said she. 'Come again!—again! And her. . . Bring her. . . I must see her! She must be noble, indeed, to be worthy of you!'

'She is many a hundred miles away.'

'Ah! Perhaps she might have taught something to me—me, the philosopher! You need not have feared me. I have no heart to make converts now. Oh, Raphael Aben Ezra, why break the husel reed? My plans are scattered to the winds, my pupils worthless, my fair name tarnished, my conscience heavy with the thought of my own cruelty. If you do not know all, you will know it but too soon. My last hope, Synesius, implores for himself the hope which I need from him!'

And, over and above all. You! Et tu, Brute! Why not fold my mantle round me, like Julius of old, and die!'

Raphael stood looking sadly at her, as her whole face sank into utter prostration.

'Yes—come. The Galilean. If He conquers strong men, can the weak mind resist Him? Come soon. . . This afternoon. My heart is breaking fast.'

'At the eighth hour this afternoon.'

'Yes. At noon I lecture. . . take my farewell, rather, for ever of the school! Gods! What have I to say? . . . And tell me about Him of Nazareth. Farewell!'

'Farewell, beloved lady! At the ninth hour, you shall hear of Him of Nazareth!'

Why did his own words sound to him strangely pregnant, all but ominous? He almost fancied that not he, but some third person had spoken them. He kissed Hypatia's hand, it was as cold as ice; and his heart, too, in spite of all his bliss, felt cold and heavy, as he left the room.

As he went down the steps into the street, a young man sprang from behind one of the pillars, and seized his arm.

'Aha! my young Corypheus of pious plunderers! What do you want with me?'

Philammon, for it was he, looked at him an instant, and recognised him.

'Save her! for the love of God, save her!'

'Whom?'

'Hypatia!'

'How long has her salvation been important to you, my good friend?'

'For God's sake,' said Philammon, 'go back and warn her! She will hear you—you are rich—you used to be her friend—I know you—I have heard of you. . . Oh, if you ever cared for her—if you ever felt for her a thousandth part of what I feel—go in and warn her not to stir from home!'

'I must hear more of this,' said Raphael, who saw that the boy was in earnest. 'Come in with me, and speak to her father.'

'No! not in that house! Never in that house again! Do not ask me why, but go yourself! She will not hear me. Did you—did you prevent her from listening?'

'What do you mean?'

'I have been here—ages! I sent a note in by her maid, and she returned no answer.'

Raphael recollected then, for the first time, a note which he had seen brought to her during the conversation.

'I saw her receive a note. She tossed it away. Tell me your story. If there is reason in it, I will bear your message myself. Of what is she to be warned?'

'Of a plot. I know that there is a plot—against her! among the monks and Parabolani. As I lay in bed this morning in Arsenius's room—they thought I was asleep—'

'Arsenius! Has that venerable fanatic, then, gone the way of all monastic flesh, and turned persecutor?'

'God forbid! I heard him beseeching Peter the Reader to refrain from something, I cannot tell what, but I caught her name. I heard Peter say, "She that hindereth will hinder till she be taken out of the way." And when he went out into the passage I heard him say to another, "That thou doest, do quickly! . . ."

'These are slender grounds, my friend.'

'Ah, you do not know of what those men are capable!'

'Do I not? Where did you and I meet last?'

Philammon blushed and burst forth again. 'That was enough for me. I know the hatred which they bear her, the crimes which they attribute to her. Her house would have been attacked last night had it not been for Cyril. . . And I knew Peter's tone. He spoke too gently and softly not to mean something devilish. I watched all the morning for an opportunity of escape, and here I am!—Will you take my message, or see her—'

'What?'

'God only knows, and the devil whom they worship instead of God!'

Raphael hurried back into the house—'Could he see Hypatia?' She had shut herself up in her private room, strictly commanding that no visitor should be admitted. . . 'Where was Theon, then?' 'He had gone out by the canal gate half an hour before, with a bundle of mathematical papers under his arm, no one knew whither. . . "Inbecile old idiot!" and he hastily wrote on his tablet—'

'Do not despise the young monk's warning. I believe him to speak the truth. As you love yourself and your father, Hypatia, stir not out to-day.'

He bribed a maid to take the message upstairs:

and passed his time in the hall in warning the servants. But they would not believe him. It was true the shops were shut in some quarters, and the Museum gardens empty, people were a little frightened after yesterday. But Cyril, they had heard for certain, had threatened excommunication only last night to any Christian who broke the peace, and there had not been a monk to be seen in the streets the whole morning. And as for any harm happening to their mistress—impossible! 'The very wild beasts would not tear her,' said the huge negro porter, 'if she was thrown into the amphitheatre.'

Whereat a man bowed his ears for talking of such a thing; and then, by way of mending it, declared that she knew for certain that her mistress could turn aside the lightning, and call legions of spirits to fight for her with a nod. What was to be done with such idolaters? And yet who could help liking them the better for it?

At last the answer came down, in the old graceful, stiched, self-conscious signifying.

'It is a strange way of persuading me to your new faith, to bid me beware, on the very first day of your preaching, of the wickedness of those who believe it. I think you—but your affection for me makes you timorous. I dread nothing. They will not dare. Did they dare now, they would have dared long ago. As for that youth—to obey or to believe his word, even to seem aware of his existence, were shame to me henceforth. Because he is insolent enough to warn me therefore I will go. Fear not for me. You would not wish me, for the first time in my life, to fear for myself. I must follow my destiny. I must speak the words which I have to speak. Above all, I must let no Christian say, that the philosopher dared less than the lunatic. If my Gods are Gods, then will they protect me; and if not, let your God prove His rule as seems to Him good.'

Raphael tore the letter to fragments. The guards, at least, were not gone and like the rest of the world. It wanted half an hour of the time of her lecture. In the interval he might summon force enough to crush all Alexandria. And turning suddenly, he darted out of the room and out of the house.

'Quem Deus vult perdere——' cried he to Philammon, with a gesture of grief. 'Stay here and stop her!—make a last appeal! Drag the horses' heads down, if you can! I will be back in ten minutes.' And he ran off for the nearest gate of the Museum gardens.

On the other side of the gardens lay the courtyard of the palace. There were gates in plenty communicating between them. If he could but see Orestes, even alarm the guard in time!

And he hurried through the walks and alcoves, now deserted by the fearful citizens, to the nearest gate. It was fast, and barricaded firmly on the outside.

Terrified, he ran on to the next, it was barred also. He saw the reason in a moment, and maidenly as he saw it. The guards, careless about the Museum, or reasonably fearing no danger from the Alexandrian populace to the glory and wonder of their city, or perhaps wishing wisely enough to concentrate their forces in the narrowest space, had contented themselves with cutting off all communication with the gardens, and so converting the lofty partition-wall into the outer enceinte of their marble citadel. At all events, the doors leading from the Museum itself might be open. He knew them every one, every hall, passage, statue, picture, almost every book in that vast treasure-house of ancient civilisation. He found an entrance, hurried through well-known corridors to a puerum through which he and Orestes had lounged a hundred times, their lips full of bad words, their hearts of worse thoughts, gathered in those records of the fan wickedness of old.

It was fast. He beat upon it, but no one answered. He rushed on and tried another. No one answered there. Another—still silence and despair! He rushed up stairs, hoping that from the windows above he might be able to call to the guard. The prudent soldiers had locked and barred the entrances to the upper floors of the whole right wing, lest the palace court should be commanded from thence. Whither now? Back—and whither then? Back, round endless galleries, vaulted halls, staircases, doorways, some fast some open, up and down, trying this way and that, losing himself at whiles in that enormous silent labyrinth. And his breath failed him, his throat was parched, his face burned as with the sunbeam wind, his legs were trembling under him. His presence of mind, usually so perfect, failed him utterly. He was baffled, nettled, there was a spell upon him. Was it a dream? Was it all one of those hideous nightmares of endless pillars beyond pillars, stairs above stairs, rooms within rooms, changing, shifting, lengthening out for ever and for ever before the dreamer, narrowing, closing in on him, choking him? Was it a dream? Was he doomed to wander for ever and for ever in some palace of the dead, to expiate the sin which he had learnt and done therein? His brain, for the first time in his life, began to reel! He could recollect nothing but that something dreadful was to happen—and that he had to prevent it, and could not. Where was he now? In a little by-chamber. He had talked with her there a hundred times, looking out over the Pharos and the blue Mediterranean. What was that near below? A sea of wolvering yelling heads, thousands on thousands, down to the very beach, and from their innumerable throats one mighty wail—'God, and the mother of God!' Cyril's hounds were loose. He reeled from the window, and darted frantically away again.

Whither, he knew not, and never knew until his dying day.

And Philammon? . . . Sufficient for the chapter, as for the day, is the evil thereof.

CHAPTER XXVIII

WOMAN'S LOVE

PELAGIA had passed that night alone in sleepless sorrow, which was not diminished by her finding herself the next morning palpably a prisoner in her own house. Her girls told her that they had orders—they would not say from whom—to prevent her leaving her own apartments. And though some of them made the announcement with sighs and tears of condolence, yet more than one, she could see, was well inclined to make her feel that her power was over, and that there were others besides herself who might aspire to the honour of reigning favourite.

What matter to her? Whispers, sneers, and sneering answers fell on her ear unheeded. She had one idol, and she had lost it, one power, and it had failed her. In the heaven above, and in the earth beneath, was neither peace, nor help, nor hope, nothing but black, blank, stupid terror and despair. The little weak infant soul, which had just awakened in her, had been crushed and stunned in its very birth hour, and instinctively she crept away to the roof of the tower where her apartments were, to sit and weep alone.

There she sat, hour after hour, beneath the shade of the large windsail, which served in all Alexandrian houses the double purpose of a shelter from the sun and a ventilator for the rooms below, and her eye roved carelessly over that endless sea of roofs and towers, and masts, and glittering canals, and gliding boats, but she saw none of them—nothing but one beloved face, lost, lost for ever.

At last a low whistle roused her from her dream. She looked up. Across the narrow lane, from one of the embrasures of the opposite house parapet bright eyes were peering at her. She moved angrily to escape them.

The whistle was repeated, and a head rose cautiously above the parapet. It was Miriam's. Casting a careful look around, Pelagia went forward. What could the old woman want with her?

Miriam made interrogative signs, which Pelagia understood as asking her whether she was alone, and the moment that an answer in the negative was returned, Miriam rose, tossed over to her feet a letter weighted with a pebble, and then vanished again.

'I have watched here all day.' They refused me admittance below. Beware of Wulf, of every one. Do not stir from your chamber. There is a plot to carry you off to-night, and give you up to your brother the monk; you are betrayed, be brave.

Pelagia read it with blanching cheek and staring eyes; and took, at least, the last part of Miriam's advice. For walking down the stair, she passed proudly through her own rooms, and commanding back the girls who would have stayed her, with a voice and gesture at which they quailed, went straight down, the letter in her hand, to the apartment where the Amal usually spent his mid-day hours.

As she approached the door, she heard loud voices within. His '—yes, but Wulf's also. Her heart failed her, and she stopped a moment to listen. . . She heard Hypatia's name, and mad with curiosity, crouched down at the lock, and hearkened to every word.

'She will not accept me, Wulf.'

'If she will not, she shall go further and fare worse. Besides, I tell you, she is hard run. It is her last chance, and she will jump at it. The Christians are mad with her, if a storm blows up, her life is not worth—that.'

'It is a pity that we have not brought her hither already.'

'It is, but we could not. We must not break with Orestes till the palace is in our hands.'

'And will it ever be in our hands, friend?'

'Certain. We were round at every banquet last night, and the very notion of an Amal's heading them made them so eager, that we had to bribe them to be quiet rather than to rise.'

'Odim! I wish I were among them now.'

'Wait till the city rises. If the day pass over without a riot, I know nothing. The treasure is all on board, is it not?'

'Yes, and the galleys ready. I have been working like a horse at them all the morning, as you would let me do nothing else. And to-morrow will not be back from the palace, you say, till nightfall.'

If we are attacked first, we are to throw up a fire signal to him, and he is to come off hither with what holds he can muster. If the palace is attacked first, he is to give us the signal, and we are to pack up and row round thither. And in the meanwhile he is to make that bound of a Greek prefect as drunk as he can.'

'The Greek will see him under the table. He has drugs, I know, as all these Roman rascals have, to sober him when he likes, and then he sets to work and drinks again. Send off old Smul, and let him beat the armourer if he can.'

'A very good thought,' said Wulf, and came out instantly for the purpose of putting it in practice.

Pelagia had just time to retreat into an adjoining doorway, but she had heard enough, and as Wulf passed, she sprang to him and caught him by the arm.

'Oh, come in hither! Speak to me one moment, for mercy's sake speak to me!' and she drew him, half against his will, into the chamber, and throwing his feet, broke out into a childlike wail.

Wulf stood silent, utterly discomfited by this unexpected submission, where he had expected petulant and artful resistance. He almost felt guilty and ashamed, as he looked down into that beautiful imploring face, convulsed with simple sorrow, as of a child for a broken toy. . . . At last she spoke.

'Oh, what have I done—what have I done? Why must you take him from me? What have I done but love him, honour him, worship him? I know you love him, and I love you for it.—I do indeed! But you—what is your love to mine? Oh, I would do for him—be torn in pieces for him—now, this moment!'

Wulf was silent.

'What have I done but love him? What could I wish but to make him happy? I was rich enough, praised, and petted, and then he came, . . . glorious as he is, like a god among men among apes rather—and I worshipped him—was I wrong in that? I gave up all for him—was I wrong in that? I gave him myself—what could I do more? He condescended to like me—he the hero! Could I help submitting? I loved him—could I help loving him? Did I wrong him in that? Cruel, cruel Wulf!'

Wulf was forced to be stern, or he would have melted at once.

'And what was your love worth to him? What has it done for him? It has made him a sot, an idler, a laughing-stock, to these Greek dogs, when he might have been their conqueror, their king. Foolish woman, who cannot see that your love has been his bane, his ruin! He, who ought by now to have been sitting upon the throne of the Ptolemies, the lord of all south of the Mediterranean—as he shall be still!'

Pelagia looked up at him wide eyed, as if her mind was taking in slowly some vast new thought, under the weight of which it reeled already. Then she rose slowly.

'And he might be Emperor of Africa.'

'And he shall be, but not—'

'Not with me!' she almost shrieked. 'No! not with wretched, ignorant, polluted me! I see—oh-God, I see it all! And this is why you want him to marry her—her—'

She could not utter the dreaded name.

Wulf could not trust himself to speak, but he bowed his head in acquiescence.

'Yes—I will go—up into the desert—with Philammon—and you shall never hear of me again. And I will be a nun, and pray for him, that he may be a great king, and conquer all the world. You will tell him why I went away, will you not? Yes, I will go—now, at once—'

She turned away hurriedly, as if to act upon her promise, and then she sprang again to Wulf with a sudden shudder.

'I cannot, Wulf—I cannot leave him! I shall go mad if I do! Do not be angry,—I will promise anything—take any oath you like, if you will only let me stay here. Only as a slave—as anything—if I may but look at him sometimes. No—not even that—but to be under the same roof with him, only—Oh, let me be but a slave in the kitchen! I will make over all I have to him—to you—to any one! And you shall tell him that I am gone—dead, if you will.—Only let me stay! And I will wear rags, and grind in the mill. . . . Even that will be delicious, to know that he is eating the bread which I have made! And if I ever dare speak to him—even to come near him—let the steward hang me up by the wrists, and whip me, like the slave which I deserve to be!'

And then shall I soon grow old and ugly with grief, and there will be no more danger then, dear Wulf, will there, from this accursed face of mine? Only promise me that, and— There! he is calling you! Don't let him come in and see me—I cannot bear it! Go to him, quick, and tell him all—No, don't tell him yet.

And she sank down again on the floor, as Wulf went out murmuring to himself—

'Poor child! poor child! well for thee this day if thou wert dead, and at the bottom of Hela!'

And Pelagia heard what he said.

Gradually, amid sobs and tears, and stormy confusion of impossible hopes and projects, those words took root in her mind, and spread, till they filled her whole heart and brain.

'Well for me if I were dead!'

And she rose slowly.

'Well for me if I were dead? And why not? Then it would indeed be all settled! There would be no more danger from poor little Pelagia then.

She went slowly, firmly, proudly, into the well-known chamber. She threw herself upon the bed, and covered the pillow with kisses. Her eye fell on the Ainal's sword, which hung across the bed's head, after the custom of Gothic warriors. She seized it, and took it down, shuddering.

'Yes! Let it be with this, if it must be.

And it must be—I cannot bear it! Anything but shame! To have fancied all my life—vain fool that I was!—that every one loved and admired me, and to find that they were despising me, hating me, all along! Those students at the lecture-room door told me I was despised.—The old monk told me so—Fool that I was! I forgot it next day.—For he—he loved me still!—Ah—how could I believe them, till his own lips had said it? Intolerable! And yet women as bad as I am have been honoured—when they were dead. What was that song which I used to sing about Epicharia, who hung herself in the litter, and Leana, who bit out her tongue, lest the torture should drive them to betray their lovers? There used to be a statue of Leana, they say, at Athens—a lioness without a tongue. . . . And whenever I sang the song, the theatre used to rise, and shout, and call them noble and blessed. . . . I never could tell why then; but I know now!—I know now! Perhaps they may call me noble, after all. At least, they may say "She was a—a—but she dare die for the man she loved!"

Ay, but God despises me too, and hates me. He will send me to eternal fire. Philammon said so—though he was my brother. The old monk said so—though he wept as he said it. . . . The flames of hell for ever! Oh, not for ever!

Great, dreadful God! Not for ever! Indeed, I did not know! No one taught me about right and wrong, and I never knew that I had been baptized—Indeed, I never knew! And it was so pleasant—so pleasant to be happy, and praised, and loved, and to see happy faces round me. How could I help it? The birds there who are singing in the darling, beloved court—they do what they like, and Thou art not angry with them for being happy! And Thou wilt not be more cruel to me than to them, great God—for what did I know more than they? Thou hast made the beautiful sunshine, and the pleasant, pleasant world, and the flowers, and the birds—Thou wilt not send me to burn for ever and ever! Will not a hundred years be punishment enough—or a thousand? Oh God! is not this punishment enough already,—to have to leave him just as—just as I am beginning to long to be good, and to be worthy of him? Oh, have mercy—mercy—mercy—and let me go after I have been punished enough! Why may I not turn into a bird, or even a worm, and come back again out of that horrible place, to see the sun shine, and the flowers grow once more? Oh, am I not punishing myself already? Will not this help to atone? . . . Yes—I will die!—and perhaps so God may pity me!’

And with trembling hands she drew the sword from its sheath and covered the blade with kisses.

‘Yes—on this sword—with which he won his battles. That is right—his to the last! How keen and cold it looks! Will it be very painful? No—I will not try the point, or my heart might fail me. I will fall on it at once let it hurt me as it may, it will be too late to draw back then. And after all it is his sword—It will not have the heart to torture me much. And yet he struck me himself this morning!’

And at that thought, a long wild cry of misery broke from her lips, and rang through the house. Hurriedly she fastened the sword upright to the foot of the bed, and tore open her tunic. . . . ‘Here—under this widowed bosom, where his head will never lie again! There are footsteps in the passage! Quick, Pelagia! Now—’

And she threw up her arms wildly, in act to fall.

‘It is his step! And he will find me, and never know that it is for him I die!’

The Amal tried the door. It was fast. With a single blow he burst it open, and demanded—

‘What was that shriek? What is the meaning of this? Pelagia!’

Pelagia, like a child caught playing with a forbidden toy, hid her face in her hands and cowered down.

‘What is it?’ cried he, lifting her.

But she burst from his arms.

‘No, no!—never more! I am not worthy of you! Let me die, wretch that I am! I can only drag you down. You must be a king. You must marry her—the wise woman!’

‘Hypatia! She is dead!’

‘Dead?’ shrieked Pelagia.

‘Murdered, an hour ago, by those Christian devils.’

Pelagia put her hands over her eyes, and burst into tears. Were they of pity or of joy?

She did not ask herself; and we will not ask her.

‘Where is my sword? Soul of Odin! Why is it fastened here?’

‘I was going to—Do not be angry! . . . They told me that I had better die, and—’

Tho Amal stood thunderstruck for a moment.

‘Oh, do not strike me again! Send me to the mill. Kill me now with your own hand! Anything but another blow!’

‘A blow!—Noble woman!’ cried the Amal, clasping her in his arms.

The storm was past, and Pelagia had been nestling to that beloved heart, coming like a happy dove, for many a minute before the Amal aroused himself and her . . .

‘Now!—quick! We have not a moment to lose. Up to the tower, where you will be safe; and then to show these curs what comes of snarling round the wild wolves’ den!’

CHAPTER XXIX

NEMESIS

AND was the Amal’s news true, then?

Philammon saw Raphael rush across the street into the Museum gardens. His last words had been a command to stay where he was, and the boy obeyed him. The black porter who let Raphael out told him somewhat insolently, that his mistress would see no one, and receive no messages, but he had made up his mind complained of the sun, quietly ensconced himself behind a buttress, and sat coiled up on the pavement, ready for a desperate spring. The slave stared at him, but he was accustomed to the vagaries of philosophers, and thanking the gods that he was not born in that station of life, retired to his porter’s cell, and forgot the whole matter.

There Philammon awaited a full half-hour. It seemed to him hours, days, years. And yet Raphael did not return—and yet no guards appeared. Was the strange Jew a traitor? Impossible!—his face had shown a desperate earnestness of terror as intense as Philammon’s own. Yet why did he not return?

Perhaps he had found out that the streets were clear; their mutual fears groundless.

What meant that black knot of men some two hundred yards off, hanging about the mouth of the side street, just opposite the door which led to her lecture-room? He moved to watch them—they had vanished. He lay down again and waited. . . . There they were again. It was a suspicious post. That street ran along the back of the Casareum, a favourite haunt of monks, communicating by innumerable entries and back buildings with the great Church itself. And yet, why should there not be a knot of monks there? What more common in every street of Alexandria? He tried to laugh away his own fears. And yet they ripened, by the very intensity of thinking on them, into certainty. He knew that something terrible was at hand. More than once he looked out from his hiding-place—the knot of men were still there, . . . it seemed to have increased, to draw nearer. If they found him, what would they not suspect? What did he care? He would die for her, if it came to that—not that it could come to that, but still he must speak to her—he must warn her. Passenger after passenger, carriage after carriage passed along the street, student after student entered the lecture-room, but he never saw them, not though they passed him close. The sun rose higher and higher, and turned his whole blaze upon the corner where Philammon crouched, till the pavement scorched like hot iron, and his eyes were dazzled by the blinding glare, but he never heeded it. His whole heart, and sense, and sight, were riveted upon that well-known door, eyeing it to open.

At last a carriage, glittering with silver, rattled round the corner and stopped opposite him. She must be coming now. The crowd had vanished. Perhaps it was, after all, a fancy of his own. No, there they were, peeping round the corner, close to the lecture-room—the hell-hounds! A slave brought out an embroidered cushion—and then Hypatia herself came forth, looking more glorious than ever, her lips set in a sad firm smile, her eyes uplifted, inquiring, eager, and yet gentle, dimmed by some great inward awe, as if her soul was far away aloft, and face to face with God.

In a moment he sprang up to her, caught her robe convulsively, threw himself on his knees before her—

'Stop! Stay! You are going to destruction!'

Calmly she looked down upon him. 'Accomplices of witches! Would you make of Theon's daughter a traitor like yourself?'

He sprang up, stepped back, and stood stupefied with shame and despair. . . .

She beheld him guilty, then! It was the will of God!

The plumes of the horses were waving far down the street before he recovered himself, and rushed after her, shouting he knew not what.

It was too late! A dark wave of men rushed from the ambuscade, surged up round the car . . . swept forward . . . she had disappeared! and as Philammon followed breathless, the horses galloped past him madly homeward with the empty carriage.

Whither were they dragging her? To the Cæsareum, the Church of God Himself? Impossible! Why thither of all places of the earth? Why did the mob, increasing momentarily by hundreds, pour down upon the beach, and return brandishing flints, shells, fragments of pottery?

She was upon the church steps before he caught them up, invisible among the crowd, but he could track her by the fragments of her dress.

Where were her gay pupils now? Alas! they had barricaded themselves shamefully in the Museum, at the first rush which swept her from the door of the lecture-room. Cowards! he would save her!

And he struggled in vain to pierce the dense mass of Parabolani and monks, who, mingled with the fishwives and dock-workers, leaped and yelled around their victim. But what he could not do another and a weaker did—even the little porter. Furiously—no one knew how or whence—he burst up as if from the ground in the thickest of the crowd, with knife, teeth, and nails, like a venomous wild-cat, tearing his way towards his idol. Alas! he was torn down himself, rolled over the steps, and lay there half dead in an agony of weeping, as Philammon sprang up past him into the church.

Yes. On into the church itself! Into the cool dim shadow, with its fretted pillars, and lowering domes, and candles, and incense, and blazing altar, and great pictures looking from the walls against the gorgeous gloom. And right in front, above the altar, the colossal Christ watching unmoved from off the wall, His right hand raised to give a blessing—or a curse?

On, up the nave, fresh shreds of her dress strewn the holy pavement—up the chancel steps themselves—up to the altar—right underneath the great still Christ, and there even those hell-hounds paused. . . .

She shook herself free from her tormentors, and springing back, rose for one moment to her full height, naked, snow-white against the dark mass around—shame and indignation in those wide clear eyes, but not a stain of fear. With one hand she clasped her golden locks around her; the other long white arm was stretched upward toward the great still Christ appealing—and who dare say in vain?—from man to God. Her lips were opened to speak, but the words that should have come from them reached God's ear alone, for in an instant Peter struck her down, the dark mass closed over her again, and then wail on wail, long, wild, ear-piercing, rang along the vaulted roofs, and thrilled like the trumpet of avenging angels through Philammon's ears.

Crushed against a pillar, unable to move in the dense mass, he pressed his hands over his ears. He could not shut out those shrieks! When would they end? What in the name of the God of mercy were they doing? Tearing her piecemeal? Yes, and worse than that. And still the shrieks rang on, and still the great Christ looked down on Philammon with that calm, intolerable eye, and would not turn away. And over His head was written in the rainbow, 'I am the same, yesterday, to-day, and for ever!' The same as He was in Judea of old, Philammon! Then what are these, and in whose temple? And he covered his face with his hands, and longed to die.

It was over. The shrieks had died away into moans, the moans to silence. How long had he been there? An hour, or an eternity? Thank God it was over! For her sake—but for theirs! But they thought not of that as a new cry rose through the dome.

'To the Cinaron! Burn the houses to ashes! Scatter them into the sea!' And the mob poured past him again.

He turned to flee but, once outside the church, he sank exhausted, and lay upon the steps, watching with stupid horror the glaring of the fire, and the mob who leaped and yelled like demons round their Moloch sacrifice.

A hand grasped his arm, he looked up, it was the porter.

'And this, young butcher, is the Catholic and apostolic Church!'

'No! Eudaimon, it is the church of the devils of hell!' And gathering himself up, he sat upon the steps and buried his head within his hands. He would have given life itself for the power of weeping but his eyes and brain were hot and dry as the desert.

Eudaimon looked at him a while. The shock had sobered the poor fellow for once.

'I did what I could to die with her!' said he.

'I did what I could to save her,' answered Philammon.

'I know it. Forgive the words which I just spoke. Did we not both love her?'

And the little wretch sat down by Philammon's side, and as the blood dripped from his wounds upon the pavement, broke out into a latter agony of human tears.

There are times when the very intensity of our misery is a boon, and kindly stuns us till we are unable to torture ourselves by thought. And so it was with Philammon then. He sat there, he knew not how long.

'She is with the gods,' said Eudaimon at last.

'She is with the God of gods,' answered Philammon: and they both were silent again.

Suddenly a commanding voice aroused them. They looked up, and saw before them Raphael Aben-Ezra.

He was pale as death, but calm as death. One look into his face told them that he knew all.

'Young monk,' he said, between his closed teeth, 'you seem to have loved her?'

Philammon looked up, but could not speak.

'Then arise, and flee for your life into the farthest corner of the desert, ere the doom of Sodom and Gomorrah fall upon this accursed city. Have you father, mother, brother, sister,—ay, cat, dog, or bird for which you care, within its walls?'

Philammon started; for he recollected Pelagia.

That evening, so Cyril had promised, twenty trusty monks were to have gone with him to seize her.

'You have? Then take them with you, and escape, and remember Lot's wife. Eudaimon, come with me. You must lead me to your house, to the lodging of Miriam the Jewess. Do not deny! I know that she is there. For the sake of her who is gone I will hold you harmless, ay, reward you richly, if you prove faithful. Rise!'

Eudaimon, who knew Raphael's face well, rose and led the way trembling, and Philammon was left alone.

They never met again. But Philammon knew that he had been in the presence of a stronger man than himself, and of one who hated even more bitterly than he himself that deed at which the very sun, it seemed, ought to have veiled his face. And his words, 'Arise, and flee for thy life,' uttered as they were with the stern self-command and writhing lip of compressed agony, rang through his ears like the tramp of doom. Yes, he would flee. He had gone forth to see the world, and he had seen it. Arsenius was in the night after all. Home to the desert! But first he would go himself, alone, to Pelagia, and implore her once more to flee with him. 'Beast, fool, that he had been to try to win her by force—by the help of such as these! God's kingdom was not a kingdom of fanatics yelling for a doctrine, but of willing, loving, obedient hearts. If he could not win her heart, her will, he would go alone, and die praying for her.'

He sprang from the steps of the Cæsareum, and turned up the street of the Museum. Alas! it was one roiling sea of heads! They were sucking Theon's house—the house of so many memories! Perhaps the poor old man too had perished! Still—his sister! He must save her and flee. And he turned up a side street and tried to make his way onward.

Alas again! the whole of the dock-quarter was up and out. Every street poured its tide of furious fanatics into the main river; and ere he could reach Pelagia's house the sun was set, and close behind him, echoed by ten thousand voices, was the cry of 'Down with all heathens! Root out all Arian Goths! Down with idolatrous wantons! Down with Pelagia Aphrodite!'

He hurried down the alley, to the tower door, where Wulf had promised to meet him. It was half open, and in the dusk he could see a figure standing in the doorway. He sprang up the steps, and found, not Wulf, but Miriam.

'Let me pass!'

'Wherefore?'

He made no answer, and tried to push past her.

'Fool, fool, fool!' she whispered the hag, holding the door against him with all her strength. 'Where are your fellow-kidnappers? Where are your band of monks?'

Philammon started back. How had she discovered his plan?

'Ay—where are they? Besotted boy! Have you not seen enough of monkery this afternoon, that you must try still to make that poor girl even such a one as yourselves? Ay, you may root out your own human natures if you will, and make yourselves devils in trying to become angels—but woman she is, and woman she shall live or die!

'Let me pass!' cried Philammon furiously.

'Raise your voice—and I raise mine—and then your life is not worth a moment's purchase. Fool, do you think I speak as a Jewess? I speak as a woman—as a nun! I was a nun once, madman—the iron entered into my soul!—God do so to me, and more also, if it ever enter into another soul while I can prevent it! You shall not have her! I will strangle her with my own hand first!' And turning from him, she darted up the winding stair.

He followed, but the intense passion of the old hag hurled her onward with the strength and speed of a young Menad. Once Philammon was near passing her. But he recollected that he did not know his way, and contented himself with keeping close behind, and making the fugitive his guide.

Stair after stair, he fled upward, till she turned suddenly into a chamber door. Philammon paused. A few feet above him the open sky showed at the stair-head. They were close then to the roof! One moment more, and the hag darted out of the room again, and turned to flee upward still. Philammon caught her by the arm, hurled her back into the empty chamber, shut the door upon her, and with a few bounds gained the roof, and met Pelagia face to face.

'Come!' gasped he breathlessly. 'Now is the moment! Come, while they are all below!' and he seized her hand.

But Pelagia only recoiled.

'No, no,' whispered she in answer, 'I cannot, cannot—he has forgiven me all, all! and I am his for ever! And now, just as he is in danger, when he may be wounded—ah, heaven! would you have me do anything so base as to desert him!'

'Pelagia, Pelagia, darling sister!' cried Philammon, in an agonised voice, 'think of the doom of sin! Think of the pains of hell!'

'I have thought of them this day and I do not believe you! No—I do not! God is not so cruel as you say! And if He were—to lose my love, that is hell! Let me burn hereafter, if I do but keep him now!'

Philammon stood stupefied and shuddering. All his own early doubts flashed across him like a thunderbolt, when in the temple-cave he had seen those painted ladies at their revels, and shuddered, and asked himself, were they burning for ever and ever!

'Come!' gasped he once again; and throwing himself on his knees before her, covered her hands with kisses, wildly entreating: but in vain.

'What is this!' thundered a voice; not Miriam's, but the Amal's. He was unarmed. but he rushed straight upon Philammon.

'Do not harm him!' shrieked Pelagia, 'he is my brother—my brother of whom I told you!'

'What does he here?' cried the Amal, who instantly divined the truth.

Pelagia was silent.

'I wish to deliver my sister, a Christian, from the sinful embraces of an Arian heretic; and deliver her I will, or die!'

'An Arian?' laughed the Amal. 'Say a heathen at once, and tell the truth, young fool! Will you go with him, Pelagia, and turn nun in the sand-heaps!'

Pelagia sprang towards her lover: Philammon caught her by the arm for one last despairing appeal, and in a moment, neither knew how, the Goth and the Greek were locked in deadly struggle, while Pelagia stood in silent horror, knowing that a call for help would bring instant death to her brother.

It was over in a few seconds. The Goth lifted Philammon like a baby in his arms, and bearing him to the parapet, attempted to hurl him into the canal below. But the active Greek had wound himself like a snake around him, and held him by the throat with the strength of despair. Twice they rolled and tottered on the parapet, and twice recoiled. A third fearful lunge—the earthen wall gave way, and down to the dark depths, locked in each other's arms, fell Goth and Greek.

Pelagia rushed to the brink, and gazed downward into the gloom, dumb and dry-eyed with horror. Twice they turned over together in mid-air. The foot of the tower, as was usual in Egypt, sloped onwards towards the water. They must strike upon that—and then! It seemed an eternity ere they touched the masonry. The Amal was undermost. She saw his fair floating locks dash against the cruel stone. His grasp suddenly loosened, his limbs collapsed, two distinct plunges broke the dark sullen water, and then all was still but the awakened ripple, lapping angrily against the wall.

Pelagia gazed down one moment more, and then, with a shriek which rang along roof and river, she turned, and fled down the stairs and out into the night.

Five minutes afterwards, Philammon, dripping, bruised, and bleeding, was crawling up the water-steps at the lower end of the lane. A woman rushed from the postern door, and stood on the quay edge, gazing with clasped hands into the canal. The moon fell full on her face. It was Pelagia. She saw him, knew him, and recoiled.

'Sister!—my sister! Forgive me!'

'Murderer!' she shrieked, and dashing aside his outspread hands, fled wildly up the passage.

The way was blocked with bales of merchandise—but the dancer bounded over them like a deer; while Philammon, half stunned by his fall, and blinded by his dripping locks, stumbled, fell, and lay, unable to rise. She held on for a few yards towards the torch-lit mob, which was surging and roaring in the main street above, then turned suddenly into a side alley, and vanished; while Philammon lay groaning upon the pavement, without a purpose or a hope upon earth.

Five minutes more, and Wulf was gazing over the broken parapet, at the head of twenty terrified spectators, male and female, whom Polagna's shriek had summoned.

He alone suspected that Philammon had been there; and shuddering at the thought of what might have happened, he kept his secret.

But all knew that Polagna had been on the tower; all had seen the Amal go up thither. Where were they now? And why was the little postern gate found open, and shut only just in time to prevent the entrance of the mob?

Wulf stood, revolving in a brain but too well practised in such cases, all possible contingencies of death and horror. At last—

'A rope and a light, Smid!' he almost whispered.

They were brought, and Wulf, resisting all the entreaties of the younger men to allow them to go on the perilous search, lowered himself through the breach.

He was about two-thirds down, when he shook the rope, and called in a steady voice, to those above—

'Haul up! I have seen enough.'

Breathless with curiosity and fear, they hauled him up. He stood among them for a few moments, silent, as if stunned by the weight of some enormous woe.

'Is he dead?'

'Odin has taken his son home, wolves of the Goths!' And he held out his right hand to the awe-struck ring, and burst into an agony of weeping. A clotted tress of long fair hair lay in his palm.

It was snatched; handed from man to man. . . One after another recognised the beloved golden locks. And then, to the utter astonishment of the girls who stood round, the great simple hearts, too brave to be ashamed of tears, broke out and wailed like children. Their Amal! Their heavenly man! Odin's own son, their joy and pride, and glory! Their 'Kingdom of heaven,' as his name declared him, who was all that each wished to be, and more, and yet belonged to them, bone of their bone, flesh of their flesh! Ah, it is bitter to all true human hearts to be robbed of their ideal, even though that ideal be that of a mere wild bull, and soulless gladiator.

At last Smid spoke—

'Heroes, this is Odin's doom, and the All-father is just. Had we listened to Prince Wulf four months ago, this had never been. We have been cowards and sluggards, and Odin is angry with his children. Let us swear to be Prince Wulf's men and follow him to-morrow where he will!'

Wulf grasped his outstretched hand lovingly—

'No, Smid, son of Troll! These words are not yours to speak. Agilmund son of Cuwa, Goderic son of Ermenric, you are Balts, and to you the succession appertains. Draw lots here, which of you shall be our chieftain.'

'No! no! Wulf!' cried both the youths at once. 'You are the hero! you are the Sagaman! We are not worthy, we have been cowards and sluggards, like the rest. Wolves of the Goths, follow the Wolf, even though he lead you to the land of the giants!'

A roar of applause followed.

'Lift him on the shield,' cried Goderic, tearing off his buckler. 'Lift him on the shield! Hail, Wulf king! Wulf, king of Egypt!'

And the rest of the Goths, attracted by the noise, rushed up the tower-stairs in time to join in the mighty shout of 'Wulf, king of Egypt!'—as careless of the vast multitude which yelled and surged without, as boys are of the snow against the window-pane.

'No!' said Wulf solemnly, as he stood on the uplifted shield. 'If I be indeed your king, and ye my men, wolves of the Goths, to-morrow we will go forth of this place, hated of Odin, rank with the innocent blood of the Alruna maid. Back to Adolf, back to our own people! Will you go?'

'Back to Adolf!' shouted the men.

'You will not leave us to be murdered!' cried one of the girls. 'The mob are breaking the gates already!'

'Silence, silly one! Men—we have one thing to do. The Amal must not go to the Valhalla without fair attendance.'

'Not the poor girls!' said Agilmund, who took for granted that Wulf would wish to celebrate the Amal's funeral in true Gothic fashion by a slaughter of slaves.

'No. One of them I saw behave this very afternoon worthy of a Vala. And they, too—they may make heroes' wives after all, yet.

Women are better than I fancied, even the worst of them. No. Go down, heroes, and throw the gates open, and call in the Greek hounds to the funeral supper of a son of Odin.'

'Throw the gates open!'

'Yes Goderic, take a dozen men, and be ready in the east hall. Agilmund, go with a dozen to the west side of the court—there in the kitchen, and wait till you hear my war-cry. Smid and the rest of you, come with me through the stables close to the gate—as silent as Hela.'

And they went down—to meet, full on the stairs below, old Miriam.

Breathless and exhausted by her exertion, she had fallen heavily before Philammon's strong arm, and lying half stunned for a while, recovered just in time to meet her doom.

She knew that it was come, and faced it like herself.

'Take the witch!' said Wulf slowly.—'Take the corrupter of heroes—the cause of all our sorrows!'

Miriam looked at him with a quiet smile. 'The witch is accustomed long ago to hear fools lay on her the consequences of their own lust and laziness.'

'Hew her down, Smid, son of Troll, that she may pass the Amal's son and gladden it on her way to Nidheim.'

Smid did it, but so terrible were the eyes which glared upon him from those sunken sockets, that his sight was dazzled. The axe turned aside, and struck her shoulder. She reeled, but did not fall.

'It is enough,' she said quietly.

'The accursed Grendel's daughter numbed my arm!' said Smid. 'Let her go! No man shall say that I struck a woman twice.'

'Nidhogg waits for her, soon or late,' answered Wulf.

And Miriam, coolly folding her shawl around her, turned and walked steadily down the stair, while all men breathed more freely, as if delivered from some accursed and supernatural spell.

'And now,' said Wulf, 'to your posts, and vengeance!'

The mob had weltered and howled ineffectually around the house for some half-hour. But the lofty walls, opening on the street only by a few narrow windows in the higher stories, rendered it an impregnable fortress. Suddenly, the iron gates were drawn back, disclosing to the front rank the court, glaring empty and silent and ghastly in the moonlight. For an instant they recoiled, with a vague horror, and dread of treachery, but the mass behind pressed them onward, and in swept the murderers of Hypatia, till the court was full of choking wretches, surging against the walls and pillars in aimless fury. And they from under the archway on each side, rushed a body of tall armed men, driving back all incomers more, the gates shut together again upon their grooves, and the wild beasts of Alexandria were trapped at last.

And then began a murder grim and great. From three different doors issued a line of Goths, whose helmets and mail-shirts made them invulnerable to the clumsy weapons of the mob, and began hewing their way right through the living mass, helpless from their close-packed array. True, they were but as one to ten; but what are ten eurs before one lion? And the moon rose higher and higher, staring down ghastly and unoved upon that doomed court of the furies, and still the bills and swords hewed on and on, and the Goths drew the corpses, as they found room, towards a dark pile in the midst, where old Wulf sat upon a heap of slain, singing the praises of the Amal and the glories of Valhalla, while the shrieks of his lute rose shrill above the shrieks of the dying and the wounded, and its wild waltz-time danced and rollicked on swifter and swifter as the old singer maddened, in awful mockery of the terror and agony around.

And so, by men and purposes which recked not of her, as is the wont of Providence, was the blood of Hypatia avenged in part that night.

In part only. For Peter the Reader, and his especial associates, were safe in sanctuary at the Cæsareum, clinging to the altar. Terrified at the storm which they had raised, and fearing the consequences of an attack upon the palace, they had left the mob to run riot at its will; and escaped the swords of the Goths to be reserved for the more awful punishment of impunity.

CHAPTER XXX

PETER MAN TO HIS OWN PLACE

It was near midnight. Raphael had been sitting some three hours in Miriam's inner chamber, waiting in vain for her return. To recover, if possible, his ancestral wealth, to convey it, without a day's delay, to Cyrene, and, if possible, to persuade the poor old Jewess to accompany him, and there to soothe, to guide, perhaps to convert her, was his next purpose—at all events, with or without his wealth, to flee from that accursed city. And he counted impatiently the slow hours and minutes which detained him in an atmosphere which seemed reeking with innocent blood, black with the lowering curse of an avenging God. More than once, unable to bear the thought, he rose to depart, and leave his wealth behind, but he was checked again by the thought of his own past life. How had he added his own sin to the great heap of Alexandrian wickedness! How had he tempted others, pampered others in evil! Good God! how had he not only done evil with all his might, but had pleasure in those who did the same! And now, now he was reaping the fruit of his own devices. For years past, merely to please his lust of power, his misanthropic scorn, he had been making that wicked Orestes wickedder than he was even by his own base will and nature, and his puppet had avenged itself upon him! He, he had prompted him to ask Hypatia's hand. He had laid, half in sport, half in envy of her excellence, that foul plot against the only human being whom he loved, and he had destroyed her! He, and not Peter, was the murderer of Hypatia! True, he had never meant her death. . . . No, but had he not meant for her worse than death? He had never foreseen. . . . No; but only because he did not choose to foresee. He had chosen to be a god, to kill and to make alive by his own will and law, and behold, he had become a devil by that very act. Who can—and who dare, even if he could—withdraw the sacred veil from those bitter agonies of inward shame and self-reproach, made all the more intense by his clear and undoubting knowledge that he was forgiven? What dread of punishment, what blank despair, could have pierced that great heart so deeply as did the thought that the God whom he had hated and hated had returned him good for evil, and rewarded him not according to his iniquities? That discovery, as Ezekiel of old had warned his forefathers, filled up the cup of his self-loathing. 'To have found at last the hated and dreaded name of God, and found that it was Love! To possess Victoria, a living, human likeness, however imperfect, of that God, and to possess in her a home, a duty, a purpose, a fresh clear life of righteous labour, perhaps of final victory.' That was his punishment, that was the brand of Cain upon his forehead, and he felt it greater than he could bear.

But at least there was one thing to be done. Where he had sinned, there he must make amends, not as a propitiation, not even as a restitution, but simply as a confession of the truth which he had found. And as his purpose shaped itself, he longed and prayed that Miriam might return, and make it possible.

And Miriam did return. He heard her pass slowly through the outer room, learn from the girls who was within, order them out of the apartments, close the outer door upon them, at last she entered, and said quietly—

'Welcome! I have expected you. You could not surprise old Miriam. The tetrarch told me last night that you would be here.'

Did she see the smile of incredulity upon Raphael's face, or was it some sudden pang of conscience which made her cry out—

'No! I did not! I never expected you! I am a liar, a miserable old liar, who cannot speak the truth, even if I try! Only look kind! Smile at me, Raphael!—Raphael come back at last to his poor, miserable, villainous old mother! Smile on me but once, my beautiful, my son! my son!'

And springing to him, she clasped him in her arms.

'Your son!'

'Yes, my son! Safe at last! Mine at last! I can prove it now! The son of my womb, though not the son of my vows!' And she laughed hysterically. 'My child, my heir, for whom I have toiled and hoarded for three and thirty years! Quick! here are my keys. In that cabinet are all my papers—all I have is yours. Your jewels are safe—buried with mine. The negro-woman, Eudamon's wife, knows where I made her swear secrecy upon her little wooden idol, and, Christian as she is, she has been honest. Make her rich for life. She had your poor old mother, and kept her safe to see her boy come home. But give nothing to her little husband—he is a bad fellow, and beats her.—Go, quick! take your riches, and away! No, stay one moment—just one little moment—that the poor old wretch may feast her eyes with the sight of her darling once more before she dies!'

'Before you die! Your son? God of my fathers, what is the meaning of all this, Miriam! This morning I was the son of Ezra the merchant of Antioch!'

'His son and heir, his son and heir! He knew all at last. We told him on his death-bed! I swear that we told him, and he adopted you!'

'Who! Who?'

'His wife and I. He craved for a child, the old miser, and we gave him one—a better one than ever came of his family. But he loved you, accepted you, though he did know all. He was afraid of being laughed at after he was dead—afraid of having it known that he was childless, the old dotard! No—he was right—true Jew in that, after all!'

'Who was my father, then?' interrupted Raphael, in utter bewilderment.

The old woman laughed a laugh so long and wild, that Raphael shuddered.

'Sit down at your mother's feet. Sit down just to please the poor old thing! Even if you do not believe her, just play at being her child, her darling, for a minute before she dies, and she will tell you all. Perhaps there is time yet!'

And he sat down. 'What if this incarnation of all wickedness were really my mother!'

And yet—why should I shrink thus proudly from the notion? Am I so pure myself as to deserve a purer source? And the old woman laid her hand fondly on his head, and her skinny fingers played with his soft locks, as she spoke hurriedly and thick.

'Of the house of Jesse, of the seed of Solomon, not a rabbi from Babylon to Rome dare deny that! A king's daughter I am, and a king's heart I had, and have, like Solomon's own, my son! A kingly heart! It made me dread and scorn to be a slave, a plaything, a soulless doll, such as Jewish women are condemned to be by their tyrants, the men I craved for wisdom, cunning, power—power—power! and my nation refused them to me because, forsooth, I was a woman! So I left them. I went to the Christian priests. They gave me what I asked. They gave me more. They pampered my woman's vanity, my pride, my self-will, my scorn of wedded bondage, and bade me be a saint, the judge of angels and archangels, the bride of God! Liars! liars! And so—if you laugh, you kill me, Raphael—and so Miriam, the daughter of Jonathan—Miriam, of the house of David—Miriam, the descendant of Ruth and Rachab, of Rachel and Sara, became a Christian nun, and shut herself up to see visions, and dream dreams, and fattened her own mad self-conceit upon the impious fancy that she was the spouse of the Nazarene, Joshua Bar-Joseph, whom she called Jehovah!—Silence! If you stop me a moment, it may be too late. I hear them calling me already, and I made them promise not to take me before I had told all to my son—the son of my shame!'

'Who calls you?' asked Raphael, but after one strong shudder she ran on, unheeding—

'But they had, had, had! I found them out that day. . . Do not look up at me, and I will tell you all. There was a riot—a fight between the Christian devils and the Heathen devils—and the convent was sacked, Raphael, my son!—Sacked! Then I found out their blasphemy. Oh God! I shrieked to Him, Raphael! I called on Him to rend His heavens and come down—to pour out His thunderbolts upon them—to cleave the earth and devour them—to save the wretched helpless girl who adored Him, who had given up father, mother, kinsfolk, wealth, the light of heaven, womanhood itself, for Him—who worshipped, meditated over Him, dreamed of Him night and day. . . And, Raphael, He did not hear me! He did not hear me! . . . And then I knew it all for a lie!

‘And you knew it for what it is!’ cried Raphael through his sobs, as he thought of Victoria, and felt every vein burning with righteous wrath.

—‘There was no mistaking that test, was there? . . . For nine months I was mad. And then your voice, my baby, my joy, my pride—that brought me to myself once more! And I shook off the dust of my feet against those Galilean priests, and went back to my own nation, where God had set me from the beginning. I made them—the Rabbis, my father, my kin—I made them all receive me. They could not stand before my eye. I can make people do what I will, Raphael! I could—I could make you emperor now, if I had but time left! I went back. I palmed you off on Ezra as his son, I and his wife, and made him believe that you had been born to him while he was in Byzantium. . . And then—to live for you! And I did live for you. For you I travelled from India to Britain, seeking wealth. For you I toiled, hoarded, lied, intrigued, won money by every means, no matter how base—for was it not for you? And I have conquered! You are the richest Jew south of the Mediterranean, you, my son! And you deserve your wealth. You have your mother’s soul in you, my boy! I watched you, gloried in you—in your cunning, your daring, your learning, your contempt for these Gentile hounds. You felt the royal blood of Solomon within you! You felt that you were a young lion of Judah, and they the jackals who followed to feed upon your leavings! And now, now! Your only danger is past! The cunning woman is gone—the sorceress who tried to take my young lion in her pitfall, and has fallen into the midst of it herself, and he is safe, and returned to take the nations for a prey, and grind their bones to powder, as it is written, “He couched like a lion, he lay down like a lioness’s whelp, and who dare rouse him up?”’

‘Stop!’ said Raphael. ‘I must speak! Mother! I must! As you love me, as you expect me to love you, answer! Had you a hand in her death? Speak!’

‘Did I not tell you that I was no more a Christian? Had I remained one—who can tell what I might not have done? All I, the Jewess, dare do was—Fool that I am! I have forgotten all this time the proof—the proof—’

‘I need no proof, mother. Your words are enough,’ said Raphael, as he clasped her hand between his own, and pressed it to his burning forehead. But the old woman hurried on—‘See! See the black agate which you gave her in your madness!’

‘How did you obtain that?’

‘I stole it—stole it, my son; as thieves steal, and are crucified for stealing. What was the chance of the cross to a mother yearning for her child?—to a mother who put round her baby’s neck, three-and-thirty black years ago, that broken agate, and kept the other half next her own heart by day and night? See! See how they fit! Look, and believe your poor old sinful mother! Look, I say!’ and she thrust the talisman into his hands.

‘Now, let me die! I vowed never to tell this secret but to you—never to tell it to you, until the night I died. Farewell, my son! Kiss me but once—once, my child, my joy! Oh, this makes up for all! Makes up even for that day, the last on which I ever dreamed myself the bride of the Nazarene!’

Raphael felt that he must speak, now or never. Though it cost him the loss of all his wealth, and a mother’s curse, he must speak. And not daring to look up, he said gently—

‘Alas! I lied to you about Him, mother, but has He ever lied to you about Himself? He did not lie to me when He sent me out into the world to find a man, and sent me back again to you with the good news that The Man is born into the world!’

But to his astonishment, instead of the burst of bigoted indignation which he had expected, Miriam answered in a low, confused, abstracted voice—

‘And did He send you hither? Well—that was more like what I used to fancy Him. A grand thought it is after all—a Jew the king of heaven and earth! Well—I shall know soon. . . I loved Him once, and perhaps perhaps—’

Why did her head drop heavily upon his shoulder? He turned—a dark stream of blood was flowing from her lips! He sprang to his feet. The gulls rushed in. They tore open her shawl, and saw the ghastly wound, which she had hidden with such iron resolution to the last. But it was too late. Miriam the daughter of Solomon was gone to her own place.

Early the next morning, Raphael was standing in Cyril’s anteroom, awaiting an audience. There were loud voices within; and after a while a tribune whom he knew well hurried out, muttering curses—

‘What brings you here, friend?’ said Raphael.

‘The scoundrel will not give them up,’ answered he, in an undertone.

‘Give up whom?’

‘The murderers. They are in sanctuary now at the Caesarem. Orestes sent me to demand them, and this fellow defies him openly!’ And the tribune hurried out.

Raphael, smothered with disgust, half-turned to follow him; but his better angel conquered, and he obeyed the summons of the deacon who ushered him in.

Cyril was walking up and down, according to his custom, with great strides. When he saw who was his visitor, he stopped short with a look of fierce inquiry. Raphael entered on business at once, with a cold calm voice.

'You know me, doubtless, and you know what I was. I am now a Christian catechumen. I come to make such restitution as I can for certain past ill-deeds done in this city. You will find among these papers the trust-deeds for such a yearly sum of money as will enable you to hire a house of refuge for a hundred fallen women, and give such dowries to thirty of them yearly as will enable them to find suitable husbands. I have set down every detail of my plan. On its exact fulfilment depends the continuance of my gift.'

Cyril took the document eagerly, and was breaking out with some commonplace about pious benevolence, when the Jew stopped him.

'Your Holiness's compliments are unnecessary. It is to your office, not to yourself, that this business relates.'

Cyril, whose conscience was ill enough at ease that morning, felt abashed before Raphael's dry and quiet manner, which bespoke, as he well knew, reproof more severe than all open upbraidings. So looking down, not without something like a blush, he ran his eye hastily over the paper; and then said, in his blandest tone—

'My brother will forgive me for remarking, that while I acknowledge his perfect right to dispose of his charities as he will, it is somewhat startling to me, as Metropolitan of Egypt, to find not only the Abbot Isidore of Pelusium, but the secular Defender of the Plebs, a civil officer, implicated, too, in the late conspiracy, associated with me as co-trustees.'

'I have taken the advice of more than one Christian bishop on the matter. I acknowledge your authority by my presence here. If the Scriptures say rightly, the civil magistrates are as much God's ministers as you, and I am therefore bound to acknowledge their authority also. I should have preferred associating the Prefect with you in the trust; but as your discussions with the present occupant of that post might have crippled my scheme, I have named the Defender of the Plebs, and have already put into his hands a copy of this document. Another copy has been sent to Isidore, who is empowered to receive all moneys from my Jewish bankers in Pelusium.'

'You doubt, then, either my ability or my honesty?' said Cyril, who was becoming somewhat nettled.

'If your Holiness dislikes my offer, it is easy to omit your name in the deed. One word more. If you deliver up to justice the murderers of my friend Hypatia, I double my bequest on the spot.'

Cyril burst out instantly—

xy

'Thy money perish with thee! Do you presume to bribe me into delivering up my children to the tyrant?'

'I offer to give you the means of showing more mercy, provided that you will first do simple justice.'

'Justice?' cried Cyril. 'Justice? If it be just that Peter should die, am, see first whether it was not just that Hypatia should die. Not that I compassed it. As I live, I would have given my own right hand that this had not happened! But now that it is done—let those who talk of justice look first in which scale of the balance it lies! Do you fancy, sir, that the people do not know their enemies from their friends? Do you fancy that the yare to sit with folded hands, while a puliant makes common cause with a profligate, to drag them back again into the very black gulf of outer darkness, ignorance, brutal lust, grinding slavery, from which the Son of God died to free them, from which they are painfully and slowly struggling upward to the light of day? You, sir, if you be a Christian catechumen, should know for yourself what would have been the fate of Alexandria had the devil's plot of twa days since succeeded. What if the people struck too truly? They struck in the right place. What if they have given the reins to passions fit only for heathens? Recall the centuries of heathendom which bred those passions in them, and blame not my teaching, but the teaching of their forefathers. That very Peter—'

What if he have for once given place to the devil, and avenged where he should have forgiven? Has he no memories which may excuse him for fancying, in a just paroxysm of dread, that idolatry and falsehood must be crushed at any risk?—He who counts back for now three hundred years, in persecution after persecution, martyrs, sir! martyrs—if you know what that word implies—of his own blood and kin, who, when he was but a seven years' boy, saw his own father made a sightless cripple to this day, and his elder sister, a consecrated nun, devoured alive by some in the open streets, at the hands of those who supported the very philosophy, the very gods, which Hypatia attempted yesterday to restore. God shall judge such a man, not I, nor you!'

'Let God judge him, then, by delivering him to God's minister.'

'God's minister? That heathen and apostate Prefect? When he has expiated his apostasy by penance, and returned publicly to the bosom of the Church, it will be time enough to obey him till then he is the minister of none but the devil. And no ecclesiastic shall suffer at the tribunal of an infidel. Holy Writ forbids us to go to law before the unjust. Let the world say of me what it will. I defy it and its rulers. I have to establish the kingdom of God in this city, and do it I will, knowing that other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, which is Christ.'

'Wherefore you proceed to lay it afresh. A curious method of proving that it is laid already.'

x

'What do you mean?' asked Cyril angrily. 'Simply that God's kingdom, if it exist at all, must be a sort of kingdom, considering Who is The King of it, which would have established itself without your help some time since, probably, indeed, if the Scriptures of my Jewish forefathers are to be believed, before the foundation of the world, and that your Empire was to believe that God was King of Alexandria, and had put the Roman law there to crucify all murderers, ecclesiastics included, and that crucified they must be accordingly, is high is Haman himself.'

'I will hear no more of this, sir. I am responsible to God alone, and not to you. Let it be enough that by virtue of the authority committed to me, I shall cut off these men from the Church of God, by solemn excommunication, for three years to come.'

'They are cut off, then, it seems, is not?'

'I tell you, sir, that I shall cut them all. Do you come here to doubt my word?'

'Not in the least, most august sir. But I should have fancied that, according to my carnal notions of God's Kingdom and the Church, they had cut off themselves most effectually already, from the moment when they cast away the Spirit of God, and took to themselves the spirit of murder and cruelty, and that all which your most just and indubitable excommunication could effect, would be to inform the public at that fact. However, farewell! My money shall be forthcoming in due time, and that is the most important matter between us at this moment. As for your client Peter and his fellows, perhaps the most fearful punishment which can befall them, is to go on as they have begun. I only hope that you will not follow in the same direction.'

'If?' cried Cyril, trembling with rage.

'Really I wish your Holiness well when I say so. If my notions seem to you somewhat secular, yours—forgive me—seem to me somewhat atheistic, and I advise you honestly to take care lest while you are busy trying to establish God's kingdom, you forget what it is like, by shutting your eyes to those of its laws which are established already. I have no doubt that with your Holiness's great powers you will succeed in establishing something. My only dread is, that when it is established, you should discover to your horror that it is the devil's kingdom and not God's.'

And without waiting for an answer, Raphael bowed himself out of the august presence, and sailing for Berytus that very day, with Eudemon and his negro wife, went to his own place, there to labour and to sweat, a sad and stern, and yet a loving and a much-loved man, for many a year to come.

And now we will leave Alexandria also, and taking a forward leap of some twenty years, see how all other persons mentioned in this history went, likewise, each to his own place.

A little more than twenty years after, the wisest and holiest man in the East was writing of Cyril, just deceased—

'His death made those who survived him joyful, but it grieved most probably the dead, and there is cause to fear, lest, finding his presence too troublesome, they should send him back to us. May it come to pass, by your prayers, that he may obtain mercy and forgiveness, that the unmeasurable grace of God may prevail over his wickedness.'

So wrote Theodoret in days when men had not yet intercalated into Holy Writ that line of an obscure modern hymn, which proclaims to men the good news that 'There is no repentance in the grave.' Let that be as it may, Cyril has gone to his own place. What that place is in history is but too well known. What it is in the sight of Him unto whom all live for ever, is no concern of ours. May He whose mercy is over all His works, have mercy upon all, whether orthodox or unorthodox, Papist or Protestant, who, like Cyril, began by lying for the cause of truth, and setting on upon that evil road, armed singly, with the Scriks and Phantasies of old, sooner or later at their own place!

True, he and his monks had conquered; but Hypatia did not the unavenged. In the hour of that mighty victory, the Church of Alexandria received a deadly wound. It had admitted and sanctioned those habits of doing evil that good may come, of pious intrigue, and at last of open persecution, which are certain to creep in wheresoever men attempt to set up a merely religious empire, independent of human relationships and civil laws, to establish, in short, a 'theocracy,' and by that very act confess their secret disbelief that God is doing already. And the Egyptian Church grew, year by year, more lawless and inhuman. Fied from enemies without, and from the men which fear compels, it turned its ferocity inward, to prey on its own vitality, and to fortify itself in forces by a voluntary suicide, with mutual anathemas and exclusions, till it ended in a micro-chloric of idolatrous sects, persecuting each other for metaphysical propositions, which, true or false, were equally heretical in their mouths, because they used them only as watch-words of division. Orthodox or unorthodox, they knew not, fled, for they knew neither righteousness, nor love, nor peace. They hated their brethren, and walked on still in darkness, not knowing whether they were going.

till Ammon and his Mohammedans appeared, and whether they discovered the fact or not, they went to their own place.

Though the mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small. Though He stands and waits with patience, with exactness grinds He all—

'And so found, in due time, the philosophers as well as the ecclesiastics of Alexandria.'

Twenty years after Hypatia's death, philosophy was flinching down to the very socket Hypatia's murder was its death-blow. In language tremendous and unmistakable, philosophers had been informed that mankind had done with them, that they had been weighed in the balances, and found wanting, that if they had no better Gospel than that to preach, they must make way for those who had. And they did make way. We hear little or nothing of them or their wisdom henceforth, except at Athens, where Proclus, Marinus, Isidore, and others kept up 'the golden chain of the Platonic succession,' and descended deeper and deeper, one after the other, into the mazes of confusion and confusion of the material with the spiritual, of the subject with the object, the moral with the intellectual, self-consistent in one thing only,—namely, in their excessive Pharisaism, utterly unable to proclaim any good news for man as man, or even to conceive of the possibility of such, and gradually looking with more and more complacency on all superstitions which did not involve that one idea, which alone they hated,—namely, the Incarnation, craving after signs and wonders, dubbing in magic, astrology, and herbarian letichisms, denouncing the Bible as, and barking querulously at every form of human thought except their own, winning pompous longevity, full of bad Greek, worse taste, and still worse miracles.

—That last day of no
Of covinous slath, and proud decrepitude
No faith, no art, no king, no priest, no
While round the freezing fountains of life
Crouched on the bare worn soil,
Huddling about the man turning spin,
And whining for dials of gold, who cannot save
The toothless systems shiver to their grave

The last scene of their tragedy was not without a touch of pathos. In the year 529, Justinian finally closed, by imperial edict, the schools of Athens. They had nothing more to tell the world, but what the world had yawned over a thousand times before—why should they break the blessed silence by any more such noises? The philosophers felt so themselves. They had no mind to be martyrs, for they had nothing for which to testify. They had no message for mankind, and mankind no interest for them. All that was left for them was to take care of their own souls, and fancying that they saw something like Plato's ideal republic in the pure monotheism of the Guebres, their philosophic emperor the Khosroo, and his holy caste of magi, seven of them set off to Persia, to forget the hateful existence of Christianity in that realised ideal. Alas for the facts! The purest monotheism, they discovered, was perfectly compatible with laziness and ferocity, luxury and tyranny, searls and bastings, incestuous marriages and corpses exposed to the beasts of the field and the fowls of the air, and in reasonable fear for their own necks, the last seven Sages of Greece returned home weary-hearted, into the Christian Empire from which they had fled, fully contented with the permission, which the Khosroo had obtained for them from Justinian, to hold their peace, and die among decent people. So among decent people they died, leaving behind them, as their last legacy to mankind, Simplicius's Commentaries on Epictetus's Enchiridion, an essay on the art of egotism, by obeying which, whosoever list may become as perfect a Pharisee as ever darkened the earth of God. Peace be to their ashes! They are gone to their own place.

Wulf, too, had gone to his own place, wherever that may be. He died in Spain, full of years and honours, at the court of Adolf and Placidia, having resigned his sovereignty into the hands of his lawful claimant, and having lived long enough to see Hlodare and his younger companions in arms settled with their Alcxandrian brides upon the sunny slopes from which they had expelled the Vandals and the Savi, to be the ancestors of 'bluest blooded' Castilian nobles. Wulf died, as he had lived, a heathen. Placidia, who loved him well, as she loved all righteous and noble souls, had succeeded once in persuading him to accept baptism. Adolf himself acted as one of his sponsors, and the old warrior was in the act of stepping into the font, when he turned suddenly to the lady, and asked where were the souls of his heathen ancestors? 'In hell,' replied the worthy prelate. Wulf drew back from the font, and threw his bearskin cloak around him. 'He would prefer, if Adolf had no objection, to go to his own people.' And so he died unbaptized, and went to his own place.

Victoria was still alive and busy. But Augustine's warning had come true—she had found trouble in the flesh. The day of the Lord had come, and Vandal tyrants were now the masters of the far coasts of Africa. Her father and brother were lying by the side of Raphael Abn-Ezza, beneath the mure walls of Hippo, slain, long years before, on the vain attempt to deliver their country from the invading swarms. But they had died the death of heroes, and Victoria was content. And it was whispered, among the down-trodden Catholics, who clung to her as an angel of mercy, that she, too, had endured strange misery and disgrace, that her delicate limbs bore the scars of fearful tortures, that a room in her house, into which none ever entered but herself, contained a young boy's grave, and that she passed long nights of prayer upon the spot, where lay her only child, martyred by the hands of Arian persecutors. Nay, some of the few who, having dared to face that fearful storm, had survived its fury, asserted that she herself, amid her own shame and agony, had cheered the shrinking boy on to his glorious death. But though she had found trouble in the flesh, her spirit knew none. Clear-eyed and joyful as when she walked by her father's side on the field of Ostia, she went in and fro among the victims of Vandal rapine and persecution, spending upon the maimed, the sick, the ruined, the small remnants of her former wealth, and winning, by her purity and her piety, the reverence and favour even of the barbarian conquerors. She had her work to do, and she did it, and was content, and, in good time, she also went to her own place.

Abbot Pambo, as well as Arsenius, had been dead several years, the abbot's place was filled, in his own dying command, by a hermit from the neighbouring deserts, who had made himself famous for many miles round, by his extraordinary austerities, his ceaseless prayers, his loving wisdom, and, it was rumoured, by various cures which could only be attributed to miraculous powers. While still in the prime of his manhood, he was dragged, against his own entreaties, from a lofty cranny of the cliffs to preside over the Laura of Scetis, and ordained a deacon at the advice of Pambo, by the bishop of the diocese, who, three years afterwards, took on himself to command him to enter the priesthood. The elder monks considered it an indignity to be ruled by so young a man, but the monastery thrived and grew rapidly under his government. His sweetness, patience, and humility, and above all, his marvellous understanding of the doubts and temptations of his own generation, soon drew around him all whose sensitiveness or waywardness had made them unmanageable in the neighbouring monasteries. As to David in the mountains, so to him, every one who was discontented, and every one who was oppressed, gathered themselves. The neighbouring abbots were at first inclined to shrink from him, as one who ate and drank with publicans and sinners, but they held their peace, when they saw those whom they had driven out as reprobates labouring peacefully and cheerfully under Philammon. The elder generation of Scetis, too, saw, with some horror, the new influx of sinners, but their abbot had but one answer to their remonstrances—'Those who are whole need not a physician, but those who are sick.'

Never was the young abbot heard to speak harshly of any human being. 'When thou hast tried in vain for seven years,' he used to say, 'to convert a sinner, then only wilt thou have a right to suspect him of being a worse man than thyself.' That there is a seed of good in all men, a Divine Word and Spirit striving with all men, a gospel and good news which would turn the hearts of all men, if abbots and priests could but preach it aright, was his favourite doctrine, and one which he used to defend, when, at rare intervals, he allowed himself to discuss any subject from the writings of his favourite theologian, Clement of Alexandria. Above all, he stopped, by stern rebuke, any attempt to revile either heretics or heathens. 'On the Catholic Church alone,' he used to say, 'lies the blame of all heresy and unbelief for if she were but for one day that which she ought to be, the world would be converted before nightfall.' To one class of sins, indeed, he was inexorable—all but ferocious; to the sins, namely, of religious persons. In proportion to any man's reputation for orthodoxy and sanctity, Philammon's judgment of him was stern and pitiless. More than once events proved him to have been unjust: when he saw himself to be so, none could confess his mistake more frankly, or humiliate himself for it more bitterly. But from his rule he never swerved; and the Pharisees of the Nile dreaded and avoided him, as much as the publicans and sinners loved and followed him.

One thing only in his conduct gave some handle for scandal, among the just persons who needed no repentance. It was well known that in his most solemn devotions, on those long nights of unceasing prayer and self-discipline, which won him a reputation for superhuman sanctity, there mingled always with his prayers the names of two women. And, when some worthy elder, taking courage from his years, dared to hint kindly to him that such conduct caused some scandal to the weaker brethren, 'It is true,' answered he, 'tell my brethren that I pray nightly for two women, both of them young, both of them beautiful, both of them beloved by me more than I love my own soul, and tell them, moreover, that one of the two was a harlot, and the other a heathen.' The old monk laid his hand on his mouth, and retired.

The remainder of his history it seems better to extract from an unpublished fragment of the Hypologia Nilotica of Gradiocodrus Tabernicius, the greater part of which valuable work was destroyed at the taking of Alexandria under Amun, A.D. 640.

'Now when the said abbot had ruled the monastery of Scetis seven years with uncommon prudence, resplendent in virtue and in miracles, it befell that one morning he was late for the Divine office. Whereon a certain ancient brother, who was also a deacon, being sent to ascertain the cause of so unwonted a defection, found the holy man extended upon the floor of his cell, like Balaam in the flesh, though still differing from him in the spirit, having fallen into a trance, but having his eyes open. Who, not daring to arouse him, sat by him until the hour of noon, judging rightly that something from heaven had befallen him. And at that hour, the saint arising without astonishment, said, "Brother, make ready for us the divine elements, that I may consecrate them." And he asking the reason wherefore, the saint replied, "That I may partake thereof with all my brethren, ere I depart hence. For know assuredly that, within the seventh day, I shall migrate to the celestial mansions. For this night stood by me in a dream, those two women, whom I love, and for whom I pray, the one clothed in a white, the other in a ruby-coloured garment, and holding each other by the hand, who said to me, "That life after death is not such a one as you fancy; come, therefore, and behold with us what it is like." Troubled at which words, the deacon went forth yet on account not only of holy obedience, but also of the sanctity of the blessed abbot, did not hesitate to prepare according to his command the divine elements: which the abbot having consecrated, distributed among his brethren, reserving only a portion of the most holy bread and wine; and then, having bestowed on them all the kiss of peace, he took the paten and chalice in his hands, and went forth from the monastery towards the desert, whom the whole fraternity followed weeping, as knowing that they should see his face no more. But he, having arrived at the foot of a certain mountain, stopped, and blessing them, commanded them that they should follow him no further, and dismissed them with these words "As ye have been loved, so love. As ye have been judged, so judge. As ye have been forgiven, so forgive." And so ascending, was taken away from their eyes. Now they, returning astonished, watched three days with prayer and fasting but at last the eldest brother, being ashamed, like Elzaba before the entreaties of Elydi's disciples, sent two of the young men to seek their master.

'To whom befall a thing noteworthy and full of miracles. For ascending the same mountain where they had left the abbot, they met with a certain Moorish people, not averse to the Christian verity, who declared that certain days before a priest had passed by them, bearing a paten and chalice, and blessing them in silence, proceeded across the desert in the direction of the cave of the holy Anna.

'And they inquiring who this Anna might be, the Moors answered that some twenty years ago there had arrived in those mountains a woman more beautiful than had ever before been seen in that region, dressed in rich garments, who, after a short sojourn among their tribe, leaving distributed among them the jewels which she wore, had embraced the eremitic life, and sojourned upon the highest peak of a neighbouring mountain, till her garments failing her, she became invisible to mankind, saving to a few women of the tribe, who went up from time to time to carry her offerings of fruit and meal, and to ask the blessing of her prayers. To whom she rarely appeared, veiled down to her feet in black hair of exceeding length and splendour.

'Hearing these things, the two brethren doubted for awhile but at last, determining to proceed, arrived at sunset upon the summit of the said mountain.

'Where, behold a great miracle. For above an open grave, freshly dug in the sand, a cloud of vultures and obscene birds hovered, whom two lions, fiercely contending, drove away with their talons, as if from some sacred deposit therein enshrined. Towards whom the two brethren, fortifying themselves with the sign of the holy cross, ascended. Whereupon the lions, as having fulfilled the term of their guardianship, retired, and left to the brethren a sight which they beheld with astonishment, and not without tears.

'For in the open grave lay the body of Philammon the abbot: and by his side, wrapped in his cloak, the corpse of a woman of exceeding beauty, such as the Moors had described. Whom embracing straitly, as a brother a sister, and joining his lips to hers, he had rendered up his soul to God, not without bestowing on her, as it seemed, the most holy sacrament, for by the grave-side stood the paten and the chalice emptied of their divine contents.

'Having beheld which things awhile in silence, they considered that the right understanding of such matters pertained to the judgment seat above, and was unnecessary to be comprehended by men consecrated to God. Whereon, filling in the grave with all haste, they returned weeping to the Laura, and declared to them the strange things which they had beheld, and whereof I the writer, having collected these facts from sacrosanct and most trustworthy mouths, can only say that wisdom is justified of all her children.

'Now, before they returned, one of the brethren searching the cave wherein the holy woman dwelt, found there neither food, furniture, nor other matters, saving one bracelet of gold, of large size and strange workmanship, engraved with foreign characters, which no one could decipher. The which bracelet, being taken home to the Laura of Scetis, and there dedicated in the chapel to the memory of the holy Anna, proved beyond all doubt the sanctity of its former possessor, by the miracles which its virtue worked, the same whereof spreading abroad throughout the whole Thebaid, drew innumerable crowds of suppliants to that holy relic. But it came to pass, after the Vandalic persecution wherein Hunceric and Genseric the king devastated Africa, and enriched the Catholic Church with innumerable martyrs, that certain wandering barbarians of the Vandalic race, imbued with the Arian pagany, and made insolent by success, boiled over from the parts of Mauritania into the Thebaid region. Who plundering and burning all monasteries, and insulting the consecrated virgins, at last arrived even at the monastery of Scetis, where they not only, according to their impious custom, defiled the altar, and carried off the sacred vessels, but also bore away that most holy relic, the chief glory of the Laura,—namely, the bracelet of the holy Anna, impiously pretending that it had belonged to a warrior of their tribe, and thus expounded the writing thereon engraven—

'For Annalis Aiala Son Smil Troll a Son Male M.

Wherein whether they spoke truth or not, yet their sacrilege did not remain unpunished, for attempting to return homeward toward the sea by way of the Nile, they were set upon while weighed down with wine and sleep, by the country people, and to a man miserably destroyed. But the pious folk, restoring the holy gold to its pristine sanctuary, were not unrewarded for since that day it grows glorious with ever fresh miracles—as of blind restored to sight, paralytics to strength, demons to sanity—to the honour of the orthodox Catholic Church, and of its ever-blessed saints.'

So be it. Pelagia and Philammon, like the rest, went to their own place, to the only place where such in such days could find rest, to the desert and the hermit's cell, and then forward into that fairy land of legend and miracle, wherein all saintly lives were destined to be enveloped for many a century thenceforth.

And now, readers, farewell. I have shown you New Foes under an old face—your own likenesses in toga and tunic, instead of coat and bonnet. One word before we part. The same devil who tempted these old Egyptians tempts you. The same God who would have saved these old Egyptians if they had willed, will save you, if you will. Their sins are yours, their errors yours, their doom yours, their deliverance yours. There is nothing new under the sun. The thing which has been, it is that which shall be. Let him that is without sin among you cast the first stone, whether at Hypatia or Pelagia, Miriam or Raphael, Cyril or Philammon.

The Saturday Review said of the previous volume - "The new volume of the English Illustrated Magazine is a gift book in its pretty cloth binding of pale green and gold, shows in all respects a constant adherence to the standard excellence prescribed at its birth. It is a bright and varied volume, which is by no means common to magazine literature."

The Spectator said - "The volume for the year ending this month of September shows no falling off, either in the literary matter or the illustrations, which are the speciality of the periodical."

The Athenaeum said - "The English Illustrated Magazine, 1888-9, is an excellent bargain."

The Scotsman said - "The publication maintains the high excellence by which it has been marked from the first for the illustrations, they are counters in number, and wonderfully good in execution. A jaded reader may turn the page over idly and not be bored, while a reader who 'means business' will find it under his hand. No better book could be suggested for a summer holiday or a winter retreat."

The Manchester Guardian said - "The least that can be said of this year's issue, is that it is worthy to be classed with predecessors. Christmas not now very distant, and this volume may be confidently recommended as a suitable gift book for the illustrations, they are counters in number, and wonderfully good in execution. A jaded reader may turn the page over idly and not be bored, while a reader who 'means business' will find it under his hand. No better book could be suggested for a summer holiday or a winter retreat."

The Record said - "The volume, whether for its letterpress or its illustrations, is of the highest and most interesting order. The Aberdeen Daily Free Press said - "There is no equal to it as regards both its literary and artistic contents."

INTRODUCTORY

It may seem a somewhat Irish method of beginning the story of Two Years Ago by a scene which happened but a month since. And yet, will not the story be on that very account a better type of many a man's own experiences? How few of us had learnt the meaning of 'Two years ago' until this late quiet autumn time, and till Christmas, too, with its eyes in the old ring of friendly faces, never to be filled up again on earth, began to teach us somewhat of its lesson.

Two years ago, while justice was hovering over us and ours, while the battle was ringing in our ears, who had time to think, to ask what all that meant, to seek for the deep lesson which we knew must be beneath? Two years ago was the time for work—for men to do with all their might whatsoever their hands found to do. But now the storm has lulled once more, the air has cleared while, and we can talk calmly over all the wonders of that sudden, strange, and sad 'Two years ago'.

So left, at least, two friends who went down just one week before Christmas Day, to Whitlany in Berkshire. Two years ago had come to one of them, as to thousands more, the crisis of his life, and he was talking of it with his companion, and was on his way, too, to learn more of that story which this book contains, and in which he had borne his part.

They were both of them men who would at first sight interest a stranger. The shorter of the two he might have seen before—at picture sales, Royal Academy meetings, dinner parties, evening parties, anywhere and everywhere in town, for Claude Mellot is a general favorite and a general guest.

He is a tiny, delicate-looking man, with a look of half-lazy enthusiasm about his beautiful face, which reminds you much of Shelley's portrait, only he has what Shelley had not, clustering Auburn curls, and a rich brown beard, soft as silk. You set him down at once as a man of delicate susceptibility, sweetness, thoughtfulness, probably (as he actually is) an artist.

His companion is a man of stouter stamp, tall, dark, and handsome, with a very large forehead. If the face has a fault, it is that the mouth is too small, that, and the expression of face too, and the tone of voice, seem to indicate over-illumination, possibly a too aristocratic exclusiveness. He is dressed like a very fine gentleman indeed, and looks and talks like one. Aristocrat, however, in the common sense of the word, he is not, for he is a native of the Model Republic, and shipping partner in a great New York merchant firm.

He is chatting away to Claude Mellot, the artist, about Edmont's election, and on that point seems to be earnest enough, though pitiful and fluctuate.

'My dear Claude, our loss is great. The delay of the next four years was really necessary, that we might consolidate our party. And I leave you to judge if it has grown to its present size in but a few months, what dimensions it will have attained before the next election. We require the delay, too, to discover who are our really best men, not merely us cantors, but as workers, and you English ought to know, better than any nation, that the latter class of men are those whom the world most needs—that though Aaron may be an altogether unproved preacher, yet it is only slow-tongued, practical Moses, whose spokesman he is, who can deliver Israel from their taskmasters. Besides, my dear fellow, we really want the next four years "tell it not in Gath"—to look about us, and see what is to be done. Your wisest Englishmen justly complain of us, that our "platform" is as yet a merely negative one, that we define what the South shall not do, but not what the North shall. Ere four years be over, we will have a "positive platform," at which you shall have no cause to grumble.

'I still think with Marie, that your "positive platform" is already in use for you, plain as the sun in heaven, as the lightnings of Sinai. Free those slaves at once and utterly!'

'Impatient idealist! By what means? By law, or by force? Leave us to draw a cordon sanitaire round the United States, and leave the system to die a natural death, as it rapidly will if it be prevented from enlarging its field. Don't fancy that a dream of mine. None knew it better than the Southerners themselves. What makes them so very just now to risk honour, justice, even the common law of nations and humanity in the struggle for new slave territory? What but the consciousness that without virgin soil, which will yield rapid and enormous profit to slave labour, they and their institution must be ruined !

'The more reason for accelerating so desirable a consummation by freeing the slaves at once.'

'Humph !' said Stangrave, with a smile. 'Who so cruel at times as your too-benevolent philanthropist ? Did you ever count the meaning of those words ? Disunion of the Union, an invasion of the South by the North, and an intestine war, aggravated by the horrors of a general rising of the slaves, and such scenes as Hayti beheld sixty years ago ! If you have ever read them, you will pause ere you determine to repeat them on a vaster scale.'

'It is dreadful, Heaven knows, even in thought ! But, Stangrave, can any moderation on your part ward it off ? Where there is crime, there is vengeance, and without shedding of blood is no remission of sin.'

'God knows ! It may be true, but God forbid that I should ever do ought to hasten what may come. Oh, Claude, do you know that I, of all men, do not feel at moments the thirst for brute vengeance !'

Claude was silent.

'Judge for yourself, you who know all—what man among us Northerners can feel, as I do, what those hapless men may have deserved ! Who have day and night before me the brand of their cruelty, filling my heart with fire ? I need all my strength, all my reason, at times to say to myself, as I say to others—"Are not these slaveholders men of like passions with yourself ? What have they done which you would not have done in their place ?" I have never read that Kry to Uncle Tom's Cabin. I will not even read this Dred, admirable as I believe it to be.'

'Why should you ?' said Claude. 'Have you not a key to Uncle Tom's Cabin more pathetic than any word of man's or woman's !'

'But I do not mean that ! I will not read them, because I have the key to them in my own heart, Claude, because conscience has taught me to feel for the Southerner as a brother, who is lost what I might have been, and to sigh over his misdirected courage and energy, not with hatred, not with contempt, but with pity, all the more intense the more he scorns that pity, so long, not merely for the slaves' sake, but for the masters' sake, to see them—the once chivalrous gentlemen of the South—delivered from the meshes of a net which they did not spread for themselves, but which was round their feet, and round their fathers', from the day that they were born. You ask me to destroy these men. I long to save them from their certain doom !'

'You are right, and a better Christian than I am, I believe. Certainly they do need pity, if any sinners do, for slavery seems to be to judge from Mr. Brooks's triumph—a great moral curse, and a heavier degradation to the slaveholder himself, than it can ever be to the slave.'

'Then I would free them from that curse, that degradation. If the negro asks, "Am I not a man and a brother !" have they no right to ask it also ? Shall I, pretending to love my country, venture on any rash step which may shut out the whole Southern white population from their share in my country's future glory ? No, have but patience with us, you comfortable liberals of the Old World, who find freedom ready made to your hands, and we will pay you all. Remember, we are but children yet, our sins are the sins of youth,—greediness, intemperance, petulance, self-conceit. When we are purged from our youthful sins, England will not be ashamed of her child.'

'Ashamed of you ? I often wish I could make Americans understand the feeling of England to you—the honest pride, as of a mother who has brought into the world the loveliest baby that ever this earth beheld, and is rather proud of its stamping about and beating her in its pretty pats. Only the old lady does get a little cross when she hears you talk of the wrongs which you have endured from her, and teaching your children to hate us as their ancient oppressors on the ground of a foolish war, of which every Englishman is utterly ashamed, and in the result of which he glories really as much as you do.'

Don't talk of "you," Claude ! You know well what I think on that point. Never did the nation make the amende honorable to another more fully and nobly than you have to us, and those who try to keep up the quarrel are I won't say what. But the truth is, Claude, we have had no real sorrows, and therefore we can afford to play with imaginary ones. God grant that we may not have our real ones that way, nor have to drink of the cup of which our great mother drank two years ago !'

'It was a wholesome letter for us, and it may be so for you likewise, but we will have no sad forebodings on the eve of the Ides of Christmas-tide. He lives, He lives, He reigns, and all is well, for we are His and He is ours !'

'Ah,' said Stangrave, 'when Emerson sneered at you English for believing your Old Testament, he little thought that that was the lesson which it had taught you, and that that same lesson was the root of all your greatness. That that belief in God's being, in some mysterious way, the living King of England and of Christendom, has been the very pole which has kept you in peace and safety now for many a hundred years, moving slowly on from good to better, not without many backslidings and many short comings, but still holding out, quickly enough, when you were in the wrong road, and not ashamed to retract your steps, and to reform, as brave strong men should dare to do, a people who have been for many an age in the vanguard of all the nations, and the champions of sure and solid progress throughout the world, because what is new among you is not patched artificially on to the old, but grows organically out of it, with a growth like that of your own English oak, whose every new-year's leaf-crop is fed by roots which burrow deep in many a buried generation, and the rich soil of full a thousand years.

'Stay!' said the little artist. 'We are quite contented enough already, without your eloquent adulation, sir! But there is a tincture in your words. There is a better spirit roused among us, and that not merely of two years ago. I knew this part of the country well in 1846-7-8, and since then, I can bear witness, a spirit of self-reform has been awakened round here in many a heart which I thought once utterly frivolous. I find, in every circle of every class, men and women asking to be taught their duty, that they may go and do it, I find everywhere schools, libraries, and mechanics' institutes springing up, and rich and poor meeting together more and more in the faith that God has made them all. As for the outward and material improvements you know as well as I, that since free trade and emigration the labourers confess themselves better off than they have been for fifty years, and though you will not see in the chalk counties that rapid and enormous agricultural improvement which you will in Lancashire, Yorkshire, or the Lothians, yet you shall see enough to-day to settle for you the question whether we English country folk are in a state of decadence and decay. Par exemple?'

And Claude pointed to the clean large fields, with their neat close-set hedges-rows, among which here and there stood cottages, more than three-fourths of them new.

'Those well drained fallow fields, ten years ago, were poor clay pastures, fit to sleep in nine six months in this year, and accused in the eyes of my poor dear old friend, Spence Lavington, because they were so full of old moles' nests, that they threw all horses down. I am no firmer, but they seem surely to be somewhat altered since then.'

As he spoke, they turned off the main line of the rolling clays toward the foot of the chalk-hills, and began to brush through short cuttings of blue guilt and 'green sand,' so called by geologists, because its usual colours are bright brown, snow-white, and crimson.

Soon they get glimpses of broad silver Whit, as she shales, with divided streams, through bright water-meadows and stately groves of poplar, and alder, and pine, white, far above upon the left, the downs rise steep, crowned with black fir spinnies, and dotted with dark box and juniper.

Soon they pass old Whitford Priory, with its numberless gables nestling amid mighty clins, and the Nunpool flashing and roaring as of old, and the lowly shingle below sparkling and laughing in the low but bright December sun.

So shales on the noble river, be ever changing, and yet for ever the same—always fulfilling its errand, which yet is never fulfilled, said Stungarr, 'he was given to halt mystification, and hankering after Pagan mythology, learnt in the days when he worshipped Emerson, and tried (but unsuccessfully) to worship Margaret Fuller Ossoli. 'Those old Greeks had a deep insight into nature, when they gave to each river not merely a name, but a semi-human personality, a river-god of its own. It may be but a collection of ever-changing atoms of water, what is your body but a similar collection of atoms, decaying and renewing every moment? Yet you are a person, and is not the river, too, a person—a live thing? It has an individual countenance which you love, which you would recognise again, meet it where you will, it marks the whole landscape, it determines probably the geography and the society of a whole district. It draws you, too, to itself by an indelible magnetic attraction. If you stop in a strange place, the first instinct of your ill half-hour is to lounge by the river. It is a person to you, you call it Scotchman too, at least she, and not it. How do you know that you are not philosophically correct, and that the river has a spirit as well as you?'

'Amph! ' said Claude, who talks mysticism himself by the hour, but smiles it in every one else. 'It has front, at least, and they stand, I suppose, for its soul, as the jansans do for those of Jean Paul's gaucy ideal bride and bridegroom and peripatetic baby.'

'Oh, you materialist English! sporting-mad all of you, from the duke who shooteth stags to the clown who peacheth rabbits!'

'And who therefore can fight Russians at Inkermann, duke and clown alike, and side by side, never better (says the chronicler of old) than in their last battle. I can neither fight nor fish, and on the whole I agree with you—but I think it proper to be as English as I can in the presence of an American.'

A whistle—work—a jar, and they stop at the little Watford station, where a carriage for the vile, far better than Claude was, made his appearance, in the person of Mark Armsworth, banker, railway director and de facto king of Whitham town, long since elected by universal suffrage (his own vote included) as permanent locum tenens of his gracious Majesty.

He hailed Claude cheerfully from the platform, as he waddles about with a face as of the rising sun, radiant with good fun, good humour, good deeds, good news, and good living. His coat was scarlet once, but purple now. His leathers and boots were doubtless clean this morning—but are now afflicted with elephantiasis being three inches deep in solid mud, which his old groom is scraping off as fast as he can. His rap is dimpled in, his buck tears fresh stains of peat, a gentle rain distils from the few angles of his person, and bedews the platform, for Mark Armsworth has 'been in Whit' to day.

All pointers and guards touch their hats to him, the station-master rushes up and down intricately, shouting, 'Where are those horse-boxes? Now then, look alive!' for Mark is chairman of the line, and everybody's friend beside, and as he stands there being scraped he finds time to enquire after every one of the officials by turns, and after their wives, children, and sweethearts beside.

'What a fine specimen of your English squire,' says Stangrave.

'He is no squire, he is the Whitbury banker, of whom I told you.'

'Armsworth?' said Stangrave, looking at the old man with interest.

'Mark Armsworth himself. He is acting as squire, though, now, for he has hunted the Whitford Priors ever since poor old Lavington died.'

'Now then—those horse boxes!'

'Very sorry, sir, I telegraphed up, but we could get but one down.'

'Put the horses into that, then, and there's an empty carriage! Look, put the hounds into it, and they shall all go second class, as sure as I'm chairman!'

The grinning porters hand the strange passengers in, while Mark counts the couples with his whip point.

'Ravager! Roystoner! Melody—Gay lass, all right! Why, where's that old buff of a Good man?'

'Went over a gate as soon as he saw the couples, and wouldn't come in at my price, sir,' says the huntsman. 'Come home by himself, I expect.'

'Goodman, Goodman, boy!' And forthwith out of the station room slips the noble old hound, gray-nosed, gray-eyebrowed, who has hidden for purposes of his own, till he sees all the rest safe locked in.

Up he goes to Mark, and begins wringing against his knees, and looking up as only dogs can. 'Oh, want to go first class with me, eh? Jump in, then!' And in jumps the hound, and Mark struggles after him.

'Hello, sir! Come out! Here are your letters here before you,' as he sees Stangrave, and a fat old lady in the opposite corner.

'Oh no, let the dog stay!' says Stangrave.

'I shall wet you, sir, I'm afraid.'

'Oh no!'

And Mark settles himself, puffing, with the hound's head on his knees, and begins talking fast and loud.

'Well, Mr Mellot, you're a stranger here. Haven't seen you since poor Miss Honour died. Ah, sweet angel she was! Thought my Mary would never get over it. She's just such another, though I say it, baring the beards. Goodman, boy! You recollect old Goodman, son of Gallopier, that the old squire gave our old squire?'

Claude, of course, knows—as will do who know those parts—who the Old Squire is, long may he live, patriarch of the parish! The genealogy he does not.

'Ah, well—Miss Honour took to the pony, and used to walk him out, and a prince of a hound he is, so now he's old we let him have his own way, for her sake, and nobody'll ever bully you, will they, Goodman, my boy?'

'I want to introduce you to a friend of mine.'

'Proud to know any friend of yours, sir.'

'Mr Stangrave—Mr Armsworth. Mr Stangrave is an American gentleman, who is anxious to see Whitbury and the neighbourhood.'

'Well, I shall be happy to show it him, though I can't have a better guide, though I say it know everything by this time, and everybody, man, woman, and child, as I hope Mr Stangrave'll find when he gets to know old Mark.'

'You must not speak of getting to know you, my dear sir, I know you intimately already, I assure you, and more, am under very deep obligations to you, which, I regret to say, I can only repay by thanks.'

'Obligation to me, my dear sir?'

'Indeed I am. I will tell you all when we are alone.' And Stangrave glanced at the fat old woman, who seemed to be listening intently.

'Oh, never mind her,' says Armsworth, 'she is as quiet as a good woman, but so deaf she ought to speak to her though'—and, reaching a horse, to the infinite amusement of his companions, he roared in the fat woman's face, with a voice as of a speaking trumpet, 'Glad to see you, Mrs Grove! Got those dividends ready for your next time you come into town?'

'Ah!' screamed the hapless woman, who is the first to hear of it. 'What do you mean, frightening a lady in that way? Dear, indeed!'

'Why,' roared Mark again, 'ain't you Mrs Grove, of Dystown Dytwith?'

'No, not no acquaintance! What business it of your son, to be chattering in that way?'

'Well—but I'll swear if you ain't her, you're somebody else. I know you as well as the town clock.'

'Mr—If you must know, sir, I'm Mrs Pettigrew's mother, the hunchback's establishment, sir, a-going down for thirteen, sir!'

'Humph!' says Mark, 'you see—was sure I knew her—know everybody here. As I said, she wasn't Mrs Grove, she was somebody else. Even in these parts before?'

'Never—but I have heard a good deal of them, and very much chattered with them I am. I have seldom seen a more distinctive specimen of English scenery.'

'And how you are improving round here!' said Claude, who knew Mark's weak points, and wanted to draw him out. 'Your homesteads seem all new, three fields have been thrown into one, I fancy, over half the town.'

Mark broke out at once on his favourite topic. 'I believe you! I'm making the mare go here in Whitford, without the money too, sometimes. I'm steward now, barill! ha! ha! these four years past—to Mrs Lavington's Irish husband, I wanted him to have a regular agent, a county seat or Yorkshireman. Futh, the poor man couldn't afford it, and so full back on old Mark. Paddy loves a job, you know. So I've the votes and the tithing, and send him his rents, and manage all the rest pretty much my own way.'

When the name of Lavington was mentioned,

Mark observed Stangrave start, and an expression passed over his face difficult to be defined -- it seemed to Mark mingled pain and shame. He turned to Chundle, and said, in a low voice, but loud enough for Mark to hear, --

'Livington? Is this then country also? As I am going to visit the graves of my ancestors, I suppose I ought to visit those of hers.'

Mark caught the words which he was not enabled to -- 'Eh? Sir, do you belong to these parts?'

'My family, I believe, lived in the neighbourhood of Whithorn, at a place called Stan --'

'I'm sure! Old farm-house now, fine old --' saying in it, though the old family must have been, a church full of their monuments. 'Hum, - ha! Well! that's pleasant work! I've often heard there were good old families away there in New England, never thought that there were Whithorn people among them! Hum! well! the world's not so large as people think, after all. And you spoke of the Livingtons! They are great folks here - or were --' He was going to rattle on, but he saw a pained expression on both the travellers' faces, and Stangrave stopped him somewhat abruptly.

'I know nothing of them, I assure you, or they of me. Your country here is certainly charming, and shows little of those signs of decay which some people in America impute to it.'

'Decay?' Mark went off at once. 'Decay! I longed for it! There's life in the old dog yet, sir! and old pigs are looking up since free trade and emigration. The upland and high wages now, and instead of hinds going out of cultivation, as they thought, bosh! there's a greater breadth down in what in the vale now than there ever was, and look at the roofs! Farmers must farm now, or sink, and, by George! they are farming, like sensible fellows, and a fig for that old grimy ghost of Protection! There was a fellow came down from the Cotton - you know what that is?' Stangrave bowed, and shrilled assent. 'From the Cotton, sir, two years since, and tried it on, till he fell in with old Mark. I told him a thing or two, among the rest, told him to his face that he was a liar - for he wanted to make farmers believe they were ruined, when he knew they were not, and that he'd got 'em back Protection, when he knew that he couldn't -- and what's more he didn't mean to. So he cut up rough, and wanted to call me out.'

'Did you get?' asked Stangrave, who was fast becoming amused with his man.

'I told him that that wasn't my line, unless he'd try Eley's greens at forty yards, and then I was his man! but if he had a finger on me, I'd give him as sound a horse-whipping, old as I am, as ever man had in his life. And so I would!' And Mark looked complacently at his own broad shoulders. 'And since then, my lord, and I have had it all our own way, and Munchampstead and Co. is the only firm in the 'What's become of a Lord Munchampstead, who used to live somewhere hereabouts? I used to meet him at Rome.'

'Rome?' said Mark solemnly. 'Yes, he was too fond of Rome, awhile back. Can't see what people want running into foreign parts to look at those poor idolaters, and then Punch and Judy plays. Pray for 'em, and keep clear of them, is the best rule. But he has married my lord's youngest daughter, and three pretty children he has, - ducks of children. Always comes to see me in my shop, when he drives into town. Oh! - he's doing pretty well. One of these new between-the-stools, Peaches they call them, - hope they'll be as good as the main. However, he's a free trader, because he can't help it. So we have his votes, and as to his Conservatism, let him conserve hops and haws if he chooses, like a politician. After all, why pull down anything, when it's tumbling on your head? By the bye, sir, as you're a man of money, there's that Stangrave and firm in the market now. Pretty little investment - I'd see that you got it cheap, and my lord wouldn't lad, against you, of course, as you're a liberal all Americans say, I suppose. And so you'd oblige us, as well as yourself, for it would give us another vote for the county.'

'Upon my word you tempt me. But I do not think that this is just the moment for an American to desert his own country and settle in England. I should not be here now, had I not this autumn done all I could for America in America, and so crossed the sea to save her, if possible, in England.'

'Well, perhaps not, especially at you're a freemason.'

'I am, I assure you.'

'Thought as much, by your looks. Don't see what else an honest man can be just now.'

Stangrave laughed. 'I hope every one thinks so in England.'

'Just as for that, sir! We know a man when we see him here, I hope they'll do the same across the water.'

There was silence for a minute or two, and then Mark began again.

'Look! - there's the farm, that's my lord's. I should like to show you the shorthorns there, sir! all my Lord Duncie's and Sir Edward Knightley's stock. Bought a bull calf of him the other day myself for a cool hundred odd fool that I am. Never mind spreads the word. And here are mules - four pair of new stones. Old What don't know her self again. But I dare say they look smart enough to you, sir, after your American water power.'

'What of that? It is just as honourable in you to make the most of a small river, as in us to make the most of a large one.'

'You speak like a book, sir. By the bye, if you think of taking home a calf or two to improve your New England breed, there me a good many gone across the sea in the last few years. I think we could find you three or four boasties, not so very dear, considering the labour.

'Thanks, but I really am no farmer.'

'Well, no offence, I hope, but I am like your Yankees in one thing, you see, always have an eye to a bit of business. If I didn't, I shouldn't be here now.'

'How very tasteful! our own American shrubs! what a pity that they are not in flower! What is this,' asked Stangrave—'one of your noblemen's parks?'

And they began to run through the cutting in Minchamstead Park, where the owner has concealed the banks of the rail for nearly half a mile in a thicket of azaleas, rhododendrons, and clambering roses.

'Ah! isn't it pretty?' His lordship let us have the land for a song, only bargained that we should keep low, not to spoil his view, and so we did, and he's planted our cutting for us. I call that a present to the county, and a very pretty one too! Ah, give me these new houses that sweep clean!

'Your old brooms, like Lord Vauxhous, were new brooms once, and swept well enough five hundred years ago,' said Stangrave, who had that fatal reverence for English antiquity which sets so gracefully upon many highly educated and far-sighted Americans.

'Worn to the stumps now, too many of them, sir, and want new-heading, as our broomsquines would say, and I doubt whether most of them are worth the cost of a fresh head. Not that I can say that of the young lord. He's foremost in all that's good, if he had but money, and when he hasn't, he gives brains. Gave a lecture in our institute at Whitford, last winter, on the late great Poets. "Shot over my head a little, and other people's too," but my May—my daughter, sir—thought it beautiful, and there's nothing that she don't know.'

'It is very hopeful to see your aristocracy joining in the general movement, and bringing their taste and knowledge to bear on the lower classes.'

'Yes, sir! We're going all right now in the old country. Only have to steer straight, and not put on too much steam. But give me the newcomers, after all. They may be close men of business, how else could one live? But when it comes to giving, I'll back them against the old ones for generosity, or taste either. They've then proper pride, when they get hold of the land, and they like to show it, and quite right they. You must see my little place too. It's not in such bad order, though I say it, and am but a county banker, but I'll back my flowers against half the squires round my May's, that is—and my fruit, too. See, there! There's my lord's new schools, and his model cottages, with more comforts in them, saving the size, than my father's house had, and there's his hammock, as he calls it, for the unmarried men, reading-room and dining-room in common, and a library of books, and a sleeping-room for each.'

'It seems strange to complain of prosperity,' said Stangrave, 'but I sometimes regret that in America there is so little room for the very highest virtues, all are so well off that one never needs to give, and what a man does here for others, they do for themselves.'

'So much the better for them. There are other ways of being generous, besides putting your hand in your pocket, sir! By Jove! there'll be room enough (if you'll excuse me) for an American to do fine things, as long as those poor negro slaves

'I know it, I know it,' said Stangrave, in the tone of a man who had already made up his mind on a painful subject, and wished to be no more of it. 'You will excuse me, but I am come here to learn what I can of England. Of my own country I know enough, I trust, to do my duty in it when I return.'

Mark was silent, seeing that he had touched a tender place, and pointed out one object of interest after another, as they ran through the flat park, past the great house with its Dutch gables, which the eighteenth century had raised above the quiet cell of the Minchamstead recluses.

'It is very ugly,' said Stangrave, and truly.

'Could it be enough, though? and, as somebody said, "people live inside their houses, and not outside 'em." You should see the pictures there, though, while you're in the country. I can show you one or two, too, I hope. Never grudge money for good pictures. The pleasantest furniture in the world, as long as you keep them, and if you're tired of them, always fetch double their price.'

After Minchamstead, the rail leaves the sands and clays, and turns up between the chalk hills, along the large river, which it has reduced useless, save as a superfluous trout stream, and then along Whit, now flowing clearer and clearer, as we approach its springs and the lofty downs. On through more wild meadows, and rows of pollard willow, and peat-purcell with tall golden reeds, and such dykes each in summer a floating flower-bed, while Stangrave looks out of the window, has been lighting up with curiosity.

'How perfectly English! At least, how perfectly un-American! It is just Tennyson's beautiful dream.

"On either side the river he Long fields of barley and of rye,
Which rattle the wheat and meadow below;
And through the middle stream comes by,
To many towers a white

'Why, what is this?' as they stop again at a station, where the board bears, in large letters, 'Shalott.'

'Shalott? Where are the "Four grey walls and four grey towers" which overlook a space of flowers?'

Then, upon the little island, are the castle ruins, now converted into a useful house-museum. 'And the lady?—is that she?'

It was only the miller's daughter, fresh from a boarding-school, gardening in a broad straw hat.

'At least,' said Claude, 'she is tending far prettier flowers than ever the lady saw, while the lady herself, instead of weaving and dreaming, is reading Miss Yonge's novels, and becoming all the wiser thereby, and teaching poor children in Hemmelford National School.'

'And where is her fairy knight?' asked Stungrave, 'whom one half hopes to see riding down from that grand old house which sulks there above among the beech-woods, as if frowning on all the change and civilisation below?'

'You do old Sidriestane injustice. Vieuxbons descends from thence, nowadays, to lecture at localism's institutes, instead of the fairy knight, toiling along in the blazing summer weather, sweating in burning metal, like poor Pallas in his own bull.'

'Then the fairy knight is extinct in England?' asked Stungrave, smiling.

'No man less, only he (not Vieuxbons, but his younger brother) has found a wide awake colder than an iron kettle, and travels by rail when he is at home, and, when he was in the Crimea, rode a shaggy pony, and smoked coffee-dish all through the battle of Inkermann.'

'He showed himself the old Sir Lancelot then,' said Stungrave.

'He did. Wherefore the lady married him when the Guards came home, and he will breed prize pigs, and sit at the board of guardians, and take in the Times, clothed, and in his right mind, for the old Berserk spirit is gone out of him, and he is become respectable, in a respectable age, and is nevertheless just as laconic a fellow as ever.'

'And so all things are changed, except the river, which still -'

Willows whiten, aspens quiver,
Little breezes dash and shiver
On the stream that runneth ever.

'And,' said Claude, smiling, 'the descendants of medieval trout snip at the descendants of medieval fish, spinning about upon just the same sized and coloured wings on which their forfathers spun a thousand years ago, having become, in all that while, neither bigger nor wiser.'

'But is it not a grand thought,' asked Stungrave, 'the silence and permanence of nature and the perpetual flux and noise of human life? - a grand thought that one generation goeth, and another cometh, and the earth abideth for ever?'

'At least it is so much the worse for the poor old earth, if her doom is to stand still, while man improves and progresses from age to age.'

'May I ask one question, sir?' said Stungrave, who saw that their conversation was puzzling their jolly companion. 'Have you heard any news yet of Mr. Thurnall?'

Mark looked him full in the face.

'Did you know him?'

'I did, in past years, most intimately.'

'Then you know the finest fellow, sir, that ever walked mortal earth.'

'I have discovered that, sir, as well as you. I am under obligations to that man which my heart's blood will not repay. I shall make no secret of telling you what they are at a fit time.'

Mark held out his broad red hand and grasped Stungrave's till the joints cracked. His face grew as red as a turkey cock's, his eyes filled with tears.

'His father must hear that! Hang it, his father must hear that! And Grace too!'

'Grace?' said Claude, 'and is she with you?'

'With the old man, the angel! tending him night and day.'

'And as beautiful as ever?'

'Sir!' said Mark solemnly, 'when any one's soul is as beautiful as hers is, one never thinks about her face.'

'Who is Grace?'

'A saint and a heroine!' said Claude. 'You shall know all, for you ought to know. But you have no news of Tom, and I have none either. I am losing all hope now.'

'I'm not, sir!' said Mark fiercely. 'Sir, that boy's not dead, he's not! He's more alive than a cat, and if you know anything of him, you ought to know that.'

'I have good reason to know it, none more but -'

'But, sir. But what? Harm come to him, sir? The Lord wouldn't harm him, for his father's sake, and as for the devil! I tell you, sir, if he tried to fly away with him, he'd have to drop him before he'd gone a mile.' And Mark began blowing his nose violently, and getting so red that he seemed on the point of going into a fit.

'Tell you what it is, gentlemen,' said he at last, 'you come and stay with me, and see his father. It will comfort the old man and will comfort me too, for I get down hearted about him at times.'

'Strange affliction there was about that man,' says Stungrave, softly, to Claude.

'He was like a son to him.'

'No, gentlemen. Mr. Mellot, you don't hint.'

'No, thank you,' said Claude.

'Mr. Stungrave does, I'll warrant.'

'I have at various times, both in England and in Virginia.'

'Ah! Do they keep up the real sport there, eh? Well, that's the best thing I've heard of them. Sir! - my horses are yours.' A friend of that boy, sir, is welcome to lunge the whole lot, and I won't grumble. Three days a week, sir. Breakfast at eight, dinner at 5.30 - none of your late London hours for me, sir, and after it the best bottle of port, though I say it, short of my friend S - - at Reading.'

You must accept,' whispered Claude, 'or he will be angry.'

So Stungrave accepted, and all the more readily because he wanted to hear from the good banker many things about the lost Tom Thurnall.

'Here we are,' cries Mark. 'Now, you must excuse me—see to yourselves. I see to the puppies. Dinner at 5.30, mind! Come along, Goodman, hoy!'

'Is this Whitbury?' asks Stangrave.

It was Whitbury, indeed. Pleasant old town, which slopes down the hillside to the old church, just 'restored,' though, by Lords Munchamstead and Venebians, not without Mark Armsworth's help, to its ancient beauty of grey flint and white church chequer-work, and quaint wooden spire. Pleasant churchyard round it, where the dead lie looking up to the bright southern sun, among huge black yews, upon their knoll of white chalk above the ancient stream. Pleasant white wooden bridge, with its row of arches dropping hints upon the noses of elephantine tourists, or fishing over the rail with crooked piers, while hapless gadgones come dangling upward between stream and sky with a look of sheepish surprise and shame, as of a schoolboy caught stealing apples, in their foolish vagrancy. Pleasant new national schools at the bridge end, whether the mimes scurried at the sound of the swan's bell. Though it be an ugly pole enough of larch red brick, it is doing its work, as Whitbury folk know well by now. Pleasant, too, though still more ugly, those long red arms of new houses which Whitbury is stretching out along its fine turnpikes, especially up to the railway station beyond the bridge, and to the smart new hotel, which hopes (but hopes in vain) to out rival the ancient 'Angler's Rest.' Away thither, and not to the Railway Hotel, they trundle in a fly, leaving Mark Armsworth all but angry because they will not sleep, as well as breakfast, lunch, and dine with him daily, and settle in the good old inn, with its three white gables overhanging the pavement, and its long lattice window barred deep beneath them, like so Stangrave says to a shrewd kindly eye under a bland white forehead.

No, good old inn, not such shall be thy fate as long as trout are trout, and men have wit to catch them. For art thou not a sacred house? Art thou not consecrated to the Whitbury brotherhood of anglers? Is not the wainscot of that long low parlour inscribed with many a famous name? Are not its walls hung with many a famous countenance? Has not its oak-ribbed ceiling rung, for now a hundred years, to the laughter of painters, sculptors, grave divines (unbending at least there), great lawyers, statesmen, wits, even of Foote and Quin themselves, while the sleek landlord wiped the cobwebs off another mug of that grand old port, and took in all the wisdom with a quiet twinkle of his sleepy eye? He rests now, good old man, among the yews beside his forefathers, and on his tomb his lengthy epitaph, writ by himself, for Barker was a poet in his way.

Some people hold the said epitaph to be irreverent, because in a list of Barker's many blessings occurs the profane word 'trout' but those trout, and the custom which they brought him, had made the old man's life comfortable, and enabled him to leave a competence for his children, and why should not a man honestly thank Heaven for that which he knows has done him good, even though it be but fish?

He is gone, but the Whiff is not, nor the Whitbury Club, nor will, while old Mark Armsworth is king in Whitbury, and sits every evening in the May-fly season at the table head, relating good stories of the great anglers of his youth, names which you, reader, have heard many a time, and who could do many things besides handling a fish-line. But though the club is not what it was fifty years ago,—before Norway and Scotland became easy of access, yet it is still an important institution of the town, to the members whereof all good subjects touch their hats, for does not the club bring into the town good money, and take out again only fish, which cost nothing in the breeding? Did not the club present the Town-hall with a portrait of the renowned fishing sculptor? and did it not (only stipulating that the school should be built beyond the bridge to avoid noise) give fifty pounds to the said school but two years ago, in addition to Mark's own hundred?

But enough of this—only may the Whitbury club, in recompense for my thus handling them down to immortality, give me another day next year, as they gave me this, and may the May fly be strong on, and a south west gale blowing!

In the course of the next week, in many a conversation, the three men compared notes as to the events of two years ago, and each supplied the other with new facts, which shall be duly set forth in this tale, saving and excepting, of course, the real reason why everybody did everything. For as everybody knows who has watched life—the fine springs of all human action are generally those which fools will not see, which wise men will not mention, so that in order to present a credible tragedy of Humbly you must always 'omit the part of Humbly' and probably the ghost and the queen into the bargain.

CHAPTER I

POETRY AND PROSE

Now, to tell my story, if not as it ought to be told, at least as I can tell it. I must go back sixteen years, to the days when Whitbury boasted of forty coaches per diem, instead of one railway, and set forth how in its southern suburb there stood two pleasant houses side by side, with their gardens sloping down to the Whiff, and parted from each other only by the high black fruit-wall, through which there used to be a door of communication, for the two occupiers were fast friends. In one of these two houses, sixteen years ago, lived our friend Mark Armsworth, banker, solicitor, land-agent, church warden, guardian of the poor, justice of the peace,—in a word, viceroy of Whitbury town, and far more potent therein than her gracious majesty Queen Victoria. In the other lived Edward Thurnall, esquire, doctor of medicine, and consulting physician of all the country round. These two men were as brothers, and had been as brothers for now twenty years, though no two men could be more different, save in the two common virtues which bound them to each other, and that was, that they both were honest and kind-hearted men. What Mark's character was, and is, I have already shown, and enough of it, I hope, to make my readers like the good old banker—as for Doctor Thurnall, a pious or gentle soul never entered a sick-room, with patient wisdom in his brain and patient tenderness in his heart. Beloved and trusted by rich and poor, he had made to himself a practice large enough to enable him to settle two sons well in his own profession, the third and youngest was still in Whitbury. He was something of a geologist, too, and a botanist, and an antiquarian, and Mark Armsworth, who knew, and knows still, nothing of science looked up to the doctor as an inspired sage, quoted him, defended his opinions, right or wrong, ~~and~~ thrust him forward at public meetings, and in all places and seasons, much to the mock doctor's discomfort.

The good doctor was sitting in his study on the morning on which my tale begins, having just brushed his breakfast, and settled to his microscope in the bay-window, opening on the lawn.

A beautiful October morning it was, one of those in which Dame Nature, healthily tired with the revelry of summer, is composing herself, with a quiet satisfied smile, for her winter's sleep. Sheets of dappled cloud were sliding slowly from the west, long bars of hazy blue hung over the southern chalk downs, which gleamed pearly gray beneath the low south-eastern sun. In the vale below, soft white flakes of mist still hung over the water meadows, and bared the dark trunks of the huge elms and poplars, whose fast yellowing leaves came showering down at every rustle of the western breeze, spotting the grass below. The river swirled along, glossy no more, but dingy gray with autumn rains and rotting leaves. All beyond the golden tides of autumn, bright and peaceful, even in decay, but up the sunny slope of the garden itself, and to the very window-sill, summer still lingered. The beds of red viburns and geraniums were still brilliant, though choked with fallen leaves of acacia and plum, the canary plant, still untouched by frost, twined its delicate green leaves, and more delicate yellow blossoms, through the crimson lacework of the Virginia creeper, and the great yellow nosegay swung its long canes across the window, filling all the air with fruity fragrance.

And the good doctor, lifting his eyes from his microscope, looked out upon it all with a quiet satisfaction, and though his lips did not move, his eyes seemed to be thanking God for it all, and thanking Him, too, perhaps, that he was still permitted to gaze upon that fair world outside. For as he gazed he started, as if with sudden pain, and passed his hand across his eyes, with something like a sigh, and then looked at the microscope no more, but sat, seemingly absorbed in thought, while upon his delicate, frail-worn features, and high, blank, unwrinkled forehead, and the few soft gray locks which not time for he was scarcely fifty-five—but long labour of brain, had spared to him, there lay a hopeful calm, as of a man who had nigh done his work, and felt that he had not altogether done it all, an antinatal calm, resigned, yet full of cheerfulness, which harmonised fitly with the quiet beauty of the decaying landscape before him.

'I say, daddy, you must drop that microscope, and put on your shade. You are running those dear old eyes of yours again, in spite of what Alexander told you.'

The doctor took up the green shade which lay beside him, and replaced it with a sigh and a smile.

'I must use the old things now and then, till you can take my place at the microscope, Tom, or till we have, as we ought to have, a first-rate analytical chemist settled in every county town, and paid, in part at least, out of the county rates.'

The 'Tom' who had spoken was one of two youths of eighteen, who stood in opposite corners of the bay window, gazing out upon the landscape, but evidently with thoughts as different as were their complexions.

Tom was of that bull-terrier type so common in England, sturdy, and yet not coarse, middle-aged, deep-chested, broad shouldered, with small well-kent hands and feet, large jaw, bright gray eyes, crisp brown hair, a heavy projecting brow, his face full of shrewdness and good nature, and of humour withal, which might be at times a little sally and sarcastic, to judge from the glances which he sent forth from the corners of his wicked eyes at his companion on the other side of the window. He was evidently prepared for a day's shooting, in velvet jacket and leather gaiters, and stood feeling about in his pockets to see whether he had forgotten any of his tackle, and muttering to himself amid his whistling, 'Capital day. How the birds will be. Where on earth is old Mark? Why must he wait to smoke his pipe after breakfast? Couldn't he have had it in the t'n up, the blessed old chimney that he is.'

The other lad was somewhat taller than Tom, awkwardly and plainly dressed, but with a highly developed hyacinth turn down collar, and long black curling locks. He was certainly handsome, as far as the form of his features and brow, and would have been very handsome, but for the bad complexion which at his age so often accompanies a sedentary life and a melancholic temper. One glance at his face was sufficient to tell that he was moody, shy, restless, perhaps discontented, perhaps ambitious and vain. He held in his hand a volume of Percy's Reliques, which he had just taken down from Thurnall's shelves, yet he was looking, not at it, but at the landscape. Nevertheless, as he looked, one might have seen that he was thinking not so much of it as of his own thoughts about it. His eye, which was very large, dark, and beautiful, with heavy lids and long lashes, had that dreamy look so common among men of the poetic temperament, conscious of thought, if not conscious of self, and as his face kindled, and his lips moved more and more earnestly, he began muttering to himself half aloud, till Tom Thurnall burst into an open laugh.

'There's Jack at it again! making poetry, I'll bet my head to a China orange.'

'And why not?' said his father, looking up quietly, but reprovably. Jack winced and blushed, and a dark shade of impatience passed across his face.

'Oh! it's no concern of mine. Let everybody please themselves. The country looks very pretty, no doubt, I can tell that, only my notion is, that a wise man ought to go out and enjoy it—as I am going to do—with a gun on his shoulder, instead of poking at home like a yard-dog, and belabouring himself in poetry,' and Tom lifted up his voice into a doleful mawfall's howl.

'Then be as good as your word, Tom, and let every one please themselves,' said the doctor, but the dark youth broke out in sudden passion.

'Mr Thomas Thurnall! I will not endure this! Why are you always making me your butt,—insulting me, sir, even in your father's house? You do not understand me, and I do not care to understand you. "If my presence" is disagreeable to you, I can easily relieve you of it!' and the dark youth turned to go away, like Naaman, in a rage.

'Stop, John,' said the doctor. 'I think it would be the more courteous plan for Tom to relieve you of his presence. Go and find Mark, Tom, and please to remember that John Briggs is my guest, and that I will not allow any rudeness to him in my house.'

'I'll go, gladly, to the world's end, if you like, provided you won't ask me to write poetry. But Jack takes offence so soon. Give us your hand, old tinder-box! I meant no harm, and you know it.'

John Briggs took the proffered hand silkily enough, and Tom went out of the glass door, whistling as merry as a cricket.

'My dear boy,' said the doctor, when they were alone, 'you must try to curb this temper of yours. Don't be angry with me, but—'

'I should be an ungrateful brute if I was, sir. I can bear anything from you. I ought to, for I owe everything to you, but—'

'But my dear boy—"better is he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city".'

John Briggs tapped his foot on the ground impatiently. 'I cannot help it, sir. It will drive me mad, I think, at times,—this contrast between what I might be, and what I am. I can bear it no longer—mixing mediocres here, when I might be educating myself, distinguishing myself for I can do it, have you not said as much yourself to me again and again?'

'I have, of course, but—'

'But, sir, only hear me. It is in vain to ask me to command my temper while I stay here. I am not fit for this work, not fit for the dull country. I am not appreciated, not understood, and I shall never be, till I can get to London, till I can find congenial spirits, and take my rightful place in the great Parliament of mind. I am Pegasus in harness, here!' cried the vain discontented youth. 'Let me but once get there, amid art, civilisation, intellect, and the company of men like that old Mermaid Club, to hear and to answer—'

"Words,
No noble, and so full of noble flame,
As one had put his whole soul in a jest," and then you shall see whether Pegasus has not wings, and can use them too!' And he stopped suddenly, choking with emotion, his nostrils and chest dilating, his foot stamping impatiently on the ground.

The doctor watched him in a sad smile.

'Do you remember the devil's temptation of our Lord? "Cast thyself down from hence, for it is written, He shall give his angels charge over thee"?''

'I do, but what has that to do with me?'

'Throw away the safe station in which God has certainly put you, to seek, by some desperate venture, a new, and, as you fancy, a grander one for yourself? Look out of that window, lad, is there not poetry enough, beauty and glory enough, in that sky, those fields—ay, in every fallen leaf, to employ all your powers, considerable as I believe them to be? Why spin the pure, quiet, country life, in which such men as Wordsworth have been content to live and grow old?'

The boy shook his head like an impatient horse. 'Too slow—too slow for me, to wait and wait, as Wordsworth did, through long years of obscurity, misconception, ridicule. No! What I have, I must have at once, and, if it must be, like Chatterton—if only, like Chatterton, I can have my little day of success, and make the world confess that another prout of the beautiful has arisen among men.'

Now, it can scarcely be denied that the good doctor was guilty of a certain amount of weakness in listening patiently to all this rant. Not that the rant was very blamable in a lad of eighteen, for have we not all, while we are going through our course of Shelley, talked very much the same abominable stuff, and thought ourselves the grandest fellows upon earth, on account of that very length of ear which was patent to all the world save our precious selves, blinded by our self-conceit, and wondering in wrath why everybody was laughing at us? But the truth is, the doctor was easy and indulgent to a fault, and dreaded nothing so much, save telling a lie, as hurting people's feelings, beside, as the acknowledged wise man of Whitbury, he was a little proud of playing the Mæcenas, and he had, and not unjustly, a high opinion of John Briggs's powers. So he had lent him books, corrected his taste in many matters, and, by dint of petting and humouring, had kept the wayward youth half a dozen times from running away from his father, who was an apothecary in the town, and from the general practitioner, Mr Bolus, under whom John Briggs fulfilled the office of co-assistant with Tom Thurnall. Plenty of trouble had both the lads given the doctor in the last five years, but of very different kinds. Tom, though he was in everlasting hot water, as the most incorrigible scapegrace for ten miles round, contrived to confine his naughtiness strictly to play-hours, while he learnt everything which was to be learnt with marvellous quickness, and so ably fulfilled the ideal of a bottle boy (for of him, too, as of all things, I presume, an ideal exists eternally in the supra-sensual Platonic universe), that Bolus told his father, 'In hours, so he takes care of my business as well as I could myself, but out of hours, sir, I believe he is possessed by seven devils.'

John Briggs, on the other hand, aimed in the very opposite direction. Too proud to learn his business, and too proud also to play the scapegrace as Tom did, he neglected alike work and amusement for lazy mooming over books, and the dreams which books called up. He made perpetual mistakes in the shop, and then considered himself mislaid by an 'inferior spirit,' if poor Bolus called him to account for it. Indeed, had it not been for many applications of that 'precious oil of unity,' with which the good doctor daily anointed the creaking wheels of Whitbury society, John Briggs and his master would have long ago 'broken out of gear, and parted company in mutual wrath and tury. And now, indeed, the critical moment seemed come at last, for the lad began afresh to declare his deliberate intention of going to London to seek his fortune, in spite of parents and all the world.

'To live on here, and never to rise, perhaps, above the post of correspondent to a country newspaper! To publish a volume of poems by subscription and have to go round, hat in hand, begging five shillings' worth of patronage from every stupid country squire intolerable! I must go! Shakespeare was never Shakespeare till he fled from miserable Stratford, to become at once the friend of Sidney and Southampton.'

'But John Briggs will be John Briggs still, if he went to the moon,' shouted Tom Thurnall, who had just come up to the window. 'I advise you to change that name of yours, Jack, to Sidney, or Percy, or Walker if you like, anything but the illustrious surname of Briggs the osseuer!'

'What do you mean, sir?' thundered John, while the doctor himself jumped up, for Tom was red with rage.
T. Y. A.

'What is this, Tom?'

'What's that?' screamed Tom, bursting, in spite of his passion, into tears of laughter. 'What's that?' and he held out a phial. 'Smell it! taste it! Oh, if I had but a gallon of it to pour down your throat! That's what you brought Mark Arnsworth last night, instead of his cough mixture, while your brains were wool-gathering after poetry!'

'What is it?' gasped John Briggs.

'Miss Twiddle's black dose, — strong enough to rive the gizzard out of an old cock!'

'It's not!'

'It is!' roared Mark Arnsworth from behind, as he rushed in, in shooting-jacket and gaiters, his red face redder with fury, his red whiskers standing on end with wrath like a tiger's, his left hand upon his hairless hypogastric region, his right brandishing an empty glass, which smelt strongly of brandy and water. 'It is! And you've given me the cholera, and spoilt my day's shooting, and if I don't serve you out for it there's no law in England!'

'And spoilt my day's shooting, too, the first I shall get before I'm off to Paris! To have a day in Lord Muchminstead's preserves, and to be baulked of it in this way!'

John Briggs stood as one astounded.

'If I don't serve you out for this!' shouted Mark.

'If I don't serve you out for it!' You shall never hear the last of it!' shouted Tom. 'I take to writing, after all. I'll put it in the papers. I'll make the name of Briggs the persecutor in abomination in the land!'

John Briggs turned smilled.

'Well!' said Mark, 'I must spend my mooming at home, I suppose. So I shall just sit and chat with you, doctor.'

'And I shall go and play with Molly,' said Tom, and walked off to Arnsworth's garden.

'I don't care for myself so much,' said Mark, 'but I'm sorry the boy's lost his last day's shooting.'

'Oh, you will be well enough by noon, and can go then, and as for the boy, it is just as well for him not to grow too fond of sports in which he can never indulge.'

'Never indulge? Why not? He vows he'll go to the Rocky Mountains, and shoot a grizzly bear, and he'll do it!'

'He has a great deal to do before that, poor fellow, and a great deal to learn!'

'And he'll learn it! You're always down-hearted about the boy, doctor!'

'I can't help feeling the parting with him, and for Paris, too, such a seat of temptation. But it is his own choice, and, after all, he must see temptation wherever he goes!'

'Bless the man! if a boy means to go to the land, he'll go just as easily in Whitbury as in Paris. Give the lad his head, and never let him fall on his legs like a cat, I'll warrant him, whatever happens. He's as steady as old Tim,

I tell you, there's a gray head on green shoulders there'

'Steady!' said the doctor, with a smile and a shrug

'Steady, I tell you, at heart, as prudent as you or I, and never lost you a farthing, that you know. Hang good boys! I gave me one who knows how to be naughty in the right place, I wouldn't give sixpence for a good boy. I never was one myself, and have no faith in them. Give me the lad who has more steam up than he knows what to do with, and must needs blow off a little in larks. When once he settles down on the rail, it'll send him along as steady as a luggage train. Did you never hear a locomotive puffing and roaring before it gets under way? Well, that's what your boy is doing. Look at him now, with my poor little Molly.'

Tom was cantering about the garden with a little weakly child of eight in his arms. The little thing was looking up in his face with delight, screaming at his jokes.

'You are right, Mark, the boy's heart cannot be in the wrong place while he is so fond of little children.'

'Poor Molly! How she'll miss him! Do you think she'll ever walk, doctor?'

'I do not.'

'Hm! ah! well! if she grows up, doctor, and don't go to join her poor dear mother up there, I don't know that I'd wish her a better husband than your boy.'

'It would be a poor enough match for her.'

'But! she'll have the money, and he the brains. Mark my words, doctor, that boy'll be a credit to you, he'll make a name in the world, or I know nothing. And if his fancy holds seven years hence, and he wants still to turn traveller, let him. If he's inclined to go round the world, I'll back him to get somehow or other, or I'll eat my head, Ned Thurnall.'

The doctor acquiesced in this hopeful theory, partly to save an argument, for Mark's reverence for his opinion was confined to scientific matters, and he made up to his own self-respect by patronising the doctor, and, indeed, taking him sometimes pretty sharply to task on practical matters.

'Best fellow alive is Thurnall, but not a man of business, poor fellow. None of your gentlemen are. Don't know what he'd do without me.'

So Tom curled May about all the morning, and went to Much unstead in the afternoon, and got three hours' good shooting, but in the evening he vanished, and his father went into Arisworth's to look for him.

'Why do you want to know where he is?' replied Mark, looking sly. 'However, as you can't stop him now, I'll tell you. He is just about this time sewing up Briggs's coat-sleeves, putting copperas into his water-jug and powdered galls on his towel, and making various other little returns for this morning's favour.'

'I dislike practical jokes.'

'So do I, especially when they come in the form of a black dose. Sit down, old boy, and we'll have a game at cribbage.'

In a few minutes Tom came in. 'Here's a good riddance. The poisoner has fabricated his pilgrim's staff, to speak scientifically, and perambulated his calcareous strata.'

'What!'

'Cut his stick, and walked his chalks, and is off to London.'

'Poor boy,' said the doctor, much distressed.

'Don't cry, daddy, you can't bring him back again. He's been gone these four hours. I went to his room at Bolus's about a little business, and saw at once that he had packed up, and curled off all he could. And, looking about, I found a letter directed to his father. So to his father I took it, and really I was sorry for the poor people. I left them all crying in choirs.'

'I must go to them at once,' and up rose the doctor.

'He's not worth the trouble you take for him—the addle-headed, ill-tempered covecomb,' said Mark. 'But it's just like your soft heartedness. Tom, sit down, and finish the game with me.'

Tom rushed from Whitbury, with all his aspirations, poor John Briggs, and gave an occasional letter to his parents, telling them that he was alive and well, and heard anything of him for many a year. The doctor tried to find him out in London, again and again, but without success. His letters had no address upon them, and no clue to his whereabouts could be found.

And Tom Thurnall went to Paris, and became the best pistol-shot and billiard player in the Quarter Latin, and then went to St. Mary's Hospital in London, and became the best boxer therein, and captain of the eight-oar, besides winning prizes and certificates without end, and becoming in due time the most popular house surgeon in the hospital. But nothing could keep him permanently at home. Still dining in London he would not settle down in a country practice he would not. So he started forth into the wide world with nothing but his wife and his secure, is anatomy professor to a new college in some South American republic. Unfortunately, when he got there, he found that the annual revolution had just taken place, and that the party who had founded the college had been killed the week before. Whereat he whistled, and started off again, no man knew whither.

'Having got round half the world, daddy,' he wrote home, 'it's hard if I don't get round the other half. So don't expect me till you see me, and take care of your dear old eyes.'

With which he vanished into infinite space, and was only heard of by occasional letters dated from the Rocky Mountains (where he shot a grizzly bear), the Spanish West Indies, Otaheite, Singapore, the Falkland Islands, and all manner of unexpected places, sending home valuable notes (sometimes accompanied by valuable specimens), zoological and botanical, and informing his father that he was doing very well, that work was plentiful, and that he always found two fresh jobs before he had finished one old one.

His eldest brother, John, died meanwhile. His second brother, William, was in good general practice in Manchester. His father's connections supported him comfortably, and if the old doctor ever longed for Tom to come home, he never hinted it to the wanderer, but bade him go on and prosper, and become (which he gave high promise of becoming) a distinguished man of science. Nevertheless the old man's heart sank at last, when month after month and at last two full years, had passed without any letter from Tom.

At last, when full four years were passed and gone since Tom started for South America, he descended from the box of the day-mail, with a serene and healthful countenance, and with no more look of interest in his face than if he had been away on a two days' visit, shouldered his carpet-bag, and started for his father's house. He stopped, however, as there appeared from the inside of the mail a face which he must surely know. A seigneur's old man that was none other than John Briggs. But how altered! He had grown up into a very handsome man—tall and delicate-featured, with long black curls and a black moustache. There was a slight stoop about his shoulders, as of a man accustomed to too much sitting and writing, and he carried an eye-glass, whether for fashion's sake, or for his eyes' sake, was uncertain. He was wrapped in a long Spanish cloak, new and good, wore well-cut trousers, and (what Tom, of course, examined carefully) French boots, very neat, and very thin. Moreover, he had lavender kid gloves on. Tom looked and wondered, and walked half round him, sniffing like a dog when he examines into the character of a fellow-dog.

'Him! his mark seems to be at present P P—prosperous party—so there can be no harm in renewing our acquaintance. What trade on earth does he live by, though? Editor of a newspaper? or keeper of a gambling-table? Begging his pardon, he looks a good deal more like the latter than the former. However—'

And he walked up and offered his hand, with 'How d'ye do, Briggs? Who would have thought of our falling from the skies against each other in this fashion?'

Mr Briggs hesitated a moment, and then took coldly the offered hand.

'Excuse me, but the circumstances of my visit here are too painful to allow me to wish for society.'

And Mr Briggs withdrew, evidently glad to escape.

'Has he vamped with the contents of a till, that he wishes so for solitude?' asked Tom, and, shouldering his carpet-bag a second time, with a grim inward laugh, he went to his father's house, and hung up his hat in the hall, just as if he had come in from a walk, and walked into the study, and not finding the old man, stepped through the garden to Mark Armaworth's, and in at the drawing-room window, frightening out of her wits a short, pale, ugly girl of seventeen, whom he discovered to be his old play-fellow, Mary. However, she soon recovered her equanimity—he certainly never lost his.

'How d'ye do, darling? How you are grown! and how well you look! How's your father? I hadn't anything particular to do, so I thought I'd come home and see you all, and get some fishing.'

And Mary, who had longed to throw her arms round his neck, as of old, and was restrained by the thought that she was grown a great girl now, called in her father and all the household, and after a while the old doctor came home, and the fatted calf was killed, and all made merry over the return of this altogether unrepentant prodigal son, who, whether from affection, or from that blunted sensibility which often comes by continual change and wandering, took all their affection and delight with the most provoking coolness.

Nevertheless, though his feelings were not 'demonstrative,' as fine ladies say nowadays, he evidently had some left in some corner of his heart, for after the fatted calf was eaten, and they were all settled in the doctor's study, it came out that his carpet-bag contained little but presents, and those valuable ones—rare minerals from the Ural for his father, a pair of Circassian pistols for Mark, and for little Mary, to her astonishment, a Russian malachite bracelet, at which Mary's eyes opened wide, and old Mark said:

'Pretty fellow you are, to go fooling your money away like that! What did that gunrack cost, pray, sir?'

'That is no concern of yours, sir, or mine either, for I didn't pay for it.'

'Oh!' said Mary doubtfully.

'No, Mary—I killed a giant, who was carrying off a beautiful princess, and thus you see, he wore as a ring on one of his fingers, so I thought it would just suit your wrist.'

'Oh, Tom—Mr Thrumall—what nonsense!'

'Come, come,' said his father, 'instead of telling us these sort of stories, you ought to give an account of yourself as you seem quite to forget that we have not heard from you for more than two years.'

'When I wrote,' said Tom, 'whenever I could. However, you can have all my letters in one now.'

So they sat round the fire, and Tom gave an account of himself, while his father marked with pride that the young man had grown and strengthened in body and in mind, and that under that nonchalant, almost cynical outside, the heart still beat honest and kindly. For before Tom began, he would needs draw his chair closer to his father's, and half-whispered to him,—

'This is very jolly. I can't be sentimental, you know. Knocking about the world has beat all that out of me—but it is very comfortable, after all, to find oneself with a dear old daddy and a good coal fire.

'Which of the two could you best do without?'

'Well, one takes things as one finds them. It don't do to look too deeply into one's feelings. Like chemicals, the more you analyse them, the worse they smell.'

So Tom began his story.

'You heard from me at Bombay, after I'd been up to the Himalaya with an old Munjeem's friend.'

'Yes.'

'Well, I worked my way to Suez on board a ship whose doctor had fallen ill, and then I must needs see a little of Egypt, and there rubbed was I, and nearly murdered too, but I took a good deal of killing.'

'I'll warrant you do,' said Mark, looking at him with pride.

'So I heggled my way to Cairo, and there I picked up a Yankee—a New Yorker, made of money, who had a yacht at Alexandria, and travelled en prime—and I thought would be him but I must go with him to Constantinople, but there he and I quarrelled more fools, both of us! I wrote to you from Constantinople.'

'We never got the letter.'

'I can't help that. I wrote. But there I was on the wide world again. So I took up with a Russian prince, whom I met at a gambling table in Pera, a mere boy, but such a plucky one, and went with him to Circassia, and up to Astrakhan, and on to the Kughris steppe, and there I did see snakes.'

'Snakes!' says Mary. 'I should have thought you had seen plenty of Indian snakes.'

'Yes, Mary! but these were snakes spiritual and unphonetic. For, poking about where we had no business, Mary, the Tartars caught us, and tied us to their horses' tails, after giving me this scar across the cheek, and taught us to drink mares' milk, and to do a good deal of dirty work besides. So there we stayed with them six months, and observed their manners, which were none, and their customs, which were disgusting, as the midshipman said in his diary, and had the honour of visiting a most little place in No-man's Land, called Khiva, which you may find in your atlas, Mary, and at very nearly being sold for slaves into Persia, which would not have been pleasant, and at last, Mary, we ran away—or rather, rode away, on two razor-backed Cossack ponies and got back to Russia, and Orenburg, for which cannot your atlas again, so the young prince was restored to the bosom of his afflicted family, and a good deal of trouble I had to get him safe there, for the poor boy's health gave way. They wanted me to stay with them, and offered to make me my fortune.'

'I'm so glad you didn't,' said Mary.

'Well—I wanted to see little Mary again, and two worthy old gentlemen beside, you see. However, these Russians are generous enough

They filled my pockets, and heaped me with presents, that bracelet among them. What's more, Mary, I've been introduced to old Nick himself, and can testify, from personal experience, to the correctness of Shakespeare's opinion that the prince of darkness is a gentleman.'

'And now you are going to stay at home?' asked the doctor.

'Well, if you'll take me in, daddy, I'll send for my traps from London, and stay a month or so.'

'A month,' cried the forlorn father.

'Well, daddy, you see, there is a chance of more fighting in Mexico, and I shall see such practice there, besides meeting old friends who were with me in Texas. And—and I've got a little commission, too, down in Georgia, that I should like to go and do.'

'What is that?'

'Well, it's a long story and a sad one, but there was a poor Yankee sergeant with the army in Circassia—a Southerner, and a very good fellow, and he had taken a fancy to some colored girl at home—poor fellow, he used to go half mad about her sometimes, when he was talking to me, for fear she should have been sold. So it is the New Orleans market, or some other devilry, and what? I say to come to him? Well, he got his mittens by one of Schamyl's bullets, and, when he was dying, he made me promise (I hadn't the heart to refuse) to take all his savings, which he had been hoarding for years for no other purpose, and see if I couldn't buy the girl, and get her away to Canada. I was a fool for promising. It was no concern of mine, but the poor fellow wouldn't die in peace else. So what must be, must.'

Oh, gu! gu!" said Mary. 'You will let him go, Doctor Thorneil, and set the poor old free?' 'Think how dreadful it must be to be a slave.'

'I will, my little Miss Mary, and for more reasons than you think of. Little do you know how dreadful it is to be a slave.'

'Hum!' said Mark Amisworth. 'That's a queer story, Tom, have you got the poor fellow's money? Didn't lose it when you were taken by those Tartars?'

'Not I. I wasn't so green as to carry it with me. It ought to have been in England six months ago. My only fear is, it's not enough.'

'Hum!' said Mark. 'How much more do you think you'll want?'

'Heaven knows. There is a thousand dollars, but it she be half as beautiful as poor Wyse used to say she was, I may want more than double that.'

'If you do, pay it, and I'll pay you again. No, by George!' said Mark, 'no one shall say that while Mark Amisworth had a dollar at his bankers' he let a poor girl—well, need I bring Mary's presence, he finished his sentence by sundry stamps and thumps on the table.

'You would soon exhaust your balance if you set to work to free all poor girls who are in the same case in Georgia,' said the doctor.

'Well, what of that? Then I don't know of, and so I ain't responsible for them, but this one I do know of, and so—there, I can't aigne, lint, Tom, if you want the money, you know where to find it.'

'Very good. By the bye I forgot it till this moment—who should come down in the coach with me but the lost John Briggs.'

'He is come too late, then?' said the doctor. 'His poor father died this morning.'

'Ah! then Briggs knew that he was ill? That explains the Manfredian mystery and gloom with which he greeted me.'

'I cannot tell. He has written from time to time, but he has never given any address, so that no one could write in return.'

'He may have known. He looked very downcast. Perhaps that explains his cutting me dead.'

'Cut you?' cried Mark. 'I dare say he's been doing something he's ashamed of, and don't want to be recognised. That fellow has been after me good all this while, I'll warrant. I always say he's connected with the swell mob, or crummed at a gambling-table, or something of that kind. Don't you think it's likely, now?'

Mark was in the habit of so saying for the purpose of making the doctor—who held steadily to his old belief, that John Briggs was a very clever man, and would turn up some day as a distinguished literary character.

'Well,' said Tom, 'honest or not, he's thriving, came down inside the coach, dressed in the distinguished foreign style, with lavender kid gloves, and French boots.'

'Just like a swell pickpocket,' said Mark. 'I always told you so, Thurnall.'

'He had the old Byron collar, and Raphael hair, though.'

'Nasty, effeminate, un-English foppery,' grumbled Mark, 'so he may be in the scribbling line after all.'

'I'll go and see if I can find him,' quoth the doctor.

'Bother you,' said Mark, 'always running out at night after somebody else's business, instead of having a jolly evening. You stay, Tom, like a sensible fellow, and tell me and May some more travellers' lies. Had much sporting, boy?'

'Hun! I've shot and hunted every beast, I think, shootable and huntable, from a hummingbird to an elephant, and I had some splendid fishing in Canada, but, after all, give me a Wiltshire trout, on a single-handed Chevalier. We'll at them to-morrow, Mr. Armsworth.'

'We will, my boy! I never so many fish in the river as this year, or in season so early.'

The good doctor returned, but with no news, which could throw light on the history of the now mysterious Mr. John Briggs. He had locked himself into the room with his father's corpse, evidently in great excitement and grief, spent several hours in walking up and down there alone, and had then gone to an attorney in the town, and settled everything about the funeral 'in the handsomest way,' said the man of law, 'and was quite the gentleman in his manner, but not much of a man of business, never had even thought of looking for his father's will, and was quite surprised when I told him that there ought to be a fair sum—eight hundred or a thousand, perhaps—to come in to him, if the stock and business were properly disposed of. So he went off to London by the evening mail, and told me to address him at the post-office in some street off the Strand. Queer business, Mr. wa't it?'

John Briggs did not reappear till a few minutes before his father's funeral, witnessed the ceremony evidently with great sorrow, bowed off skulkingly all who attempted to speak to him, and returned to London by the next coach, leaving matter for much babble among all Wiltshire gossip. One thing at least was plain, that he wished to be forgotten in his native town, and forgotten he was, in due course of time.

Tom Thurnall stayed his month at home, and then went to America, whence he wrote home, in about six months, a letter, of which only one paragraph need interest us.

'Toll Mark I have no need for his dollars. I have done the deed, and, thanks to the underground railway, done it nicely gratis, which was both cheaper than buying her, and infinitely better for me, so that she has all poor Wye's dollars to start with afresh in Canada. I write this from New York. I could accompany her no further, for I must get back to the South in time for the Mexican expedition.'

Then came a long and anxious silence, and then a letter, not from Mexico, but from California, one out of several which had been posted and then letters more regularly from Australia. Sicken with Californian life, he had crossed the Pacific once more, and was hard at work in the diggings, doctoring and gold-mining by turns.

'A rolling stone gathers no moss,' said his father.

'He has the pluck of a hound, and the cunning of a fox,' said Mark, 'and he'll be in credit to you yet.'

And May prayed every morning and night for her old playfellow, and so the years slipped on till the autumn of 1853.

As no one has heard of Tom now for eight months and more (the pulse of Australian postage being of a somewhat intermittent type), we may as well go and look for him.

A sheet of dark rolling ground, quarried into a gigantic rabbit burrow, with hundreds of tents and huts dotted about among the heaps of rubbish, dark overgreen forests in the distance, and, above all, the great volcanic mountain of Banuoyong towering far aloft—these are the 'Black Hills of Ballarat', and that windlass at that shaft's mouth belongs in part to Thomas Thurnall.

At the windlass are standing two men, whom we may have seen in past years, self-satisfied in countenance, and spotless in array, sauntering down Preshill any July afternoon, or lounging in Haggis's stable-yard at Cambridge any autumn morning. Alas! how changed from the fast young undergraduates, with powers of enjoyment only equalled by their powers of running into debt, are those two black-bearded and mud-bespattered ruffians, who once were Smith and Brown of Trinity. Yet who need pity them, as long as they have stouter limbs, healthier stomachs, and clearer consciences than they have had since they left Eton at seventeen? Would Smith have been a happier man as a briefless barrister in a dingy hulk of law, peering now and then into third-rate London Society, and scribbling for the daily press? Would Brown have been a happier man had he been forced into those holy orders for which he never felt the least vocation, to pay off his college debts out of his curate's income, and settle down on his knees, at last, in the family living of Nonmarsham-cum-Chayhole, and support a wife and five children on five hundred a year, exclusive of rates and taxes? Let them dig, and be men.

The windlass rattles, and the rope goes down. A shout from the bottom of the shaft proclaims all right, and in due time, sitting in the noose of the rope, up comes Thomas Thurnall, bare-footed and bare-headed, in flannel trousers and red jersey, begrimed with slush and mud, with a mahogany face, a brick-red neck, and a lugubrious beard, looking, to use his own expression, 'as jolly as a sandboy.'

'A letter for you, doctor, from Europe.'

Tom takes it, and his countenance falls, for it is black-edged and black-sealed. The handwriting is Mary Arnsworth's.

'I suppose the old lady who is going to leave me a fortune is dead,' says he drily, and turns away to read.

'Bad luck, I suppose,' he says to himself. 'I have not had any for full six months, so I suppose it is time for Dame Fortune to give me a sly stab again. I only hope it is not my father, for, begging the dame's pardon, I can bear any trick of hers but that.' And he sets his teeth doggedly, and reads.

'My dear Mr. Thurnall—My father would have written himself, but he thought, I don't know why, that I could tell you better than he. Your father is quite well in health.'—Thurnall breathes freely again—'but he has had heavy trials since your poor brother William's death.'

Tom opens his eyes and sets his teeth more firmly. 'Will's dead?' 'I suppose there is a letter lost better so, better to have the whole lot of troubles together, and so get them sooner over. Poor Will!'

'Your father caught the scarlet fever from him, while he was attending him, and was very ill after he came back. He is quite well again now, but if I must tell you the truth, the disease has affected his eyes. You know how weak they always were, and how much worse they have grown of late years, and the doctors are afraid that he has little chance of recovering the sight, at least of the left eye.'

'Recovering? He's blind, then.' And Tom set his teeth more tightly than ever. He felt a sob rise in his throat, but choked it down, shaking his head like an impatient bull.

'Wait a bit, Tom,' said he to himself, 'before you have it out with Dame Fortune. There's more behind, I'll warrant. News like this lies in pockets, and not in single nuggets.' And he read on—

'And—for it is better you should know all—something has happened to the railroad in which he had invested so much. My father has lost money in it also, but not much, but I fear that your poor dear father is very much straitened. My father is dreadfully vexed about it, and thinks it all his fault in not having watched the matter more closely, and made your father sell out in time, and he wants your father to come and live with us, but he will not bear of it. So he has given up the old house, and taken one in Water Street, and oh! I need not tell you that we are there every day, and that I am trying to make him as happy as I can, but what can I do?' And then followed kind, womanly, commonplace, which Tom hurried over with three impatient glances.

'He wants you to come home, but my father has entreated him to let you stay. You know, while we are here, he is safe, and my father begs you not to come home, if you are succeeding as well as you have been doing.'

There was much more in the letter, which I need not repeat, and, after all, a short postscript by Mark himself followed—

'Stay where you are, boy, and keep up heart while I live a pound, your father shall have half of it, and you know Mark Arnsworth.'

He walked away slowly into the forest. He felt that the crisis of his life was come, that he must turn his hand henceforth to quite new work, and as he went he 'took stock,' as it were, of his own soul, to see what point he had attained—what he could do.

Fifteen years of adventure had hardened into wrought metal a character never very ductile. Tom was now, in his own way, an altogether accomplished man of the world, who knew (at least in all companies and places where he was likely to find himself) exactly what to say, to do, to make, to seek, and to avoid. Shifty and thifty as old Greek, or modern Scout, there were few things he could not invent, and perhaps nothing he could not endure. He had watched human nature under every disguise, from the pomp of the ambassador to the war-paint of the savage, and formed his own clear, hard, shallow, practical estimate thereof. He looked on it as his raw material, which he had to work up into existence and comfort for himself. He did not wish to live on men, but live by them; he must, and for that purpose he must study them, and especially their weaknesses. He would not cheat them, for there was in him an innate vein of honesty, as surly and explosive, at times, as to give him much trouble. The severest part of his self-education had been the repression of his dangerous inclination to call a sham a sham on the spot, and to answer fools according to their folly. That youthful rashness, however, was now well-nigh subdued, and Tom could flatter and bully also, when it served his turn—as who cannot? Let him that is without sin among my readers cast the first stone. Self-conscious he was, therefore, in every word and action, not from morbid vanity, but a necessary consequence of his mode of life. He had to use men, and therefore to watch how he used them, to watch every word, gesture, tone of voice, and, in all times and places, do the fitting thing. It was hard work, but necessary for a man who stood alone and self-poised in the midst of the universe, fashioning for himself everywhere, just as far as his arm could reach, some not intolerable condition, depending on nothing but himself, and caring for little but himself and the father whom, to do him justice, he never forgot. If I wished to define Tom Thurnall by one epithet, I should call him specially an ungodly man—were it not that scriptural epithets have, nowadays, such a together conventional and official nearness, that one fears to (disturb), using them, some notion quite foreign to the truth. Tom was certainly not one of those ingenuously whom David had to deal with of old, who robbed the widow, and put the fatherless to death. His morality was as high as that of the average, his sense of honour far higher. He was generous and kind-hearted. No one ever heard him tell a lie, and he had a blunt honesty about him, half real, because he liked to be honest, and yet half affected too, because he found it pay in the long run, and because it threw off then guard the people whom he intended to make his tools. But of godliness in its true sense—of belief that any Being above cared for him, and was helping him in the daily business of life—that it was worth while asking that Being's advice, or that any advice would be given if asked for, of any practical notion of a Heavenly Father, or a Divine education—Tom was as ignorant as thousands of respectable people who go to church every Sunday, and read good books, and believe firmly that the Pope is Antichrist. He ought to have learnt it, no doubt, for his father was a religious man, but he had not learnt it, any more than thousands learn it, who have likewise religious parents. He had been taught, of course, the common doctrines and duties of religion; but early remembrances had been rubbed out, as off a schoolboy's slate, by the mere current of new thoughts and objects, in his continual wanderings. Disappointments he had had, and dangers in plenty, but only such as rouse a brave and cheerful spirit to bolder self-reliance and invention, not those deep sorrows of the heart which leave a man helpless in the lowest pit, crying for help from without, for there is none within. He had seen men of all creeds, and had found in all alike (so he held) the many rogues and the few honest men. All religions were, in his eyes, equally true and equally false. Superior morality was owing principally to the influences of race and climate, and devotional experiences (to judge, at least, from American camp-meetings and popish cities) the results of a diseased nervous system.

Upon a man so hard and strong this fearful blow had fallen, and, to do him justice, he took it like a man. He wandered on and on for an hour or more, up the hills, and into the forest, talking to himself.

'Poor old Willy! I should have liked to have looked into his honest face before he went, it only to make sure that we were good friends. I used to plague him sadly with my tricks. But what is the use of wishing for what cannot be? I recollect I had just the same feeling when John died, and yet I got over it after a time, and was as cheerful as if he were alive again, or had never lived at all. And so I shall get over this. Why should I give way to what I know will pass, and is meant to pass? It is my father I feel for. But I couldn't be there, and it is no fault of mine that I was not there. No one told me what was going to happen, and no one could know, so again,—why grieve over what can't be helped?'

And then, to give the lie to all his cool arguments, he sat down among the ferns, and burst into a violent fit of crying. 'Oh, my poor dear old daddy!'

Yes, beneath all the hard crust of years, that fountain of life still lay pure as when it came down from heaven, love for his father.

'Come, come, this won't do, this is not the way to take stock of my goods, either mental or worldly. I can't cry the dear old man out of this scrape.'

He looked up. The sun was setting. Beneath the dark roof of evergreens the eucalyptus boles stood out, like black pillars, black against a background of burning flame. The flying foxes shot from tree to tree, and moths as big as sparrows whirled about the trunks, one moment black against the glare beyond, and vanishing the next, like mips of darkness, into their native gloom. There was no sound of living thing around, save the ghostly rattle of the dead bark tassels which swung from every tree, and, far away, the faint chinking of the diggers at their work, like the rustle of a gigantic ant-hill. Was there one among them all who cared for him? who would not forget him in a week with—'Well, he was pleasant company, poor fellow,' and go on digging without a sigh? What if it were his fate to die, as he had seen many a stronger man, there in that lonely wilderness, and sleep for ever, unhonoured and unknown, beneath that awful forest roof, while his father looked for bread to others' hands?

No man was less sentimental, no man less superstitious, than Thomas Thurnall, but crushed and softened—all but terrified (as who would not have been?)—by that day's news, he could not struggle against the weight of loneliness which fell upon him. For the first and last time, perhaps, in his life, he felt fear, a vague, awful dread of unseen and inevitable possibilities. Why should not calamity fall on him, wave after wave? Was it not falling on him already? Why should he not grow sick to-morrow, break his leg, his neck—why not? What guarantee had he in earth or heaven that he might not be 'smothered out silently,' as he had seen hundreds already, and die and leave no sign? And then spinning up in him at once the intensest yearning after his father and the haunts of his boyhood, and the wildest dread that he should never see them. Might not his father be dead ere he could return? If ever he did return. That twelve thousand miles of sea looked to him a gulf impassable. Oh, that he were safe at home! that he could start that moment! And for one minute a helplessness, as of a lost child, came over him.

Perhaps it had been well for him had he given that feeling vent, and, confessing himself a lost child, cried out of the darkness to a Father, but the next minute he had dashed it proudly away.

'Pretty baby I am! to get frightened, at my time of life, because I find myself in a dark wood—and the sun shining all the while as jolly as ever away there in the west! It is morning somewhere or other now, and it will be morning here again to-morrow. "Good times and bad times, and all times pass over,"—I learnt that lesson out of old Bewick's vignettes, and it has stood me in good stead this many a year, and shall now. Die? Nonsense! I take more killing than that comes to. So for one more bout with old Dame Fortune. If she throws me again, why, I'll get up again, as I have any time these fifteen years. Mark's right! I'll stay here and work till I make a bit, or luck runs dry, and then home and settle, and, meanwhile, I'll go down to Melbourne to-morrow, and send the dear old man two hundred pounds, and then back again here, and to it again.'

And with a faint defiant smile, half bitter and half cheerful, Tom rose and went down again to his mates, and stopped their inquiries by 'What's done can't be mended, and needn't be mentioned, whining won't make me work the harder, and harder than ever I must work.'

Strange it is, how mortal man, 'who cometh up and is cut down like the flower,' can thus harden himself into stonical security, and count on the morrow, which may never come. Yet so it is, and, perhaps, if it were not so, no work would get done on earth,—at least by the many who know not that God is guiding them, while they fancy that they are guiding themselves.

CHAPTER II

STILL LIFE

I MUST now, if I am to bring you to 'Two years ago,' and to my story, as it was told to me, ask you to follow me into the good old West Country, and set you down at the back of an old harbour pier, thirty feet of gray and brown boulders, spotted aloft with bright yellow lichens, and black drops of tar, polished lower down by the surge of centuries, and towards the foot of the wall roughened with crusts of barnacles, and mussel-nests in crack and cranny, and festoons of coarse dripping weed.

On a low rock at its foot, her back resting against the Cylopean wall, sits a young woman of eight-and-twenty, soberly, almost primly dressed, with three or four tiny children clustering round her. In front of them, on a narrow spit of sand between the rocks, a dozen little girls are laughing, romping, and pattering about, turning the stones for 'shannies' and 'bullies,' and other luckless fish left by the tide, while the party beneath the pier wall look steadfastly down into a little rock-pool at their feet, full of the pink and green and purple cut-work of delicate weeds and corals, and starred with great sea-dahlias, crimson and brown and gray, and with the waving snake-larks of the Cerens, pale blue, and rose tipped like the fingers of the dawn. One delicate Melchior is sliding across the pool, by slow paintings of its crystal bell, and on the eyes of the whole group are fixed—for it seems to be the subject of some story which the village schoolmistress is finishing in a sweet, half abstracted voice—

'And so the cruel soldier was changed into a great rough red staghorn, who goes about killing the poor mussels, while nobody loves him, or cares to take his part, and the poor little girl was changed into a beautiful bright jelly-fish, like that one, who swims about all day in the pleasant sunshine, with a red cross stamped on its heart.'

'Oh, mistress, what a pretty story! cry the little ones, with tearful eyes. "And what shall we be changed to when we die?"'

'If we will only be good we shall go up to Jesus, and be beautiful angels, and sing hymns. Would that it might be soon, soon, for you and me, and all!' And she draws the children to her, and looks upward, as if longing to bear them with her aloft.

Let us leave the conversation where it is, and look into the face of the speaker, who, young as she is, has already meditated so long upon the mystery of death that it has grown lovely in her eyes.

Her figure is tall, graceful, and slight, the severity of its outlines suiting well with the severity of her dress, with the brown stuff gown and plain gray whittle. Her neck is long, almost too long, but all defects are forgotten in the first look at her face. We can see it fully, for her bonnet lies beside her on the rock.

The masque, though thin, is perfect. The brow, like that of a Greek statue, looks lower than it really is, for the hair springs from below the bend of the forehead. The brain is very long, and sweeps backward and upward in grand curves, till it attains above the ears a great expanse and height. She should be a character more able to feel than to argue, full of all a woman's veneration, devotion, love of children, perhaps, too, of a woman's anxiety.

The nose is slightly aquiline, the sharp-cut nostrils indicate a reserve of compressed strength and passion, the mouth is delicate, the lips, which are full and somewhat heavy, not from coarseness, but rather from languor, show somewhat of both the upper and the under teeth. Her eyes are bent on the pool at her feet, so that we can see nothing of them but the large sleepy lids, fringed with lashes so long and dark that the eye looks as if it had been painted, in the Eastern fashion, with minium, the dark lashes, dark eyebrows, dark hair, crimped (as West-country hair so often is) to its very roots, increase the almost ghost-like paleness of the face, not sallow, not snow-white, but of a clean, bloodless, waxen hue.

And now she lifts her eyes—dark eyes, of preternatural largeness, brilliant, too, but not with the sparkle of the diaphan, brilliant as deep clear wells are, in which the mellow moonlight sleeps fathom-deep between black walls of rock, and round them, and round the wide-opened lips, and the no eyebrow, and slightly wrinkled forehead, hangs an air of melancholy thought, vague doubt, almost of stultified ten, then that expression passes, and the whole face collapses into a languor of patient sadness, which seems to say, 'I cannot solve the mystery. Let Him solve it as it seems good to Him.'

The pier has, as usual, two stages, the upper and narrower for a public promenade, the lower and broader one for business. Two tough collier lads, strangers to the place, are lounging on the wall above, and begin, out of mere mischief, dropping pebbles on the group below.

'Hillo! you young rascals,' calls an old man lounging like them on the wall, 'if you don't stop that, you're likely to get your heads broken.'

'Will you do it?'

'I would thirty years ago, but I'll find a dozen in five minutes who will do it now. Here, lads! here's two Welsh vagabonds pelting our schoolmistress.'

This is spoken to a group of Sea Titans, who are sitting about on the pier-way behind him, in red caps, blue jackets, striped jerseys, bright brown trousers, and all the picturesque comfort of a fisherman's costume, superintending the mending of a boat.

Up jumped half a dozen, off the logs and bankings, where they have been squatting, doubled up knee to nose, after the fashion of their class, and a volley of execrations, like a storm of grape, almost blows the two offenders off the wall. The holder, however, hurls, anathematising in turn, whereon a black-bearded youth, some six foot four in height, catches up an oar, makes a sweep at the shins of the lad above his head, and brings him writhing down upon the upper pier-way, whence he walks off howling, and muttering threats of 'taking the law.' In vain, there is not a magistrate within ten miles, and custom, lynch-law, and the coastguard lieutenant settle all matters in Aberllynva town, and do so easily enough, for the petty crimes which fill our gaols are all unknown among those honest Vikings' sons, and any man who covets his neighbour's goods, instead of stealing them has only to go and borrow them, on condition, of course, of lending in his turn.

'What's that collier lad hollering about, Captain Willis?' asks Mr Tardrew, steward to Lord Scoutbush, landlord of Aberllynva, as he comes up to the old man.

'Gentleman I'm out him over, for pelting the schoolmistress below here.'

'Serve him right, he'll have to out over that curate next, I reckon.'

'Oh, Mr Tardrew, don't you talk so, the young gentleman is as kind a man as I ever saw, and comes in and out of our house like a lamb.'

'Wolf in sheep's clothing,' growls Tardrew. 'What d'ye think he says to me last week? Wanted to turn the schoolmistress out of her place because she went to chapel sometimes.'

'I know, I know,' replied Willis, in the tone of a man who wished to avoid a painful subject. 'And what did you answer, then, Mr Tardrew?'

'I told him he might if he liked, but he'd make the place too hot to hold him, if he hadn't done it already, with his howlings and his crossings, and his chantings, and his popish Gregories and tells one he's no papist, called him Pope Gregory himself. What do we want with popes' tunes here, instead of the Old Hundred and Martyrdom? I should like to see any pope of the lot make a tune like them.'

Captain Willis listened with a face half sad, half slyly amused. He and Tardrew were old friends, being the two most notable persons in the parish, save Jones the lieutenant, Heale the doctor, and another gentleman, of whom we shall speak presently. Both of them, too, were thorough-going Protestants, and, though Churchmen, walked sometimes into the Buanite chapel on an afternoon, and thought it no sin. But each took the curate's 'Puseyism' in a different way, being two men as unlike each other as one could well find.

Tardrew—steward to Lord Scoutbush, the absentee landlord—was a shrewd, hard bitten, choleric old fellow, of the shape, colour, and consistence of a red brick, one of those English types which Mr Emerson has so well hit off in his rather confused and contradictory Traits—

'He hides virtues under vices, or, rather, under the semblance of them. It is the misshapen, hairy Scandinavian Troll again who lifts the cart out of the mire, or threshes the corn which ten day-labourers could not end, but it is done in the dark, and with muttered maledictions. He is a churl with a soft place in his heart, whose speech is a brush of bitter waters, but who loves to help you at a pinch. He says, No, and serves you, and his thanks disgust you' Snah was Tarlton—a true British bull-dog, who lived pretty faithfully up to his Old Testament, but had, somehow, forgotten the existence of the New.

Willis was a very different and a very much nobler person, the most perfect specimen which I ever have met (for I knew him well, and loved him) of that type of British sailor which good Captain Marryat has painted in his Masterman Ready, and painted far better than I can, even though I do so from life. A tall and graceful old man, though stooping much from lumbago and old wounds, with snow-white hair and whiskers, delicate aquiline features, the manners of a nobleman, and the heart of a child. All children knew that latter fact, and clung to him instinctively. Even 'the Boys,' that terrible Berserk-trike, self-organised, self-dependent, and bound together in common infirmities and the dread of common retribution, who were in Aberlona, as all fishing towns, the terror and terror of all dunces feigns, male and female—even 'the Boys,' I say, respected Captain Willis, so potent was the influence of his gentleness; nailed not up his shutters, nor tied fishing-lis across his doorway, tail-piped out his dog, nor sent his cat to sea on a barrel-stave, put not live eels into his pocket, nor dead dog-fish into his well, yea, even when judgment, too long provoked, made bare her red right hand, and the lieutenant vowed by his commission that he would send half a dozen of them to the treadmill, they would send up a deputation to 'beg Captain Willis to beg the schoolmistress to beg them off.' For between Willis and that fair young creature a friendship had grown up, easily to be understood. Willis was one of those rare natures upon whose purity no mire can cling, who pass through the furnace, and yet not even the smell of fire has passed upon them. Bred, almost born, on board a smuggling cutter, in the old war-times, then hunting, in the old coast-blockade service, the smugglers among whom he had been trained, watching the slow horrors of the Watchmen, fighting under Collingwood and Nelson, and many another valiant captain, lounging away years of temptation on the West-Indian station, as sailing master of a ship-of-the-line, pensioned comfortably now for many a year in his native town, he had been always the same gentle, valiant, righteous man, sober in life, strict in duty, and simple in word, a soul as transparent as crystal, and as pure. He was the oracle of Aberlona now, and even Lieutenant Brown would ask his opinion—non-communished officer though he was—in a time which was all the more patronising, because he stood a little in awe of the old man.

But why, when the boys wanted to be begged off, was the schoolmistress to be their advocate? Because Grace Harvey excused, without intending anything of the kind, an almost mesmerising influence on every one in the little town, Goodness rather than talent had given her wisdom, and goodness rather than courage a power of using that wisdom, which, to those simple, superstitious folk, seemed altogether an inspiration. There was a mystery about her, too, which worked strongly on the hearts of the West-country people. She was supposed to be at times 'not right', and wandering intellect was with them, as with many primitive peoples, an object more of awe than of pity. Her deep melancholy alternated with bursts of wild eloquence, with fantastic fables, with entreaties and warnings against sin, full of such pity and pathos that they melted, at times, the hardest hearts. A whole world of strange tales, half false, half true, had grown up around her as she grew. She was believed to spend whole nights in prayer, to speak with visitors from the other world, even to have the power of scintillating futurity. The intensity of her imagination gave rise to the belief that she had only to will, and she could see whom she would, and all that they were doing, even across the seas; her exquisite sensibility, it was whispered, made her feel every bodily suffering she witnessed as acutely as the sufferer's self, and in the very hush in which he suffered. Her deep melancholy was believed to be caused by some dark fate—by some agonising sympathy with evil-doers, and it was 'me' 'in Aberlona.' 'Don't do that, for poor Grace's sake. She bears the sins of all the parish.'

So it befell that Grace Harvey governed, she knew not how or why, all hearts in that wild simple fishing town. Rough men, fighting on the quay, shook hands at Grace's bidding. Wives who could not hire their husbands from the beer-shop, sent Grace in to fetch them home, sobbed by shame, and wept to the stranger who fancied that her entrance into that noisy den gave him a right to say a rough word to the fair girl. The mudlarks, instead of envying her beauty, made her the confidante of all their loves, for though many a man would gladly have married her, to woo her was more than any dared, and Gentleman Jan himself, the rightful bully of the quay, as being the handsomest and biggest man for many a mile, besides owning a tidy trawler and two good mackerel boats, had said openly, that if any man had a right to her, he supposed he had, but that he should as soon think of asking her to marry him, as of asking the moon.

But it was in the school, in the duty which lay nearest to her, that Grace's inward loveliness shone most lovely. Whatever dark cloud of melancholy lay upon her own heart, she took care that it should never overshadow one of those young innocents, whom she taught by love and ruled by love, always tender, always cheerful, even gay and playful, punishing, when she rarely punished, with tears and kisses. To make them as happy as she could in a world where there was nothing but temptation, and disappointment, and misery, to make them 'fit for heaven,' and then to pray that they might go thither as speedily as possible, this had been her work for now seven years, and that Manichæism which has driven darker and harder natures to destroy young children, that they might go straight to bliss, took in her the form of outpourings of gratitude (when the first natural tears were dried), as often as one of her little lambs was 'delivered out of the miseries of this sinful world.' But as long as they were in the world, she was their guardian angel, and there was hardly a mother in Abberlona who did not confess her debt to Grace, not merely for her children's scholarship, but for their characters.

Frank Headley the curate, therefore, had touched altogether the wrong chord when he spoke of discharging Grace. And when, that same afternoon, he sauntered down to the parsonage, wearied with his parish work, not only did Tardlow stump away in silence as soon as he appeared, but Captain Willis's face assumed a grave and severe look, which was not often to be seen on it.

'Well, Captain Willis?' said Frank, solitary and sad, lounging for a talk with some one, and not quite sure whether he was welcome.

'Well, sir?' and the old man lifted his hat, and made one of his princely bows. 'You look lively, sir, I am afraid you're doing too much.'

'I shall have to do some,' said the curate, his eye glancing towards the schoolmistress, who, disturbed by the noise above, was walking slowly up the beach, with a child holding to every finger, and every fold of her dress.

Willis saw the direction of his eye, and came it once to the point, in his gentle, straightforward fashion.

'I hear you have thoughts of taking the school from him, sir?'

'Why—indeed—I shall be very sorry, but if she will persist in going to the chapel, I cannot overlook the sin of sinning.'

'She takes the children to church twice a Sunday, don't she? And teaches them all that you tell her?'

'Why—yes—I have taken the religious instruction almost into my own hands now.'

Willis smiled quietly.

'You'll excuse an old sailor, sir, but I think that's more than mortal man can do. There's no hour of the day but what she's teaching them something. She's telling them Bible stories now, I'll warrant, if you could hear her.'

Frank made no answer.

'You wouldn't stop her doing that? Oh, sir,' and the old man spoke with a quiet earnestness which was not without its effect, 'just look at her now, like the Good Shepherd with His lambs about His feet, and think whether that's not much too pretty a sight to put an end to, in a poor sinful world like this.'

'It is my duty,' said Frank, hardening himself. 'It pains me exceedingly, Willis, I hope I need not tell you that.'

'If I know aught of Mr. Headley's heart by his ways you needn't mislead, sir.'

'But I cannot allow it. Her mother a class leader among these Dissenters, and one of the most active of them, too. The school next door to her house. The preacher, of course, has influence there, and must have. How am I to instil Church principles into them, if he is counteracting me the moment my back is turned? I have made up my mind, Willis, to do nothing in a hurry. Lady-day is past, and she must go on till Midsummer, then I shall take the school into my own hands, and teach them myself, for I can pay no mistress or master, and Mr. St. Just—'

Frank checked himself as he was going to speak the truth, namely, that his sleepy old absentee rector, Lord Southbush's uncle, would yawn and grumble at the move, and wondering why Frank 'had not the sense to leave all alone,' would give him no manner of assistance beyond hisittance of eighty pounds a year, and five pounds at Christmas to spend on the poor.

'Excuse me, sir, I don't doubt that you'll do your best in teaching, as you always do; but I tell you honestly, you'll get no children to teach.'

'No children?'

'Their mothers know the worth of Grace too well, and the children too, sir, and they'll go to her all the same, do what you will, and never a one of them will enter the church door from that day forth.'

'On their own heads be it!' said Frank, a little testily, 'but I should not have lauded Miss Harvey the sort of person to set up herself in defiance of me.'

'The more reason, sir, if you'll forgive me, for your not putting upon her.'

'I do not want to put upon her or any one. I will do everything I will—I do—work day and night for these people, Mr. Willis. I tell you, as I would my own father. I don't think I have another object on earth—if I have, I hope I shall forget it—than the parish—but Church principles I must carry out.'

'Well, sir, certainly no man ever worked here as you do. If all had been like you, sir, there would not be a Dissenter here now, but excuse me, sir, the Church is a very good thing, and I keep to mine, having served under her Majesty, and her Majesty's forefathers, and learnt to obey orders, I hope, but don't you think, sir, you're taking it as the Pharisees took the Sabbath-day?'

'How then?'

'Why, as if man was made for the Church, and not the Church for man.'

'That is a shrewd thought, at least. Where did you pick it up?'

'Tis none of my own, sir, a bit of wisdom that my man let fall, and it has stuck to me strangely ever since.'

'Your man?'

'Yes, Grace there. I always call her my maid, having no father, poor thing, she looks up to me as one, pretty much—the dear soul. Oh sir! I hope you'll think over this again, before you do anything. It's done in a day but years won't undo it again.

So Grace's sayings were quoted against him. Her power was formidable enough, if she dare use it. He was silent awhile, and then

'Do you think she has heard of this—of my

'Honesty's the best policy, sir, she has, and that's the truth. You know how things get round.'

'Well, and what did she say?'

'I'll tell you her very words, sir, and they were these, if you'll excuse me. "Poor dear gentleman," says she, "if he thinks chapel-going so wrong, why does he dare drive folks to chapel? I wonder, every time he looks at that deep sea, he don't remember what the Lord said about it, and those who canse his little ones to offend."

Frank was somewhat awed. The thought was new, the application of the text, as his own scholarship taught him, even more exact than Grace had fancied.

'Then she was not angry?'

'She, sir? You couldn't anger her if you tore her in pieces with hot pincers, as they did those old martyrs she's always telling about.'

'Good-bye, Willis,' said Frank, in a hopeless tone of voice, and sauntered to the pier-end, down the steps, and along the lower pier-way, burdened with many thoughts. He came up to the knot of chatting sailors. Not one of them touched his cap, or moved out of the way for him. The boat lay almost across the whole pier-way, and he stopped, awkwardly enough, for there was not room to get by.

'Will you be so kind as to let me pass?' asked he, meekly enough. But no one stirred.

'Why don't you get up, Tom?' asked one.

'I be laze.'

'So be I.'

'The gentleman can step over me, if he likes,' said big Jan, a proposition the impossibility whereof raised a horse-laugh.

'Am't you ashamed of yourselves, lads?' said the severe voice of Willis, from above. The men rose sulkily, and Frank hastened on, as ready to cry as ever he had been in his life. Poor fellow! he had been labouring among these people for now twelve months, as no man had ever laboured before, and he felt that he had not won the confidence of a single human being,—not even of the old women, who took his teaching for the sake of his charity, and who scouted popery, all the while, in words in which there was no popery, and in doctrines which were just the same, on the whole, as those of the dissenting preacher, simply because he would sprinkle among them certain words and phrases which had become 'suspect,' as party badges. His church was all but empty, the general excuse was, that it was a mile from the town, but Frank knew that that was not the true reason, that all the parish had got it into their heads that he had a leaning to popery, that he was going over to Rome; that he was probably a Jesuit in disguise.

Now, be it always remembered, Frank Headley was a good man, in every sense of the word. He had nothing, save the outside, in common with those undesirable eccentrics who have not been bred by the High Church movement, but have taken refuge in its cracks, as they would have done forty years ago in those of the Evangelical,—youths who hide their crass ignorance and darkness under the cloak of Church infallibility, and having neither wit, manners, learning, humanity, nor any other dignity whereon to stand, talk loud, pour pis aller, about the dignity of the priesthood. Such men Frank had met at neighbouring clerical meetings, over bearing and out-talking the elder and the wise members, and finding that he got no good from them, had withdrawn into his parish work, to eat his own heart, like Bellerophon of old. For Frank was a gentleman, and a Christian, if ever one there was. Dilicate in person, all but consumptive, graceful and refined in all his words and ways, a scholar, elegant rather than deep, yet a scholar still; full of all love for painting, architecture, and poetry, he had come down to bury himself in this remote curacy, in the honest desire of doing good. He had been a curate in a fashionable London church, but finding the atmosphere thereof not over wholesome to his soul, he had had the courage to throw off St. Neponne's, its brotherhoods, sisterhoods, and all its gorgeous and highly-organised appliances for enabling five thousand rich to take tolerable care of two hundred poor, and had fled from 'the holy virgins' (as certain old ladies, who do twice then work with half their noise, call them) into the wilderness of Bethnal Green. But six months' brilliant work there, with gallant men (for there are High Churchmen there who are an honour to England), brought him to death's door. The doctors commanded some soft western air. Frank, as chivalrous as a knight errant of old, would fain have died in his host, but his mother interfered, and he could do no less than obey her. So he had taken this remote West-country curacy, all the more willingly because he knew that nine tenths of the people were Dissenters. To recover that place to the Church would be something worth living for. So he had come, and laboured late and early, and behold, he had failed utterly, and seemed further than ever from success. He had opened, too hastily, a crusade against the Dissenters, and denounced where he should have conciliated. He had overlooked—indeed he hardly knew—the sad truth, that the mere fact of his being a clergyman was no passport to the hearts of his people. For the onrars who preceded him had been an old man, mean, ignorant, intemperate, remaining there simply because nobody else would have him, and given to brandy and water as much as his flock. The rector for the last fifteen years, Lord Seontbush's uncle, was a cypher. The rector before him had notoriously earned the living by a marriage with a lady who stood in some questionable relation to Lord Scoutbush's father, and who had never had a thought above his dinner and his titles, and all that the Aberlva fishermen knew of God or righteousness, they had learnt from the sedes disciples of John Wesley. So Frank Headley had to make up, at starting, the arrears of half a century of base neglect, but instead of doing so, he had contrived to awaken against himself that dogged hatred of popery which lies unarticulate and confused, but deep and firm, in the heart of the English people. Poor fellow! if he made a mistake, he suffered for it. There was hardly a sadder soul than poor Frank, as he went listlessly up the village street that afternoon, to his lodging at Captain Willis's, which he had taken because he preferred living in the village itself to occupying the comfortable refectory a mile out of town.

However, we cannot set him straight,—after all, every man must pursue that office for himself. So the best thing we can do, as we landed, naturally, at the pier head, is to walk up street after him, and see what sort of a place Aberlva is.

Beneath us, to the left hand, is the quay-pool, now lying dry, in which a dozen trawlers are loquacious over their 'cogles' their red sails drying in the sun, the tails of the trawls hauled up to the topmast heads, while the more hasty of their owners are getting on board by ladders, to pack away the said red sails, for it will blow to-night. In the long throws which their keels have left, and in the shallow muddy pools, lie unnumberable fragments of excremented minds (not human ones, pitiful reader, but belonging to the order Pisces, and the family Rana), and some twenty non-excremented ray-dogs and piked dogs (Angler, dog-fish), together with a blue basking shark, at least nine feet long, out of which the kneeling Mr. George Thomas, clothed in pilot cloth patches of every hue, bright scarlet, blue, and brown (not to mention a large square of white canvas which has been let into that part of his trousers which is no appearance), is dissecting the liver, for the purpose of grasping his 'sheaves' with the fragment of thereof. The pools in general are bedded with black mud, and crusted over with oily flakes, which may proceed from the tar on the vessels' sides, and may also from 'decomposing animal matter,' as we euphemise it nowadays. The hot pebbles, at high tide mark, crowned with a long black row of herring and mackerel boats, laid up in ordnance for the present,—are beautifully variegated with mackerels' heads, gurnets' tus, old hag, lobworm, and mussel-boats, and the moulds of a whole ichthyological museum, save at one spot where the Clonca Maxima and Port Esquima of Aberlva town (small enough, considering the place holds fifteen hundred souls) immure themselves in a gray stone arch toward the sea, not untroubled with deasil rats and cats, who, their ancient fend forgotten, combine lovingly at last in increasing the health of the blue translucent urchins who are sailing upon that Acherontic stream bits of board with a feather stuck in it, or of their tiny sisters, who are dancing about in the dirtiest pool among the trawlers in a way which (if your respectable black coat be seen upon the pier) will elicit from one of the balconied windows above, decked with reeking shirts and linen, some such shriek as—

'Patience Penberthy, Patience Penberthy—a! You nasty, dirty, little indecent hussy—a! What be playing in the quay-pool for—a! A jailing up your pesticoats before the quality—a!' Each exclamation being followed with that drowning grunt, with which the West-country folk, after having screamed their lungs empty through their noses, recover their breath for a fresh burst.

Never mind, it is no nosegay, certainly, as a whole—but did you ever see sturdier, rozier, nobler-looking children, rounder faces, raven hair, bright gray eyes, full of fun and tenderness? As for the dirt, that cannot harm them, poor people's children must be dirty—why not? Look on fifty yards to the left. Between two ridges of high pebble bank some twenty yards apart, comes Alva river rushing to the sea. On the opposite ridge, a low white house, with three or four white canvas covered boats, and a flag-staff with sloping cross-yard, betokens the coastguard station. Beyond it rise black jagged hills, mile after mile of iron bound wall and here and there, at the glens' mouths, great banks and dunes of shifting sand. In front of it, upon the beach, are half a dozen great green and gray heaps of Welsh limestone, behind it, at the hill foot, is the lime-kiln, with its white dusty heaps and brown dusty men, its quivering mirage of hot air, its strings of patient hay-mulching donkeys, which look as if they had just awakened out of a flour bin. Above, a green down stretches up to bright yellow firze crofts far aloft. Behind, a reedy marsh, covered with red cattle, paves the valley till it closes in, the steep sides of the hills are clothed in oak and ash covert, in which, three months ago, you could have shot more cocks in one day than you would in Baskin in a year. Pleasant little glimpses there are, too, of gray stone furnaces, nestling among sycamore and birch, bright green meadows, alder-fringed, squares of rich red fallow held, parted by lines of golden firze, all cut out with a peculiar blackness and clearness, soft and tender withal, which betokens a climate surcharged with rain. Only, in the very bosom of the valley, a soft mist hangs, increasing the sense of distance, and softening back one hill and wood behind another, till the great brown moor which backs it all seems to rise out of the empty air. For a thousand feet it ranges up, in huge sheets of brown heather, in gray taurus and screes of granite, all sharp and black-edged against the pale blue sky, and all suddenly cut off above by one long horizontal line of dark gray cloud, which seems to hang there motionless, and yet is growing to whirlwind, and dying to leeward, for ever rushing out of the invisible into night, and into the invisible again, at railroad speed. Out of nothing the moor rises, and into nothing it ascends—a great dark phantom between earth and sky, boding rain and howling tempest, and perhaps fearful wreck—for the ground-swell moans and thunders on the beach behind us, louder and louder every moment.

Let us go on, and up the street, after we have rambled through the usual labyrinth of timber-baulks, rusty anchors, boats which have been dragged, for the purpose of mending and tarring, into the very middle of the road, and old spars stowed under walls, in the vain hope that they may be of some use for something some day, and have stood the stares and welcomes of the livery grooms who are sitting about upon them, black-headed, black-bearded, with ruddy, wholesome faces, and eyes as bright as diamonds, men who are on their feet on ground, and know it, who will not touch their caps to you, or pull the short black pipe from between their lips as you pass, but expect you to prove yourself a gentleman, by speaking respectfully to them, which, if you do, you will find them as hearty, intelligent, brave fellows as ever walked this earth, capable of anything, now working the naval-brigade guns at Sevastopol down to running up to a hundred miles in a cockleshell lugger, to forestall the early mackerel market. God be with you, my brave lads, and with your children after you, for as long as you are what I have known you, Old England will rule the seas, and many a land beside!

But in going up Aberalva Street, you remark several things, first, that the houses were all whitewashed yesterday, except where the snowy white is picked out by buttresses of pink and blue, next, that they all have bright green palings in front, and bright green window-sills and frames, next, that they are all roofed with shining gray slate, and the spaces between the window and the pales flagged with the same, next, that where such space is not flagged, it is full of flowers and shrubs which stand the winter only in our greenhouses. The fuchsias are ten feet high, laden with ripe purple berries running over (for there are no birds to pick them off) and there, in the front of the coast-guard lieutenant's house, in Cobaa mandina, covered with purple claret-glasses, as it has been ever since Christmas for Aberalva knows no winter, and there are grown-up men in it who never put on a skate, or made a snowball in their lives. A most cleanly, bright-coloured, foreign-looking street, is that long straggling one which runs up the hill towards Ponalva Court only remark, that this cleanliness is gained by making the gutter in the middle street the common sewer of the town, and tread clear of cabbage-leaves, pickard bones, et id genus omne. For Aberalva is like Paris (if the answer of a celebrated sanitary reformer to the Emperor be truly reported), 'fair without but foul within'.

However, the wind is blowing dull and hollow from south-west, the clouds are rolling faster and faster up from the Atlantic, the sky to westward is brassy green, the glass is falling fast, and there will be wind and rain enough to-night to sweep even Aberalva clean for the next week.

Grace Harvey sees the coming storm, as she goes slowly homewards, dismissing her little flock, and she lingers long and sadly outside her cottage door, looking out over the fast blackening sea, and listening to the hollow thunder of the ground-swell against the back of the point which shelters Aberalva Cove.

Far away on the horizon, the masts of stately ships stand out against the sky, driving fast to the eastward with shortened sail. They, too, know what is coming, and Grace prays for them as she stands, in her wild way, with half-uttered words.

All those gallant ships, dear Lord! and so many beautiful men in them, and so few of them ready to die, and all those gallant souls going to the war,—Lord, wilt thou not have mercy? Spare them for a little time before—Is not that cruel, man-devouring sea full enough, Lord, and brave men's bones enough, strewn up and down all rocks and sands? And is not that dark place full enough, O Lord, of poor souls that go off in a moment, as my two went? Oh, not to-night, dear Lord! Do not call any one to-night—give them a day more, one chance more, poor fellows—they have had so few, and so many temptations, and, perhaps, no schooling. They go to sea so early, and young things will be young things, Lord! Spare them but one night more—and yet He did not spare my two—they had no time to repent, and have no time for ever, evermore!

And she stands looking out over the sea, but she has lost sight of everything, save her own sad imaginings. Her eyes open wider and wider, as if before some unseen horror, the eyebrows contract upwards, the cheeks sharpen, the mouth parts, the lips draw back, showing the white teeth, as if in intensest agony. Thus she stands long, motionless, awe-frozen, save when a shudder runs through every limb, with such a common sense that 'fair terror' of which Shelley sang—

'Its horror and its beauty are divine,
Upon its lips and eyelids seem to lie
The light of heaven, and the light of hell,
The light of heaven, and the light of hell.'

Her mother comes out from the cottage door behind, and lays her hand upon the girl's shoulder. The spell is broken, and hiding her face in her hands, Grace bursts into violent weeping.

'What are you doing, my poor child, here, in the cold night air?'

'My two, mother, my two!' said she, 'and all the poor souls at sea to-night!'

'You mustn't think of it. Haven't I told you not to think of it? One would lose one's wits if one did too often.'

'If it is all true, mother, what else is there worth thinking of in heaven or earth?'

And Grace goes in with a dull, heavy look of utter exhaustion, bodily and mental, and quietly gets the things for supper, and goes about her cottage work, as one who bears a heavy chain, but has borne it too long to let it hinder the daily drudgery of life.

Grace had reason to pray at least for the soldiers who were going to the war. For as she prayed, the Orinoco, Ilipon, and Matilla were steaming down Southampton Water, with the Guards on board, and but that morning little Lord Southbush, left behind at the depot, had bid farewell to his best friend, opposite Buckingham Palace, while the bargains were on the lay-out-points, with 'Well, old fellow, you have the sun, after all, and I the work,' and had been answered with

'Fun? there will be no fighting, and I shall only have lost my season in town.'

Was there, then, no man among them that day, who,

'As the trees began to whisper and the wind began to roll,
Heard in the wild March morning the angels call his soul'?

Verily they no more come down to India on many stalwart souls of heroes.

CHAPTER III

ANYTHING BUT STILL LIFE

PISALVA COURT, about half a mile from the quay, is 'like a house in a story', a house of seven gables, and those very shaky ones, a house of useless long passages, useless turrets, vast lumber attics where mice and ghosts, lofty garden and yard walls of grey stone, round which the wind and rain are fishing through the dreary darkness, low oak-tiled ceilings, windows which once were mullioned with stone, but now with wood painted white, walls which were once oak-wooded, but have been painted like the millions, to the disgust of Elsley Vavasour, poet, its occupant in March 1814, who forgot that, while the oak was left dark, no man could have seen to read in the rooms a yard from the window.

He has, however, little reason to complain of 'his one drawing-room, where he and his wife are sitting, so pleasant has she made it look, in spite of the plainness of the furniture. A bright log-fire is burning on the hearth. There are a few good books too, and a few handsome prints, while some really valuable knick-knacks are set out, with pardonable ostentation, on a little table covered with crimson velvet. It is only cotton velvet, if you look close at it, but the things are pretty enough to catch the eye of all visitors, and Mrs. Heale, the doctor's wife (who always calls Mrs. Vavasour 'my lady,' though she does not love her), and Mrs. Treboove, of Treboove, always finger them over when they have any opportunity, and whisper to each other half contemptuously, 'Ah, poor thing! there's a sign that she has seen better days.'

And better days, in one sense, Mrs. Vavasour has seen. I am afraid, indeed, that she has more than once regretted the morning when she ran away in a hack-cab from her brother Lord Southbush's house in Eaton Square, to be married to Elsley Vavasour, the gifted author of A Soul's Agonies, and other Poems. He was a lion then, with foolish women running after him, and turning his head once and for all, and Lucia St. Just was a wild Irish girl, new to London society, all feeling and romance, and literally all, for there was little real intellect underlying her passionate sensibility. So when the sensibility burnt itself out, as it generally does, and when children, and the weak health which comes with them, and the cares of a household, and money difficulties, were absorbing her little powers, Elsley Vavasour began to fancy that his wife was a very commonplace person who was fast losing even her good looks and her good temper. So, on the whole, they were not happy. Elsley was an affectionate man, and honourable to a fantastical nicety, but he was vain, capricious, over-sensitive, craving for admiration and distinction, and it was not enough for him that his wife loved him, bore him children, kept his accounts, mended and mended all day long for him and his, he wanted her to act the public for him exactly when he was hungry for praise, and that not the actual, but an altogether ideal, public, to worship him as a deity, 'live for him and him alone,' 'realise' his poetic dreams of marriage bliss, and talk sentiment with him, or listen to him talking sentiment to her, when she would much sooner lie idle in bed, biding all the petty cares of the day, and the pain in his back too, poor thing! in sound sleep, and so it befell that they often quarrelled and wrangled, and that they were quarrelling and wrangling this very night.

Who cares to know how it began? Who cares to hear how it went on,—the stupid, aimless skirmish of bitter words, between two people who had forgotten themselves? I believe it began with Elsley's being vexed at her springing up two or three times, fancying that she heard the children cry, while he wanted to be quiet, and sentimentalise over the roaring of the wind outside. Then she thought of nothing but those children. Why did she not take a book and occupy her mind? To which she had her pert, though just answer, about her mind having quite enough to do to keep clothes on the children's backs, and so forth,—let who list imagine the miserable little squabble?—till she says,—'I know what has put you out so tonight, nothing but the news of my sister's coming.' He answers, 'That her sister is as little to him as to any man, as welcome to come now as she has been to stay away these three years.'

'Ah, it's very well to say that, but you have been a different person ever since that letter came,' And so she torments him into an angry self-justification (which she takes triumphantly as a confession) that 'it is very disagreeable to have his thoughts broken in on by one who has no sympathy with him and his parents—and who——' and at that point he wisely stops short, for he was going to throw down a very ugly gage of battle.

'Thrown down or not, Lucia snatches at it. 'Ah, I understand, poor Valentin! You always hated her.'

'I did not—but she is so brusque, and excited, and

'Be so kind as not to abuse my family. You may say what you will of me, but

'And what have your family done for me, pray?'

'Why, considering that we are now living rent-free in my brother's house, and——' She stops in her turn for her pride and her prudence also will not let her tell him that Valentin has been clothing her and the children for the last three years. He is just the man to forbid her on the spot to receive any more presents, and to sacrifice her comfort to his own pride. But what she has said is quite enough to bring out a very angry answer, which, she is expecting, mis in the end by—

'For goodness' sake, don't speak so loud, I don't want the servants to hear.'

'I am not speaking loud' (he has not yet opened his lips). 'That is your old trick to prevent my defending myself, while you are driving me mad. How dare you taunt me with being a pensioner on your brother's bounty? I'll go up to town again and take lodgings there. I need not be beholden to any aristocrat of them all. I have my own station in the real world,—the world of intellect, I have my own friends. I have made myself a name without his help, and I can live without his help, he shall find!'

'Which name were you speaking of?' rejoins she, looking up at him, with all her native Irish humour flashing up for a moment in her naughty eyes. The next minute she would have given her hand not to have said it, for, with a very terrible word, Elsie springs to his feet and dashes out of the room.

She hears him catch up his hat and cloak, and hurry out into the rain, slamming the door behind him. She springs up to call him back, but he is gone,—and she dashes herself on the floor and bursts into an agony of weeping over 'young bliss never to return!' Not in the least. Her principal fear is, lest he should catch cold in the rain. She takes up her work again, and stitches away in the comfortable certainty that in half an hour she will have recovered her temper, and he also, that they will pass a sulky night, and to-morrow, by about mid-day, without explanation or formal reconciliation, have become as good friends as ever. 'Perhaps,' says she to herself, with a woman's sense of power, 'if he be very much ashamed and very wet, I'll pity him, and make friends to-night.'

Miserable enough are these little squabbles.

Why will two people, who have sworn to love and cherish each other untily, and who, on the whole, do what they have sworn, behave to each other as they dare for very shame behave to no one else? Is it that, as every beautiful thing has its hideous antitype, this mutual shamelessness is the devil's ape of mutual confidence? Perhaps it cannot be otherwise with beings compact of good and evil. When the veil of reserve is withdrawn from between two souls, it must be withdrawn for evil, as for good, till the two natures, which ought to seek rest, each in the other's inmost depths, may at last spring apart, confronting each other recklessly with—'There, you see me as I am, you know the worst of me, and I of you, take me as you find me—what care I?'

Elsie and Lucia have not yet arrived at that terrible crisis, though they are on the path toward it, the path of little carelessnesses, rudenesses, ungoverned words and tempers, and worst of all, of that half-confidence, which is certain to avenge itself by irritation and quarrelling, for if two married people will not tell each other in love what they ought, they will be sure to tell each other in anger what they ought not. It is plain enough already that Elsie has her weak point, which must not be touched—something about 'a name,' which Lucia is to be expected to ignore,—as if anything which really exists could be ignored while two people live together night and day, for better for worse. Till the thorn is out, the wound will not heal, and till the matter (whatever it may be) is set right by confession and absolution, there will be no peace for them, for they are living in a hell, and unless it be a very little one indeed, better, perhaps, that they should go on to that terrible crisis of open denunciations. It may end in disgust, hatred, in madness, but it may, too, end in each falling again upon the other's bosom, and sobbing out through holy tears—'Yes, you do know the worst of me, and yet you love me still! This is happiness, to find oneself most loved when one most hates oneself! God, help us to confess our sins to Thee, as we have done to each other, and to begin life again like little children, struggling hand in hand out of this lowest pit, up the steep path which leads to life and strength, and peace.'

Heaven grant that it may so end! But now Elsie has gone raging out into the raging darkness, trying to prove himself to himself the most injured of men, and to hate his wife as much as possible, though the fool knows the whole time that he loves her better than any thing on earth, even than that 'fame,' on which he tries to fatten his lean soul, snapping greedily at every scrap which falls in his way, and in default snapping at everybody and everything else. And little comfort it gives him. Why should it? What comfort, save in being wise and strong? And is he the wiser or stronger for being told by a reviewer that he has written two novels, or has failed in writing them; or to have silly women writing to ask for his autograph, or for leave to set his songs to music? Nay,—shocking as the question may seem,—is he the wiser and stronger man for being a poet at all, and a genius?—provided, of course, that the word genius is used in its modern meaning, of a person who can say prettier things than his neighbours. I think not. Be it as it may, away goes the poor genius, his long cloak, picturesque enough in calm weather, fluttering about uncomfortably enough, while the rain washes his long curls into swabs, out through the old garden, between storm-swept barrels, beneath dark groaning pines, and through a door in the wall which opens into the lane.

The road leads downward, on the right, into the village. He is in no temper to meet his fellow-creatures—even to see the comfortable gleam through their windows, as the sailors close round the fire with wife and child, so he turns to the left, up the deep stone-banked lane, which leads towards the cliff, dark now as pitch, for it is overhanging, right and left, with deep oak-wood.

It is no easy matter to proceed, though, for the wind puns down the lane as through a funnel, and the road is of slippery bare slate, worn here and there into puddles of greasy clay, and Elsley slips back half of every step. His wrath, as he moves, comes out of his heels. Moreover, those dark trees above him, tossing their heads impatiently against the scarlet-leafed dark sky, strike an awe into him, a sense of loneliness, almost of awe. An uncanny, bird-like night it is, and he is out on a lone errand, and he knows it, and wishes that his wife were home again. He does not believe, of course, in those 'spirits of the storm,' about whom he has so often written, any more than he does in a great deal of his line imagery, but still, in such characters as his, the sympathy between the moods of nature and those of the mind is most real and important, and Dame Nature's equinoctial night wail is weird, gruesome, crushing, and can be laid (if it must be laid) in real comfort only when one is going on an errand of mercy, with a clear conscience, a light heart, a good leg, and plenty of unacknowledged.

So, ere Elsley had gone a quarter of a mile, he turned back, and resolved to go in, and take up his book once more. Perhaps Lucia might beg his pardon, and if not, why, perhaps he might beg hers. The rain was washing the spirit out of him, as it does out of a thin-coated horse.

Stay! What was that sound above the roar of the gale? A cannon?

He listened, turning his head right and left to escape the howling of the wind in his ears. A minute, and another boom rose and rang aloft. It was near, too. He almost fancied that he felt the concussion of the air.

Another, and another, and then, in the village below, he could see lights hurrying to and fro. A wreck at sea? He turned again up the lane. He had never seen a wreck. What an opportunity for a poet, and on such a night too! It would be magnificent if the moon would but come out! Just the scene, too, for his excited temper! He will work on upward, let it blow and ram as it may. He is not disappointed. Ere he has gone a hundred yards, a mass of dripping oilskins runs full butt against him, knocking him against the bank, and, by the clank of weapons, he recognises the coast-guard watchman.

'Hillo—who's that? Beg your pardon, sir,' as the man recognises Elsley's voice.

'What is it?—what are the guns?'

'God knows, sir! Overnight the Clough and Crow, on 'em, I'm assured. There they go again!—hard up, poor souls! God help them!' and the man runs shouting down the lane.

Another gun, and another, but long ere Elsley reaches the cliff, they are silent, and nothing is to be heard but the noise of the storm, which, loud as it was below among the wood, is almost intolerable now that he is on the open down.

He struggles up the lane toward the cliff, and there pauses, gasping, under the shelter of a wall, trying to analyse that enormous mass of sound which fills his ears and brain and flows through his nostrils like mad-drumming wine. He can bear the sight of the dead grass on the hill edge, weary, feeble, expostulating with its old tormentor the gale, then the fierce screams of the blasts as they rush up across the layers of rock below, like hounds leaping up at their prey, and, far beneath, the horrible, confused battle-ruin of that great leaguer of waves. He cannot see them, as he strains his eyes over the wall into the blank depth,—nothing but a confused welter of a jumbled an, and ram, and spay, as if the very atmosphere were writhing in the clutch of the gale. But he can hear,—what can he not hear? It would have needed a less vivid brain than Elsley's to fancy another Madagascar beneath. There it all is.

The rush of columns to the beach, officers cheering them on, pauses, breaks, wild cries, upbraiding calls, whispering consultations, fresh rush on rush, now here, now there, fierce shouts above, below, behind—shocks of agony, choked groans and gasps of dying men,—scaling-ladders hauled down with all their rattling freight, dull mine explosions, ringing cannon thunder, as the old fortress blasts back its besugars pell-mell into the deep. It is all there—truly enough there, at least, to unhide yet more Elsley's wild angry brain, till he tries to add his shouts to the great battle cries of land and sea, and finds them as little audible as an infant's wail.

Suddenly, far below him, a faint glimmer, and, in a moment, a blue-light reveals the whole scene, in ghastly hues,—blue leaping breakers, blue weltering sheets of foam, blue rocks, crowded with blue figures, like ghosts, flitting to and fro upon the brink of that blue seething Phlegethon, and rushing up toward him through the air, a thousand flying blue foam sponges, which drive over the brow of the hill and vanish, like delusive faeries fleeing.

before the wrath of the gale—but where is the wreck? The blue light cannot pierce the gray veil of mingled mist and spray which hangs to seaward, and her guns have been silent for half an hour and more.

Elsley hurries down, and finds half the village collected on the long sloping point of down below. Sailors wrapped in pilot-cloth, oil-skinned coast-guardsmen, women with their gowns turned over their heads, staggering restlessly up and down, and in and out, while every moment some fresh comer stumbles down the slope, thrusting himself into his clothes as he goes, and asks, 'Where's the wreck?' and gets no answer, but a sully advice to 'hold his nose,' as if they had hope of hearing the wreck which they cannot see, and kind women, with their hearts full of mothers' instincts, declare that they can hear little children crying, and are pooh-poohed down by kind men, who, man's fashion, don't like to believe anything too painful, or, if they believe it, to talk of it.

'What were the guns from, then, Brown?' asks the lieutenant of the head boatman.

'Off the Clough and Crow, I thought, sir (God grant not)!'.

'You thought, sir,' says the great man, willing to vent his vexation on some one. 'Why didn't you make sure?'

'Why, just look, lieutenant,' says Brown, pointing into the 'black height of the dark', 'and I was on the pier too, and couldn't see, but the look-out man here says—' A shift of wind, a drift of cloud, and the moon flashes out a moment. 'There she is, sir'.

Some three hundred yards out at sea lies a long curved black line, beautiful, severe, and still, and those white wild leaping hills. A murmur from the crowd, which swells into a roar, as they surge aimlessly up and down.

Another moment, and it is cut in two by a whiteline—covered—lost—all hold their breath. No, the sea passes on, and still the black curve is there, enduring.

'A terrible big ship!'

'A Liverpool clipper, by the lines of her'.

'God help the poor passengers, then!' sobs a woman. 'They're past our help—she's on her beam ends'.

'And her deck upright towards us'.

'Silence! Out of the way, you loafing long-shores!' shouts the lieutenant. 'Brown—the rockets!'

What though the lieutenant be somewhat given to strong liquors, and stronger language. He wears the Queen's uniform, and what is more, he knows his work and can do it, all make a silent rug while the fork is planted, the lieutenant, throwing away the end of his cigar, kneels and adjusts the stick, Brown and his mates examine and shake out the coils of line.

Another minute, and the magnificent creature rushes forth with a triumphant roar, and soars aloft over the waves in a long stream of fire, defiant of the gale.

Is it over her? No! A fierce gust, which all but hurls the spectators to the ground, the fiery stream sweeps away to the left, in a grand curve of sparks, and drops into the sea.

'Try it again!' shouts the lieutenant, his blood now up. 'We'll see which will beat, wind or powder'.

Again a rocket is fixed, with more allowance for the wind, but the black curve has disappeared, and he must wait awhile.

'There it is again!' Fly swift and sure, cries Elsley, 'thou fiery angel of mercy, bearing the saviour-line! It may not be too late yet.'

Full and true the rocket went across her, and 'Three cheers for the lieutenant!' rose above the storm.

'Silence, lads! Not so bad, though,' says he, rubbing his wet hands. 'Hold on by the line, and watch for a bite, Brown'.

Five minutes pass. Brown has the line in his hand waiting for any signal touch from the ship—but the line sways limp in the surge.

Ten minutes. The lieutenant lights a fresh cigar, and paces up and down, smoking fiercely.

A quarter of an hour, and yet no response. The moon is shining clearly now. They can see her—her masts, the stumps of her masts, great tangles of rigging swaying and lashing down across her deck, and that delicate black upper curve is becoming more ragged after every wave, and the tide is rising fast.

'There's a jill!' shouts Brown. 'No, there ain't! God have mercy, sir! She's going!'

The black curve boils up, as if a mine had been sprung on board, leaps into arches, jagged peaks, black bars crossed and tangled, and then all melts away into the white soothing waste, while the line floats home helplessly, as if disappointed, and the billows plunge more sullenly and sadly towards the shore, as it in remorse for their dark and reckless deed.

All is over. What shall we do now? Go home, and pray that God may have mercy on all drowning souls? Or think what a picture unique and tragical scene it was, and what a beautiful poem it will make, when we have thrown it into an artistic form, and bedizened it with conceits and analogies stolen from all heaven and earth by our own self-willed fancy?

Elsley Vavasour—through whose spectacles, rather than with my own eyes, I have been looking at the wreck, and to whose account, not to mine, the metaphors and similes of the last two pages must be laid—took the latter course, not that he was not awed, calmed, and even humbled, as he felt how poor and petty his own troubles were, compared with that great tragedy, but in his fatal habit of considering all matters in heaven and earth as bricks and mortar for the poet to build with, he considered that he had 'seen enough', as if men were sent into the world to see, and not to act, and going home too excited to sleep, much more to go and kiss forgiveness to his sleeping wife, sat up all night, writing 'The Wreck.'

which may be (as the reviewer in The Parthenon asserts) an exquisite poem, but I cannot say that it is of much importance.

So the delicate genius sat that night, scribbling verses by a warm fire, and the rough lieutenant settled himself down in his mackintoshes, to sit out those weary hours on the bare rock, having done all that he could do, and yet knowing that his duty was not to leave the place as long as there was a chance of saving not a life, for that was past all hope—but a chest of clothes or a stick of timber. There he settled himself, grumbling yet faithful, and filled up the time with sleepy maledictions against some old admiral, who had— or had not—taken a squire to him in the West Indies thirty years before, else he would have been a post-captain by now, comfortably in bed on board a crack frigate, instead of sitting all night out on a rock, like an old cornorant, etc. etc. Who knows not the woes of ancient coast-guard lieutenants?

But as it befell, Elsie Vavasour was justly punished for going home, by losing the most 'poetical' incident of the whole night.

For with the coast-guardsmen many sailors stayed. There was nothing to be earned by staying, but still, who knew but they might be wanted? And they hung on with the same feeling which tempts you to linger round a grave ere the earth is filled in, loth to give up the last sight, and with it the last hope. The ship herself, over and above her lost crew, was in their eyes a person to be loved and regretted. And Gentleman Jan spoke, like a true sailor—

'Ah, poor And she such a beauty, Mr Brown, as any one might see by her lines, even that way off. Ah, poor dear!'

'And so many brave souls on board, and, perhaps, some of them not ready, Mr Brown, says the serious elderly chief boatman 'Eli, Captain Willis?'

'The Lord has had mercy on them, I don't doubt,' answers the old man, in his quiet sweet voice. 'One can't but hope that He would give them time for one prayer before all was over, and having been drowned myself, Mr Brown, three times, and taken up for dead—that is, once in Gibraltar Bay, and once when I was a total wreck in the old Seahorse, that was in the hurricane in the Indies, after that, when I fell over quay-head here, fishing for bass,—why, I know well how quick the prayer will run through a man's heart, when he's a-drowning, and the light of conscience, too, all one's life in one minute, like—'

'It ain't the men I care for,' says Gentleman Jan, 'they're gone to heaven, like all brave sailors do as dies by wreck and battle. But the poor dear ship, d'ye see, Captain Willis, she ain't no heaven to go to, and that's why I feel fur her so.'

Both the old men shake their heads at Jan's doctrine, and turn the subject off.

'You'd better go home, captain, 'fear of the rheumatics. It's a rough night for your years; and you've no call, like me.'

'I would, but for my maid there, and I can't get her home, and I can't leave her.' And Willis points to the schoolmistress, who sits upon the flat slope of rock, a little apart from the rest, with her face resting on her hands, gazing intently out into the wild waste.

'Make her go, it's her duty—we all have our duties. Why does her mother let her out at this time of night? I keep my maids tighter than that, I warrant.' And disciplinarian Mr Brown makes a step towards her.

'Ah, Mr Brown, don't now! She's not one of us. There's no saying what's going on there in her. Maybe she's praying, maybe she sees more than we do, over the sea there.'

'What do you mean? There's no living body in those breakers, be sure!'

'There's more living things about on such a night than have bodies to them, or than any but such as she can see. If any one ever talked with angels, that maid does; and I've heard her, too, I can say I have certain of it. Those that like may call her an innocent, but I wish I were such an innocent, Mr Brown. I'd be nearer heaven then, here on earth, than I fear sometimes I ever shall be, even after I'm dead and gone.'

'Well, she's a good girl, married or not, but look at her now! What's she after?'

The girl had raised her head, and was pointing, with one arm stretched stiffly out toward the sea.

Old Willis went down to her, and touched her gently on the shoulder.

'Come home, my maid, then, you'll take cold, indeed,' but she did not move or lower her arm.

The old man, accustomed to her fits of fixed melancholy, looked down under her bonnet, to see whether she was 'past,' as he called it. By the moonlight he could see her great eyes steady and wide open. She motioned him away, half impatiently, and then sprang to her feet with a scream.

'A man! a man! Save him!'

As she spoke, a huge wave rolled in, and shot up the sloping end of the point in a broad sheet of foam. And out of it struggled, on hands and knees, a human figure. He looked wildly up, and round, and then his head dropped again on his breast, and he lay clinging with outspread arms, like Homer's polydus in the Odyssey, as the wave drained back, in a thousand roaring cataracts, over the edge of the rock.

'Save him!' shrieked she again, as twenty men rushed forward and stopped short. The man was fully thirty yards from them, but close to him, between them and him, stretched a long ghastly crack, some ten feet wide, cutting the point across. All knew it its slippery edge, its polished upright sides, the seething cauldrons within it, and knew, too, that the next wave would boil up from it in a hundred jets, and suck in the strongest to his doom, to fall, with brains dashed out, into a chasm from which was no return.

Ere they could nerve themselves for action, the wave had come. Up the slope it went, one half of it burying the wretched mariner, and fell over into the chasm. The other half rushed up the chasm itself, and spouted forth again to the moonlight in columns of snow, in time to meet the wave from which it had just parted, as it fell from above, and then the two boiled up, and round, and over, and swirled along the smooth rock to their very feet.

The schoolmistress took one long look, and as the wave retired, rushed after it to the very brink of the chasm, and flung herself on her knees.

'She's in!' said

'No, she's not!' almost screamed old Willy, in mingled pride and terror, as he rushed after her. 'The wave has carried him across the rock, and she's got him!' And he spring upon her, and caught her round the waist.

'Now, if you be men!' shouted he, as the rest hurried down.

'Now, if you be men, before the next wave comes!' shouted big Jan. 'Hands together, and make a line!' and he took a grip with one hand of the old man's waistband, and held out the other for who would to seize.

Who took it? Frank Headley, the inmate, who had been watching all sally apart, longing to do something which no one could mistake.

'Be you man enough?' asked big Jan doubtfully.

'Try,' said Frank.

'Really, you won't, sir,' said Jan, civilly enough. 'Means no offence, sir, your heart's stout enough, I see, but you don't know what it'll be.' And he caught the hand of a fifth fellow next him, while Frank shrank sally back into the darkness.

Strong hand after hand was clasped, and strong knee after knee dropped almost to the rock, to meet the coming rush of water, and all who knew their business took a long breath, they might have need of one.

It came, and surged over the man, and the girl, and up to old Willy's throat, and round the knees of Jan and his neighbour, and then followed the returning out-drift, and every limb quivered with the strain, but when the cataraet had disappeared, the chain was still unbroken.

'Saved!' and a cheer broke from all lips, save those of the girl herself, she was as senseless as he whom she had saved. They hurried her and him up the rock ere another wave could come, but they had much ado to open her hands, so firmly clenched together were they round his waist.

Gently they lifted each, and laid them on the rock, while old Willy, having recovered his breath, set to work crying like a child, to restore breath to 'his maiden.'

'Ran for Dr Heale, some good Christian!'

But Frank, longing to escape from a company who did not love him, and to be of some use ere the night was out, was already half-way to the village on that very errand.

However, ere the doctor could be stirred out of his boozy slumbers, and thrust into his clothes by his wife, the schoolmistress was safe in bed at her mother's house, and the man, weak, but alive, carried triumphantly up to Heale's door, which having been kicked open the sailors insisted in carrying him right up stairs, and depositing him on the best spare bed.

'If you won't come to your patients, doctor, your patients shall come to you. Why were you asleep in your liquor, instead of looking out for poor wretches, like a Christian? You see whether his bones be broke, and gi' 'em his medicines proper, and then go and see after the schoolmistress, she's worth a dozen of any man, and a thousand of you! We'll pay for our like men, and if you don't, we'll break every bottle in your shop.'

To which, what between bodily fear and red good nature, old Heale assented, and so ended that eventful night.

CHAPTER IV

PHYSIC, PILLOW, AND PAIN.

About nine o'clock the next morning, Gentleman Jan strolled into Dr Heale's surgery, pipe in mouth, with an attendant satellite, for even here, poor as well as rich, in country as in town, must needs have his jackal.

Heale's surgery—or, in plain English, shop—was a dreadful hole enough in such dirt and confusion as might be expected from a drunken occupant, with a practice which was only not decaying because there was no rival in the field. But monophony made the old man, as it makes most men, all the more lazy and careless, and there was not a drug on his shelves which could be warranted to work the effect set forth in that sanguine and too trustful book, the Pharmacopœia, which, like Mr Pecksniff's England, expects every man to do his duty, and is, accordingly (as the Lawyer and Dr Lethely know too well), grievously disappointed.

In this kennel of evil savours Heale was slowly trying to poke things into something like order, and dragging out a few old drugs with a shaky hand, to see if any one would buy them, in a vague expectation that something must needs have happened to somebody the night before, which would require somewhat of his art.

And he was not disappointed. Gentleman Jan, without taking his pipe out of his mouth, dropped his huge elbows on the counter, and his black-fringed chin on his fists, took a look round the shop, as if to find something which would suit him; and then—

'I say, doctor, gi' some tackleum.'

'Some diachylum plaster, Mr Beer!' says Heale meekly. 'What for, then?'

'To tackle my shins. I barked 'em cruel against King Arthur's nose last night. Hard in the bone he is,—wish I was as hard.'

'How much diachylum will you want, then, Mr Beer?'

'Well, I don't know. Let's see!' and Jan pulls up his blue trousers, and pulls down his gray rig and furrows, and considers his broad and shaggy shins.

'Matter of four pennies' worth, two to each leg,' and then replaces his oilskins, and smokes on.

'I say, doctor, that 'ero curate came out well last night. I shall go to church next Sunday.'

'What,' asks the satellite, 'after you upset to that fashion yesterday?'

'I don't care what you think,' says Jan, who of course, bullies his jackal like most boys.

'But I goes to church. He's a good 'un, say I, little and good, like a Welshman's cow, and clapped me on the back when we'd got the man and the mull safe, and says, "Well done on side, old fellow!" and stands something hot all round, what's more, in at the Manner's Rest—I say, doctor, where's he as we hauled 'em out? I'll go up and see 'em.'

'Not now then, Mr Beer. Now, then, He's sleeping, indeed he is, like any child.'

'So much the better.' 'We won't be bothered with his hollering. But go up I will. Do ye let me now, I'll be as still as a maid.'

And Jan kicked off his shoes, and marched on tiptoe through the ship, while Dr Heale, morning professional ejaculations, showed him the way.

The shipwrecked man was sleeping sweetly, and little was to be seen of his face, so covered was it with dark tangled curls and thick beard.

'Ah! a 'Stralian digger, by the beard of him, and his red jersey,' whispered Jan, as he bent tenderly over the poor fellow, and put his head on one side to listen to his breathing. 'Beautiful he sleeps, to be sure!' said Jan, 'and a tidy-looking chap, too. 'Tis a pity to wake 'em, poor wretch, and he, perhaps, with a sweetheart aboard, and drowned, or else all his kit lost. Let 'em sleep so long as he can. He'll find all out soon enough, God help him!'

And big Jan stole down the stairs gently and reverently, like a true sailor, and took his diachylum, and went off to plaster his shins.

About ten minutes afterwards, Heale was made aware that his guest was awake by snoring grunts and ejaculations, which ended in a series of long and doleful whistles; and then broken out into a song. So he went up, and found the stranger sitting upright in bed, combing his curls with his fingers, and chanting unto himself a cheerful ditty.

'Good morning, doctor,' quoth he, as his host entered. 'Very kind of you, this. Hope I haven't turned a better man than myself out of his bed.'

'Delighted to see you so well. Very near drowned, though. We were pumping at your lungs for a full half hour.'

'Ah! nothing, though, for an experienced professional man like you!'

'Him!' speaks well for your discrimination,' says Heale, flattered. 'Very well-spoken young person, though his beard is a bit wild. How did you know, then, that I was a doctor?'

'By the reverend looks of you, sir. Besides, I smelt the rhubarb and senna all the way upstairs, and knew that I'd fallen among professional brethren.'

"Oh, then this valiant mariner,
Which sailed a rose the sea,
He came home to his own sweetheart
With his heart so full of glee,

"With his heart so full of glee, sir,
And his pockets full of gold,
And his bag of druggist with many a nugget,
As heavy as he could hold."

'Don't you wish yours was, doctor?'

'Eh, eh, eh,' suggested Heale.

'Mine was last night. Now, doctor, let's have a glass of brandy and water, hot with, and in hour's more sleep, and then kick me out, and into the workhouse. Was anybody else saved from the wreck last night?'

'Nobody, sir,' said Heale, and said 'so' because, in spite of the stranger's rough looks, his accent,—or rather, his no accent—showed him that he had fallen in with a very different and probably a very superior stamp of man to himself, in the light of which conviction (and being withal a good-natured old soul), he went down and mixed him a still glass of brandy-and-water, answering his wife's remonstrances by 'The party upstairs is a bit of a frantic party, certainly, but he is certainly a very superior party, and has the true gentleman about him, any one can see. Besides, he's shipwrecked, as you and I may be any day, and what's like brandy-and-water?'

'I should like to know when I'm like to be shipwrecked, or you either,' says Mrs Heale, in a tone slightly savouring of indignation and contempt. 'You think of nothing but brandy-and-water.' But she let the doctor take the glass upstairs, nevertheless.

A few minutes afterwards Frank came in, and inquired for the shipwrecked man.

'Well enough in body, sir, and rather requires your skill than mine,' said the old time server. 'Won't you walk up?'

So up Frank was shown.

The stranger was sitting up in bed. 'Capital your brandy is, doctor,—Ah, sir,' seeing Frank, 'it is very kind of you, I am sure, to call on me. I presume you are the clergyman?'

But before Frank could answer, Heale had broken forth into loud praises of him, setting forth how the stranger owed his life entirely to his superhuman strength and courage.

'Pon my word, sir,' said the stranger, looking them both over and over through and through, as if to settle how much of all this he was to believe, 'I am deeply indebted to you for your gallantry I only wish it had been employed on a better subject.

'My good sir,' said Frank, blushing, 'you owe your life not to me. I would have helped if I could, but was not thought worthy by our sows of Anak here. Your actual preserver was a young girl.'

And Frank told him the story.

'Whew! I hope she won't expect me to marry her as payment. Handsome!'

'Beautiful,' said Frank.

'Money!'

'The village schoolmistress.'

'Clever?'

'A sort of half-baked body,' said Heale.

'A very puzzling intellect,' said Frank.

'Ah—well—that's a fair excuse for declining the honour. I can't be expected to marry a lunatic party, as you called me downstairs just now, doctor.

'I, sir?'

'Yes, I heard, no offence, though, my good sir, but I've the ears of a fox. I hope really, though, that she is none the worse for her heroic flights.'

'How is she this morning, Mr. Heale?'

'Well—poor thing, a little light-headed last night—but kindly when I went in last.'

'Whew! I hope she has not fallen in love with me. She may fancy me her property—a private waif and stray. Better send for the coast-guard officer, and let him claim me as belonging to the Admiralty, as floater, jetsom, and legend, for I was all three last night.'

'You were indeed, sir,' said Frank, who began to be a little tired of this levity, 'and very thankful to Heaven you ought to be.'

Frank spoke thus in a somewhat professional tone of voice, at which the stranger arched his eyebrows, screwed his lips up, and laid his ears back, like a horse when he meditates a kick.

'You must be better acquainted with my affairs than I am, my dear sir, if you are able to state that fact. Doctor! I hear a patient coming into the surgery.'

'Extraordinary power of hearing, to be sure,' said Heale, toddling downstairs, while the stranger went on, looking Frank full in the face.

'Now that old fog's gone downstairs, my dear sir, let us come to an understanding at the beginning of our acquaintance. Of course, you're bound by your cloth to say that sort of thing to me, just as I am bound by it not to swear in your company—but you'll allow me to remark, that it would be rather trying even to your faith, if you were thrown ashore with nothing in the world but an old jersey and a bag of tobacco, two hundred miles short of the port where you hoped to land with fifteen hundred well-earned pounds in your pocket.'

'My dear sir,' said Frank, after a pause, 'whatsoever comes from our Father's hand must be meant in love. "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away".'

A quaint wince passed over the stranger's face.

'Father, sir! That fifteen hundred pounds was going to my father's hand, from whosoever hand it came, or the loss of it. And now what is to become of the poor old man, that busy Dame Fortune only knows—if she knows her own mind an hour together, which I very much doubt. I worked early and late for that money, sir, up to my knees in mud and water. Let it be enough for your lofty demands on poor humanity, that I take my loss like a man, with a whistle and a laugh, instead of howling and cursing over it like a baboon. Let's talk of something else, and lend me five pounds and a suit of clothes. I shan't run away with them, for as I've been thrown ashore here, here I shall stay.'

Frank almost laughed at the free and easy request, though he felt at once pained by the man's irreligion, and abashed by his stoicism,—would he have behaved even as well in such a case?

'I have not five pounds in the world.'

'Good! we shall understand each other better.'

'But the suit of clothes you shall have at once.'

'Good again! Let it be your oldest, for I must do a little rick-scrabbling here, for purposes of my own.'

So off went Frank to fetch the clothes, pulling over his new parishioner. The man was not altogether with Frank, either in voice or manner, but there was an ease, a confidence, a sense of power, which made Frank feel that he had fallen in with a very strong nature, and one which had seen many men, and many lands, and profited by what it had seen.

When he returned, he found the stranger busy at his ablutions, and gradually appearing as a somewhat dapper, handsome fellow, with a bright gray eye, a short nose, a firm, small mouth, a broad and upright forehead, across the left side of which ran a fearful scar.

'That's a shrewd mark,' said he, as he caught Frank's eye fixed on it, while he sat coolly arranging himself on the bedside. 'I got it in fair fight, though, by a Crow's tomahawk in the Rocky Mountains. And here's another token' (lifting up his black curls), 'which a Greek robber gave me in the Morea. I've another under my head, for which I have to thank a Tartar, and one or two more little remembrances of flood and field up and down me. Perhaps they may explain to you why I take life and death so coolly. I've looked too often at the little razor-bridge which parts them, to care much for either. Now, don't let me trouble you any longer. You have your flock to see to, I don't doubt. You'll find me at church on Sunday. I always do at Rome as Rome does.'

'Then you will stay away,' said Frank, with a sad smile.

'Ah! No. Church is respectable and aristocratic, and there one don't get sent to a place unmentionable, ten times an hour, by some inspired tinker. Beside, country people like the doctor to go to church with their betters, and the very fellows who go to the Methodist meeting themselves would think it infra dig. in me to walk in there. Now, good-bye—though I haven't introduced myself—not knowing the name of my kind preserver.

'My name is Frank Headley, curate of the parish,' said Frank, smiling though he saw the man was rattling on for the purpose of preventing his talking on serious matters.

'And mine is Tom Thurnall, F.R.C.S., Licentiate of the Universities of Paris, Glasgow, and whilome surgeon of the good clipper Hesperus, which you saw wrecked last night. So, farewell!'

'Come over with me, and have some breakfast.'

'No, thanks, you'll be busy. I'll screw some out of old bottles here.'

'And now,' said Tom Thurnall to himself, as Frank left the room, 'to begin life again with an old penknife and a pound of honey-dew. I wonder which of them got my grille. I'll stick here till I find out that one thing, and stop the notes by to-day's post if I can but recollect them all,—if I could but stop the nugget, too!'

So saying, he walked down into the surgery, and looked round. Everything was in confusion. Cobwebs were over the bottles, and armies of mites played at hop-peep behind them. He tried a few drawers, and found that they stuck fast, and when he at last opened one, its contents were two old dried-up horse-halls, and a dirty tobacco-pipe. He took down a jar marked Epsom salts, and found it full of Welsh snuff, the next, which was labelled cinamon, contained blue vitriol. The spatula and pill-roller were crusted with deposits of every hue. The pill-box drawer had not a dozen whole boxes in it, and the counter was a quarter of an inch deep in deposit of every vegetable and mineral matter, including ends of string, tobacco ashes, and broken glass.

Tom took up a dirty duster, and set to work coolly to clear up, whistling away so merrily that he brought in Heale.

'I'm doing a little in the way of business, you see.'

'Then you really are a professional practitioner, sir, as Mr Headley informs me though, of course, I don't doubt the fact!' said Heale, summoning up all the little courage he had to ask the question with.

'F.R.C.S. London, Paris, and Glasgow. Easy enough to write and ascertain the fact. Have been medical officer to a poor law union, and to a Brazilian man-of-war. Have seen three cholerae, two army fevers, and yellow-jack without end. Have doctor'd gunshot wounds in the two Texan wars, in one Paris revolution, and in the Schleswig-Holstein row, beside a cadent practice in every country from California to China, and round the world and back again. There's a fine nest of Mr Weekes's friend (if not creation), Acarus Horridus, and Tom went on dusting and arranging.

Heale had been fairly taken aback by the imposing list of acquirements, and looked at his guest awhile with considerable awe suddenly a suspicion flashed across him, which caused him (not unseen by Tom) a start and a look of self-congratulatory wisdom. He next darted out of the shop, and returned as rapidly, rather redder about the eyes, and wiping his mouth with the back of his hand.

'But, sir, though, though,'—began he—'but, of course, you will allow me, being a stranger—and as a man of business—all I have to say is, it—that is to say—'

'You want to know why, if I've had all these good businesses, why I haven't kept them?'

'Ex—exactly,' stammered Heale, much relieved.

'A very sensible and business-like question but you needn't have been so delicate about asking it as to want a screw before beginning.'

'Ah, you're a wag, sir, keekled the old man.'

'I'll tell you frankly, I have an old father, sir,—a gentleman, and a scholar, and a man of science, once in as good a country practice as man could have, till, God help him, he went blind, sir, and I had to keep him, and have still. I went over the world to make my fortune, and never made it, and sent him home what I did make, and little enough too. At last, in my despair, I went to the diggings, and had a pretty haul. I needn't say how much. That matters little now, for I suppose it's at the bottom of the sea. There's my story, sir, and a poor one enough it is,—for the dear old man, at least. And Tom's voice trembled so as he told it, that old Heale believed every word, and what is more, being—like most hard drinkers—not 'unused to the melting mood,' wiped his eyes fervently, and went off for another drop of comfort, while Tom dusted and arranged on, till the shop began to look quite smart and business-like.

'Now, sir!—when the old man came back. "Business is business, and beggars must not be choosers. I don't want to meddle with your practice, I know the rules of the profession but if you'll let me sit here, and mix your medicines for you, you'll have the more time to visit your patients, that's clear,"—and perhaps (thought he) to drink your brandy and-water,—and when any of them are poisoned by me, it will be time to kick me out. All I ask is bed and board. Don't be frightened for your spirit-bottle—I can drink water, I've done it many a time for a week together in the prairies, and been thankful for a half-pint in the day.'

'But, sir, your dignity as a—'

'Fiddlesticks for dignity, I must live, sir. Only lend me a couple of sheets of paper and two queen's heads, that I may tell my friends my whereabouts,—and go and talk it over with Mrs. Heale. We must never act without consulting the ladies.'

That day Tom sent off the following epistle—

'To CHARLES SHUTTER, Esq., M.D., St. Mumpsimus's Hospital, London.

'DEAR CHARLEY—'

"I do assure thee, by old pleasant days,
Quarrier Latin, and neatly shod grannies,
By all our wanderings in quaint by-ways,
By ancient frocks, and by ancient debts," go to the United Bank of Australia forthwith, and stop the notes whose numbers—all, alas! which I can recollect—are enclosed. Next, lend me five pounds. Next, send me down, as quick as possible, five pounds' worth of decent drugs, as paracetamol, and—if you can borrow me one—a tolerable microscope, and a few natural history books, to astonish the yokels here with. For I was shipwrecked here last night, after all at a dirty little West country port, and what's worse, robbed of all I had made at the diggings, and at that far, and more, to run against cruel Dame Fortune, as Colson did against the Indians, without a shirt to my back. Don't be a hospitable fellow, and ask me to come up and camp with you. Munitions and all old fairs would be a great temptation, but here I must stick till I hear of my money, and plyme the natives to my daily bread'.

To his father he wrote thus, not having the heart to tell the truth—

'To EDWARD THURNALL, Esq., M.D., Whitbury

'MY DEAREST AND FATHER. I hope to see you again in a few weeks, as soon as I have settled a little business here, where I have found a capital opening for a medical man. Meanwhile let Mark or Mary write and tell me how you are, and for sending you every penny I can spare, trust me. I have not had all the luck I expected, but am as hearty as a bull, and as merry as a cricket, and fall on my legs, as of old, like a cat. I long to come to you, but I mustn't yet. It is now three years since I had a sight of that blessed white head, which is the only thing I care for under the sun, except Mark and little Mary.—By Mary I suppose she is now, and engaged to be married to some "Idealist Aristocrat." Best wishes to all Mark Armesworth. Your affectionate son, T. T.'

'Mr Heale,' said Tom next, 'are we Whigs or Tories here?'

'Why, ahem, sir, my Lord Skontbush, who owns most hereabouts, and my Lord Munchampstead, who has bought Cartmel moors above,—very old Whig connections, both of them, but Mr Treloar, id Treloar, he, again, thorough-going Tory—very good patient he was once, and may be again—ha! ha! Gay young man, sir—lurches of his health, so you see us a medical man, sir—'

'Which is the liberal paper? This one? Very good.' And Tom wrote off to the liberal paper that evening a letter, which here frint on the wreck's end, in the shape of five columns, headed thus—

'WRECK OF THE "Hesperus."

'The following detailed account of this lamentable catastrophe has been kindly contributed by the graphic pen of the only survivor, Thomas Thurnall, Esquire, F.R.C.S., etc etc, etc, late surgeon on board the ill-fated vessel.' Which five columns not only put a couple of guineas into Tom's pocket, but, as he intended they should, brought him before the public as an interesting personage, and served as a very good advertisement to the practice which Tom had already established in fancy.

Tom had not worked long, however, before the coast-guard lieutenant blisted in. He had trotted home to shave and get his breakfast, and was trotting back again to the shore.

'Hillo, Heale! can I see the fellow who was saved last night?'

'I am that fellow,' says Tom.

'The dukens you are! you seem to have fallen on your legs quickly enough.'

'It's a trick I've had occasion to learn, sir,' says Tom. 'Can I prescribe for you this morning?'

'Medicine?' roars the lieutenant, laughing. 'Cute me at it! No, I want you to come down to the shore, and help to identify goods and things. The wind has chipped up north, and is blowing dead on, and, with this tide, we shall have a good deal on shore. So, if you're strong enough—'

'I'm always strong enough to do my duty,' said Tom.

'Him! Very good sentiment, young man. Always strong enough in duty. Him! worthy of Nelson, and pretty much the same didn't he? something about duty, I know it was, and always thought it unexceptionable. Now, then, what can you tell me about this business?'

It was a sad story, but no sadder than hundreds besides. They had been struck by the gale to the westward two days before, with the wind south, had lost their foretopmast and bowsprit, and become all but unmanageable, had tried during a lull to rig a jury-mast, but were prevented by the gale, which burst on them with fresh fury from the south-west, with very heavy rain and fog, had passed a light in the night, which they took for Sully, but which must have been the Longships, had still fancied that they were safe, running up Channel with a wide berth, when, about sunset, the gale had chopped again to north-west,—and Tom knew no more. 'I was standing on the poop with the captain about ten o'clock. The last words he said to me were, "If this lasts, we shall see Bristol harbour to-morrow," when she struck, and stopped dead. I was clunked down off the poop, and nearly overboard, but brought up in the mizen rigging. Where the captain went, poor fellow, Heaven alone knows, for I never saw him after. The mainmast went like a carrot. The mizen stood. I ran round to the cabin doors. There were four men steering, the wheel had broke out of the poor fellows' hands, and knocked them over,—broken their skulls, I believe. I was stooping to pick them up, when a sea came into the waist, and then at, washing me in through the saloon-boards, among the poor half-dressed women and children. Queer sight, lieutenant! I've seen a good many, but never worse than that. I bolted to my cabin, tied my notes and gold round me, and out again.'

'Didn't desert the poor things!'

'Couldn't if I'd tried, they clung to me like a swarm of bees. 'Gad, sir, that was hard lines, to have all the pretty women one had waltzed with every evening through the Trades, and the little children one had been making playthings for, holding round one's knees, and screaming to the doctor to save them. And how the was I to save them, sir?' cried Tom, with a sudden burst of feeling, which, as in so many Englishmen, exploded in anger to avoid melting in tears.

'Ought to be a law against it, sir,' growled the lieutenant, 'against women-folk and children going to sea. It's murder and cruelty I've been wrecked, scores of times, but it was with honest men, who could shift for themselves, and if they were drowned, drowned, but didn't screech and catch hold—I couldn't stand that! Well!'

'Well, there was a pretty little creature, an officer's widow, and two children. I caught her under one arm, and one of the children under the other, and, "I can't take you all at once, I'll come back for the rest, one by one." Not that I believed it, but anything to stop the screaming, and I did hope to put some of them out of the reach of the sea, if I could get them forward. I knew the forecastle was dry, for the chief officer was firing there. You heard him?'

'Yes, five or six times, and then he stopped suddenly.'

He had reason. We got out. I could see her nose up in the air forty feet above us, covered with fore-cabin passengers. I warped the lady and the children upward—Heaven knows how, for the sea was breaking over us very sharp till we were at the mainmast stump, and holding on by the wreck of it. I felt the ship stagger as if a whale had struck her, and heard a roar and a swish behind me, and looked back just in time to see mizzen and poop, and all the poor women and children in it, go bodily, as if they had been slaved off with a knife. I suppose that altered her balance, for before I could turn again she dived forward, and then rolled over upon her beam ends to leeward, and I saw the sea walk in over her from stem to stern like one white wall, and I was washed from my hold, and it was all over.

'What became of the lady?'

'I saw a white thing flash by to leeward, what's the use of asking?'

'But the child? you held?'

'I didn't let it go till there was good reason.'

'Eh?'

Tom tapped the points of his fingers smartly against the side of his head, and then went on, in the same cynical drawl, which he had affected throughout—

'I heard that—against a piece of timber us we went overboard. And, as a medical man, I considered, after that, that I had done my duty. Pretty little boy it was, just six years old, and such a fancy for drawing.'

The lieutenant was quite puzzled by Tom's seeming nonchalance.

'What do you mean, sir? Did you leave the child to perish?'

'Confound you, sir! If you will have plain English, here it is. I tell you I heard the child's skull crack like an egg-shell! There, let's talk no more about it, or the whole matter. It's a bad business, and I'm not answerable for it, or you either, so let's go and do what we are answerable for, and identify—'

'Sir! you will be so good as to recollect,' said the lieutenant, with puffed plumes.

'I do, I do.' I beg your pardon a thousand times, I'm sure, for being so rude, but you know as well as I, sir, there are a good many things in the world which won't stand too much thinking over, and last night was one.'

'Very true, very true, but how did you get ashore?'

'I got ashore? Oh, well enough! Why not?'

'Gad, sir, you were near enough being drowned at last, only that girl's pluck saved you.'

'Well, but it did save me, and here I am, as I knew I should be when I last struck out from the stuff.'

'Knew' that is a bold word for mortal man at sea.'

'I suppose it is, but we doctors, you see, get into the way of looking at things as men of science, and the ground of science is experience, and, to judge from experience, it takes more to kill me than I have yet met with. If I had been going to be snuffed out, it would have happened long ago.'

'Hum! It's well to carry a cheerful heart, but the pitcher goes often to the well, and comes home broken at last.'

'I must be a gutta serena pitcher, I think, then, or else—'

'There's a sweet little cherub who sits up aloft, as Dublin has it. Now, look at the facts yourself, sir,' continued the stranger, with a recklessness half true, half assumed, to escape from the malady of thought. 'I don't want to boast, sir, I only want to show you that I have some practical reason for wearing as my motto, "Never say die." I have had the cholera twice, and yellow jack beside, five several times. I have had bullets through me, I have been bayoneted and left for dead, I have been shipwrecked three times—and once, as now, I was the only man who escaped. I have been fattened by savages for baking and eating, and got away with a couple of friends only a day or two before the feast. One really narrow chance I had, which I never expected to squeeze through, but, on the whole, I have taken full precautions to prevent its recurrence.'

'What was that, then?'

'I have been hanged, sir,' said the doctor quietly.

'Hanged!?' cried the lieutenant, facing round upon his strange companion with a visage which asked plainly enough, 'You hanged? I don't believe you, and if you have been hanged, what have you been doing to get hanged?

'You need not take care of your pockets, sir—neither robbery nor murder was it which brought me to the gallows, but innocent bug-hunting. The fact is, I was caught by a party of Mexicans, during the last war, straggling after plants and insects, and hanged as a spy. I don't blame the fellows, I had no business where I was, and they could not conceive that a man would risk his life for a few butterflies.'

'But if you were hanged, sir—'

'Why did I not die? By my usual luck the fellows were clumsy, and the noose would not work, so that the Mexican doctor, who meant to dissect me, brought me round again, and being a freemason, as I am, stood by me, got me safe off, and I cheated the devil.'

The worthy lieutenant walked on in silence, stealing furtive glances at Tom, as if he had been a guest from the other world, but not disbelieving his story in the least. He had seen, as most old navy men, so many strange things happen, that he was prepared to give credit to any tale when told, as Tom's was, with a straightforward and unhesitant simplicity.

'There lives the girl who saved you,' said he, as they passed Grace Harvey's door.

'Ah! I ought to call and pay my respects.'

But Grace was not at home. The wreck had emptied the school, and Grace had gone after her scholars to the beach.

'We couldn't keep her away, weak as she was,' said a neighbour, 'as soon as she heard the poor corpses were coming ashore.'

'Hum!' said Tom. 'True woman. Quant—that appetite for horrors the sweet creatures have. Did you ever see a man hanged, lieutenant? No? If you had, you would have seen two women in the crowd to one man. Can you make out the philosophy of that?'

'I suppose they like it, as some people do hot peppers.'

'Or donkeys thistles—find a little pain pleasant.' I had a patient once in France, who read Dumas's Crimes Celebres all the week, and the Vies des Saints on Sundays, and both, as far as I could see, for just the same purpose—to see how miserable people could be, and how much pinching and pulling they could bear.'

So they walked on, along a sleep-path, and over the Spur, and down to the Cove.

It was such a morning as often follows a gale, when the great firmament stares down upon the ruin which it has made, bright, and clear and bold, and seems to say, with shameless smile, 'There, I have done it, and am as merry as ever after it all.' Beneath a cloudless sky the breakers, still gray and foul from the tempest, were tumbling in before a cold northern breeze. Half a mile out at sea, the rough backs of the Chough and Crow loomed black and sulky in the foam. At their feet, the rocks and shingle of the Cove were alive with human beings—groups of women and children clustering round a corpse or a chest, sailors, knee-deep in the surf, hauling at floating spars and ropes, oilskinned coast-guardsmen pacing up and down in charge of goods, while groups of farmers' men, who had hurried down from the villages inland, lounged about on the top of the cliff, looking sulkily on, hoping for plunder, and yet half afraid to mingle with the sailors below, who looked on them as an inferior race, and refused, in general, to intermarry with them.

The lieutenant plainly held much the same opinion, for as a party of them tried to descend the narrow path to the beach, he shouted after them to come back.

'Eh! you won't!' and out rattled from its scabbard the old worthy's sword. 'Come back, I say, you loafing, inclining, wrooking clock-keepers, there are no pickings for you here. Brown, send those fellows back with the bayonet. None but blue-jackets allowed on the beach! And the labourers go up again, grumbling.'

'Can't trust those landabarks. They'll plunder even the rings off a corpse's fingers. They think every wreck a goldmine. I've known them, after they've been driven off, roll great stones over the cliff at night 'on the coast-guard, just out of spite, while these blue-jackets here, I can depend on them. Can you tell me the reason of that, as you seem a bit of a philosopher?'

'It is easy enough,' the sailors have a fellow-feeling with sailors, and the landmen have none. Besides, the sailors are finer fellows, body and soul, and the reason is that they have been brought up to face danger, and the landmen haven't.'

'Well,' said the lieutenant, 'unless a man has been taught to look death in the face, he never will grow up, I believe, to be much of a man at all.'

'Danger, my good sir, is a better schoolmaster than all your new model schools, diagrams, and scientific apparatus. It made our forefathers the masters of the sea, though they never heard of popular science, and I daresay couldn't, one out of ten of them, spell their own names.'

That sentiment elicited from the lieutenant a grunt of approbation, as Tom intended that it should do, shrewdly arguing that the old murtinet was no friend to the modern superstition, that all which is required to cast out the devil is a smattering of the 'ologies.'

'Will the gentlemen see the corpses?' asked Brown, 'we have fourteen already,'—and he led the way to where, along the shingle at high-water mark, lay a ghastly row, some fearfully bruised and mutilated, cramped together by the death agony, others with the peaceful smile which showed that they had sunk to sleep in that strange water-death, amid a wilderness of pleasant dreams. Strong men lay there, little children, women, whom the sailors' wives had covered decently with cloaks and shawls, and at their heads stood Grace Harvey, motionless, with folded hands, gazing into the dead faces with her great solemn eyes. Her mother and Captain Wallis stood by, watching her with a sort of superstitious awe. She took no notice either of Thurnall or of the lieutenant, as the doctor identified the bodies one by one, without a remark which indicated any human emotion.

'A very sensible man, Willis,' said the lieutenant apart, as Tom knelt awhile to examine the crushed features of a sailor, and then, looking up, said simply—

'James Macgillivray, second mate. Cause of death, contusions; probably by the fall of the mainmast.'

'A very sensible man, and has seen a deal of life, and kept his eyes open, but a terrible hard-plucked one. Talked like a book to me all the way, but he hanged if I don't think he has a thirty-two pound shot under his ribs instead of a heart—Doctor Thurnall, that is Miss Harvey, the young person who saved your life last night.'

Tom rose, took off his hat (Frank Heudley's), and made her a bow, of which an ambassador need not have been ashamed.

'I am exceedingly shocked that Miss Harvey should have run so much danger for anything so worthless as my life.'

She looked up at him, and answered, not him, but her own thoughts.

'Strange, is it not, that it was a duty to pray for all these poor things last night, and a sin to pray for them this morning?'

'Grace, dear!' interposed her mother, 'don't you hear the gentleman thanking you?'

She started, as one awaking out of a dream, and looked into his face, blushing scarlet.

'Good heavens, what a beautiful creature!' said Tom to himself, as quite a new emotion passed through him. Quite now it was, whatsoever it was, and he was aware of it. He had had his passions, his intrigues, in past years, and prided himself—few men more on understanding women, but the expression of the face, and the strange words with which she had greeted him, added to the broad fact of her having offered her own life for his, raised in him a feeling of chivalrous awe and admiration, which no other woman had ever called up.

'Madam,' he said again, 'I can repay you with nothing but thanks, but, to judge from your conduct last night, you are one of those people who will find reward enough in knowing that you have done a noble and heroic action.'

She looked at him very steadfastly, blushing still. Thurnall, be it understood, was (at least, while his face was in the state in which Heaven intended it to be, half hidden in a silky-brown beard) a very good-looking fellow, and (to use Mark Arnsworth's description) 'as hard as a nail, as fresh as a rose, and stood on his legs like a game-cock.' Moreover, as Willis said, approvingly, he had spoken to her 'as if he was a duke, and she was a duchess.' Besides, by some blessed moral law, the surest way to make oneself love any human being is to go and do him a kindness, and therefore Grace had already a tender interest in Tom, not because he had saved her, but she him. And so it was, that a strange new emotion passed through her heart also, though so little understood by her, that she put it forthwith into words.

'You might repay me,' she said, in a sad and tender tone.

'You have only to command me,' said Tom, wincing a little as the words passed his lips.

'Then turn to God, now in the day of His mercies. Unless you have turned to Him already!'

One glance at Tom's rising eyebrows told her what he thought upon those matters.

She looked at him sadly, hungrily, as if conscious that she ought not to look too long, and yet unable to withdraw her eyes. 'Ah! and such a precious soul as yours must be, a precious soul—all taken, and you alone left! God must have high things in store for you. He must have a great work for you to do. Else, why are you not as one of these? Oh, think! where would you have been at this moment if God had dealt with you as with them?'

'Where I am now, I suppose,' said Tom quietly.

'Where you are now?'

'Yes, where I ought to be. I am where I ought to be now. I suppose if I had found myself anywhere else this morning, I should have taken it as a sign that I was wanted there, and not here.'

Grace heaved a sigh at words which were certainly startling. The Stoic optimism of the world-hardened doctor was new and frightful to her.

'My good madam,' said he, 'the part of Scripture which I appreciate best, just now, is the case of poor Job, where Satan has leave to rob and torment him to the utmost of his wicked will, provided only he does not touch his life. I wish,' he went on, lowering his voice, to tell you something which I do not wish publicly talked of, but in which you may help me. I had nearly fifteen hundred pounds about me when I came ashore last night, sewed in a belt round my waist. It is gone. That is all.'

Tom looked steadily at her as he spoke. She turned pale, red, pale again, her lips quivered, but she spoke no word.

'She has it, as I live!' thought Tom to himself. "'Frailty, thy name is woman!'" The canting little methodistical humbug! She must have shipped it off my waist as I lay senseless. I suppose she means to keep it in pawn, till I redeem it by marrying her. Well, I might take an uglier mate, certainly, but when I do enter into the bitter bonds of matrimony, I should like to be sure, beforehand, that my wife was not a thief!'

Why, then, did not Tom, if he were so very sure of Grace's having the belt, charge her with the theft? Because he had found out already how popular she was, and was afraid of merely making himself unpopular. Because, too, he took for granted that whosoever had his belt, had hidden it already beyond the reach of a search warrant, and because, after all, an honourable shame restrained him. It would be a poor return to the woman who had saved his life to charge her with theft the next morning, and more, there was something about that girl's face which had made him feel that, if he had seen her put the belt into her pocket before his eyes, he could not have found the heart to have sent her to gaol. 'No!' thought he, 'I'll get it out of her, or whoever has it, and stay here till I do get it. One place is as good as another to me.'

But what was Grace saying?

She had turned, after two or three minutes' astonished silence, to her mother and Captain Willis—

'Belt! Mother! Uncle! What is this? The gentleman has lost a belt!'

'Dear me!—a belt? Well, child, that's not much to grieve over, when the Lord has spared his life and soul from the pit!' said her mother, somewhat testily.

'You don't understand. A belt, I say, full of money—fifteen hundred pounds, he lost it last night. Uncle! Speak, quick! Did you see a belt?'

Willis shook his head mechanically. 'I don't, and yet I do, and yet I don't again. My brains were well-nigh washed out of me, I know. However, sir, I'll think, and talk it over with you too, for if it be in the village, found it ought to be, and will be, with God's help.'

'Found?' cried Grace, in so high a key, that Tom entreated her to calm herself, and not make the matter public. 'Found? yes, and shall be found, if there be justice in heaven. Shame, that West-country folk should turn robbers and wreckers! Mariners, too, and mariners' wives, who should be praying for those who are wandering far away, each man with his life in his hand! Ah, what a world! When will it end? soon, too soon, when West-country folk rob ships, wrecked men! But you will find your belt, yes, sir, you will find it. Wait till you have learnt to do without it. Man does not live by bread alone. Do you think he lives by gold? Only be patient, and when you are worthy of it, you shall find it again, in the Lord's good time.'

To the doctor this seemed a mere burst of jargon, invented for the purpose of hiding guilt, and his faith in womankind was not heightened when he heard Grace's mother say, salvo voce, to Willis, that 'In wrecks, and fires, and such like, a many people complained of having lost more than ever they had!'

'Oh ho! my o'ld lady, is that the way the fox is gone?' quoth Tom to that trusty counsellor, himself, and began carefully scrutinizing Mrs. Harvey's face. It had been very handsome; it was still very clever, but the eyebrows, crushed together downwards above her nose, and rising high at the outer corners, indicated, as surely as the restless down-dropt eye, a character self-conscious, furtive, capable of great inconsistencies, possibly of great deceptions.

'You don't look me in the face, old lady!' quoth Tom to himself. 'Very well! between you two it lies, unless that old gentleman implicates himself also in his approaching confession.'

He took his part at once. 'Well, well, you will oblige me by saying nothing more about it. After all as this good lady says, the loss of a little money is not worth complaining over, when one has escaped with his. Good morning, and many thanks for all your kindness!'

And Tom made another grand bow, and went off to the lieutenant.

Grace looked after him awhile, as one stunned, and then turned to her mother.

'Let us go home.'

'Go home? Why there, dear?'

'Let me go home, you need not come. I am sick of this world. Is it not enough to have misery and death?' (and she pointed to the row of coffins), 'but we must have sin, too, when- ever we turn! Misery and theft—and in gratitude too!' she added, in a lower tone.

She went homeward, her mother, in spite of her entreaties, accompanied her, and, for some reason or other, did not lose sight of her all that day, or for several days after.

Meanwhile, Willis had beckoned the doctor aside. His face was serious and sad, and his lips were trembling.

'This is a very shocking business, sir. Of course, you saw the lieutenant.'

'Not yet, my good sir.'

'But—excuse my boldness, what plainer way of getting it back from the rascal, whoever he is?'

'Wait awhile,' said Tom, 'I have my reasons.'

'But, sir, in the honour of the place, the matter should be cleared up, and till the thief is found, suspicion will lie on a dozen innocent men, myself among the rest, for that matter.'

'You?' said Tom, smiling. 'I don't know who I have the honour to speak to, but you don't look much like a gentleman who wishes for a trip to Botany Bay.'

The old man chuckled, and then his face dropped again.

'I'm glad you take the thing as like a man, sir, but it is really no laughing matter. It's a scoundrelly job, only fit for a Maltese off the New Mangery. If it had been a lot of those cater fellows that had carried you up, I could have understood it, wrecking's born in the bone of them; but for those four sailors that carried you up, 'gad, sir, they'd have been shot sooner I've known 'em from boys!' and the old man spoke quite fiercely, and looked up, his lip trembling, and his eye moist.

'There's no doubt that you are honest—whatever is not,' thought Tom, so he ventured a further question.

'Then you were by all the while?'

'All the while? Who more? And that's just what puzzles me.'

'I'day don't speak loud,' said Tom. 'I have my reasons for keeping things quiet.'

'I tell you, sir, I held the man, and big John Beer (Gentleman Jan they call him) held me, and the maid had both her hands tight in your belt. I saw it as plain as I see you, just before the wave covered us, though little I thought what was in it, and should never have remembered you had a belt at all, if I hadn't thought over things in the last five minutes.'

'Well, sir, I am lucky in having come straight to the fountain head, and must thank you for telling me so frankly what you know.'

'Tell you, sir? What else should one do but tell you? I only wish I knew more, and more I'll know, please the Lord. And you'll excuse an old sailor (though not of your rank, sir) saying that he wonders a little that you don't take the plain means of knowing more yourself.'

'May I take the liberty of asking your name?' said Tom, who saw by this time that the old man was worthy of his confidence.

'Willis, at your service, sir. Captain they call me, though I'm none. Sailing-master I was, on board of His Majesty's ship Nale, 81,' and Willis bowed his hat with such an air, that Tom raised his in return.

'Then, Captain Willis, let me have five words with you apart, first thanking you for having helped to save my life.'

'I'm very glad I did, sir, and thanked God for it on my knees this morning. But you'll excuse me, sir, I was thinking and no blame to me—more of saving my poor maid's life than yours, and no offence to you, for I hadn't the honour of knowing you, but for her, I'd have been drowned a dozen times over.'

'No offence, indeed,' said Tom, and hardly knew what to say next. 'May I ask, is she your niece? I heard her call you uncle.'

'Oh, no—no relation, only I look on her as my own, poor thing, having no father, and she always calls me uncle, as most do us old men in the West.'

'Well, then, sir,' said Tom, 'you will answer for none of the four sailors having robbed me?'

'I've said it, sir.'

'Was any one else close to her when we were brought ashore?'

'No one but I. I brought her round myself.'

'And who took her home?'

'Her mother and I.'

'Very good. And you never saw the belt after she had her hands in it?'

'No, I'm sure not.'

'Was her mother by her when she was lying on the rock?'

'No, came up afterwards, just as I got her on her feet.'

'Humph! What sort of a character is her mother?'

'Oh, a tidy, God-fearing person enough. One of these Methodist class-leaders, Quakers, they call themselves. I don't hold with them, though I do go to chapel at times, but there are good ones among them; and I do believe she's one, though she's a little fretful at times. Keeps a little shop that don't pay over well, and those preachers live on her a good deal, I think. Creeping into widows' houses, and making long prayers—you know the text.'

'Well, now, Captain Willis, I don't want to hurt your feelings, but do you not see that one of two things I must believe—either that the belt was torn off my waist, and washed back into the sea, as it may have been after all, or else, that—'

'Do you mean that she took it?' asked Willis, in a voice of such indignant astonishment that Tom could only answer by a shrug of the shoulders.

'Who else could have done so, on your own showing?'

'Sir!' said Willis slowly. 'I thought I had to do with a gentleman, but I have my doubts of it now. A poor girl risks her life to drag you out of that sea, which but for her would have hove your body up to be along with that line there,' and Willis pointed to the ghastly row—'and your soul gone to give in its last account—you only know what that would have been like—and the first thing you do in payment is to accuse her of robbing you—her, that the very angels in heaven, I believe, are glad to keep company with,' and the old man turned and paced the beach in fierce excitement.

'Captain Willis,' said Tom, 'I'll trouble you to listen patiently and civilly to me a minute.'

Willis stopped, drew himself up, and touched his hat mechanically.

'Just because I am a gentleman, I have not accused her, but held my tongue, and spoken to you in confidence. Now, perhaps, you will understand why I have said nothing to the lieutenant.'

Willis looked up at him.

'I beg your pardon, sir. I see now, and I'm sorry if I was rude, but it took me aback, and does still. I tell you, sir,' quoth he, warning again, 'whatever's true, that's false. You're wrong there, if you never are wrong again, and you'll say so yourself, before you've known her a week. No, sir! If you could make me believe that, I should never believe in goodness again on earth, but hold all men, and women too, and those above, for aught I know, that are greater than men and women, for liars together.'

What was to be answered? Perhaps only what Tom did answer.

'My good sir, I will say no more. I would not have said that much if I had thought I should have pained you so. I suppose that the belt was washed into the sea. Why not?'

'Why not, indeed, sir? That's a much wiser Christian-like way of looking at it than to blacken your own soul before God by suspecting that sweet innocent creature.'

'Be it so, then. Only say nothing about the matter, and beg them to say nothing. If it be jammed among the rocks (as it might be, heavy as it is), talking about it will only set people looking for it, and I suppose there is a man or two, even in Aberlona, who would find fifteen hundred pounds a tempting bait. If, again, some one finds it, and makes away with it, he will only be the more careful to hide it if he knows that I am on the look-out. So just tell Miss Harvey and her mother that I think it must have been lost, and beg them to keep my secret. And now shake hands with me.'

'The best plan, I believe, though bad, is the best,' said Willis, holding out his hand, and he walked away sadly. His spirit had been altogether ruffled by the imputation on Grace's character, and, besides, the chances of Thimnall's recovering his money seemed to him very small.

In five minutes he returned.

'If you would allow me, sir, there's a man there of whom I should like to ask one question. He who held me, and after that, helped to carry you up,' and he pointed to Gentleman Jan, who stood, dripping from the waist downward, over a chest which he had just secured. 'Just let us ask him, off-hand like, whether you had a belt on when he carried you up. You may trust him, sir. He'd knock you down as soon as look at you, but tell a lie, never.'

They went to the giant, and after cordial salutations, Tom propounded his question carelessly, with something like a whim.

'It's no great matter, but it was an old friend, you see, with fittings for my knife and pistols, and I should be glad to find it again.'

Jan thrust his red hand through his black curls, and meditated while the water surged round his ankles.

'Never a belt seed I, sir; leastwise while you were in my hands. I had you round the waist all the way up, so no one could have took it off. Why should they! And I undressed you myself, and nothing, save your presence, was there to get off, but jersey and trousers, and a lump of laccy against your skin that looked the right sort.'

'Have some, then,' said Tom, pulling out his honey-dew. 'As for the belt, I suppose it's gone to choke the dog-fish.'

And there the matter ended, outwardly at least, but only outwardly. Tom had his own opinion, gathered from Grace's seemingly guilty face, and to it he held, and called old Willis, in his heart, a simple-minded old dotard, who had been taken in by her hypocrisy.

And Tom accompanied the lieutenant on his dreary errand that day, and several days after, through depositions before a justice, interviews with Lloyd's underwriters, and all the sad details which follow a wreck. Ere the week's end, forty bodies and more had been recovered, and brought up, ten or twelve at a time, to the churchyard, and upon the down, and laid side by side in one long shallow pit, where Frank Headley read over them the blessed words of hope, amid the sobs of women, and the grand silence of stalwart men, who knew not how soon their turn might come, and after each procession came Grace Harvey, with all her little scholars two and two, to listen to the funeral service; and when the last corpse was buried, they planted flowers upon the mound, and went their way again to learn their hymns and read their Bible—little ministering angels, to whom, as to most sailors' children, death was too common a sight to have in it aught of hideous or strange.

And this was the end of the good ship Hesperus, and all her gallant crew.

Verily, however important the mere animal lives of men may be, and ought to be, at times, in our eyes, they never have been so, to judge from floods and earthquakes, pestilences and storm, in the eyes of Him who made and loves us all. It is a strange fact better for us, instead of shutting our eyes to it, because it interferes with our modern tenderness of pain, to ask honestly what it means.

CHAPTER V

THE WAY TO WIN THEM

So, for a week or more, Tom went on thrivingly enough, and became a general favourite in the town. Heale had no reason to complain of boarding him, for he had dinner and supper thrust on him every day by one and another, who were glad enough to have him for the sake of his stories, and songs, and endless fun and good humour. The lieutenant, above all, took the newcomer under his special patronage, and was paid for his services in some of Tom's incomparable honey-dew. The old fellow soon found that the doctor knew more than one old foreign station of his, and ended by pouring out to him his ancient wrongs, and the evil doings of the wicked admiral, all of which Tom heard with deepest sympathy, and surprise that so much naval talent had remained unappreciated by the unjust upper powers, and the lieutenant, of course, reported of him accordingly to Heale.

'A very civil spoken and intelligent youngster, Mr. Heale, d'ye see, to my mind, and you can't do better than accept his offer, for you'll find him a great help, especially among the ladies, d'ye see. They like a good-looking chap, eh, Mrs. Jones?'

On the fourth day, by good fortune, what should come ashore but Tom's own chest moneyless, alas! but with many useful matters still unspoiled by salt water. So all went well, and indeed somewhat too well (if Tom would have let it), in the case of Miss Anna Maria Heale, the doctor's daughter.

She was just such a girl as her father's daughter was likely to be, a short, stout, rosy, pretty body of twenty, with loose red lips, thwart black eyebrows, and right naughty eyes under them, of which Tom took good heed for Miss Heale was exceedingly inclined, he saw, to make use of them in his behoof. Let others who have experience in, and taste for such matters, declare how she set her cap at the dapper young surgeon, how she rushed into the shop with sweet abandon ten times a day, to find her father, and, not finding him, giggled, and blushed, and shook her shoulders, and retired to peep at Tom through the glass door which led into the parlour, how she discovered that the muslin curtain of the said door would get out of order every ten minutes, and at last called Mr Thurnall to assist her in rearranging it, how, bolder grown, she came into the shop to help herself to various matters, inquiring tenderly for Tom's health, and giggling vulgar sentiments about 'absent friends, and hearts left behind', in the hope of fishing out whether Tom had a sweetheart or not. How, at last, she was minded to confide her own health to Tom, and to install him as her private physician, yea, and would have made him feel her pulse on the spot, had he not luckily found some assafoetida, and therewith so perfumed the shop, that her 'nerves' (of which she was always talking, though she had nerves only in the sense wherein a sirloin of beef has them) forced her to beat a retreat.

But she returned again to the charge next day, and rushed bravely through that fearful snail, cleaver in hand, as the carrier set down at the door a lunge box, carriage paul, all the way from London, and directed to Thomas Thurnall, Esquire. She would help to open it, and so she did, while old Heale and his wife stood by curious,—he with a mandarin wonder and awe (for he regarded Tom airily as an altogether awful and incomprehensible 'party'), and Mrs Heale with a look of incredulous scorn, as if she expected the box to be a mere sham, filled probably with shavings. For (from reasons best known to herself) she had never looked pleasantly on the arrangement which entrusted to Tom the care of the bottles. She had given way from motives of worldly prudence, even of necessity, for Heale had been for the greater part of the week quite incapable of attending to his business, but black envy and spite were seething in her foolish heart, and soothed more and more fiercely when she saw that the box did not contain shavings, but valuables of every sort and kind—drugs, instruments, a large microscope (which Tom delivered out of Miss Heale's fat clumsy fingers only by strong warnings that it would go off and shoot her), books full of prints of unspeakable monsters, and finally, a little packet, containing not one five-pound note, but four, and a letter which Tom, after perusing, put into Mr. Heale's hands with a look of honest pride.

The Mumpsimus man, it appeared, had 'sent round the hat' for him, and here were the results, and they would send the hat round again every month, if he wanted it, or, if he would come up, board, lodge, and wash him gratis. The great Doctor Bellairs, House Physician, and Carver, the famous operator (names at which Heale bowed his head and worshipped), sent compliments, condolences, offers of employment—never was so triumphant a testimonial, and Heale, in his simplicity, thought himself (as indeed he was) the luckiest of country doctors, while Mrs. Heale, after swelling and choking for five minutes, tottered into the back room, and cast herself on the sofa in violent hysterics.

As she came round again, Tom could not but overhear a little that passed. And thus he overheard among other matters—

'Yes, Mr Heale, I see, I see too well, which your natural blindness, sir, and that fatal easiness of temper, will bring you to a premature grave within the paupers' precincts, and this young designing infidel, with his science and his magnifiers, and his callipers, and philosophy falsely so called, which in our true Protestant youth there was none, nor needed none, to supplant you in your old age, and take the bread out of your gray hairs, which he will bring with sorrow to the grave, and mine likewise, which am like my poor infant here, of only too sensitive sensibilities! Oh, Anna Maria, my child, my poor lost child! which I can feel for the tenderness of the inexperienced heart! My Virgin Eve, which the Serpent has entered into your youthful paradise, and you will find, alas! too late, that you have warmed an adder into your bosom!'

'Oh, ma, how judcheats!' giggled Anna Maria, evidently not displeased. 'If you don't mind he will hear you, and I should never be able to look him in the face again.' And therewith she looked round to the glass door.

What more passed, Tom did not choose to hear, for he began making all the bustle he could in the shop, merely saying to himself—

'That flood of eloquence is symptomatic enough I'll lay my life the old dame knows her way to the lundatum bottle.'

Tom's next business was to ingratiate himself with the young curate. He had found out already, cunning fellow, that any extreme intimacy with Headley would not increase his general popularity, and, as we have seen already, he bore no great affection to 'the cloth' in general, but the curate was an educated gentleman, and Tom wished for some more rational conversation than that of the lieutenant and Heale. Besides, he was one of those men with whom the possession of power, sought at first from self-interest, has become a passion, a species of sporting, which he follows for its own sake. To whomsoever he met he must needs apply the moral stethoscope, sound him, lungs, heart, and liver, put his tissues under the microscope, and try conclusions on him to the uttermost. They might be useful hereafter, for knowledge was power or they might not. What matter? Every fresh specimen of humanity which he examined was so much gained in general knowledge. Very true, Thomas Thurnall, provided the method of examination be the sound and the deep one, which will lead you down in each case to the real living heart of humanity; but what if your method be altogether a shallow and a cynical one, savouring much more of Gil Blas than of St. Paul, grounded not on faith and love for human beings, but on something very like suspicion and contempt? You will be but too likely, doctor, to make the coarsest mistakes, when you fancy yourself most penetrating, to mistake the mere scurf and disease of the character for its healthy organic tissue, and to find out at last, somewhat to your confusion, that there are more things, not only in heaven, but in the earthiest of the earth, than are dreamt of in your philosophy. You have already set down Grace Harvey as a hypocrite, and Willis as a dotard. Will you make up your mind, in the same foolishness of over-wisdom, that Frank Headley is a merely narrow-headed and hard-hearted pedant, quite unaware that he is living an inner life of doubts, struggles, prayers, self-reproaches, noble hunger after an ideal of moral excellence, such as you, friend Tom, never yet dreamed of, which would be to you as an unintelligible gibber of shadows out of dreamland, but which is to him the only reality, the life of life, for which everything is to be risked and suffered? You treat his opinions (though he never thrusts them on you) about 'the Church,' and his duty, and the souls of his parishioners, with civil indifference, as much ado about nothing, and his ritual eccentricities as puerilities. You have already made up your mind to 'try and put a little common sense into him,' not because it is any concern of yours whether he has common sense or not, but because you think that it will be better for you to have the parish at peace, but has it ever occurred to you how noble the man is, even in his mistakes? How that one thought, that the finest thing in the world is to be utterly good, and to make others good also, puts him three heavens at least above you, your most unangelic terror-dog, bowered all day long by gubbling after vermin! What if his idea of 'the Church' be some what too narrow for the year of grace 1854, is it no honour to him that he has such an idea at all, that there has risen up before him the vision of a perfect polity, a 'Divine and wonderful Order,' linking earth to heaven, and to the very throne of Him who died for men, witnessing to each of its citizens what the world tries to make him forget, namely, that he is the child of God himself, and guiding and strengthening him, from the cradle to the grave, to do his Father's work? Is it a shame to him that he has seen that such a polity must exist, that he believes that it does exist, or that he thinks he finds it in its highest, if not its perfect form, in the most ancient and august traditions of his native land? True, he has much to learn, and you may teach him something of it, but you will find some day, Thomas Thurnall, that, granting you to be at one pole of the English character, and Frank Headley at the other, he is as good an Englishman as you, and can teach you more than you can him.

The two soon began to pass almost every evening together, pleasantly enough, for the reckless and rattling manner which Tom assumed with the mob, he laid aside with the curate, and showed himself as agreeable a companion as man could need; while Tom in his turn found that Headley was a rational and sweet-tempered man, who, even where he had made up his mind to differ, could hear an adverse opinion, put sometimes in a startling shape, without falling into any of those male hysterics of sacred horror, which are the usual refuge of ignorance and stupidity, terrified by what it cannot refute. And soon Tom began to lay aside the reserve which he usually assumed to clergymen, and to tread on ground which Headley would gladly have avoided. For, to tell the truth, ever since Tom had heard of Grace's intended dismissal, the curate's opinions had assumed a practical importance in his eyes - and he had vowed in secret that, if his cunning failed him not, turned out of her school she should not be. Whether she had stolen his money or not, she had saved his life, and nobody should wrong her, if he could help it. Besides, perhaps she had not his money. The belt might have slipped off in the struggle, some one else might have taken it all in carrying him up, he might have mistaken the shame of innocence in her face for that of guilt. Be it as it might, he had not the heart to make the matter public, and contented himself with staying at Abernethy, and watching for every hint of his lost treasure.

By which it befell that he was thinking, the half of every day at least, about Grace Harvey and her face was seldom out of his mind's eye, and the more he looked at it, either in fancy or in fact, the more did it fascinate him. They met but rarely, and then interchanged the most simple and modest of salutations - but Tom liked to meet her, would have gladly stopped to chat with her, however, whether from modesty or from a guilty conscience, she always hurried on in silence.

And shot Tom's request to her, through Willis, to say nothing about the matter, she had obeyed, as her mother also had done. That Tom suspected her was a thought which never crossed her mind, to suspect any one herself was in her eyes a sin, and if the fancy that this manner that, among the sailors who had carried Tom up to Hale's, might have been capable of the baseness, she thrust the thought from her, and prayed to be forgiven for her much-abled judgment.

But night and day there weighed on that strange and delicate spirit the shame of the deed, as heavily, if possible, as if she herself had been the doer. There was another soul in danger of perdition, another black spot of sin, making earth hideous to her. The village was disgraced, not in the public eyes, true - but in the eye of heaven, and in the eyes of that stranger for whom she was beginning to feel an interest more intense than she ever had done in any human being before. Her saintliness (for Grace was a saint in the truest sense of that word) had long since made her free of that 'communion of saints' which consists not in Pharisaic isolation from 'the world,' not in the mutual flatteries and congratulations of a self-concocted clique, but which bears the sins and carries the sorrows of all around—whose atmosphere is disappointed hopes and plans for good, and the indignation which hates the sin because it loves the sinner, and sacred fear and pity for the self-inflated miseries of those who might be (so runs the dream, and will run till it becomes a waking reality) strong, and free, and safe, by being good and wise. 'To such a spirit' this bold cunning man had come, stiff-necked and heaven-defiant, a 'brand plucked from the burning'—and yet equally unconscious of his danger, and thankless for his rescue. Given, too, as it were, into her hands, tossed at her feet out of the very mouth of the pit—why but that she might save him? A far duller heart, a far narrower indignation than Grace's would have done what Grace's did concentrate themselves round the image of that man with all the love of woman. For, ere long, Grace found that she did love that man, as a woman loves but once in her life, perhaps in all time to come. She found that her heart throbbled, her cheek flushed, when his name was mentioned, that she watched, almost unawares to herself, for his passing, and she was not ashamed of the discovery. It was a sort of melancholy comfort to her that there was a great gulf fixed between them. His station, his acquirements, his great connections and friends in London (for all Tom's matters were the gossip of the town, as, indeed, he took care that they should be), made it impossible that he should ever think of her, and therefore she held herself excused for thinking of him, without any fear of that 'self-seeking,' and 'inordinate affection,' and 'unsanctified passions,' which her religious books had taught her to dread. Besides, he was not 'a Christian.' That five minutes on the shore had told her that, and even if her station had been the same as his, she must not be 'unequally yoked with an unbeliever.' And thus the very hopelessness of her love became its food and strength, the feeling which she would have checked with maidenly modesty, had it been connected even remotely with marriage, was allowed to take immediate and entire dominion, and she held herself permitted to keep him next her heart of hearts, because she could do nothing for him but pray for his conversion.

And pray for him she did, the noble, guileless girl, day and night, that he might be converted, that he might prosper, and become—perhaps rich, at least useful, a mighty instrument in some good work. And then she would build up a beautiful castle in the air after another, out of her fancies about what such a man, whom she had invested in her own mind with all the wisdom of Solomon, might do if his 'talents were sanctified.' Then she prayed that he might recover his lost gold—when it was good for him, that he might discover the thief—no—that would only involve fresh shame and sorrow, that the thief, thou, might be brought to repentance, and confession, and restitution. That was the solution of the dark problem, and for that she prayed, while her face grew sadder and sadder day by day.

For a while, ever and above the pain which the theft caused her, there came—how could it be otherwise?—sudden pangs of regret that this same love was hopeless, at least upon this side of the grave. Inconsistent they were with the chivalrous selfishness of her usual temper, and as such she dashed them from her, and conquered them, albeit a while, by a method which many a woman knows too well. It was but 'one cross more', a natural part of her destiny—the child of sorrow and heaviness of heart. Pleasure in joy she was never to find on earth, she would find it, then, in grief. And musing her own melancholy, she went on her way, sad, sweet, and steadfast, and lavished more care and tenderness, and even gaiety, than ever upon her neighbours' children, because she knew that she should never have a child of her own.

But there is a third dunsel, to whom, whether more or less engaging than Grace Harvey or Miss Heale, my readers must needs be introduced. Let Miss Heale herself do it, with eyes full of jealous enmity.

'There is a foreign letter for Mr. Thurnall, marked Montreal, and sent on here from Whitbury,' said she, one morning at breakfast, and in a significant tone, for the address was evidently in a woman's hand.

'For me? ah, yes, I see,' said Tom, taking it carelessly, and thrusting it into his pocket.

'Won't you read it at once, Mr. Thurnall? I'm sure you must be anxious to hear from friends abroad,' with an emphasis on the word friends.

'I have a good many acquaintances all over the world, but no friends that I am aware of,' said Tom, and went on with his breakfast.

'Ah—but some people are more than friends. Are the Montreal ladies pretty, Mr. Thurnall?'

'Don't know, for I never was there.'

Miss Heale was silent, being mystified—and, moreover, not quite sure whether Montreal was in India or in Australia, and not willing to show her ignorance.

She watched Tom through the glass door all the morning to see if he read the letter, and betrayed any emotion at its contents. But Tom went about his business as usual, and, as far as she saw, never read it at all.

However, it was read in due time, for, hiding himself in a lonely place that afternoon, Tom pulled it out with an anxious face, and read a letter written in a hasty ill-formed hand, underscored at every fifth word, and plentifully beset with notes of exclamation.

'What? my dearest friend, and fortune still frowns upon you? You father blind and ruined! Ah, that I were there to comfort him for your sake! And ah, that I were anywhere, doing any drudgery, which might prevent my being still a burden to my benefactors. Not that they are unkind, not that they are not angels! I told them at once that you could send me no more money till you reached England, perhaps not then, and they answered that God would send it that He who had sent me to them would send the means of supporting me, and ever since they have redoubled their kindness but it is intolerable, this dependence, and on you, too, who have a father to support in his darkness. Oh, how I feel for you! But to tell you the truth, I pay a price for this dependence. I must needs be staid and sober, I must needs dress like any Quakeress, I must not read this book or that, and my Shelley taken from me, I suppose, because it spoke too much "Liberty," though, of course, the reason given was its unkind opinions—is replaced by Lea's Serious Call. 'Tis all right and good, I don't not, but it is very dreary, as dreary as these black fir forests, and brown snake fences, and that dreadful, dreadful Canadian winter which is past, which went to my very heart, day after day, like a sword of ice. Another such winter, and I shall die, as one of my own humming-birds would die, did you cage him here, and prevent him from fleeing home to the sunny South when the first leaves begin to fall. Dear children of the sun! my heart goes forth to them, and the whir of their wings is music to me, for it tells me of the South, the glaring South, with its glorious flowers, and glorious woods, its luxuriance, life, heroic enjoyments. Let fierce sorrows come with them, if it must be so! Let me take the evil with the good, and live my rich wild life through bliss and agony, like a true daughter of the sun, instead of crystallizing slowly here into ice, and countenances rigid with respectability, sharpened by the lust of gain, without taste, without emotion, without even sorrow! Let who will be the stagnant mill head, crawling in its ugly spade-cut ditch to turn the mill. Let me be the wild mountain brook, which foams and flashes over the rocks—what if they tell it?—it leaps then nevertheless, and goes laughing on its way. Let me go thus, for weal or woe! And if I sleep a while, let it be like the brook, beneath the shade of fragrant magnolias and luxuriant vines, and images, meanwhile, in my bosom nothing but the beauty around.

Yes, my friend, I can live no longer this dull chrysalid life, in comparison with which, at times, even that past dark dream seems tolerable—for amid its lurid smoke were flashes of brightness. A slave? Well, I ask myself at times, and what were women meant for but to be slaves? Free them, and they enslave themselves again, or languish unsatisfied, for they must love. And what blame to them if they love a white man, tyrant though he be, rather than a fellow-slave? If the men of our own race will claim us, let them prove themselves worthy of us! Let them rise, exterminate their tyrants, or, failing that, show that they know how to die. Till then, those who are the masters of their bodies will be the masters of our hearts. If they crouch before the white like brutes, what wonder if we look up to him as to a god? Woman must worship, or be wretched. Do I not know it? Have I not had my dream—too beautiful for earth? Was there not one whom you knew, to hear whom call no slave would have been rapture, to whom I would have answered on my knees, Master, I leave no will but yours? But that is past—past. One happiness alone was possible for a slave, and even that they tore from me, and now I have no thought, no purpose, save revenge.

"These good people bid me forgive my enemies. Easy enough for them, who have no enemies to forgive. Forgive? Forgive injustice, oppression, baseness, cruelty? Forgive the devil, and bid him go in peace, and work his wicked will? Why have they put into my hands, these last three years, books worthy of a free nation? books which call patriotism divine, which tell me how in every age and clime men have been called heroes who rose against their conquerors, women martyrs who stabbed their tyrants, and then died? Hypocrites! Did their grandfathers meekly turn the other cheek when your English taxed them somewhat too heavily? Do they not now teach every school-child to glory in their own revolution, their own declaration of independence, and to flatter themselves into the conceit that they are the lords of creation, and the examples of the world, because they asserted that sacred right of resistance which is discovered to be unchristian in the African? They will free us, forsooth, in good time (is it to be in God's good time, or in their own?), if we will but be patient, and endure the rice-swamp, the scourge, the slave-market, and shame unspcakable, a few years more, till all is ready and set—for them. Dreamers as well as hypocrites! What nation was ever freed by other's help? I have been reading history to see,—you do not know how much I have been reading,—and I find that freemen have always freed themselves as we must do, and as they will never let us do, because they know that with freedom must come retribution, that our Southern tyrants have an account to render, which the cold Northerner has no heart to see him pay. For, after all, he loves the Southerner better than the slave, and fears him more also. What if the Southern aristocrat, who looks it over him as the panther does over the ox, should transfer (as he has threatened many a time) the cowhide from the negro's loins to his? No, we must free our selves! And there lives one woman, at least, who, having gained her freedom, knows how to use it in eternal war against all tyrants. Oh, I could go down, I think at moments, down to New Orleans itself, with a brain and lips of fire, and speak words—you know how I could speak them—which would bring me in a week to the scourge, perhaps to the stake. The scourge I could endure. Have I not felt it already? Do I not bear its scars even now, and glory in them, for they were won by speaking as a woman should speak? And even the fire?—Have not women been martyrs already? and could not I be one? Might not my torments madden a people to manhood, and my name become a war-cry in the sacred fight! And yet, oh my friend, life is sweet!—and my little day has been so dark and gloomy!—may I not have one hour's sunshine ere youth and vigour are gone, and my swift-vanishing Southern womanhood wrinkles itself up into despondent old age? Oh, counsel me, — help me, my friend, my preserver, my true master now, so brave, so wise, so all-knowing, under whose mask of cynicism lies hid (have I not cause to know it?) the heart of a hero.

'MARIE.'

If Miss Heale could have watched Tom's face as he read, much more could she have heard his words as he finished, all jealousy would have passed from her mind for as he read, the cynical smile grew sharper and sharper, turning a bit prelude for the 'Little fool' which was his only comment.

'I thought you would have fallen in love with some honest fellow years ago but a martyr you shan't be, even if I have to send for you hither, though how to get you hither to eat I don't know. However, you have been reading your book, it seems, — clever enough you always were, and too clever, so you could go out as governess, or something. Why, here's a postscript dated three months afterwards! Ah, I see, this letter was written last July, in answer to my Australian one. What's the meaning of this?' And he began reading again.

'I wrote so far, but I had not the heart to send it, it was so full of repetitions. And now then, — must I tell the truth? — I have made a step, do not call it a desperate one, do not blame me, for your blame I cannot bear, but I have gone on the stage. There was no other means of independence open to me, and I had a dream, I have it still, that there, if anywhere, I might do my work. You told me that I might become a great actress. I have set my heart on becoming one, on learning to move the hearts of men, till the time comes when I can tell them, show them, in living flesh and blood, upon the stage, the secrets of a slave's sorrows, and that slave a woman. The time has not come for that yet here. But I have had my success already, more than I could have expected, and not only in Canada, but in the States. I have been at New York, acting to crowded houses. Ah, when they applauded me, how I longed to speak! to point out my whole soul to them, and call upon them, as men, to — But that will come in time. I have found a friend, who has promised to write dramas especially for me. Merely republican ones at first, in which I can give full vent to my passion, and hurl forth the eternal laws of liberty, which their conscience may — must — at last, apply for themselves. But soon, he says, we shall be able to dare to approach the real subject, if not in America, still in Europe, and then, I trust, the coloured actress will stand forth as the championess of her race, of all who are oppressed, in every capital in Europe, save, alas! Italy and the Austria who crushes her. I have taken, I should tell you, an Italian name. It was better I thought, to hide my African taint, forsooth, for awhile. So the wise New Yorkers have been sitting, as Maria Cordiamina, the white woman (for am I not fairer than many an Italian signora?), whom they would have looked on as an inferior being under the name of Marie Livingston though there is finer old English blood running in my veins, from your native Berkshire, they say, than in many a Down-Easter's who hangs upon my lips. Address me henceforth, then, as La Signora Maria Cordiamina. I am learning fast, by the bye, to speak Italian. I shall be at Quebec till the end of the month. Then, I believe, I come to London, and we shall meet once more, and I shall thank you, thank you thank you, once more, for all your unworldly kindnesses.'

'Triumph!' said Tom, after a while. 'Well, she is old enough to choose for herself. Fifty-and-twenty she must be by now. As for the stage, I suppose it is the best place for her, better, at least, than turning governess, and going mad, as she would do, over her drudgery and her dreams. But who is this friend? Singing-master, scribbler, or political refugee? or perhaps all three together? A dark lot, those fellows. I must keep my eye on him though it's no concern of mine. I've done my duty by the poor thing, the devil himself can't deny that. But somehow, if this play writing worthy plays her false, I feel very much as if I should be loud enough to try whether I had for gotten my pistol-shooting.'

CHAPTER VI

AN OLD FOE WITH A NEW FACE

'This child's head is dreadfully hot, and how yellow he does look!' says Mrs Vavasour, fussing about in her little nursery. 'Oh, Clara, what shall I do? I really dare not give them any more medicine myself, and that horrid old Dr. Heale is worse than no one.'

'Ah, ma'am,' says Clara, who is privileged to become herself, and to have sad confidence made to her, 'at we were but in town now, to see Mr. Chivers, or any one that could be trusted, but in this dreadful out-of-the-way place—'

'Don't talk of that, Clara! Oh, what will become of the poor children!' And Mrs Vavasour sits down and cries, as she does three times at least every week.

'But indeed, ma'am, if you thought you could trust him, there is that new assistant—'

'The man who was saved from the wreck? Why, nobody knows who he is.'

'Oh, but indeed, ma'am, he is a very nice gentleman, I can say that, and so wonderfully clever, and has cured so many people already, they say, and got down a lot of new medicines

(for he has great friends among the doctors in town), and such a wonderful magnifying glass, with which he showed me himself, as I dropped into the shop promiscuous, such horrible things, ma'am, in a drop of water, that I haven't dared hardly to wash my face since.'

And what good will the magnifying glass do to us?' says the poor little Irish soul, laughing up through its tears. 'He won't want it to see how ill poor Frederick is, I'm sure, but you may send for him, Clara.'

'I'll go myself, ma'am, and make sure,' says Clara, glad enough of a run, and chance of a chat with the young doctor.

And in half an hour Mr Thurnall is announced.

Though Mrs. Vavasour has a flannel apron on (for she will wash the children herself, in spite of Elsley's grumbings), Tom sees that she is a lady, and puts on, accordingly, his very best manner, which, as his experience has long since taught him, is no manner at all.

He does his work quietly and kindly, and bows himself out.

'You will be sure to send the medicine immediately, Mr Thurnall.'

'I will bring it myself, madam, and, if you like, administer it. I think the young gentleman has made friends with me sufficiently already.'

Tom keeps his word, and is back, and away again to his shop, in a marvellously short space, leaving 'struck a fresh root,' as he calls it, fir—

'What a very well-beloved sensible man that Mr Thurnall is,' says Laura to Elsley, an hour after, as she meets him coming in from the garden, where he has been polishing his 'Wreck.' 'I am sure he understands his business,' he was so kind and quiet, and yet so ready, and seemed to know all the child's symptoms before hand, in such a strange way. I do hope he'll stay here. I feel happier about the poor children than I have for a long time.'

'Thurnall?' asks Elsley, who is too absorbed in the 'Wreck' to ask after the children, but the name catches his ear.

'Mr Heale's new assistant—the man who was wrecked,' answers she, too absorbed, in her turn, in the children to notice her husband's startled face.

'Thurnall? Which Thurnall?'

'Do you know the name? It's not a common one,' says she, moving to the door.

'No—not a common one at all. You said the children were not well?'

'I am glad that you thought of asking after the poor things.'

'Why, really, my dear—' But before he can finish his excuse (probably not worth hearing), she has trotted upstairs again to the nest, and is as busy as ever. Possibly Clara might do the greater part of what she does, and do it better, but still are they not her children? Let those who will call a mother's care mere animal instinct, and liken it to that of the sparrow or the spider; shall we not rather call it a Divine inspiration, and doubt whether the sparrow and the spider must not have souls to be saved, if they, too, show forth that faculty of maternal love which is, of all human feelings, most inexplicable and most self-sacrificing, and therefore, surely, most heavenly? If that does not come down straight from heaven, a 'good and perfect gift,' then what is heaven, and what the gifts which it sends down?

But poor Elsley may have had solid reasons for thinking more of the name of Thurnall than of his children's health, we will hope so for his sake, for, after sundry melodramatic parings and stunts (Elsley was of a melodramatic turn, and fond of a scene, even when he had no spectator, not even a looking-glass), besides ejaculations of 'It cannot be!' 'If it were!' 'I trust not!' 'A fresh ghost to torment me!' 'When will come the end of this accursed evil which I have wound round my life!' and so forth, he decided aloud that the suspense was intolerable, and enclosing himself in his poetical cloak and Mazzini wide-awake, strode down to the town, and into the shop. And as he entered it, 'his heart sank to his girdle, and his knees below were loosed.' For there, making up pills, in a pair of brown-holland sleeves of his own manufacture (for Tom was a good scamster, as all travellers should be) whistled Lilliputero, as of old, the Tom of other days, which Elsley's nurse would fain have buried in a thousand Letheas.

Elsley came forward to the counter carelessly, nevertheless, after a moment. 'What with my beard, and the lapse of time,' thought he, 'I cannot know me.' So he spoke—

'I understand you have been visiting my children, sir. I hope you did not find them seriously indisposed?'

'Mr Vavasour?' says Tom, with a low bow.

'I am Mr Vavasour.' But Elsley was a loud actor, and hesitated and coloured so much as he spoke, that if Tom had known nothing, he might have guessed something.

'Nothing serious, I assure you, sir, unless you are come to announce any fresh symptom.'

'Oh, no—not at all—that is—I was passing my way to the quay, and thought it as well to have your own assurance.' Mrs. Vavasour is so over-anxious.

'You seem to partake of her infirmity, sir,' says Tom, with a smile and a bow. 'However, it is one which does you both honour.'

An awkward pause.

'I hope I am not taking a liberty, sir, but I think I am bound to—'

'What in heaven is he going to say?' thought Elsley to himself, feeling very much inclined to run away.

'Thank you for all the pleasure and instruction which your writings have given me in lonely hours, and lonely places too. Your first volume of poems has been read by one man, at least, beside wild watch-fires in the Rocky Mountains.'

Tom did not say that he pitched the said volume into the river in disgust, and that it was, probably, long since used up as house material by the caddis-baits of those parts, - for doubtless there are caddises there as elsewhere.

Poor Elsley rose at the last, and smiled and bowed in silence.

'I have been so long absent from England, and in utterly wild countries, too, that I need hardly be ashamed to ask if you have written anything since The Soul's Agony? No doubt, if you have, I might have found it at Melbou no on my way home, but my visit there was a very hurried one. However, the loss is mine, and the fault too, as I ought to call it.'

'Pray make no excuses,' says Elsley, delighted. 'I have written, of course. Who can help writing, sir, while Nature is so glorious, and man so wretched? One cannot but take refuge from the pettiness of the real in the contemplation of the ideal. Yes, I have written. I will send you my last book down. I don't know whether you will find me improved.'

'How can I doubt that I shall?'

'Saddened, perhaps, perhaps more severe in my taste, but we will not talk of that. I owe you a debt, sir, for having furnished me with one of the most striking "motifs" I ever had. I mean that miraculous escape of yours. It is seldom enough, in this dull every-day world, one stumbles on such an incident ready made to one's hands, and needing only to be described as one sees it.'

And the weak vain man chattered on, and ended by telling Tom all about his poem of 'The Wreck,' in a tone which seemed to imply that he had done Tom a serious favour, perhaps raised him to immortality, by putting him in a book.

Tom thanked him gravely for the said honour, bowed him at last out of the shop, and then vaulted back clean over the counter, as soon as Elsley was out of sight, and commenced an Indian war-dance of frantic character, accompanying himself by an extemporaneous chant, with which the name of John Briggs was frequently intermingled -

"If I don't know you, Johnny, my boy,
In spite of all your blarney,
Why then I am a slow-witted fellow,
Than ever has yet appeared."

'Oh! if it was but he! what a card for me! What a world it is for poor honest muscals like me to try a fall with!'

"Why didn't I take bad verse to make,
And call it poetry,
And so make up to an earl's daughter,
Which was of high degree?"

But perhaps I am wrong after all, no—I saw he knew me, the humbug, though he never was a humbug, never rose above the rank of fool. However, I'll make assurance doubly sure, and then—if it pays me not to tell him I know him, I won't tell him, and if it pays me to tell him,

I will tell him. Just as you choose, my good Mr. Post.' And Tom returned to his work singing an extemporaneous parody of 'We met, 'twas in a crowd,' ending with—in a howl so doleful, that Mrs. Heale marched into the shop, evidently making up her mind for an explosion.

'And thou art the cause of this anguish, my pill box,'

'I am very sorry, sir, to have to speak to you upon such a subject, but I must say, that the profane songs, sir, which our house is not at all accustomed to them, not to mention that at your time of life, and in your position, sir, as my husband's assistant, though there's no saying' (with a meaning toss of the head) 'how long it may last,'—and there, her gramma having got into a hopeless knot, she stopped.

Tom looked at her cheerfully and fixedly. 'I had been expecting this,' said he to himself. 'Better show the old cat at once that I carry claws as well as she.'

'There is saying, madam, humbly begging your pardon, how long my present engagement will last. It will last just as long as I like.'

Mrs. Heale boiled over with rage, but ere the geyser could explode, Tom had continued in that dogged, nasal Yankee twang which he assumed when he was venomous.

'As for the songs, ma'am, there are two ways of making oneself happy in this life, you can judge for yourself which is best. One is to do one's work like a man, and hum a tune, to keep one's spirits up, the other is to let the work go to rack and ruin, and keep one's spirits up, if one is a gentleman, by a little too much brandy, if one is a lady, by a little too much laudanum.'

'Laudanum, you?' almost screamed Mrs. Heale, turning pale as death.

'The pint bottle of best laudanum, which I had from town a fortnight ago, ma'am, is now nearly empty, ma'am. I will make affidavit that I have not used a hundred drops, or drunk one. I suppose it was the cat. Cats have queer tastes in the West, I believe. I have heard the cat coming downstairs into the surgery, once or twice, after I was in bed, so I set my door ajar a little, and saw her come up again, but whether she had a vial in her paws—'

'Oh, sir!' says Mrs. Heale, bursting into tears. 'And after the dreadful toothache which I have had this fortnight, which nothing but a little laudanum would ease it, and at my time of life, to mock a poor elderly lady's infirmities, which I did not look for this cruelty and outrage!'

'Dry your tears, my dear madam,' says Tom, in his most winning tone. 'You will always find me the thorough gentleman, I am sure. If I had not been one, it would have been easy enough for me, with my powerful London connections, - though I won't boast, - to get up in opposition to your good husband, instead of saving him labour in his good old age. Only, my dear madam, how shall I get the laudanumbottle refilled without the doctor's—you understand?

The wretched old woman hurried upstairs, and brought him down a half-sovereign out of her private hoard, trembling like an aspen leaf, and departed.

'So—scotched, but not killed. You'll gossip and he too. Never trust a landlamm drinker. You'll see me, by the eye of imagination, committing all the seven deadly sins, and by the tongue of inspiration go forth and proclaim the same at the town-head. I can't kill you, and I can't cure you, so I must endure you. What said old Goethe, in all the German I ever cared to recollect—

"Der Wallfisch hat doch seine Lais, Muss auch die meine haben."

'Now, then, for Mrs Ponberthy's draughts. I wonder how that pretty schoolmistress goes on. If she were but honest, now, and had fifty thousand pounds why then, she wouldn't marry me, and so why now, I wouldn't marry she,—as my native Berkshire grammar would render it.'

CHAPTER VII

LA CORDIFIANNA

THIS chapter shall begin good reader, with one of those startling bursts of 'illustration,' with which our most popular preachers are wont now to astonish and edify their hearers, and after starting with them at the opening of the sermon from the north pole, the Crystal Palace, or the nearest cabbage-garden, float them safe, upon the gushing stream of oratory, to the safe and well-known shores of doctrinal commonplaces, lost in admiration at the skill of the good man who can thus make all roads lead, if not to heaven, at least to strong language about its opposite. True, the logical sequence of their periods may be, like that of the coming one, somewhat questionable, reminding one at moments of Eucliden's comparison between Macedon and Monmouth, Henry the Fifth and Alexander. But, in the logic of the pulpit, all's well that end's well, and the end must needs sanctify the means. There is, of course, some connection or other between all things in heaven and earth, or how would the universe hold together? And if one has not time to find out the true connection, what is left but to invent the best one can for one's self? Thus argues, probably, the popular preacher, and fills his pews, proving thereby clearly the excellence of his method. So argue also, probably, the popular poets, to whose 'luxuriant fauney' everything suggests anything, and thought plays leap-frog with thought down one page and up the next, till one fancies at moments that they had got permission from the higher powers, before looking at the universe, to stir it all up a few times with a spoon. It is notorious, of course, that poets and preachers alike pride themselves upon this method of astonishing, that the former call it, 'seeing the infinite in the finite', the latter, 'pressing secular matters into the service of the sanctuary,' and other pretty phrases which, for reverence' sake, shall be omitted. No doubt they have their reasons and their reward. The style takes, the style pays, and what more would you have? Let them go on rejoicing, in spite of the cynical podants in the Saturday Review, who dare to accuse (will it be believed?) those luminaries of the age of talking merely irreverent nonsense. Meanwhile, so evident is the success (sole test of merit) which has attended the new method, that it is worth while trying whether it will not be as taking in the novel as it is in the chapel, and therefore the reader is requested to pay special attention to the following paragraph, modelled carefully after the exordiums of a famous Irish preacher, now drawing crowded houses at the West End of Town. As thus—'It is the pleasant month of May, when, as in old Chaucer's time, the—

"Smale foules maken melodie,
That sleepen alle night with open eye
So priketh hem nature in their songes.
Then longen folk to go on pilgrimages,
And specially from every shire a end
Of Englond, to Exeter hall they wend," till the low places of the Strand blossom with white cravats, those hills of the valley, types of meekness and humility, at least in the pious palmer—and why not of similar virtues in the undertaker, the concert-singer, the grocer, the tavern-writer, the roustabout at the gaming-table, and Frederick Augustus Lord Scouthlash, who, white cravated like the rest, is just getting into his cab at the door of the Never-mind-what Theatre, to spend an hour at Kensington before sauntering in to Lady M—'s ball?

Why not, I ask, at least in the case of little Scouthlash? For Guardsman though he is coming from a theatre and going to a ball, there is meekness and humility in him at this moment, as well as in the average of the white-cravated gentlemen who trotted along that same pavement about eleven o'clock this forenoon. Why should not his white cravat, like theirs, be held symbolic of that fact? However, Scouthlash belongs rather to the former than the latter of Chaucer's categories, for a 'smale foule' he is, a little bad-like fellow, who maketh melodie also, and warbles like a cock-rolan, we cannot liken him to any more dignified songster. Moreover, he will sleep all night with open eye, for he will not be in bed till five to-morrow morning, and pricked he is, and that sorely, in his courage, for he is as much in love as his little nature can be with the new actress, La Signora Cordifiamina, of the Never-mind-what Theatre.

How exquisitely, now (for this is one of the rare occasions in which a man is permitted to praise himself), is established hereby an unexpected bond of linked sweetness long drawn out between things which had, ere they came beneath the magic touch of genius, no more to do with each other than this book has with the Stock Exchange. Who would have dreamed of travelling from the Tabard in Southwark to the last new singer, vid Eveter-hall and the lilies of the valley, and touching en passant on two cardinal virtues and an Irish Viscount? But see, given only a little impudence, and less logic, and hey presto! the thing is done, and all that remains to be done is to dilute (as the Rev Dionysius O'Blaraway would do at this stage of the process) upon the moral question which has been so cunningly raised, and to inquire, firstly, how the virtues of meekness and humility could be predicated of Frederick Augustus St Just, Viscount Scoutbush and Baron Torytown, in the peerage of Ireland, and secondly, how those virtues were called into special action by his questionably wise attachment to a new actress, to whom he had never spoken a word in his life.

First, then, 'Little Freddy Scoutbush,' as his compoers irreverently termed him, was, by common consent of her Majesty's Guards, a 'good fellow.' Whether the St James' Street definition of that adjective be the perfect one or not, we will not stay to inquire, but in the Guards' club-house it meant this: that Scoutbush had not an enemy in the world, because he deserved none, that he lent, and borrowed not, gave, and asked not again, carried not, hustled not, slandered not, never bore malice, never said a cruel word, never played a dirty trick, would bear a fellow's troubles out to the end, and if he could not counsel, at least would not laugh at them, and at all times and in all places lived and let live, and was accordingly a general favourite. His morality was neither better nor worse than the average of his companions, but if he was sensual, he was at least not base, and there were frail women who blessed 'little Freddy,' and his shy and secret generosity, for having saved them from the lowest pit.

As regards, he was idle, frivolous, useless, but with those two palliating facts, that he knew it and regretted it, and that he never had a chance of being nught else. His father and mother had died when he was a child. He had been sent to Eton at seven, where he learnt nothing, and into the Guards at seventeen, where he learnt less than nothing. His aunt, old Lady Knockdown, who was a kind old Irish woman, an ex-blue and ex-beauty, now a high evangelical professor, but as worldly as her neighbours in practice, had tried to make him a good boy in old times, but she had given him up, long before he left Eton, as a 'vessel of wrath' (which he certainly was, with his hot Irish temper), and since then she had only spoken of him with moans, and to him just as if he and she had made a compact to be as worldly as they could, and as if the fact that he was going, as she used to tell her private friends, straight to the wrong place, was to be utterly ignored before the pressing reality of getting him and his sisters well married. And so it befell that Lady Knockdown, like many more, having begun with too high (or at least precise) a spiritual standard, was forced to end practically in having no standard at all, and that, for ten years of Scoutbush's life, neither she nor any other human being had spoken to him as if he had a soul to be saved, or any duty on earth save to eat, drink, and be merry.

And all the while there was a quaint and pathetic consciousness in the little man's heart that he was meant for something better, that he was no fool, and was not intended to be one. He would thrust his head into lectures at the Polytechnic and the British Institution, with a dim endeavour to guess what they were all about, and a good-natured envy of the clever fellows who knew about 'science, and all that.' He would sit and listen, puzzled and admiring, to the talk of statesmen, and could do his own alterations to some chum. 'Ah, if I had had the chance now that my cousin Chalkleton has! If I had had two or three tutors, and a good mother, too, keeping me in a coop, and cramming me with learning, as they cram chickens for the market, & fancy I could have shown my comb and wattles in the House as well as some of them. I fancy I could make a speech in parliament now, with the help of a little Irish impudence, if I only knew anything to speak about.'

So Scoutbush clung, in a childish way, to any superior man who would take notice of him, and not treat him as the fribble which he seemed. He had taken to that well-known artist, Claude Mellot, of late, simply from admiration of his brilliant talk about art and poetry, and boldly confessed that he preferred one of Mellot's orations on the sublime and beautiful, though he didn't understand a word of them, to the songs and jokes (very excellent ones in their way) of Mr Hector Larkaway, the distinguished Irish novelist, and boon companion of her Majesty's Life Guards Green. His special intimate and Mentor, however, was a certain Major Campbell, of whom more hereafter, who, however, being a lofty-minded and perhaps somewhat Pharisaic person, made heavier demands on Scoutbush's conscience than he had yet been able to meet, for fully as he agreed that Hercules's choice between pleasure and virtue was the right one, still he could not yet follow that ancient hero along the thorny path, and confined his conception of 'duty' to the minimum guard and drill. He had estates in Ireland, which had almost cleared themselves during his long minority, but which, since the famine, had cost him about as much as they brought him in, and estates in the West, which, with a Welsh slate-quarry, brought him in some seven or eight thousand a year, and so kept his poor little head above water, to look pitifully round the universe, longing for the life of him to make out what it all meant, and hoping that somebody would come and tell him.

So much for his meekness and humility in general, as for the particular display of those virtues which he has shown to-day, it must be understood that he has given a promise to Mrs. Mellot not to make love to La Cordithamma, and, on that only condition, has been allowed to meet her to-night at one of Claude Mellot's petits soupers.

La Cordithamma has been staying, ever since she came to England, with the Mellots in the wilds of Brompton, unapproachable there, as in all other places. In public, she is a very Zenobia, who keeps all animals of the other sex at an awful distance, and of the fifty young puppies who are raving about her beauty, her air, and her voice, not one has obtained an introduction, while Claude, whose studio used to be a favorite lounge of young Guardsmen, has, as civilly as he can, closed his doors to those magnificent personages ever since the new singer became his guest.

Claude Mellot seems to have come into a fortune of late years, large enough, at least, for his few wants. He paints no longer, save when he chooses, and has taken a little old house in one of those back lanes of Brompton, where islands of painted nursery garden still remain undevoured by the advancing wings of the brick and mortar deluge. There he lives, happy in a green lawn, and windows opening thereon, in three rhos, a cork, an alex, and a mulberry, with a great standard pear, for flower and foliage the queen of all suburban trees. There he lies on the lawn, upon strange skins, the summer's day, playing with cats and dogs, and making love to his Sabina, who has not lost her beauty in the least, though she is on the wrong side of five-and-thirty. He deludes himself, too, into the belief that he is doing something, because he is writing a treatise on the 'Principles of Beauty', which will be published, probably, about the time the Thaïs is pulled, in the season of latter Lammis and the Greek Kalends, and the more certainly so, because he has wandered into the abyss of comic sections and caricatures of double curvature, of which, if the truth must be spoken, he knows no more than his friends of the late Guards Green.

To this charming little nest his Lord Scoutbush procured an evening's admission after ardent supplication to Sabina, who pets him because he is musical, and solemn promises neither to talk nor look any manner of foolishness.

'My dearest Mrs. Mellot,' says the poor wretch, 'I will be good, indeed I will, I will not even speak to her. Only let me sit and look,—and—and,—why, I thought you understood all about such things, and could pity a poor fellow who was spoony.'

And Sabina, who prides herself much on understanding such things, and on having, indeed, reduced them to a science in which she gives gratuitous lessons to all young gentlemen and ladies of her acquaintance, receives him pityingly, in that delicious little back drawing-room, whither whosoever enters is in no hurry to go out again.

Claude's house is arranged with his usual defiance of all conventionalities. Dining or drawing-room proper there is none; the large front room is the studio, where he and Sabina eat and drink, as well as work and paint, but out of it opens a little room, the walls of which are so covered with gems of art (where the rogue finds money to buy them as a puzzle) that the eye can find nowhere without taking in some new beauty, and wandering on from picture to statue, from portrait to landscape, dreaming and learning afresh after every glance. At the back, a glass bay has been thrown out, and forms a little conservatory, for ever fresh and gay with tropic ferns and flowers, gaudy orchids dangle from the roof, creepers hide the framework, and you hardly see where the room ends and the winter-garden begins, and in the centre an ottoman invites you to lounge. It costs Claude money, doubtless, but he has his excuse.

'Having once seen the tropics, I cannot live without some love-tokens from their lost paradises, and such is the wiser plan, to spend money on a horse and hrougham, which we don't care to use, and on scrambling into society at the price of one great stupid party a year, or to make our little world as pretty as we can, and let those who wish to see us take us as they find us.'

In this 'nest,' as Claude and Sabina call it, sacred to the everlasting billing and cooing of that sweet little pair of human love-birds who have built it, was supper set. La Cordithamma, all the more beautiful from the languor produced by the excitement of acting, lay on a sofa, Claude attended, talking earnestly, Sabina, according to her custom, was fluttering in and out, and arranging supper with her own hands, both husband and wife were as busy as bees, and yet any one accustomed to watch the little ins and outs of married life, could have seen that neither sought for a moment that the other was in the room, but basked and purred, like two blessed cats, each in the sunshine of the other's presence, and he could have seen, too, that La Cordithamma was divining their thoughts, and studying all their little expressions, perhaps that she might use them on the stage, perhaps, too, happy in sympathy with their happiness, and yet there was a shade of sadness on her forehead.

Scoutbush enters, is introduced, and receives a salutation from the actress, haughty and cold enough to check the forwardest, puts on the air of languid nonchalance which is considered (or was before the little experiences of the Cinna) fit and proper for young gentlemen of rank and fashion. So he sits down, and casts his foolish eyes upon his idol, hoping for a few words before the evening is over. Did I not say well, then, that there was as much meekness and humility under Scoutbush's white cravat as under others? But his little joy is soon dashed, for the black boy announces (seemingly much to his own pleasure) a tall personage, whom, from his dress and his moustachio, Scoutbush takes for a Frenchman, till he hears him called Stangrave. The intruder is introduced to Lord

Scoutbush, which ceremony is consummated by a microscopic nod on either side, he then walks straight up to La Cordifiamma, and Scoutbush sees her cheeks flush as he does so. He takes her hand, speaks to her in a low voice, and sits down by her, Claude making room for him, and the two engaged earnestly in conversation.

Scoutbush is much mollified to walk out of the room, was he brought there to see that? Of course, however, he sits still, keeps his own counsel, and makes himself agreeable enough all the evening, like a good-natured kind-hearted little man, as he is. Whereby he is repaid, for the conversation soon becomes deep, and even too deep for him, and he is fain to drop out of the race, and leave it to his idol and to the woman, who seems to have seen, and done, and read everything in heaven and earth, and probably bought everything also, not to mention it if he would be happy to sell the said universe again, at a very cheap price, if any one would kindly take it off his hands. Not that he boasts, or takes any undue share of the conversation, he is evidently too well-bred for that, but every sentence shows an acquaintance with facts of which Eton has told Scoutbush nothing, the barrack-room less, and after which he still craves, the good little fellow, in a very honest way, and would soon have learnt, had he had a chance, for of native Irish shrewdness he had no lack.

'Poor Flake was half mad about you, signora, in the stage-box to-night,' said Sabina. 'He says that he shall not sleep till he has painted you.'

'Do let him!' cried Scoutbush. 'What a picture he will make!'

'He may paint a picture, but not me, it is quite enough, Lord Scoutbush, to be some one else for two hours every night, without going down to posterity as some one else for ever. If I am painted, I will be painted by no one who cannot represent my very self.'

'You are right,' said Staungrave, 'and you will do the man himself good by refusing, he has some notion still of what a portrait ought to be. If he once begins by attempting passing expressions of passion, which is all stage portraits can give, he will find them so much easier than honest representations of character, that he will end, where all our moderns seem to do, in merest melodrama.'

'Explain!' said she.

'Portrait painters now depend for their effect on the mere accidents of enlourage, on dress, on landscape, even on broad hints of a man's occupation, putting a plan on the engineer's table, and a roll in the statesman's hands, like the old Greek who wrote "this is an ox" under his picture. If they wish to give the face expression, though they seldom aim so high, all they can compass is a passing emotion, and the sitter goes down to posterity with an eternal frown, another with an eternal smile.'

'Or, if he be a poet,' said Sabina, 'rolls his eye for ever in a fine frenzy.'

'But would you forbid them to paint passion?'

'Not in its place, when the picture gives the causes of the passion, and the scene tells its own story. But then let us not have merely Kean as Hamlet, but Hamlet's self, let the painter sit down and conceive for himself a Hamlet, such as Shakespeare conceived, not merely give us as much of him as could be pressed at a given moment into the face of Mr Kean. He will be only unjust to both actor and character. If Flake paints Marie as Lady Macbeth, he will give us neither her nor Lady Macbeth, but only the single point at which then two characters can coincide.'

'How rude!' said Sabina, laughing, 'what is he doing but hinting that La Signora's conception of Lady Macbeth is a very partial and imperfect one?'

'And why should it not be?' asked the actress, humbly enough.

'I meant,' he answered warmly, 'that there was more, far more, in her than in any character which she assumes, and I do not want a painter to copy only one aspect, and let a part go down to posterity as a representation of the whole.'

'If you mean that, you shall be forgiven. No, when she is painted, she shall be painted as herself, as she is now. Claude shall paint her.'

'I have not known La Signora long enough,' said Claude, 'to aspire to such an honour. I paint no face which I have not studied for a year.'

'Faith!' said Scoutbush, 'you would find no more in most faces at the year's end, than you did the first day.'

'Then I would not paint them. If I paint a portrait, which I seldom do, I wish to make it such a one as the old masters aimed at, to give the sum total of the whole character, traces of every emotion, if it were possible, and glances of every expression which have passed over it since it was born into the world. They are all here, the whole past and future of the man, and every man, as the Mohammedans say, carries his destiny on his forehead.'

'But who has eyes to see it?'

'The old masters had, some of them at least. Raphael had, Sebastian del Piombo had, and Titian, and Giorgione. There are portraits painted by them which carry a whole life-history concentrated into one moment.'

'But they,' said Staungrave, 'are the portraits of men such as they saw around them, natures who were strong for good and evil, who were not ashamed to show their strength. Where will a painter find such among the poor, thin, unable mortals who come to him to buy immortality at a hundred and fifty guineas apiece, after having spent their lives in religiously rubbing off their angles against each other, and forming their characters, as you form shot, by shaking them together in a bag till they have polished each other into dullest uniformity?'

'It's very true,' said Scoutbush, who suffered much at times from a certain wild Irish vein, which started him up to kick over the traces. 'People are horribly like each other, and if a poor fellow is bored, and tries to do anything spivoy or original, he has half a dozen people pook-pooking him down on the score of bad taste.

'Men can be just as original now as ever,' said La Signora, 'if they had but the courage, oven the insight. Heroic souls in old times had no more opportunities than we have, but they used them. There were daring deeds to be done then—are there none now? Sacrifices to be made—are there none now? Wrongs to be redressed—are there none now? Let any one set his heart, in these days, to do what is right, and nothing else, and it will not be long ere his brow is stamped with all that goes to make up the herculean expression—with noble indignation, noble self-restraint, great hopes, great sorrows, perhaps, even, with the print of the martyr's crown of thorns.'

She looked at Stangrave as she spoke, with an expression which Scoutbush tried in vain to read. The American made no answer, and seemed to hang his head awhile. After a minute he said tenderly

'You will tire yourself if you talk thus, after the evening's fatigue. Mrs. Mellot will sing to us, and give us leisure to think over our lesson.'

And Sabina sang, and then Lord Scoutbush was made to sing, and sang his best, no doubt.

So the evening slipped on, till it was past eleven o'clock, and Stangrave rose. 'And now,' said he, 'I must go to Lady M——'s ball, and Maria must rest.'

As he went, he just leaned over La Cordhamma.

'Shall I come in to-morrow evening? We ought to read over that scene together before the rehearsal.'

'Early then or Sabina will be gone out, and she must play saute-rete to our hero and heroine.'

'You will rest? Mrs. Mellot, you will see that she does not sit up?'

'It is not very polite to rob us of her, as soon as you cannot enjoy her yourself.'

'I must take care of people who do not take care of themselves,' and Stangrave departed.

Great was Scoutbush's wrath when he saw Maria rise and obey orders. 'Who was this man? what right had he to command her?'

He asked as much of Sabina the moment La Cordhamma had retired.

'Are you not going to Lady M——'s too?'

'No, that is, I won't go yet, not till you have explained all this to me.'

'Explained what?' asked Sabina, looking as demure as a little brown mouse.

'Why, what did you ask me here for?'

'Lord Scoutbush should recollect that he asked himself.'

'You cruel venomous creature! do you think I would have come, if I had known that I was to see another man making love to her before my very eyes? I could kill the fellow, who is he?'

'A New York merchant, unworthy of your aristocratic powder and ball.'

'The confounded Yankee!' muttered Scoutbush.

'If people swear in my house, I fine them a dozen of kid gloves. Did you not promise me that you would not make love to her yourself?'

'Well—but it is too cruel of you, before my very eyes.'

'I saw no love-making to-night.'

'None? Were you blind?'

'Not in the least, but you cannot well see a thing making which has been made long ago.'

'What? Is he her husband?'

'No.'

'Engaged to her?'

'No.'

'What then?'

'Don't you know already that this is a house of mystery, full of mysterious people? I tell you this only, that if she ever marries any one, she will marry him, and that if I can, I will make her.'

'Then you are my enemy after all.'

'I? Do you think that Sabina Mellot can see a young viscount loose upon the universe, without trying to make up a match for him? No, I have such a prize for you—young, handsome, better educated than any woman whom you will meet to-night. Tina, who is a Manchester girl, but then she has eighty thousand pounds.'

'Eighty thousand noughts? I'd sooner have that divine creature without a penny, than'

'And would my lord viscount so far debase himself as to marry an actress?'

'Humph! Faith, my grandmother was an actress, and we St. Justs are none the worse for that fact, as far as I can see, and certainly none the uglier the women at least. Oh Sabina, Mrs. Mellot, I mean—only help me this once.'

'This once? Do you intend to marry by my assistance this time, and by your own the next? How many viscountesses are there to be?'

'Don't laugh at me, you cruel woman, you don't know, you fancy that I am not in love,' and the poor fellow began pouring out these confessions, which one has heard too often to take the trouble of repeating, and yet which are real enough, and pathetic too, for in every man, however frivolous, or even worthless, love calls up to the surface the real heroism, the real depth of character—all the more deep because common to poet and philosopher, guardian and country clod.

'I'll leave town to-morrow! I'll go to the Land's-end—to Norway, to Africa—'

'And forget her in the bliss of hum-bunting.'

'Don't, I tell you, here I will not stay to be driven mad. To think that she is here, and that hateful Yankee at her elbow! I'll go—'

'To Lady M——'s ball?'

'No, confound it, to meet that fellow there! I should quarrel with him, as sure as there is hot Irish blood in my veins. The self-satisfied puppy! to be flirting and strutting there, while such a creature as that is lying thinking of him.'

'Would you have him shut himself up in his hotel, and write poetry, or walk the streets all night, sighing at the moon ?'

'No, but the cool way in which he went off himself, and sent her to bed. Confound him ! commanding her. It made my blood boil.'

'Claude, get Lord Scoutbush some real soda-water.'

'If you laugh at me, I'll never speak to you again.'

'Oh buy any of Claude's pictures !'

'Why do you torment me so ? I'll go, I say leave town to-morrow—only I can't with this horrid depot work ! What shall I do ? It's too cruel of you, while Campbell is away in Iceland, too, and I have not a soul but you to ask advice of, for Valentinia is as great a goose as I am,' and the poor little fellow buried his hands in his curls, and stared fiercely into the fire, as if to draw from thence omens of his love, by the apocalyptic augury of the ancient Greeks, while Sabina tripped up and down the room, putting things to rights for the night, and enjoying his torments as a cat does those of the mouse between her paws, and yet not out of spite, but from pure and simple fun.

Sabina is one of those charming bodies who knows everybody's business, and manages it. She lives in a world of intrigue, but without a thought of intriguing for her own benefit. She has always a match to make, a dissatisfactory lover to comfort, a young artist to bring forward, a refugee to conceal, a misadventurer to get out of a scrape, and, like David in the mountains, 'every one that is discontented, and every one that is in debt, gather themselves to her.' The strongest people, on the strongest grounds, run over each other in that cosy little nest of hers. Fine ladies with over-full hearts, and merely gentleman with over-empty pockets, push each other at her door, and she has a smile, and a repartee, and good, cunning, practical wisdom for each and every one of them, and then dismisses them to hush and coo with Claude, and laugh over everybody and everything. The only price which she demands for her services is, to be allowed to laugh, and if that be permitted, she will be as busy, and earnest, and tender, as Saint Elizabeth herself. 'I have no children of my own,' she says, 'so I just make everybody my children, Claude included, and play with them, and laugh at them, and pet them, and help them out of their scrapes, just as I should if they were in my own nursery.' And so it is all that she is every one's confidante, and though every one seems on the point of taking liberties with her, yet no one does, partly because they are in her power, and partly because, like an Eastern sultana, she carries a pom-pom, and can use it, though only in self-defence. So if great people, or small people (either who can give themselves airs as well as their betters), take her plain speaking unkindly, she just speaks a little more plainly, once for all, and goes off smiling to some one else, as a humming bird, if a flower has no honey in it, whirls away, with a saucy flirt of its pretty little tail, to the next branch on the bush.

'I must know more of this American,' said Scoutbush, at last.

'Well, he would be very improving company for you, and I know you like improving company.'

'I mean—what has he to do with her ?'

'That is just what I will not tell you. One thing I will tell you, though, for it may help to quench any vain hopes on your part, and that is, the reason which she gives for not marrying him.'

'Well ?'

'Because he is an idler.'

'What would she say of me, then ?' groaned Scoutbush.

'Very true, for, you must understand, this Mr Stangrave is not what you or I should call an idle man. He has travelled over half the world, and made the best use of his eyes. He has filled his house in New York, they say, with gems of art gathered from every country in Europe. He is a finished scholar, talks half a dozen different languages, sings, draws, writes poetry, reads hard every day at every subject, from gardening to German metaphysics, altogether, one of the most highly cultivated men I know, and quite an Admirable Crichton in his way.'

'Then why does she call him an idler ?'

'Because, she says, he has no great purpose in life. She will marry no one who will not devote himself, and all he has, to some great, chivalrous, heroic enterprise, whose one object is to be of use, even if he has to sacrifice his life to it. She says that there must be such men still left in the world, and that when she finds one, she will marry, and no one else.'

'Why, there are none such to be found nowadays, I thought ?'

'You heard what she herself said on that very point.'

There was a silence for a minute or two. Scoutbush had heard, and was pondering it in his heart. At last—

'I am not out out for a hero, so I suppose I must give her up. But I wish sometimes I could be of use, Mrs Mellot, but what can a fellow do ?'

'I thought there was an Irish mannantry to be looked after, my lord, and a Cornish tenantry too.'

'That's what Campbell is always saying, but what more can I do than I do ? As for those poor Paddies, I never ask them for rent, if I did, I should not get it, so there is no generosity in that. And as for the Aherlva people, they have got on very well without me for twenty years, and I don't know them, nor what they want, nor even if they do want anything, except fish enough, and I can't put more fish into the sea, Mrs. Mellot !'

'Try and be a good soldier, then,' said she, laughing. 'Why should not Lord Scoutbush emulate his illustrious countryman, conquer at a second Waterloo, and die a duke ?'

'I'm not cut out for a general, I am afraid, but if—I don't say if I could marry that woman—I suppose it would be a foolish thing—though I shall break my heart, I believe, if I do not. Oh, Mrs. Mellot, you cannot tell what a fool I have made myself about her, and I cannot help it! It's not her beauty merely, but there is something so noble in her face, like one of those Greek goddesses (Canda talks of, and when she is sitting, if she has to say anything grand or generous—or you know the sort of thing,—she brings it out with such a voice, and such a look, from the very bottom of her heart,—it makes me shudder, just as she did when she told that Yankee that every one could be a hero, or a martyr, if he chose. Mrs. Mellot, I am sure she is one, or she could not look and speak as she does.'

'She is one,' said Sabina, 'a heroine and a martyr too.'

'If I could, that was what I was going to say, if I could but win that woman's respect—as I live, I ask no more, only to be sure she didn't despise me. I'd do—I don't know what I wouldn't do—I'd—I'd study the art of war. I know there are books about it. I'd get out to the East, away from this depot work, and if there is no fighting there, as every one says there will not be, I'd go into a marching regiment, and see service. I'd—hang it if they'd have me—I'd even go to the senior department at Sandhurst, and read mathematics!'

Sabina kept her countenance (though with difficulty) at this magnificent bathos, for she saw that the little man was really in earnest, and that the looks and words of the strange actress had awakened in him something far deeper and nobler than the mere sensual passion of a boy.

'Ah, if I had but gone out to Varina with the rest! I thought myself a lucky fellow to be left here.'

'Do you know that it is getting very late?'

So Frederick Lord Scotchbush went home to his rooms, and there sat for three hours and more with his feet on the fender rejecting the entreaties of Mr. Bowie, his servant, either to have something, or to go to bed, yea, he forgot even to smoke, by which Mr. Bowie 'jealous' that he was hit very hard indeed—but made no remark, being a Scotchman, and of a cautious temperament.

However, from that night Scotchbush was a changed man, and tried to be so. He read of nothing but sieges and stockades, brigade evolutions, and conical bullets, he drilled his men till he was an abomination in their eyes, and a weariness to their flesh, only every evening he went to the theatre, watched La Cordiliumina with a heavy heart, and then went home to bed; for the little man had good sense enough to ask Sabina for no more interviews with her. So in all things he acquitted himself as a model officer, and excited the admiration and respect of Sergeant Major MacArthur, who began fishing at Bowie to discover the cause of this strange metamorphosis in the rakety little Irishman.

'Your master seems to be qualifying himself for the adjutant's post, Mr. Bowie. I'm jealousing he's fired with martial ardour since the war broke out.'

To which Bowie, being a brother Scot, answered—Scottish, by a crafty paralogism.

'I've always held it as my opinion, that his lordship is a youth of very good parts, if he was only compelled to employ them.'

CHAPTER VIII

TAKING HOOT

WHOEVER enjoys the sight of an honest man doing his work well, would have enjoyed the sight of Tom Thumall for the next month. Indoors all the morning, and out of doors all the afternoon, was that shrewd and good-natured visage, calling up an answering smile on every face, and leaving every heart a little lighter than he found it. Amazing enough it was, alike to Heale and to Headley, how Tom captivated, as if by magic, to gain every one's good word, their own included. For Frank, in spite of Tom's questionable opinions, had already made all but a convert of the doctor, and Heale, in spite of envy and suspicion, could not deny that the young man was a very valuable young man, if he wasn't given so much to those new-fangled notions of the profession.

By which time Heale indicated the, to him astounding fact, that Tom charged the patients as little, instead of as much as possible, and applying to medicine the principles of an enlightened political economy, tried to increase the demand by cheapening the supply.

'Which is revolutionary doctrine, sir,' said Heale to Lieutenant Jones, over the brandy-and-water, 'and just like what the Cobden and Bright lot used to talk, and have been the ruin of British agriculture, though don't say I said so, because of my Lord Munchampstead. But conceive my feelings, sir, as the father of a family who have my bread to earn, this very morning—in comes old Dame Penaluna (which is good pay I know, and has two hundred and more out on a merchant brig) for something, and what was my feelings, sir, to hear this young party deliver himself—"Well, ma'am," says he, as I am a living man, "I can cure you, if you like, with a dozen bottles of lotion, at eighteenpence a-piece, but if you'll take my advice, you'll buy twopennyworth of alum down street, do what I tell you with it, and cure yourself." It's robbery, sir, I say, all these out-of-the-way cheap dodges, which ain't in the pharmacopoeia, half of them, it's unprofessional, sir—quackery.'

'Tell you what, doctor, robbery or none, I'll go to him to-morrow, d'ye see, if I live as long, for this old ailment of mine. I never told you of it, old pill and potion, for fear of a swinging bill, but just grinned and hore it, d'yo see.

'There it is again,' cries Heale in despair 'He'll run me.'

'No, he won't, and you know it.'

'What d'yo think he served me last week? A young chap comes in, consumptive, he said, and I dare say he's right—he is uncommonly 'onto about what he calls diagnosis.' Says he, "You ought to try Carragreen moss. It's an old drug, but it's a good one." There was a drawer full of it to his hand, had been lying there any time this ten years. I go to open it but what was my feelings when he took on, as cool as a cucumber, "And there's bushels of it here," says he, "on every rock, so if you'll come down with me at low tide this afternoon, I'll show you the trade, and tell you how to boil it." I thought I should have knocked him down.'

'But you didn't,' said Jones, laughing in every muscle of his body. 'Tell you what, doctor, you've got a treasure, he's just getting back your custom, d'ya see, and when he's done that, he'll lay on the bills sharp enough. Why, I hear he's up at Mrs. Vavason's every day.'

'And not ten shillings' worth of medicine sent up to the house any week.'

'Ho charges for his visits, I suppose.'

'Not he! If you'll believe me, when I asked him if he wasn't going to, he says, says he, that Mrs. Vavason's company was quite payment enough for him.'

'Shows his good taste. Why, what now, Mary?' as the maid opens the door.

'Mr. Thurnall wants Mr. Heale.'

'Always wanting me,' groans Heale, hugging his glass, 'driving me about like any negro slave. Tell him to come in.'

'Here, doctor,' says the lieutenant, 'I want you to prescribe for me, if you'll do it gratis, d'yo see. Take some brandy-and-water.'

'Good advice costs nothing,' says Tom, hilling.

'Mr. Heale, read that letter.'

And the lieutenant details his ailments, and their supposed cause, till Heale has the pleasure of hearing Tom answer—

'Fiddlesticks! That's not what's the matter with you. I'll cure you for half a crown, and toss you up double or quits.'

'Oh!' groans Heale, as he spells away over the letter,—

'Lord Minchampstead having been informed by Mr. Armsworth that Mr. Thurnall is now in the neighbourhood of his estates of Pentremoechyn, would feel obliged to him at his earliest convenience to examine into the sanitary state of the cottages thereon, which are said to be much haunted by typhus and other epidemics, and to send him a detailed report, indicating what he thinks necessary for making them thoroughly healthy. Mr. Thurnall will be so good as to make his own charge.'

'Well, Mr. Thurnall, you ought to turn a good penny by this,' said Heale, half envious of Tom's coimection, half contemptuous at his supposed indifference to gain.

'I'll charge what it's worth,' said Tom. 'Meanwhile, I hope you're going to see Miss Beer to-night.'

'Couldn't you just go yourself, my dear sir? It is so late.'

'No, I never go near young women. I told you so at first, and I stick to my rule. You'd better go, sir, on my word, or if she's dead before morning, don't say it's my fault.'

'Did you ever hear a poor old man so tyrannised over?' said Heale, as Tom coolly went into the passage, brought in the old man's greatcoat and hat, arrayed him, and manched him out, civilly but firmly.

'Now, lieutenant, I've half an hour to spare, let's have a jolly chat about the West Indies.'

And Tom began with anecdote and joke, and the old seaman laughed till he cried, and went to bed vowing that there never was such a pleasant fellow on earth, and he ought to be physician to Queen Victoria.

Up at five the next morning, the indefatigable Tom had all his work done by ten, and was preparing to start for Pentremoechyn ere Heale was out of bed, when a customer came in who kept him half an hour.

He was a tall broad-shouldered young man, with a red face, protruding bull's eyes, and a moustachio. He was dressed in a complete suit of pink and white plaid, cut jauntily enough. A bright blue cap, a thick gold watch-chain, three or four large rings, a dog-whistle from his buttonhole, a fancy cane in his hand, and a little Oxford meershaum in his mouth, completed his equipment. He lounged in, with an air of careless superiority, while Tom, who was behind the counter, cutting up his day's provision of honey-dew, eyed him curiously.

'Who are you, now? A gentleman? Not quite, I guess. Some squire of the parts adjacent, and look in somewhat of a crapulo-connatose state moreover. I wonder if you are the great Trebooze, of Trebooze.'

'I say,' yawned the young gentleman, 'where's old Heale?' and an oath followed the speech, as it did every other one herein recorded.

'The plying half of old Heale is in bed, and I'm his working half. Can I do anything for you?'

'Cool hah,' thought the customer. 'I say what have you got there?'

'Australian honey dew. Did you ever smoke it?'

'I've heard of it, let's see,' and Mr. Trebooze—for it was he—put his hand across the counter inadvertently, and clawed up some.

'Didn't know you sold tobacco here. Prime stuff. Too strong for me, though, this morning, somehow.'

'Ah! A lil 'e too much claret last night? I thought so. We'll set that right in five minutes.'

'Eh? How did you guess that?' asked Trebooze, with a larger oath than usual.

'Oh, we doctors are men of the world,' said

Tom, in a cheerful and insinuating tone, as he mixed his man a draught.

'You doctors? You're a cock of a different hackle from old Heale, then.'

'I trust so,' said Tom.

'By George, I feel better already. I say, you're a trump, I suppose you're Heale's new partner, the man who was washed ashore?'

Tom nodded assent.

'I say—how do you sell that honey-dew?'

'I don't sell it, I'll give you as much as you like, only you shan't smoke it till after dinner.'

'Shan't I?' said Trebooze, testy and proud.

'Not with my leave, or you'll be complaining two hours hence that I'm a humbug, and have done you no good. Get on your horse, and have four hours' gallop on the downs, and you'll feel like a buffalo bull by two o'clock.'

Trebooze looked at him with a stupid curiosity and a little awe. He saw that Tom's cold self-possession was not meant for impudence, and something in his tone and manner told him that the boast of being 'a man of the world' was not idle. And of all kinds of men, a man of the world was the man of whom Trebooze stood most in awe. A small squreem, cursed with six or seven hundreds a year of his own, never sent to school, college, or into the army, he had grown up in a narrow circle of squreems like himself, without an object save that of gratifying his animal passions, and had about six years before, being then just of age, settled in life by marrying his housemaid—the only wise thing, perhaps, he ever did. For she, a clever and determined woman, kept him, though not from drunkenness and debt, at least from delirious trappings and ruin, and was, in her rough, vulgar way, his guardian angel—such a one, at least, as he was worthy of. More than once has one seen the same seeming folly turn out in practice as wise a step as could well have been taken, and the coarse nature of the man, which would have criminal and ill-used a delicate and high-minded wife, subsided to some thing like decency by a help literally meet for it.

There was a pause. Trebooze fancied, and wisely, that the doctor was a cleverer man than he, and of course would want to show it. So, after the fashion of a country squreem, he felt a longing to 'set him down.' 'He's been a traveller, they say,' thought he in that pugnacious, sceptical spirit which is bred, not, as twaddlers fancy, by too extended knowledge, but by the sense of ignorance and a narrow sphere of thought, which makes a man angry and ominous of any one who has seen more than he.

'Buffalo bulls?' said he, half contemptuously, 'what do you know about buffalo bulls?'

'I was one once myself,' said Tom, 'where I lived before.'

Treboozeswore. 'Don't you put your traveller's lies on me, sir.'

'Well, perhaps I dreamt it,' said Tom placidly, 'I remember I dreamt at the same time that you were a grizzly bear, fourteen feet long, and wanted to eat me up, but you found me too tough about the hump ribs.'

Trebooze stared at his audacity.

'You're a rum hand.'

To which Tom made answer in the same elegant strain, and then began a regular word battle of slang, in which Tom showed himself so really witty and apropos, that Mr Trebooze laughed himself into good humour, and ended by

'I say, you're a good fellow, and I think you and I shall suit.'

Tom had his doubts, but did not express them. 'Come up this afternoon and see my child,' Mrs. Trebooze thinks it's got swelled glands, or some such woman's nonsense. Better them, why can't they let the child alone, fussing and doctoring, and she will have you. Heard of you from Mrs. Vavasour, I believe. Our doctor and I have quarrelled, and she said, if I could get you, she'd sooner have you than that old rum-punchoon Heale. And then you'd better stop and take pot-luck, and we'll make a night of it.'

'I have to go round Lord Muchmunchstead's estates, and will take you on my way, but I'm afraid I shall be too dirty to have the pleasure of dining with Mrs. Trebooze coming back.'

'Mrs. Trebooze! She won't take what I like, and what's good enough for me is good enough for her, I hope. Come as you are—Jubilee hall at Trebooze,' and out he swaggered.

'Does he loilly her?' thought Tom, 'or is he hen-picked, and wants to hulo it? I'll see to-night, and play my cards accordingly.'

All which Miss Heale had heard. She had been peeping and listening at the glass-door, and her mother also, for no sooner had Trebooze entered the shop, than she had run off to tell her mother the surprising fact, Trebooze's custom having been, for some years past, confined in vain by Heale. So Miss Heale peeped and peeped at a man whom she regarded with delighted curiosity, because he bore the reputation of being 'such a naughty, wicked man!' and 'so very handsome too, and so distinguished as he looks!' said the poor little fool, to whose novel-led imagination Mr Trebooze was an ideal Lothario.

But the surprise of the two dames grew rapidly as they heard Tom's audacity towards the country aristocrat.

'Impudent wretch!' moaned Mrs. Heale to herself. 'He'll drive away an angel if he comes into the shop.'

'Oh, ma! hear how they are going on now. I can't bear it, my dear. This man will be the ruin of us. His manners are those of the pot-house, when the cloven foot is shown, which it's his nature as a child of wrath, and we can't expect otherwise.'

'Oh, ma! do you hear that Mr. Trebooze has asked him to dinner?'

'Nonsense!'

But it was true.

'Well! if there ain't the signs of the end of the world, which is? All the years your poor father has been here, and never so much as send him a hare, and now this young penniless interloper, and he to dine at Treboove off purple and luscious'.

'There is not much of that there, ma, I'm sure they are poor enough for all his pride, and as for her—'

'Yes, my dear, and as for her, though we haven't married squires, my dear, yet we haven't been squires' housemaids, and have adorned our own station, which was good enough for us, and has no need to rise out 'of it, nor ride on Phraoli's chariot-wheels after hithy lincos'.

Miss Heale hated poor Miss Treboove with a bitter hatred, because she dreamed meanly that, but for her, she might have secured Mr Treboove for herself. And though her ambition was now transferred to the unconscious Tom, that need not make any difference in the small amiable feeling.

But that Tom was a most wonderful person, she had no doubt. He had conquered her heart—so she informed herself passionately again and again, as was very necessary, seeing that the passion, having no real life of its own, required a good deal of blowing to keep it alight. Yes, he had conquered her heart, and he was conquering all hearts! It was true. There must be some mystery about him—there should be. And she settled in her novel-bewildered brain that Tom must be a nobleman in disguise—probably a foreign prince, exiled for political offences. Bah! perhaps too many lines have been spent on the poor little fool, but as such fools exist, and people must be as they are, there is no harm in drawing her, and in asking, too. Who will help those young girls of the middle class who, like Miss Heale, are often really less educated than the children of their parents' workmen, sedentary, luxurious, full of petty vanity, gossip, and intrigue, without work, without purpose, except that of getting married to any one who will ask them—bewildering brain and heart with novels, which, after all, one hardly grudges them, in what other means have they of learning that there is any fairer, nobler life possible, at least on earth, than that of the sordid money-getting, often the sordid pelfery and adulteration, which is the atmosphere of their home? Exceptions there are, in thousands, doubtless, and the families of the great city tradesmen stand, of course, on far higher ground, and are often far better educated, and more high-minded, than the fine ladies, their parents' customers. But, till some better plan of education than the boarding-school is devised for them, till our towns shall see something like in kind to, though sounder and soberer in quality than, the high schools of America, till in country villages the ladies who interest themselves about the poor will recollect that the farmers' and tradesmen's daughters are just as much in want of their influence as the charity children, and will yield a far richer return for their labour, though the one need not interfere with the other, so long will England be full of Miss Heales, fated, when they marry, to bring up sons and daughters as sordid and unwholesome as their mothers.

Tom worked all that day in and out of the Pentrevochlyn cottages, noting down nuisances and dilapidations but his head was full of other thoughts, for he had received, the evening before, news which was to him very important, for more reasons than one. The longer he stayed at Aberlva, the longer he felt inclined to stay. The strange attraction of Graca had, as we have seen, something to do with his purpose, but he saw, too, a good opening for one of those country practices in which he seemed more and more likely to end. At his native Whitbury, he knew, there was no room for a fresh medical man; and gradually he was making up his mind to settle at Aberlva, to buy out Heale, either with his own money (if he recovered it), or with money borrowed from Mark, to bring his father down to live with him, and in that pleasant wild western place, fold his wings after all his wanderings. And therefore certain news which he had obtained the night before was very valuable to him, in that it put a fresh person into his power, and might, if cunningly used, give him a hold upon the ruling family of the place, and on Lord Scouthush himself. He had found out that Lucia and Elsley were unhappy together, and found out, too, a little more than was there to find. He could not, of course, be a month among the gossips of Aberlva, without hearing hints that the great folks at the Court did not always keep their tempers, in of family jars, as of everything else beneath, the great and just law stands true. 'What you do in the closet shall be proclaimed on the lunnetop'.

But the gossips of Aberlva, as women are too often wont to do, had altogether taken the man's side in the quarrel. The reason was, I suppose, that Lucia, conscious of having fallen somewhat in rank, 'held up her head' to Mrs. Treboove and Mrs. Heale (as they themselves expressed it), and to various other little notabilities of the neighbourhood, rather more than she would have done had she married a man of her own class. She was afraid that they might boast of being intimate with her, that they might take to advising and patronising her as an inexperienced young creature, afraid, even, that she might be tempted in some unguarded moment to gossip with them, confide her unhappiness to them, in the blind longing to open her heart to some human being, for there were no resolute gentry of her own rank in the neighbourhood. She was too high-minded to complain much to Clara, and her sister Valentinia was the very last person to whom she would confess that her runaway match had not been altogether successful. So she lived alone and friendless, shrinking into herself more and more, while the vulgar women round mistook her honour for pride, and revenged themselves accordingly she was an uninteresting fine lady, proud and cross, and Elsley was a martyr 'So handsome and agreeable as he was' (and, to do him justice, he was the former, and he could be the latter when he chose), 'to be tied to that unsuitable, stuck-up woman,' and so forth.

All which Tom had heard, and formed his own opinion thereof which was—

'All very fine, but I flatter myself I know a little what women are made of, and thus I know, that where man and wife quarrel, even if she ends the battle, it is he who has begun it. I never saw a case yet where the man was not the most in fault, and I'll lay my life John Briggs has led her a pretty life what else could one expect of him?'

However, he held his tongue, and kept his eyes open withal whenever he went up to Penrhyn Court, which he had to do very often, for though he had cured the children of their ailments, yet Mrs. Vasavour was perpetually, more or less, unwell, and he could not cure her. Her low spirits, headaches, general want of tone and vitality, puzzled him at first, and would have puzzled him longer, had he not settled with himself that their cause was to be sought in the mind, and not in the body, and at last, gaining courage from certainty, he had hinted as much to Miss Clara the night before, when she came down (as she was very fond of doing) to have a gossip with him in his shop, under the pretence of fetching medicine.

'I don't think I shall send Mrs. Vasavour any more, Miss Clara. There is no use running up a long bill while I do no good, and, what is more, suspect that I can do none, poor lady.' And he gave the girl a look which seemed to say, 'You had better tell me the truth, for I know everything already.'

To which Clara answered by trying to find out how much he did know—but Tom was a cunninger diplomatist than she, and in ten minutes, after having given solemn promises of secrecy, and having, by strong expressions of contempt for Mrs. Heale and the village gossip, made Clara understand that he did not at all take their view of the case, he had pointed out to him across the counter all Clara's long-pent indignation and contempt.

'I never said a word of this to a living soul, sir, I was too proud, for my mistress's sake, to let vulgar people know what we suffered. We don't want any of their pity indeed, but you, sir, who have the feelings of a gentleman, and know what the world is, like ourselves—'

'Take care,' whispered Tom, 'that daughter of Heale's may be listening.'

'I'd pull her hair about her ears if I caught her!' quoth Clara, and then ran on to tell how Elsley 'never kept no hours, nor no accounts either; so that she has to do everything, poor thing, and no thanks either. And never knows when he'll dine, or when he'll breakfast, or when he'll be in, wandering in and out like a madman, and sits up all night, writing his nonsense. And she'll go down twice and three times a night in the cold, poor dear, to see if he's fallen asleep, and gets abused like a jack-pocket for her pains (which was an exaggeration), and lies in bed all the morning, looking at the flies, and calls after her if his shoes want tying, or his finger aches, as helpless as the babe unborn, and will never do nothing useful himself, not even to hang a picture or move a chair, and grumbles at her if he sees her doing anything, because she ain't listening to his prosodies, and snaps, and worrits, and won't speak to her sometimes for a whole morning, the brute.'

'But is he not fond of his children?'

'Fond? Yes, his way, and small thanks to him, the little angels! To play with 'em when they're good, and tell them cock-and-a-bull fairy-tales—wonder why he likes to put such stuff into their heads—and then send 'em out of the room if they make a noise, because it splits his poor head, and his nerves are so delicate. Wish he had hers, or mine either, Doctor Thurnall, then he'd know what nerves was, in a frail woman, which he uses in both as his negro slaves, or would if I didn't stand up to him pretty sharp now and then, and give him a piece of my mind, which I will do, like the faithful servant in the parable, if he kills me for it, Doctor Thurnall!'

'Does he drink?' asked Tom bluntly.

'He!' she answered, in a tone which seemed to imply that even one masculine vice would have raised him in her eyes. 'He's not man enough, I think, and lives on his slops, and his coffee, and his tapoca, and how's he ever to have any appetite, always a sitting about, heaped up together over his books, with his ribs growing into his backbone? If he'd only go and take his walk, or get a spade and dig in the garden, or anything but then everlasting papers, which I hates the sight of,' and so forth.

From all which Tom gathered a tolerably clear notion of the poor poet's state of body and mind, as a self-indulgent, unmethodical person, whose ill-temper was owing partly to perpetual brooding over his own thoughts, and partly to dyspepsia, brought on by his own effeminacy—in both cases, not a thing to be pitied or excused by the hoary and valiant doctor. And Tom's original contempt for Vasavour took a darker form, perhaps one too dark to be altogether just.

'I'll tackle him, Miss Clara.'

'I wish you would. I'm sure he wants some one to look after him just now. He's half wild about some review that somebody's been and done of him in the Times, and has been flinging the paper about the room, and calling all mankind vipers, and adders, and hooting herds—it's as bad as swearing, I say—and running to my mistress, to make her read it, and see how the whole world's against him, and then forbidding her to defile her eyes with a word of it, and so on, till she's been crying all the morning, poor dear!'

'Why not laughing at him?'

'Poor thing, that's where it all is, she's just as anxious about his poetry as he is, and would write it just as well as he, I'll warrant, if she hadn't better things to do, and all her fuss is, that people should "appreciate" him. He's always talking about appreciating, till I hate the sound of the word. How any woman can go on so after a man that behaves as he does! but were all soft fools, I'm afraid, Doctor Thurnall!" And Clara began a laughing look or two across the counter, which made Tom answer to an imaginary Doctor Heale, whom he heard calling from within.

"Yes, doctor! coming this mornin', doctor! Good-bye, Miss Clara. I must hear more next time, you may trust me, you know secret as the grave, and always your friend, and your lady's too, if you will allow me to do myself such a honour. Coming, doctor!"

And Tom bolted through the glass door, till Miss Clara was safe on her way up the street.

"Very well," said Tom to himself. "Know ledge is power—but how to use it? To get into Mrs. Vavasour's confidence, and show an inclination to take her part against her husband! If she be a true woman, she would order me out of the house on the spot, as surely as a fish-wife would fall tooth and nail on me as a base intruder, if I dared to interfere with her sacred right of being beaten by her husband when she chooses. No! I must go straight to John Briggs himself, and land him over to keep the peace, and I think I know the way to do it."

So Tom pondered over many plans in his head that day, and then went to Treboose, and saw the sick child, and sat down to dinner, where his host talked loud about the Trebooses of Treboose, who fought in the Spanish Armada on against it, and showed an unbounded belief in the greatness and antiquity of his family, confirmed with a historic accuracy almost equal to that of a good old dame of those parts, who used to say that "her family come over the water, that she knew, but whether it were with the Conqueror, or whether it were with Oliver, she couldn't exactly say!"

Then he became great on the subject of old county families in general, and poured out all the vials of his wrath on "that confounded upstart of a Newbrun, Lord Minchampstead, squandering all the true old blood in the country."

"Why, sir, that Pentremochyn, and Carrarow moors too (---- good shooting there, there used to be), they ought to be mine, sir, if every man had his rights!" And then followed a long story, and a confused one withal, for by this time Mr. Treboose had drunk a great deal too much wine, and as he became aware of the fact, became proportionately anxious that Tom should drink too much also, out of which story Tom picked the plain facts, that Treboose's father had mortgaged Pentremochyn estate for more than its value, and that Lord Minchampstead had foreclosed, while some equally respectable uncle, or cousin, just deceased, had sold the reversion of Carrarow to the same mighty cotton lord twenty years before. "And this is the way, sir, the land gets eaten up by a set of tinkers, and robbers, and money-lending jobbers, who suck the blood of the aristocracy!" The oaths we omit, leaving the reader to peep at Mr. Treboose's conversation therewith, up to any degree of heat which may suit his palate.

Tom sympathised with him deeply, of course, and did not tell him, as he might have done, that he thought the sooner such rascals of the ground were cleared off, whether by an encumbered estates' act, such as we may see yet in England, or by their own suicidal folly, the better it would be for the universe in general, and perhaps for themselves in particular. But he only answered with pleasant effrontery—

"Ah, my dear sir, I am sure there are hundreds of good sportsmen who sympathise with you deeply. The wonder is, that you do not write and defend yourselves. For not only in the west of England, but in Ireland, and in Wales, and in the north, too, it one is to believe these novels of Chriss Bell's and her sister, there is a large and important class of landed proprietors of the same stamp as yourself, and exposed to the very same dangers. I wonder at times that you do not call your, and use your combined influence on the Government."

"The Government! All a set of Whig traitors! Call themselves Conservative, or what they like. Traitors, sir! from that fellow Noel upwards—all condemned to ruin the landed gentry—ruin the Church—betray the family party. Disraeli! Derby!—Fren-trade—ruined, sir! My north Protection—treason—help yourself, and pass the—you know, nil follow."

And Mr. Treboose's voice died away, and he slumbered, but not softly.

The door opened, and in marched Mrs. Treboose, tall, tawily, and terrible.

"Mr. Treboose, it's just eleven o'clock!"

"Hush, my dear madam!" He is sleeping so sweetly," said Tom, rising, and gulping down a glass, not of wine, but of strong ammonia and water. The rogue had put a phial thereof in his pocket that morning, expecting that, as Treboose had said, he would be required to make a night of it.

She was silent, so far to rouse her tyrant was more than she dared. If awakened, he would crave for brandy-and-water, and if he got that sweet poison, he would probably become furious. She stood for half a minute, and Tom, who knew her story well, watched her anxiously.

"She is a true woman, and with a fairer heart in her than that brute. Her eyelow and eye, now, have the fair Sidlons stamp, the great white forehead, and sharp cut little nose, breathing scorn—and what a Suddons-like attitude—I should like, madam, to see the child again before I go."

"If you are fit, sir," answered she.
"Brave woman, comes to the point at once. I am a poor doctor, madam, and not a country gentleman, and have neither money nor health to spend in drinking too much wine."

"Then why do you encourage him in it, sir?"

I had expected a very different sort of conduct from you, sir.

Tom did not tell her what she would not (no woman will) understand that it is morally and socially impossible to escape from the table of a fool, till either he or you are conquered, and she was too strewed to be taken in by commonplace excuses, so he looked her very full in the face, and replied a little haughtily, with a slow and delicate articulation, using his lips more than usual, and yet compressing them--

'I beg your pardon, madam, if I have unintentionally displeased you but if you ever do me the honour of knowing more of me, you will be the first to confess that your words are unjust. Do you wish me to see your son, or do you not?'

Poor Mrs. Trebooze looked at him with an eye which showed that she had been accustomed to study character keenly, perhaps in self-defence. She saw that Tom was sober, he had taken care to prove that, by the way in which he spoke, and she saw, too, that he was a better bred man than her husband, as well as a cleverer. She dropped her eye before his, heaved something very like a sigh, and then said, in her curt, fierce tone, which yet implied a sort of sullen resignation--

'Yes, come upstairs.'

Tom went up, and looked at the boy again, as he lay sleeping. A beautiful child of four years old, as large and fair a child as man need see, and yet there was on him the curse of his father's sins, and Tom knew it, and knew that his mother knew it also.

'What a noble boy!' said he, after looking, not without honest admiration, upon the sleeping child, who had kicked off his bed-clothes, and lay in a wild graceful attitude, as children are wont to lie, just like an old Greek statue of Cupid. 'It all depends upon you, madam, now.'

'On me?' she asked, in a startled, suspicious tone.

'Yes. He is a magnificent boy but I can only give palliatives. It depends upon you care now.'

'He will have that, at least, I should hope,' said she, nettled.

'And on your influence ten years hence,' went on Tom.

'My influence?'

'Yes, only keep him steady, and he may grow up a magnificent man. If not--you will excuse me--but you must not let him live as freely as his father, the constitutions of the two are very different.'

'Don't talk so, sir. Steadily? His father makes him drunk now, if he can, teaches him to swear, because it is manly--God help him and me!'

Tom's cunning and yet kind shaft had sped. He guessed that with a coarse woman like Mrs. Trebooze his best plan was to come as straight to the point as he could, and he was right. Ere half an hour was over, that woman had few secrets on earth which Tom did not know.

'Let me give you one hint before I go,' said he at last. 'Persuade your husband to go into a militia regiment.'

'Why? He would see so much company, and it would be so expensive.'

'The expense would repay itself ten times over. The company which he would see would be sober company, in which he would be forced to keep in order. He would have something to do in the world; and he'd do it well. He is just cut out for a soldier, and might have made a gallant one by now, if he had had other men's chances. He will find he does his militia work well, and it will be a new interest, and a new pride, and a new life to him. And meanwhile, madam, what you have said to me is sacred. I do not pretend to advise or interfere. Only tell me if I can be of use--how, when, and where--and command me as your servant.'

And Tom departed, having struck another root, and was up at four the next morning (he never worked at night, for, he said, he never could trust after-dinner brains), drawing out a detailed report of the Pentremochlyn cottages, which he sent to Lord Minchamstead, with--

'And your Lordship will excuse my saying, that to put the cottages into the state in which your Lordship, with your known wish for progress of all kinds, would wish to see them, is a responsibility which I dare not take on myself, as it would involve a present outlay of not less than £150. This sum would be certainly repaid to your Lordship and your tenants, in the course of the next three years, by the saving in repairs, an opinion for which I subjoin my grounds, drawn from the books of the medical officer, Mr. Heale. But the responsibility and possible unpopularity which employing so great a sum would involve is more than I can, in the present dependent condition of poor-law medical officers, dare to undertake, in justice to Mr. Heale, my employer, save at your special command. I am bound, however, to inform your Lordship that this outlay would, I think, perfectly defend the hamlets, not only from that visit of the cholera which we have every reason to expect next summer, but also from those zymotic diseases which (as your Lordship will see by my return) make up more than sixty-five per cent of the aggregate sickness of the estate.'

Which letter the old cotton lord put in his pocket, rode into Whitbury therewith, and showed it to Mark Arnsworth.

'Well, Mr. Arnsworth, what am I to do?'

'Well, my Lord, I told you what sort of a man you'd have to do with, one that does his work thoroughly, and, I think, pays you a compliment, by thinking that you want it done thoroughly.'

Lord Minchamstead was of the same opinion, but he did not say so. Few, indeed, have ever heard Lord Minchamstead give his opinion.

though many a man has seen him act on it.

'I'll send down orders to my agent.'

'Don't.'

'Why, then, my good friend?'

'Agents are always in league with farmers, or guardians, or builders, or drain-tile makers, or attorneys, or bankers, or somebody, and either you'll be told that the work don't need doing, or have a job brewed out of it, to get off a lot of unsaleable drain-tiles, or cracked soil-pans, or to get farm ditches dug, and perhaps the highway rates saved hunking culverts, and fifty dodges besides. I know their game, and you ought, too, by now, my Lord, begging your pardon.'

'Perhaps I do, Mark,' said his Lordship with a chuckle.

'So, I say, let the man that found the fox run the fox, and kill the fox, and take the brush home.'

'And so it shall be,' quoth my Lord Muchamptstead.

CHAPTER IX

'AM I NOT A WOMAN AND A SISTER?'

BUT what was the mysterious bond between La Cordiflamia and the American, which had prevented Scotchish from following the example of his illustrious progenitor, and taking a virtuousness from off the stage?

Certainly, any one who had seen him with him on the morning after Scotchish's visit to the Mellots, would have said that, if the cause was love, the love was all on one side.

She was standing by the fireplace in a splendid pose, her arm resting on the chimney-piece, the book from which she had been reciting in one hand, the other playing in her black curls, as her eyes glanced back ever and anon at her own profile in the mirror. Staungrave was half sitting in a low chair by her side, half kneeling on the footstool before her, looking up beseechingly, as she looked down tyrannically.

'Stupid, this reciting? Of course it is! I want realities, not shams, life, not the stage, nature, not art.'

'Throw away the book, then, and words, and art, and live!'

She knew well what he meant, but she answered as if she had misunderstood him.

'Thanks, I live already, and in good company enough. My ghost-husbands are as noble as they are obedient, do all which I demand of them, and vanish on my errands when I tell them. Can you guess who my last is? Since I tired of Egmont, I have taken Sir Galahad, the spotless knight. Did you ever read the Mort d'Arthur?'

'A hundred times.'

'Of course!' and she spoke in a tone of contempt so strong that it must have been affected. 'What have you not read? And what have you copied? No wonder that these English have been what they have been for centuries, while their heroes have been the Galahads, and their Homer the Mort d'Arthur.'

'Enjoy your Utopia!' said he bitterly. 'Do you fancy they acted up to their ideals? They dreamed of the Quest of the Sangreal, but which of them ever went upon it?'

'And does it count for nothing that they felt it the finest thing in the world to have gone on it, had it been possible? Be sure if their ideal was so self-sacrificing, so lofty, their practice was ruled by something higher than the almighty dollar.'

'And so are some other men's, Marie,' answered he reproachfully.

'Yes, forsooth,—when the almighty dollar is there already, and a man has ten times as much to spend every day as he can possibly invest in French cookery, and wines, and fine clothes, then he begins to lay out his surplus nobly on self-education, and the patronage of art, and the theatre—for merely æsthetic purposes, of course; and when the lust of the flesh has been satiated, thinks himself an archangel, because he goes on to satisfy the lust of the eye and the pride of life. Christ was of old the model, and Sir Galahad was the hero. Now the one is exchanged for Goethe, and the other for Wilhelm Meister.'

'Cruel! You know that my Goethe fever is long past. How would you have known of its existence if I had not confessed it to you as a sin of old years? Have I not said to you, again and again, show me the thing which you would have me do for your sake, and see if I will not do it?'

'For my sake? A noble reason! Show yourself the thing which you will do for its own sake, because it ought to be done. Show it yourself, I say, I cannot show you. If your own eyes cannot see the Sangreal, and the angels who are bearing it before you, it is because they are dull and gross; and am I Milton's archangel, to purge them with enthusiasm and me? If you have a noble heart, you will find for yourself the noblest Quest. If not, who can prove to you that it is noble? And tapping impatiently with her foot, she went on to herself—

'A gentle wind, an awful light'

Three angels bear the holy Grail
With folded feet, in stoles of white,
On sleeping wings they sail
Ah, blessed vision! blood of God!
The spirit beats her mortal wings,
As down dark tides the glory slides,
And star-like mingles with the stars.

'Why, there was not a knight of the round table, was there, who did not give up all to go upon that Quest, though only one was found worthy to fulfil it? But nowadays, the knights sit drinking hock and champagne, or drive sulky-wagons, and never fancy that there is a Quest at all.'

'Why talk in these parables?'

'So the Jews asked of their prophets. They are no parables to my ghost-husband Sir Galahad.'

Now go, if you please, I must be busy, and write letters.

He rose with a look, half of disappointment, half amused, and yet his face bore a firmness which seemed to say, 'You will be mine yet.' As he rose, he cast his eye upon the writing-table, and upon a letter which lay there—and as he did so, his cheek grew pale, and his brows knitted.

'The letter was addressed to 'Thomas Thurnall, Esq., Aberlona'.

'Is this, then, your Sir Galahad?' asked he, after a pause, during which he had choked down his rising jealousy, while she looked first at herself in the glass, and then at him, and then at herself again, with a determined and triumphant air.

'And what if it be?'

'So he, then, has achieved the Quest of the Sangreal?'

Stangrave spoke bitterly, and with an emphasis upon the 'he', and

'What if he have? Do you know him?' answered she, while her face lighted up with eager interest, which she did not care to conceal, perhaps chafe, in her woman's love of tormenting, to punish.

'I knew a man of that name once,' he replied, in a carefully careless tone, which did not relieve her, 'an adventurer—a doctor, if I recollect—who had been in Texas and Mexico, and I know not where besides. Agreeable enough he was, but as for your Quest of the Sangreal, whatever it may be, he seemed to have as little notion of anything beyond his own interest as any Greek I ever met.'

'Unjust! Your words only show how little you can see! That man, of all men I ever met, saw the Quest at once, and followed it, at the risk of his own life, as far at least as he was concerned with it—ay, even when he pretended to see nothing. Oh, there is more generosity in that man's affected selfishness than in all the noisy good-nature which I have met with in the world. Thurnall! oh, you know his nobleness as little as he knows it himself.'

'Then he, I am to suppose, is your phantom husband, for as long, at least, as your present dream lasts?' asked he, with white, compressed lips.

'He might have been, I believe,' she answered carelessly, 'if he had even taken the trouble to ask me.'

'Marie, this is so much! Do you not know to whom you speak? To one who deserves, if not common courtesy, at least common mercy.'

'Because he adores me, and so forth? So has many a man done—or told me that he has done so. Do you know that I might be a viscountess to-morrow, so Sabrina informs me, if I but chose?'

'A viscountess? I may except you offsets English aristocrat, and, as far as I am concerned, accept my best wishes for your happiness.'

'My offete English aristocrat, did I show him that pedigree of mine which I have ere now threatened to show you, would perhaps be less horrified at it than you are?'

'Marie, I cannot bear this! Tell me only what you mean. What care I for pedigree? I want you—worship you—and that is enough, Marie!'

'You admire me because I am beautiful. What thanks do I owe you for finding out so patent a fact? What do you do more to me than I do to myself?' and she glanced back once more at the mirror.

'Marie, you know that your words are false. I do more—'

'You admire me,' interrupted she, 'because I am clever. What thanks to you for that, again? What do you do more to me than you do to yourself?'

'And thus, after all—'

'After what? After you found me, or rather I found you—you the critic, the arbiter of the green-room—the highly organized do-nothing teaching others how to do nothing most gracefully, the world-in-God who must, for the sake of his own self-development, try experiments on every weak woman whom he met. And I, the new phenomenon, whom you must appoint to show your own taste, patronise to show your own liberality, develop to show your own insight into character. You found yourself mistaken! You had attempted to play with the tigress—and behold she had talons, to scratch for the silly fish—and behold the fish was the better angler, and caught you!'

'Marie, have mercy! Is your heart iron?'

'No, but firm, as my name shows,' and she stood looking down on him with a glare of dreadful beauty.

'Firm, indeed!'

'Yes, but that I may scorch you, kindle you, madden you, to do my work, and wear the heart of iron which I wear day and night!'

Stangrave looked at her startled. Was she mad? Her face did not say so—her brow was white, her features calm, her eye fierce and contemplative, but clear, steady, full of meaning.

'So you know Mr. Thurnall?' said she, after a while.

'Yes, why do you ask?'

'Because he is the only friend I have on earth.'

'The only friend, Marie?'

'The only one,' answered she sadly, who, seeing the right, has gone and flown it forth with. When did you see him last?'

'I have not been acquainted with Mr. Thurnall for some years,' said Stangrave haughtily.

'In plain words, you have quarrelled with him?'

Stangrave bit his lip.

'He and I had a difference. He insulted my nation, and we parted.'

She laughed a long, loud, bitter laugh, which rang through Stangrave's ears.

'Insulted your nation? And on what grounds, pray?'

'About that accursed slavery question!'

La Cordisfamma looked at him with firm-closed lips a while.

'So, then! I was not aware of this! Even so long ago you saw the Sangreal, and did not know it when you saw it. No wonder that since then you have been staring at it for months, in your very hands, played with it, admired it, made verses about it, to show off your own taste, and yet were blind to it the whole time! Farewell, then!'

'Marie, what do you mean?' and Stangrave caught both her hands.

'Hush, if you please. I know you are eloquent enough, when you choose, though you have been somewhat dumb and monosyllabic to-night in the presence of the actress whom you undertook to educate. But I know that you can be eloquent, so spare me any brilliant appeals, which can only go to prove that already settled fact. Between you and me lie two great gulfs. The one I have told you of, and from it I shrink. The other I have not told you of, from it you would shrink.'

'The first is your Quest of the Sangreal.'

'She smiled assent, bitterly enough.'

'And the second?'

She did not answer. She was looking at herself in the mirror, and Stangrave, in spite of his almost dotting affection, flushed with anger, almost contempt, at her vanity.

And yet, was it vanity which was expressed in that face? No, but dread, horror, almost disgust, as she gazed with sidelong, startled eyes, struggling, and yet struggling in vain, to turn her face from some horrible sight, as if her own image had been the Gorgon's head.

'What is it? Marie, speak!'

But she answered nothing. For that last question she had no heart to answer, no heart to tell him that in her veins were some drops, at least, of the blood of slaves. Instinctively she had looked round at the mirror—for might he not, if he had eyes, discover that secret for himself? Were there not in her features traces of that taint? And as she looked,—was at the mere play of her excited fancy,—or did her eyelid slupe more and more, her nostril shorten and curl, her lips enlarge, her mouth itself protrude?

It was more than the play of fancy, for Stangrave saw it as well as she. Her actress's imagination, fixed on the African type with an intensity proportioned to her dread of seeing it in herself, had moulded her features, for the moment, into the very shape which it dreaded. And Stangrave saw it, and shuddered as he saw.

Another half minute, and that face also had melted out of the mirror, at least for Marie's eyes, and in its place an ancient negress, white-haired, withered as the wrinkled ape, but with eyes closed—in death. Marie knew that face well, a face which haunted many a dream of hers, once seen, but never forgotten since, for to that old dame's coffin had her mother, the gay quadroon woman, flaunting in finery which was the price of shame, led Marie when she was but a three years' child, and Marie had seen her bend over the corpse, and call it her dear old granny, and weep bitter tears.

Suddenly she shook off the spell, and looked round and down, terrified, self-conscious. Her eye caught Stangrave's, she saw, or thought she saw, by the expression of his face, that he knew all, and burst away with a shriek.

He sprang up and caught her in his arms. 'Marie! Beloved Marie!' She looked up at him struggling, the dark expression had vanished, and Stangrave's love blinded eyes could see nothing in that face but the refined and yet rich beauty of the Italian.

'Marie, this is mere madness, you excite yourself till you know not what you say, or what you are—'

'I know what I am,' murmured she, but he hurried on unheeding.

'You love me, you know you love me, and you madden yourself by refusing to confess it.' He felt her heart throb as he spoke, and knew that he spoke truth. 'What gulfs are these you dream of? No, I will not ask. There is no gulf between me and one whom I adore, who has thrown a spell over you which I cannot resist, which I glory in not resisting, for you have been my guide, my morning star, which has awakened me to new life. If I have a noble purpose upon earth, if I have roused myself from that conceited dream of self-culture which now looks to me so cold, and barren, and tawdry, into the hope of becoming useful, beneficent—to whom do I owe it but to you, Marie? No, there is no gulf, Marie! You are my wife, and you alone! And he held her so firmly, and gazed down upon her with such strong manhood, that her woman's heart quailed; and he might, perhaps, have conquered then and there, had not Sabina, summoned by his shriek, entered hastily.

'Good heavens! what is the matter?'

'Wait but one minute, Mrs. Mellor,' said he, 'the next, I shall introduce you to my bride.'

'Never! never! never!' cried she, and breaking from him, flew into Sabina's arms. 'Leave me, leave me to hear my curse alone!'

And she broke out into such wild weeping, and refused so wildly to hear another word from Stangrave, that he went away in despair, the prize snatched from his grasp in the very moment of seeming victory.

He went in search of Claude, who had agreed to meet him at the Exhibition in Trafalgar Square. Thither Stangrave rolled away in his cab, his heart full of many thoughts. Marie's words about him, though harsh and exaggerated, were on the whole true. She had fascinated him utterly. To marry her was now the one object of his life, she had awakened in him, as he had confessed, noble desires to be useful, but the discovery that he was to be useful to the negro, that abolition was the Sangreal in the quest of which he was to go forth, was as disagreeable a discovery as he could well have made.

From public life in any shape, with all its vulgar noise, its petty chicanery, its pandering to the mob whom he despised, he had always shrunk, as so many Americans of his stamp have done. He had no wish to struggle, unrewarded and disappointed, in the ranks of the minority, while to gain place and power on the side of the majority was to lend himself to that fatal policy which, ever since the Missouri Compromise of 1820, has been gradually making the northern states more and more the tools of the southern ones. He had no wish to be threatened in Congress with having his Northerner's 'ears nailed to the counter, like his own base coin,' or to be informed that he, with the 17,000,000 of the north, were the 'White Slaves' of a southern aristocracy of 350,000 slaveholders. He had enough comprehension of, enough admiration for, the noble principles of the American Constitution to see that the democratic mobs of Irish and Germans, who were stupidly playing into the hands of the Southerners, were not exactly carrying them out, but he had no mind to face either Irish or Southerners. The former were too vulgar for his delicacy, the latter too aristocratic for his pride. Strong, as he held (and rightly), from as fine old English blood as any Virginian (though it did happen to be Puritan, and not Cavalier), he had no list to come into contact with men who considered him much further below them in rank than an English footman is below an English nobleman, who, indeed, would some of them look down on the English nobleman himself as a mushroom of yesterday. So he compounded with his conscience by ignoring the whole matter, and by looking on the state of public affairs on his side of the Atlantic with a cynicism which very soon (as is usual with rich men) passed into apathy. Epicureanism. Poetry and music, pictures and statues, amusement and travel, became his idols, and cultivation his substitute for the plain duty of patriotism, and wandering luxuriously over the world, he learnt to sentimentalise over cathedrals and monasteries, pictures and statues, saints and kings, with a lazy regret that such 'forms of beauty and nobleness' were no longer possible in a world of scrip and railroads, but without any notion that it was his duty to reproduce in his own life, or that of his country, as much as he could of the said beauty and nobleness. And now he was sorely tried. It was interesting enough to 'develop' the peculiar turn of Marie's genius, by writing for her plays about liberty, just as he would have written plays about jealousy, or anything else for representing which she had 'capabilities.' But to be called on to act in that slavery question, the one on which he knew (as all sensible Americans do) that the life and death of his country depended, and which for that very reason he had carefully ignored till a more convenient season, finding in its very difficulty and danger an excuse for leaving it to solve itself to have this thrust on him, and by her, as the price of the thing which he must have, or die! If she had asked for his right hand, he would have given it sooner, and he entered the Royal Academy that day in much the same humour as that of a fine lady who should find herself suddenly dragged from the ballroom into the dust-hole, in her tenderest array of gauze and jewels, and there peremptorily compelled to sift the candors, under the superintendence of the sweep and the pot boy.

Glad to escape from questions which he had rather not answer too soon, he went in search of Claude, and found him before one of those pre-Raphaelite pictures, which Claude does not appreciate as he ought.

'Desmit is Calice's mother formosa superna,' said Stangrave, as he looked over Claude's shoulder, 'but I suppose he followed nature, and copied his model.'

'That he didn't,' said Claude, 'for I know who his model was, but if he did, he had no business to do so. I object on principle to those men's notion of what copying nature means. I don't deny him talent. I am ready to confess that there is more imagination and more honest work in that picture than in any one in the room. The hysterical, all but grinning joy upon the mother's face is a miracle of truth. I have seen the expression more than once, doctors see it often, in the sudden revulsion from terror and agony to certainty and peace, I only marvel where he ever met it, but the general effect is unpleasant, marred by patches of sheer ugliness, like that child's foot. There is the same mistake in all his pictures. What ever they are, they are not beautiful, and no magnificence of colouring will make up, in my eyes, for wilful ugliness of form. I say that nature is beautiful, and therefore nature cannot have been truly copied, or the general effect would have been beautiful also. I never found out the fallacy till the other day, when looking at a portrait by one of them. The woman for whom it was meant was standing by my side, young and lovely, the portrait hung there, neither young nor lovely, but a wrinkled caricature twenty years older than the model.'

'I surely know the portrait you mean, Lady D—.'

'Yes. He had simply, under pretence of following nature, caricatured her into a woman twenty years older than she is.'

'But did you ever see a modern portrait which more perfectly expressed character, which more completely fulfilled the requirements which you laid down a few evenings since?'

'Never, and that makes me all the more cross with the wilful mistake of it. He had painted every wrinkle.'

'Why not, if they were there?'

'Because he had painted a face not one-twentieth of the size of life. What right had he to cram into that small space all the marks which nature had spread over a far larger one?'

'Why not, again, if he diminished the marks in proportion?'

'Just what neither he nor any man could do, without making them so small as to be invisible, save under a microscope and the result was, that he had caricatured every wrinkle, as his friend has in those horrible knuckles of Shem's wife. Besides, I deny utterly your assertion that one is bound to paint what is there. On that very fallacy are they all making shipwreck.'

'Not paint what is there? And you are the man who talks of art being highest when it copies nature.'

'Exactly. And therefore you must paint, not what is there, but what you see there. They forget that human beings are men with two eyes, and not daguerreotype lenses with one eye, and so are contriving and striving to introduce into their pictures the very defect of the daguerreotype which the stereoscope is required to correct.'

'I comprehend. They forget that the double vision of our two eyes gives a softness, and indistinctness, and roundness to every outline.'

'Exactly so, and therefore, while for distant landscapes, motionless, and already softened by atmosphere, the daguerreotype is invaluable (I shall do nothing else this summer, but work at it), yet for taking portraits, in any true sense, it will be always useless, not only for the reason I just gave, but for another one which the pre-Raphaelites have forgotten.'

'Because all the features cannot be in focus at once?'

'Oh no, I am not speaking of that. Art, for aught I know, may overcome that, for it is a mere defect in the instrument. What I mean is this: it tries to represent as still what never yet was still for the thousandth part of a second; that is, the human face, and as seen by a spectator who is perfectly still, which no man ever yet was. My dear fellow, don't you see that what some painters call idealising a portrait is, if it be wisely done, really painting for you the face which you see, and know, and love, her ever-shifting features, with expression varying more rapidly than the gleam of the diamond on her finger, features which you, in your turn, are looking at with ever-shifting eyes, while, perhaps, if it is a face which you love and have lingered over, a dozen other expressions equally belonging to it are hanging in your memory, and blending themselves with the actual picture on your retina: till every little angle is somewhat rounded, every little wrinkle somewhat softened, every little shade somewhat blended with the surrounding light, so that the sum total of what you see, and are intended by Heaven to see, is something far softer, lovelier, younger, perhaps, thank Heaven, than it would look if your head was screwed down in a vice, to look with one eye at her head screwed down in a vice also — though even that, thanks to the muscles of the eye, would not produce the required ugliness, and the only possible method of fulfilling the pre-Raphaelite ideal would be, to set a petrified Cyclops to paint his petrified brother.'

'You are spiteful.'

'Not at all. I am standing up for art, and for nature too. For instance, Salma has wrinkles. She says, too, that she has gray hairs coming. The former I won't see, and therefore don't. The latter I can't see, because I am not looking for them.'

'Nor I either,' said Stangrave, smiling. 'I assure you the announcement is new to me.'

'Of course. Who can see wrinkles in the light of those eyes, that smile, that complexion?'

'Certainly,' said Stangrave, 'if I asked for her portrait, as I shall do some day, and the artist sat down and painted the said "wastes of time," on pretence of their being there, I should consider it an impertinence on his part. What business has he to spy out what nature is taking such charming trouble to conceal?'

'Again,' said Claude, 'such a face as Cordiamma's. When it is at rest, in deep thought, there are hues in it which utterly puzzle one — touches which are Eastern, Kalyle, almost Quadroon.'

Stangrave started. 'Claude went on unconscious --'

'But who sees them in the light of that beauty? They are defects, no doubt, but defects which no one would observe without deep study of the face. They express her character no more than a scar would, and therefore when I paint her, as I must and will, I shall utterly ignore them. If, on the other hand, I met the same hues in a face which I knew to have Quadroon blood in it, I should religiously copy them, because then they would be integral elements of the face. You understand?'

'Understand? — yes,' answered Stangrave, in a tone which made Claude look up.

That strange scene of half an hour before flashed across him. What if it were no fancy? What if Marie had African blood in her veins? And Stangrave shuddered, and felt for the moment that thousands of pounds would be a cheap price to pay for the discovery that his fancy was a false one.

'Yes — oh — I beg your pardon,' said he, recovering himself. 'I was thinking of something else. But as you say, what if she had Quadroon blood?'

'I? I never said so, or dreamt of it.'

'Oh! I mistook. Do you know, though, where she came from?'

'I? You forget, my dear fellow, that you yourself introduced her to us.'

'Of course, but I thought Mrs. Mellot might — women always make confidences.'

'All we know is, that I suppose you knew long ago, that her most intimate friend, next to you, seems to be an old friend of ours, named Thurnall.'

'An old friend of yours?'

'Oh yes, we have known him these fifteen years. Met him first at Paris; and after that went round the world with him, and saw infinite adventures. Sabina and I spent three months with him once, among the savages in a South-sea Island, and a very pretty romance our stay and our escape would make. We were all three, I believe, to have been cooked and eaten, if Tom had not got us off by that wonderful address which, if you know him, you must know well enough.

'Yes,' answered Stangrave coldly, as in a dream, 'I have known Mr. Thurnall in past years, but not in connection with La Signora Corithamma. I was not aware till this moment this morning, I mean—that they knew each other.'

'You astonish me, why she talks of him to us all day long, as of one to whom she has the deepest obligations, she was ready to rush into our arms when she first found that we knew him. He is a greater hero in her eyes, I sometimes fancy, than even you are. She does nothing (or fancies that she does nothing, for you know her pretty wilfulness) without writing for his advice.'

'I a hero in her eyes? I was really not aware of that fact,' said Stangrave, more coldly than ever, for bitter jealousy had taken possession of his heart. 'Do you know, then, what this same obligation may be?'

'I never asked. I hate gossiping, and I make a rule to inquire into no secrets but such as are voluntarily confided to me, and I know that she has never told Sabina.'

'I suppose she is married to him. That is the simplest explanation of the mystery.'

'Impossible! What can you mean? If she ever marries living man, she will marry you.'

'Then she will never marry living man,' said Stangrave to himself. 'Good-bye, my dear fellow, I have an engagement at the Traveller's.' And away went Stangrave, leaving Claude sorely puzzled, but little dreaming of the powder-magazine into which he had put a match.

But he was puzzled still more that night, when by the latest post a note came.

'From Stangrave!' said Claude. 'Why, in the name of all wonders!'—and he read.

'Good-bye. I am just starting for the Continent, on sudden and urgent business. What my destination is I hardly can tell you yet. You will hear from me in the course of the summer.'

Claude's countenance fell, and the note fell likewise. Sabina snatched it up, read it, and gave La Corithamma a look which made her spring from the sofa, and snatch it in turn.

She read it through, with trembling hands and blanching cheeks, and then dropped fainting upon the floor.

They laid her on the sofa, and while they were recovering her, Claude told Sabina the only clue which he had to the American's conduct, namely, that afternoon's conversation.

Sabina shook her head over it, for to her, also, the American's explanation had suggested itself. Was Marie Thurnall's wife? Or did she—it was possible, however painful—stand to him in some less honourable relation, which she would fain forget now, in a new passion for Stangrave? For that Marie loved Stangrave, Sabina knew well enough.

The doubt was so ugly that it must be solved, and when she had got the poor thing safe into her bedroom she alluded to it as gently as she could.

Mario sprang up in indignant innocence.

'He? Whatever he may be to others, I know not but to me he has been purity and nobleness itself—a brother, a father. Yes, if I had no other reason for trusting him, I should love him for that alone, that however tempted he may have been, and Heaven knows he was tempted, he could respect the honour of his friend, though that friend lay sleeping in a soldier's grave ten thousand miles away.'

And Marie threw herself upon Sabina's neck, and under the pressure of her misery sobbed out to her the story of her life. What it was need not be told. A little common sense, and a little knowledge of human nature, will enable the reader to fill up for himself the story of a beautiful slave.

Sabina soothed her, and cheered her, and soothed and cheered her most of all by telling her in return the story of her own life, not so dark and sour, but almost as sad and strange. And poor Marie took heart, when she found in her great need a sister in the communion of sorrows.

'And you have been through all this, so beautiful and bright as you are! You whom I should have fancied always living the life of the humming-bird and yet not a scar or a wrinkle has it left behind!'

'They were there once, Marie, but God and Claude smoothed them away.'

'I have no Claude, and no God, I think, at times.'

'No God, Marie! Then how did you come hither?'

Marie was silent, reproved, and then passionately.

'Why does He not right my people?'

That question was one to which Sabina's little scheme of the universe had no answer. Why should it, while in my scheme which pretends to be far vaster and more infallible has none as yet?

So she was silent, and sat with Marie's head upon her bosom, caressing the black curls, till she had soothed her into soldiering exhaustion.

'There, be there and rest: you shall be my child, my poor Marie. I have a fresh child every week, but I shall find plenty of room in my heart for you, my poor hunted deer.'

'You will keep my secret?'

'Why keep it? No one need be ashamed of it here in free England.'

'But he—he—you do not know, Sabina! Those Northerners, with all their boasts of freedom, shrink from us just as much as our own masters.'

'Oh, Marie, do not be so unjust to him! He is too noble, and you must know it yourself.'

'Ay, if he stood alone, if he were even going to live in England, if he would let himself be himself, but public opinion,' sobbed the poor self-tormentor. 'It has been his God, Salina, to be a leader of taste and fashion—admired and complete—the Crichton of Newport and Brooklyn. And he could not bear scorn, the loss of society. Why should he bear it for me? If he had been one of the Abolitionist party, it would have been different. But he has no sympathy with them, good, narrow, pious people, or they with him—he could not be satisfied in their society—or I either, for I crave after it all as much as he—wealth, luxury, art, brilliant company, admiration—oh, inconsistent wretch that I am! And that makes me love him all the more, and yet makes me so harsh to him, wickedly cruel, as I was to day, because when I am reproving his weakness, I am reproving my own, and because I am angry with myself, I grow angry with him too—envious of him, I do believe at moments, and all his success and luxury.'

And so poor Mario sobbed out her confused confession of that strange double nature which so many Quadroons seem to owe to their mixed blood, a strong side of deep feeling, ambition, energy, and intellect rather Greek in its rapidity than English in sturdiness, and withal a weak side, of instability, inconsistency, hasty passion, love of present enjoyment, sometimes, too, a tendency to untruth, which is the mark, not perhaps of the African specially, but of every enslaved race.

Consolation was all that Salina could give. It was too late to act. Stungrove was gone, and week after week rolled by without a hint from the wanderer.

CHAPTER V

THE RECOGNITION

ELSLEY VAYASOUR is sitting one morning in his study, every comfort of which is of Lucia's arrangement and invention, hearing the home-jaconet of his brains for pretty thoughts. On he struggles through that wild and too luxuriant cover, now brought up by a 'lawyer,' now stumbling over a root, now bogged in a green spring, now glimpsing a stray convey of birds of Paradise, now a splinter, chimera, strix, lamia, fire-drake, flying-donkey, two-headed eagle (Austrian, as will appear shortly), or other portent only to be seen nowadays in the recesses of that enchanted forest, the convolutions of a poet's brain. Up they whirl and rattle, making, like most game, more noise than they are worth. Some get back, some dodge among the trees, the fair shots are few and far between. But Elsley blazes away right and left with trusty quill, and, to do him justice, seldom misses his aim, for practice has made him a sure and quick marksman in his own line. Moreover, all is game which gets up to-day, for he is shooting for the kitchen, or rather for the London market, as many a noble sportsman does nowadays, and thinks no shame. His new volume of poems ('The Wreck' included) is in the press, but behold, it is not as long as the publisher thinks it, and Messrs Brown and Younger have written down to entreat in haste for some four hundred lines more, on any subject which Mr Vayasour may choose. And therefore is Elsley beating his home covers, heavily shot over though they have been already this season, in hopes that a few heads of his own game may still be left—or in default (for human nature is the same, in poets and in sportsmen), that a few fawns may have strayed in out of his neighbours' manners.

At last the sport slackens, for the sportsman is getting tired, and huffy also, to carry on the metaphor, for he has seen the postman come up the front walk a quarter of an hour since, and the letters have not been brought in yet.

At last there is a knock at the door, which he answers by a somewhat testy 'come in.' But he checks the coming grumble, when not the maid, but Lucia enters.

'Why not grumble at Lucia? He has done so many a time.'

Because she looks this morning so charming, really quite pretty again, so radiant is her face with smiles. And because, also, she holds triumphant above her head a newspaper.

She dances up to him—

'I have something for you.'

'For me? Why, the post has been in this half-hour.'

'Yes, for you, and that's just the reason why I kept it myself. D'ye understand my Irish reasoning?'

'No, you pretty creature,' said Elsley, who saw that whatever the news was, it was good news.

'Pretty creature, am I? I was once, I know, but I thought you had forgotten all about that. But I was not going to let you have the paper till I had devoured every word of it myself first.'

'Every word of what?'

'Of what you shan't leave unless you promise to be good for a week. Such a review, and from America! What a dear man he must be who wrote it! I really think I should kiss him if I met him.'

'And I really think he would not say no. But as he's not here, I shall act as his proxy.'

'Be quiet, and read that, if you can, for blushes', and she spread out the paper before him, and then covered his eyes with her hands. 'No, you shan't see it, it will make you vain.'

Elsley had looked eagerly at the honeyed columns (as who would not have done?), but the last word smote him. What was he thinking of! his own praise, or his wife's love?

'Too true,' he cried, looking up at her. 'You dear creature! Vain I am, God forgive mo, but before I look at a word of this I must have a talk with you'

'I can't stop, I must run back to the children. No, now don't look cross,' as his brow clouded, 'I only said that to tease you. I'll stop with you ten whole minutes, if you won't look so very solemn and important. I hate tragedy faces. Now, what is it?'

As all this was spoken while both her hands were clasped round Elsley's neck, and with looks and tones of the very sweetest as well as the very sincerest, no offence was given, and none taken, but Elsley's voice was sad as he asked—

'So you really do care for my poems?'

'You great silly creature! Why else did I marry you at all? As if I cared for anything in the world but your poems, as if I did not love everybody who praises them, and if any stupid reviewer dares to say a word against them I could kill him on the spot. I care for nothing in the world but what people say of you. And yet I don't care one pin I know what your poems are, if nobody else does, and they belong to me, because you belong to me, and I must be the best judge, and care for nobody, no, not I!' And she began singing, and then hung over him, tormenting him lovingly while he read.

It was a true American review, utterly extravagant in its laudations, whether from over-kindness, or from a certain love of exaggeration and magniloquence, which makes one suspect that a large proportion of the Transatlantic gentlemen of the press must be natives of the sister isle, but it was all the more pleasant to the soul of Elsley.

'There,' said Lucia, as she clung croodling to him, 'there is a pretty character of you, isn't it? Make the most of it, for it is all those Yankees will ever send you.'

'Yes,' said Elsley, 'if they would send me a little money, instead of making endless dollars by printing one's books, and then a few more by praising one at a penny a line.'

'That's talking like a man of business, if, instead of the review, now, a cheque for fifty pounds had come, how I would have rushed out and paid the bills!'

'And liked it a great deal better than the review!'

'You jealous creature! No. If I could always have you praised, I'd live in a cabin, and go about the world barefoot, like a wild Irish girl.'

'You would make a very charming one.'

'I need to, once, I can tell you. Valentinia and I need to run about without shoes and stockings at Kilnabeggan, and you can't think how pretty and white this little foot need to look on a nice soft carpet of green moss.'

'I shall write a sonnet to it.'

'You may if you choose, provided you don't publish it.'

'You may trust me for that. I am not one of those who anatomise their own married happiness for the edification of the whole public, and make fun, if not money, out of their own wives' hearts.'

How I should hate you, if you did! Not that I believe their fine stories about themselves. At least, I am certain it's only half the story. They have their quarrels, my dear, just as you and I have, but they take care not to put them into poetry.'

'Well, but who could? Whether they have right or not to publish the poetical side of their married life, it is too much to ask them to give you the unpoetical also.'

'Then they are all humbugs, and I believe, if they really love their wives so very much, they would not be at all that pains to persuade the world of it.'

'You are very satirical and spiteful, ma'am.'

'I always am when I am pleased. If I am particularly happy, I always long to punish somebody. I suppose it's Irish—'

"Comes out, murther a friend, and for love knocks him down."

'But you know, you rogue, that you care to read no poetry but love poetry.'

'Of course not, every woman does, but let me find you publishing any such about me, and see what I will do to you! There, now I must go to my work, and you go and write something extra-supremely grand, because I have been so good to you. No. Let me go, what a bother you are. Good-bye.'

And away she tripped, and he returned to his work, happier than he had been for a week past.

His happiness, truly, was only on the surface. The old wound had been salved—as what wound cannot be?—by woman's love and woman's wit, but it was not healed. The cause of his wrong doing, the vain, self-indulgent spirit, was there still unchastised, and he was destined, that very day, to find that he had still to bear the punishment of it.

Now the reader must understand, that though one may laugh at Elsley Vavasour, because it is more pleasant than scolding at him, yet have Philistia and Fogeydom neither right nor reason to consider him a despicable or merely ludicrous person, or to cry, 'Ah, if he had been as we are!'

Had he been merely ludicrous, Lucia would never have married him, and he could only have been spoken of with indignation, or left utterly out of the story, as a simply unpleasant figure, beyond the purposes of a novel, though admissible now and then into tragedy. One cannot heartily laugh at a man if one has not a lurking love for him, as one really ought to have for Elsley. How much value is to be attached to his mere power of imagination and fancy, and so forth, is a question; but there was in him more than mere talent: there was, in thought at least, virtue and magnanimity.

True, the best part of him, perhaps almost all the good part of him, spent itself in words, and must be looked for, not in his life, but in his books. But in those books it can be found, and if you look through them, you will see that he has not touched upon a subject without taking, on the whole, the right, and pure, and lofty view of it. However extravagant he may be in his notions of poetic licence, that licence is never with him a synonym for licentiousness. Whatever is tender and true, whatever is chivalrous and high-minded, he loves at first sight, and reproduces it lovingly. And it may be possible that his own estimate of his poems was not altogether wrong, that his words may have awakened here and there in others a love for that which is morally as well as physically beautiful, and may have kept alive in their hearts the recollection that, both for the bodies and the souls of men forms of life far nobler and purer than those which we see now are possible, that they have appeared, in fragments at least, already on the earth, that they are destined, perhaps, to reappear and combine themselves in some ideal state, and in 'One far-off divine event,

Toward which the whole creation moves.'

This is the special and proper function of the poet, that he may do this, does God touch his lips with that which, however it may be misused, is still fire from off the altar beneath which the spirits of his saints cry, 'Lord, how long?' If he 'reproduces the beautiful' with this intent, however so little, then is he of the sacred guild. And because Vavasour had this gift, therefore he was a poet.

But in this he was weak, that he did not feel, or at least was forgetting fast, that this gift had been bestowed on him for any practical purpose. No one could demand that he should have gone forth with some grand social scheme, to reform a world which looked to him so mean and evil. He was not a man of business, and was not meant to be one. But it was ill for him that in his fastidiousness and touchiness he had shut himself out from that world, till he had quite forgotten how much good there was in it as well as evil, how many people—commonplace and unpoetical it may be, but still heroic in God's sight, were working harder than he ever worked, at the divine drudgery of doing good, and that in dens of darkness and sloughs of filth from which he would have turned with disgust, so that the sympathy with the sinful and fallen which marks his earlier poems, and which perhaps verges on sentimentalism, gradually gives place to a Pharisaic and contemptuous tone, a tone more lofty and manful in seeming, but far less divine in fact. Perhaps comparative success had injured him. Whilst struggling himself against circumstances, poor, untaught, unhappy, he had more fellow-feeling with those whom circumstances oppressed. At least, the pity which he could once bestow upon the misery which he met in his daily walks, he now kept for the more picturesque woes of Italy and Greece.

In this, too, he was weak, that he had altogether forgotten that the fire from off the altar could only be kept alight by continual self-restraint and self-sacrifice, by continual gentleness and humility, shown in the petty matters of everyday home-life, and that he who cannot rule his own household can never rule the Church of God. And so it befell that amid the little cross-blasts of home squabbles the sacred spark was fast going out. The poems written after he settled at Ponalva are marked by a less definite purpose, by a lower tone of feeling, not, perhaps, by a lower moral tone, but simply by loss of any moral tone at all. They are more and more full of merely sensuous beauty, mere word-painting, mere word-hunting. The desire of finding something worth saying gives place more and more to that of saying something in a new fashion. As the originality of thought (which accompanies only vigorous moral purpose) decreases, the attempt at originality of language increases. Manner, in short, has taken the place of matter. The art, it may be, of his latest poems is greatest, but it has been expended on the most unworthy themes. The later are mannered caricatures of the earlier, without their soul, and the same change seems to have passed over him which (with Mr. Ruskin's pardon) transformed the Thyrer of 1820 into the Turner of 1850.

Thus had Elsley transferred what sympathy he had left from needle-women and ragged schools, dwellers in Jacob's Island and sleepers in the dry arches of Waterloo Bridge, to sufferers of a more poetic class. Whether his sympathies showed thereby that he had risen or fallen, let my readers decide each for himself. It is a credit to any man to feel for any human being, and Italy, as she is at this moment, is certainly one of the most tragic spectacles which the world has ever seen. Elsley need not be blamed for pitying her, only for holding, with most of our poets, a vague notion that her woes were to be cured by a ban of the dog that bit her, viz. by homoeopathic doses of that same 'art' which has been all along her mould and self-deceiving substitute for virtue and industry. So, as she had sung herself down to the nether pit, Elsley would help to sing her up again, and had already been throwing off, ever since 1848, a series of sonnets which he entitled Eurydice, intimating, of course, that he acted as the Orpheus. Whether he had hopes of drawing iron tears down Radetky's cheek does not appear, but certainly the longer poem which had sprung from his fancy, at the urgent call of Messrs. Brown and Younger, would have been likely to draw nothing but iron balls from Radetky's cannon, or failing so vast an effect, an immediate external application to the poet himself of that famous herb Pantagruelion, cure for all public ills and private woes, which men call hemp. Nevertheless, it was a noble subject, one which ought surely to have been taken up by some of our poets, for if they do not make a noble poem of it, it will be their own fault. I mean that sad and fantastic tragedy of Fra Dolcino and Margaret, which Signor Mariotti has lately given to the English public in a book which, both for its matter and its manner, should be better known than it is. Elsley's soul had been filled (it would have been a dull one else) with the conception of the handsome and gifted patriot-monk, his soul delirious with the dream of realising a perfect Church on earth, battling with tongue and pen, and at last with sword, against the villainies of pope and kaiser, and all the old devourers of the earth, cheered only by the wild love of her who had given up wealth, fame, friends, all which render life worth having, to die with him a death too horrible for words. And he had conceived (and not altogether ill) a vision in which, wandering along some bright Italian bay, he met Dolcino sitting, a spirit at rest but not yet glorified, waiting for the revival of that dead land for which he had died, and Margaret by him, dipping her scorched feet for ever in the cooling wave, and looking up to the hero for whom she had given up all, with eyes of everlasting love. There they were to prophesy to him such things as seemed fit to him, of the future of Italy and of Europe, of the doom of priests and tyrants, of the sorrows and rewards of genius unappreciated and before its age, for Elsley's secret vanity could see in himself a far greater likeness to Dolcino than Dolcino the preacher, confessor, leader of all hearts, man of the world and man of action, at last crafty and all but an invincible guerrilla warrior would ever have acknowledged in the self-indulgent dreamer. However, it was a fair conception enough, though perhaps it never would have entered Elsley's head, had Shelley never written the opening canto of the Revolt of Islam.

So Elsley, on a burning July forenoon, strolled up the lane and over the down to King Arthur's Nose, that he might find materials for his seashore scene. For he was not one of those men who live in such quiet, everyday communion with nature, that they drink in her various aspects as unconsciously as the air they breathe, and so can reproduce them, out of an inexhaustible stock of details, simply and accurately, and yet freshly too, tinged by the peculiar hue of the mind in which they have been long sleeping. He walked the world, either blind to the beauty round him, and trying to compose instead some little scrap of beauty in his own self-imprisoned thoughts, or else he was looking out consciously and spasmodically for views, effects, emotions, images, something striking and uncommon which would suggest a poetic figure, or help out a description, or in some way re-form his mind with thought. From which method it befell, that his lamp of truth was too often burnt out just when it was needed and that, like the foolish virgins, he had to go and buy oil when it was too late, or failing that, to supply its place with some baser artificial material.

That day, however, he was fortunate enough, for wandering and scrambling among the rocks, at a dead low spring tide, he came upon a spot which would have made a poem of itself better than all Elsley ever wrote, had he, forgetting all about Fra Dolcino, Italy, priests, and tyrants, set down in black and white just what he saw, provided, of course, that he had patience first to see the same.

It was none other than that ghastly chasm across which Thurnall had been so miraculously swept on the night of his shipwreck. The same ghastly chasm, but ghastly now no longer, and as Elsley looked down the beauty below invited him, and the coolness also, for the sun beat on the flat rock above till it scorched the feet, and dazzled the eye, and crisped up the blackening sea-woods, while every sea-snail crept to hide itself under the bladder-tangle, and nothing dared to peep or stir save certain grains of gunpowder, which seemed to have gone mad, so merrily did they hop about upon the surface of the fast evaporating salt-pools. That wonder, indeed, Elsley stooped to examine, and drew back his hands with an 'Ugh!' and a gesture of disgust, when he found that they were 'nasty little insects.' For Elsley held fully the poet's right to believe that all things are not very good, none, indeed, save such as suited his eclectic and fastidious taste, and to hold (on high æsthetic grounds, of course) tanks and spiders in as much abhorrence as does any boarding-school girl. However, hurrying some rock ledges which formed a natural ladder, down he scrambled, gingerly enough, for he was neither an active nor a courageous man. But once down, I will do him the justice to say that for five whole minutes he forgot all about Fra Dolcino, and, what was better, about himself also.

The chasm may have been fifteen feet deep, and above, about half that breadth, but below, the waves had hollowed it into dark overhanging caverns. Just in front of him a huge boulder spanned the crack, and formed a natural doorway, through which he saw, like a picture set in a frame, the far-off blue softening into the blue sky among brown Eastern haze. Amid the haze a single ship hung motionless, like a white cloud. Nearer a black cormorant floated sleepily along, and dived, and rose again. Nearer again, long lines of flat tide-rock, glittering and quivering in the heat, sloped gradually under the waves, till they ended in half-smoken beds of olive seaweed, which bent their tangled stems into a hundred graceful curves, and swayed to and fro slowly and sleepily. The low swell slid whispering among their floating palms, and slipped on toward the cavern's mouth, as if asking vainly (so Elsley fancied) when it would be time for it to return to that cool shade, and hide from all the blinding blaze outside. But when his eye was enough accustomed to the shade within, it withdrew gladly from the glaring sea and glaring tide-rocks to the walls of the chasm itself, to curved and polished sheets of stone, rich brown, with snow-white veins, on which danced for ever a dappled network of pale yellow light, to crusted beds of pink coralline, to caverns in the dark crannies of which hung all branching sponges and tufts of purple sea-moss; to strips of clear white sand, bestrewn with shells, to pools, each a gay flower-garden of all hues, where branching sea-weed reflected blue light from every point, like a thousand damasked sword-blades, while among their dahlias and chrysanthemums, and many another mine of our earth-born flowers, spread blooms of crimson, and purple, and blue, and creamy gray, half-buried among feathered weeds as lightly coloured as they, and strange and gaudy fishes shot across from side to side, and chased each other in and out of hidden cells.

Within and without all was at rest, the silence was broken only by the timid whisper of the swell, and by the clime of dropping water within some unseen cave, but what a delicious rest! Without, all lying breathless, stupefied, sun-stricken, in blinding glare, within, all coolness and refreshing sleep. Without, all simple, broad, and vast, within, all various, with infinite richness of form and colour. An Haroun Alraschid's harem looking out upon the—

Bother the fellow! Why will he go on analysing and figuring in this way? Why not let the blessed place tell him what it means, instead of telling it what he thinks? And—why, he is actually writing verses, though not about Fra Dolcino!

How rests yon rock, whose half day a bath is done,
With broad bright side, beneath the broad bright sun,
Like sea-nymph tired, on cushioned dunes sleeping;
Yet, nearer drawn, beneath her purple tresses,
Front down bent brows we find her slowly weeping,
So many a heart for cruel man's care is seen
Must only pine and pine, and yet must bear
A gallant front beneath his gaudy glare.

Silly fellow! Do you think that Nature had time to think of such a far-fetched conceit as that while it was making that rock and peopling it with a million tiny living things, of which not one falleth to the ground without your Father's knowledge, and each more beautiful than any sea-nymph whom you ever fancied? For, after all, you cannot fancy a whole sea-nymph (perhaps in that case you could make one), but only a very little scrap of her outside. Or if, as you boast, you are inspired by the Creative Spirit, tell us what the Creative Spirit says about that rock, and not such verse as this, the lesson of which you don't yourself really feel. Pretty enough it is, perhaps, but in your haste to say a pretty thing, just because it is pretty, you have not cared to condemn yourself out of your own mouth. Why were you sulky, sir, with Mrs. Vavasour this very morning, after all that passed, because she would look over the washing-books, while you wanted her to hear about Fra Dolcino? And why, though she was up to her knees among your dirty shirts when you went out, did you not give her one parting kiss, which would have transfigured her virtuous drudgery for her into a sacred pleasure? One is heartily glad to see you disturbed, cross though you may look at it, by that sturdy step and jolly whistle which burst in on you from the other end of the chasm, as Tom Thurnall, with an old smock frock over his coat and a large basket on his arm, comes stumbling and hopping towards you, dropping every now and then on hands and knees, and turning over on his back, to squeeze his head into some muddy crack, and then withdraw it with the salt water dripping down his nose.

Elsley closed his eyes, and rested his head on his hand in a somewhat studied 'pose'. But as he wished not to be interrupted, it may not have been altogether unpardonable to pretend sleep. However, the sleeping posture had exactly the opposite effect to that which he designed.

'Ah, Mr. Vavasour!'

'Humph!' quoth he slowly, it not sulkily.

'I admire your taste, sir, a charming museum-house old Triton has vacated for your use, but let me advise you not to go to sleep in it.'

'Why then, sir?'

'Because it's no business of mine, of course', but the tide has turned already, and if a breeze springs up, old Triton will be back again in a hurry and in a rage also, and I may possibly lose a good patient.'

Elsley, who knew nothing about the tides, save that 'the moon wooed the ocean,' or some such important fact, thanked him coolly enough, and returned to a meditative attitude. Tom saw that he was in the seventh heaven, and went on, but he had not gone three steps before he pulled up short, slipping his hands together once, as a man does who has found what he wants, and then plunged up to his knees in a rock pool, and then began working very gently at something under water.

Elsley watched him for full five minutes with so much curiosity that, despite of himself, he asked him what he was doing.

Tom had his whole face under water, and did not hear till Elsley had repeated the question.

'Only a rare zoophyte,' said he at last, hitting his dripping visage and gasping for breath, and then he dived again.

'Inexplicable pedantry of science!' thought Elsley to himself, while Tom worked on steadily, and at last rose, and taking out a phial from his basket, was about to deposit in it something invisible.

'Stay a moment, you really have roused my curiosity by your earnestness. May I see what it is for which you have taken so much trouble?'

Tom held out on his finger a piece of shiny crust the size of a halfpenny. Elsley could only shrug his shoulders.

'Nothing to you, sir, I doubt not, but worth a guinea to me, even if it be only to mount bits of it as microscope objects.'

'So you mingle business with science?' said Elsley, rather in a contentious tone.

'Why not? I must live, and my father too, and it is as honest a way of making money as any other, I preach in no man's manner for my game.'

'But what is your game? What possible attraction in that bit of dirt can make men spend their money on it?"

"You shall see," said Tom, dropping it into the phial of salt water, and offering it to Elsley, with his pocket magnifier.

"Judge for yourself."

Elsley did so, and beheld a new wonder, a living plant of crystal, studded with crystal bells, from each of which waved a crown of delicate arms. It was the first time that Elsley had ever seen one of those exquisite zoophytes which stud every rock and every tuft of weed.

"This is most beautiful," said he at length.

"Humph! why should not Mr Vavasour write a poem about it?"

"Why not, indeed?" thought Elsley.

"It's no business of mine, no man's less, but I often wonder why you poets don't take to the microscope, and tell us a little more about the wonderful things which are here already, and not about those which are not, and which, perhaps, never will be."

"Well," said Elsley, after another look. "but, after all, these things have no human interest in them."

"I don't know what, they have to me, for instance. These are the things which I would write about if I had any turn for verse, not about human nature, of which I know, I'm afraid, a little too much already. I always like to read old Darwin's Loves of the Plants, hosh as it is in a scientific point of view, it amuses one's fancy without making one lose one's temper, as one must when one begins to analyse that microscopic ape called self and friends."

"You would like, then, the old cosmogonies, the Kabbas and the Vedas," said Elsley, getting interested, as most people did after five minutes' talk with the cynical doctor. "I suppose you would not say much for their science, but, as poetry, they are just what you ask for: the expression of thoughtful spirits, who look round upon nature with awe-struck, child-like eyes, and asked of all heaven and earth the question, 'What are you? How came you to be?' Yet—it may be my fault—while I admire them, I cannot sympathise with them. To me, this zoophyte is as a being of another sphere, and till I can create some link in my own mind between it and humanity it is as nothing in my eyes."

"There is link enough, sir, don't doubt, and chains of iron and brass too."

"You believe, then, in the development theory of the 'Vestiges'?"

"Doctors who have their bread to earn never commit themselves to theories. No, all I meant was, that this little zoophyte lives by the same laws as you and I, and that he and the sea-weeds, and so forth, teach us doctors certain little rules concerning life and death, which you will have a chance soon of seeing at work on the most grand and poetical, and indeed altogether tragic scale."

"What do you mean?"

"When the cholera comes here, as it will, at its present pace, before the end of the summer, then I shall have the zoophytes rising up in judgment against me, if I have not profited by a leaf out of their book."

"The cholera?" said Elsley in a startled voice, forgetting Tom's parables in the new thought. For Elsley had a dread more nervous than really coward of infectious diseases; and he had also (and prided himself, too, on having) all Goethe's dislike of anything terrible or horrible, of sickness, disease, wounds, death, anything which jarred with that "beautiful" which was his ideal.

"The cholera?" repeated he. "I hope not, I wish you had not mentioned it, Mr Thurnall."

"I am very sorry that I did so, it it offend you. I had thought that forewarned was forearmed. After all, it is no business of mine, if I have extra labour, as I shall have, I shall have extra experience, and that will be a fair set-off, even if the board of guardians don't vote me an extra remuneration, as they ought to do."

Elsley was struck dumb, first by the certainty which Tom's words expressed, and next by the coolness of their temper. At last he stammered out, "Good heavens, Mr Thurnall! you do not talk of that frightful asconge—so disgusting, too, in its character—as a matter of profit and loss! It is sordid, cold-hearted!"

"My dear sir, if I let myself think, much more talk, about the matter in any other tone, I should face the thing poorly enough when it came. I shall have work enough to keep my head about the end of August or beginning of September, and I must not lose it beforehand, by indulging in any horror, disgust, or other emotion perfectly justifiable in a layman."

"But are not doctors men?"

"That depends very much on what 'a man' means."

"Men with human sympathy and compassion."

"Oh, I mean by a man, a man with human strength. My dear sir, one may be too busy, and at doing good too (though that is not my line, save professionally, because it is my only way of earning money), but one may be too busy at doing good to have time for compassion. If while I was cutting a man's leg off I thought of the pain which he was suffering—"

"Thank Heaven!" said Elsley, "that it was not my lot to become a medical man."

Tom looked at him with the quaintest smile, a flush of mingled anger and contempt had been rising in him as he heard the ex-bottle boy talking sentiment—but he only went on quietly—

"No, sir, with your more delicate sensibilities, you may thank Heaven that you did not become a medical man, your life would have been one of torture, disgust, and agonising sense of responsibility. But do you not see that you must thank Heaven for the sufferer's sake also? I will not shock you again by talking of amputation, but even in the smallest matter—even if you were merely sending medicine to an old maid—suppose that your imagination were preoccupied by the thought of her old age, her sufferings, her disappointed hopes, her regretful dream of bygone youth, and beauty, and love, and all the tender fancies which might well spring out of such a mournful spectacle, would you not be but too likely (pardon the pathos) to end by sending her an elderly gentleman's medicine after all, and so either frightfully increasing her sufferings, or ending them once for all?

Tom said this in the most quiet and natural tone, without even a twinkle of his wicked eye; but Elsie heard him begin with reddening face, and as he went on, the red had turned to purple, and then to deadly yellow, till making a half-step forward he cried fiercely—

'Sir!' and then stopped suddenly, for his foot slipped upon the polished stone, and on his face he fell into the pool at Thruall's feet.

'Well for both of us, goose!' said Tom inwardly, as he went to pick him up. 'I verily believe he was going to strike me, and that would have done for neither of us. I was a fool to say it, but the temptation was so exquisite, and it must have come some day.'

But Vavasour staggered up of his own accord, and dashing away Tom's proffered hand, was rushing off without a word.

'Not so, Mr John Briggs!' said Tom, making up his mind in a moment that he must have it out now, or never; and that he might have everything to fear from Vavasour if he let him go home furious. 'We do not part thus, sir!'

'We will meet again, if you will,' flamed Vavasour, 'but it shall end in the death of one of us!'

'By each other's potions? I can doctor myself, sir, thank you. Listen to me, John Briggs! You shall listen!' and Tom sprang past him, and planted himself at the foot of the rock steps, to prevent his escaping upward.

'What, do you wish to quarrel with me, sir? It is I who ought to quarrel with you. I am the aggrieved party, and not you, sir! I have not seen the son of the man who, when I was an apothecary's boy, jettied him, lent me books, introduced me as a genius, turned my head for me—which was just what I was vain enough to enjoy—I have not seen that man's son cast ashore penniless and friendless, and yet never held out to him a helping hand, but tried to conceal my identity from him, from a dirty shame of my honest father's honest name.'

Vavasour dropped his eyes, for was it not true? but he raised them again more fiercely than ever.

'Curse you! I owe you nothing. It was you who made me ashamed of it. You rhymed on it, and laughed about poetry coming out of such a name.'

'And what if I did? Are poets to be made of nothing but tinder and gall? Why could you not take an honest joke as it was meant and go your way like other people, till you had shown yourself worth something, and won honour even for the name of Briggs?'

'And I have! I have my own station now, my own fame, sir, and it is nothing to you what I choose to call myself. I have won my place, I say, and your mean envy cannot rob me of it.'

'You have your station. Very good,' said Tom, not caring to notice the imputation, 'you owe the greater part of it to your having made a most fortunate marriage, for which I respect you, as a practical man. Let your poetry be what it may (and people tell me that it is really very beautiful), your match shows me that you are a clever, and therefore a successful person.'

'Do you take me for a sordid schemer, like yourself? I loved what was worthy of me, and won it because I deserved it.'

'Then, having won it, treat it as it deserves,' said Tom, with a cool, searching look, before which Vavasour's eyes fell again. 'Understand me, Mr John Briggs, it is of no consequence to me what you call yourself. But it is of consequence to me that I should not have a patient in my parish whom I cannot cure, for I cannot cure broken hearts, though they will be simple enough to come to me for medicine.'

'You shall have no chance! You shall never enter my house! You shall not ruin me, sir, by your bills!'

Tom made no answer to this fresh insult. He had another game to play.

'Take care what you say, Briggs, remember that, after all, you are in my power, and I had better remind you plainly of the fact.'

'And you mean to make me your tool? I will die first!'

'I believe that,' said Tom, who was very near adding, 'that he should be sorry to work with such tools.'

'My tools are my lancet and my drugs,' said he quietly, 'and all I have to say refers to them. It suits my purpose to become the principal medical man in this neighbourhood—'

'And I am to tout for introductions for you?'

'You are to be so very kind as to allow me to finish my sentence, just as you would allow any other gentleman, and because I wish for practice, and patients, and power, you will be so kind as to treat me henceforth as one high-minded man would treat another to whom he is obliged. For you know, John Briggs, as well as I,' said Tom, drawing himself up to his full height, 'look me in the face, if you can, ere you deny it, that I was, while you knew me, as honourable a man and as kind-hearted a man as you ever were, and that now—considering the circumstances under which we meet—you have more reason to trust me than I have, prima facie, to trust you.'

Vavasour answered not a word. 'Good-bye, then,' said Tom, drawing aside from the step, 'Mrs Vavasour will be anxious about you! And mind! With regard to her first of all, sir, and then with regard to other matters—as long, and only as long, as you remember that you are John Briggs of Whitbury, I shall be the first to forget it. There is my hand, for old acquaintance' sake.'

Vavasour took the proffered hand coldly, paused a moment, and then wrung it in silence, and hurried away home.

'Have I played my ace ill after all?' said Tom, sitting down to consider. 'As for whether I should have played it at all, that's no business of mine now. Madam Might-have-been may see to that. But did I play ill? For if I did, I may try a new lead yet. Ought I to have twitted him about his wife? If he's venomous, it may only make matters worse, and still worse if he be suspicious. I don't think he was either in old times, but vanity will make a man so, and it may have made him. Well, I must only ingratiate myself all the more with him, and hum out, too, whether she has his secret as well as I. What I am most afraid of is my having told him plainly that he was in my power, it's up to make sprats of his now flounce desperately, in the mere hope of proving themselves whales after all, if it's only to then unnerve selves. Never mind, he can't break my tackle, and besides, that grip of the hand seemed to indicate that the poor wretch was beat, and thought himself let off easily, as unless he is. We'll hope so. Now, zoophytes, for another turn with you!'

To tell the truth, however, Tom is looking for more than zoophytes, and has been doing so at every dead low tide since he was wrecked. He has heard nothing yet of his belt. The notes have not been presented at the London bank, nobody in the village has been spending more money than usual, for cunning Tom has contrived already to know how many pints of ale every man of whom he has the least doubt has drunk. Perhaps, after all, the belt may have been torn off in the life struggle, it may have been for a moment in Grace's hands, and then have been swept back into the sea. What was likely? And what more likely, in that case, that, sinking by its weight, it is wedged away in some cranny of the rocks? So spring-tide after spring-tide Tom searches, and all the more carefully because others are searching too, for waifs and strays from the wreck. Sad relief of mortality he finds at times, as others do, once, even, a dressing-case, full of rings and pins and chains, which belonged, he fancied, to a gay young lady with whom he had waited in many a time on deck, as they shipped along before the soft trade-wind but no belt. He sent the dressing-case to the Lloyd's underwriters, and searched on, but in vain. Neither could he find that any one else had forestalled him, and that very afternoon, sulky and disheartened, he determined to waste no more time about the matter, and strode home, vowing signal vengeance against the thief, if he caught him.

'And I will catch him!' These West-country yokels, to fancy that they can do Tom Thurnall! It's adding insult to injury, as Sam Weller's parrot has it.

Now his shortest way home lay across the shore, and then along the beach, and up the steps by the little waterfall, just Mrs. Harvey's door, and at that door sat Grace, sewing in the sun. She looked up and bowed as he passed, smiling modestly, and little dreaming of what was passing in his mind, and when a very lovely girl smiled and bowed to Tom, he must needs do the same to her. Whereon she added:

'I beg your pardon, sir, have you heard anything of the money you lost? I--we--have been so ashamed to think of such a thing happening here.'

Tom's evil spirit was roused.

'Have you heard anything of it, Miss Harvey? For you seem to be the only person in the place who knows anything about the matter.'

'I, sir?' cried Grace, fixing her great startled eyes full on him.

'Why, m'am,' said Tom with a courtly smile, 'you may possibly recollect, if you will so far tax your memory, that you had it in your hands at least a moment, when you did me the kindness to save my life, and as you were kind enough to inform me that I should recover it when I was worthy of it, I suppose I have not yet risen in your eyes to the required state of conversion and regeneration.' And swinging impatiently away, he walked on, really afraid lest he should say something rude.

Grace half called after him, and then suddenly checking herself, rushed in to her mother with a wild and pale face.

'What is this Mr. Thurnall has been saying to me about his belt and money which he lost?'

'About what? Has he been rude to you, the bad man?' cried Mrs. Harvey, dropping the patch in some confusion, and taking a long while to pick up the pieces.

'About the belt. The money which he lost. Why don't you speak, mother?'

'Belt--money? Ah, I recollect now. He has lost some money, he says.'

'Of course he has.'

'How should you know anything? I recollect there was some talk of it, though. But what matter what he says? He was quite passed away, I'll swear, when they carried him up.'

'But, mother! mother! he says that I know about it, that I had it in my hands!'

'You? Oh, the wicked wretch, the false, ungrateful, slanderous child of wrath, with sinner's poison under his lips! No, my child! Though we're poor, we're honest! Let him slander us, rob us of our good name, send us to prison if he will—he cannot rob us of our souls. We'll be silent, we'll turn the other cheek, and commit our cause to One above who pleads for the orphan and the widow. We will not strive nor cry, my child. Oh, no!'

And Mrs. Harvey began fussing over the smashed patch. 'I shall not strive nor cry, mother,' said Grace, who had recovered her usual calm, 'but he must have some cause for these strange words. Do you recollect seeing me with the belt?'

'Belt, what's a belt? I know nothing about belts. I tell you he's a villain and a slanderer. Oh, that it should have come to this, to have my child's fair fame blasted by a wretch that comes nobody knows where from, and has been doing nobody knows what, for aught I know!'

'Mother, mother! we know no harm of him. If he is mistaken, God forgive him!'

'If he is mistaken?' went on Mrs. Harvey, still over the pie-dish but Grace gave her no answer. She was deep in thought. She recollected now, that as she had gone up the path from the cove on that eventful morning, she had seen Willis and Thurnall whispering earnestly together, and she recollected now, for the first time, that there had been a certain sadness and perplexity, almost reserve, about Willis ever since. Good heavens! Could he suspect her too? She would find out that at least, and no sooner had her mother fused away, talking angrily to herself, into the back kitchen, than Grace put on her bonnet and shawl, and went forth to find the captain.

In an hour she returned. Her lips were firm as if, her cheeks pale, her eyes red with weeping. She said nothing to her mother, who for her part did not seem inclined to allude again to the matter.

'Where have you been, child? You look quite poorly, and your eyes red.'

'The wind is very cold, mother,' and she, and went into her room. Her mother looked sharply after her, and muttered to herself.

Grace went in, and sat down on the bed. 'What a coldness this is at my heart!' she said aloud to herself, trying to smile, but she could not, and she sat on the bed-side, without taking off her bonnet and shawl, her hands hanging listlessly by her side, her head drooping on her bosom, till her mother called her to tea. Then she was forced to rouse herself, and went out, composed, but utterly wretched.

Tom walked up homeward, very ill at ease. He had played, to use his nomenclature, two trump cards running, and was by no means satisfied that he had played them well. He had no right, certainly, to be satisfied with either move, for both had been made in a somewhat evil spirit, and certainly for no very disinterested end.

That was a view of the matter, however, which never entered his mind, there was only that general dissatisfaction with himself which is, though men try hard to deny the fact, none other than the supernatural sting of conscience. He tried 'to lay to his soul the flattering unction' that he might, after all, be of use to Mrs. Vavasour, by using his power over her husband, but he knew in his secret heart that any move of his in that direction was likely only to make matters worse, that to-day's explosion might only have sent home the hapless Vavasour in a more irritable temper than ever. And thinking over many things, backward and forward, he saw his own way so little, that he actually condescended to go and 'pump' Frank Headley. So he termed it, but after all, it was only like asking advice of a good man, because he did not feel himself quite good enough to advise himself.

T. Y. A.

The curate was preparing to sally forth, after his frugal dinner. The morning he spent at the schools, or in parish secularities, the afternoon, till dusk, was devoted to visiting the poor, the night, not to sleep, but to reading and sermon writing. Thus, by sitting up till two in the morning, and rising again at six for his private devotions, before walking a mile and a half up to church for the morning service, Frank Headley burnt the candle of life at both ends very effectually, and showed that he did so by his pale cheeks and red eyes.

'Ah!' said Tom, as he entered. 'As natural poor nature is being robbed and murdered by rich grace.'

'What do you mean now?' asked Frank, smiling, for he had become accustomed enough to Tom's quaint parables, though he had to scold him often for their irreverence.

'Nature says, "after dinner sit awhile"; and even the dumb animals hear her voice, and lie by for a while when their stomachs are full. Grace says, "Jump up and rush out the moment you have swallowed your food, and if you get an indigestion, blame poor Nature for it, and lay the blame on Adam's fall!"'

'You are irreverent, my good sir, as usual, but you are unjust also this time.'

'How then?'

'Unjust to grace, as you phrase it,' answered Frank, with a quaint sad smile. 'I assure you on my honour that grace has nothing whatsoever to do with my "rushing out" just now, but simply the desire to do my good works that they may be seen of men. I hate going out. I should like to sit and read the whole afternoon but I am afraid lest the dysentery should say, "He has not been to see us and so for the last three days", so off I go, and no credit to me.'

Why had Frank dared, upon a month's acquaintance, to lay bare his own heart thus to a man of no creed at all? Because, I suppose, and all differences, he had found one point of likeness between himself and Thurnall, he had found that Tom at heart was a truly genuine man, sincere and faithful to his own scheme of the universe.

Now that man, through all his eventful life, had been enabled to 'Bate not a jot of heart or hope,

But steer right on ward, was a problem which Frank longed curiously, and yet fearfully vital, to solve. There were many qualities in him which Frank could not but admire, and long to imitate, and, 'Whence had they come?' was another problem at which he looked, trembling as many a new thought crossed him. He longed, too, to learn from Tom somewhat at least of that serior fare, that power of 'becoming all things to all men,' which St. Paul had, and for want of which Frank had failed. He saw, too, with surprise, that Tom had gained in one month more real insight into the characters of his parishioners than he had done in twelve, and besides all, there was the f

craving of the lonely heart for human confidence and friendship. So it befell that Frank spoke out his inmost thought that day, and thought no shame, and it befell also, that Thurnall, when he heard it, said in his heart—

'What a noble, honest fellow you are, when you —'

But he answered enigmatically—

'Oh, I quite agree with you that Grace has nothing to do with it. I only referred it to that source because I thought you would do so.'

'You ought to be ashamed of your dishonesty, then.'

'I know it, but my view of the case is, that you made out after dinner for the very same reason that the Yankee store-keeper does—from — you'll forgive me if I say it!'

'Of course. You cannot speak too plainly to me.'

'Concent, the Yankee fancies himself such an important person that the commercial world will stand still unless he lies back to its help after ten minutes' joshing, with his mouth full of pork and pickled peaches. And you fancy yourself so important in your line that the spiritual world will stand still unless you bolt back to help it in like wise. Substitute a hall craked with tin chips for the pork, and the cases are exact parallels.'

'Your parallel does not hold good, doctor. The Yankee goes back to his store to earn money for himself, and not to keep commerce alive.'

'While you go for utterly disinterested motives. I see.'

'Do you?' said Frank. 'If you think that I fancy myself a better man than the Yankee, you mistake me, but at least you will confess that I am not working for money.'

'No, you have your notions of reward, and he has his. He wants to be paid by material dollars, payable next month; you by spiritual dollars, payable when you die. I don't see the great difference.'

'Only the slight difference between what is material and what is spiritual.'

'They seem to me, from all I can hear in pulpits, to be only two different sorts of pleasant things, and to be sought after, both alike, simply because they are pleasant. Self-interest, if you will forgive me, seems to me the spring of both, only, to do you justice, you are a further-sighted and more prudent man than the Yankee store-keeper, and having more exquisitely developed notions of what your true self-interest is, are content to wait a little longer than he.'

'You staid with a jest, Thurnall. You little know how your words hit home.'

'Well, then, to turn from a matter of which I know nothing—I must keep you in, and give you parish business to do at home. I am come to consult you as my spiritual pastor and master.'

Frank looked a little astonished.

'Don't be alarmed. I am not going to confess my own sins—only other people's.'

'Pray don't, then. I know far more of them already than I can cure. I am worn out with the daily discovery of fresh evil wherever I go.'

'Then why not comfort yourself by trying to find a little fresh good wherever you go?'

Frank sighed.

'Perhaps, though, you don't care for any sort of good except your own sort of good. You are fastidious. Well, you have your expenses. But you can understand a poor fellow like me, who has been dragged through the slums and sewers of this wicked world for fifteen years and more, being very well content with any sort of good which I can light on, and not particular as to either quantity or quality.'

'Perhaps yours is the healthier state of mind, if you can only find the real good. The vulture me nose, which smells nothing but corruption, is no credit to its possessor. And it would be pleasant, at least, to find good in every man.'

'One can't do that in one's study. Mixing with them is the only plan. No doubt they're inconsistent enough. The more you see of them, the less you trust them, and yet the more you see of them, the more you like them. Can you solve that paradox from your books?'

'I will try,' said Frank. 'I generally have more than one to think over when you go. But, surely, there are men so fallen that they are utterly unsalvageable to good.'

'Very likely. There's no saying in this world what may not be. Only I never saw one. I'll tell you a story, you may apply it as you like. When I was on the Texan expedition, and raw to soldiering and camping, we had to sleep in low ground, and suffered terribly from a miasma. Badly cold it was, when it came, and the men who once got chilled through with it, just died. I was lying on the bare ground one night, and chilly enough I was. For I was short of clothes, and had lost my buffalo robe—but fell asleep. And on waking the next morning, I found myself covered up in my comrade's blankets, even to his coat, while he was sitting shivering in his shirt sleeves. The cold fog had come down in the night, and the man had stripped himself, and sat all night with death staring him in the face, to save my life. And all the reason he gave was, that if one of us must die, it was better the older should go first, and not a youngster like me. And, said Tom, lowering his voice, 'that man was a murderer!'

'A murderer?'

'Yes, a drunken, gambling, cut-throat rowdy as ever grew ripe for the gallows. Now, will you tell me that there was nothing in that man but what the devil put there?'

Frank sat meditating awhile on this strange story, which is moreover a true one, and then looked up with something like tears in his eyes.

'And he did not die?'

'Not he. I saw him die afterwards—shot through the heart, without time even to cry out. But I have not forgotten what he did for me that night, and I'll tell you what, sir! I do not believe that God has forgotten it either.'

Frank was silent for a few moments, and then Tom changed the subject.

'I want to know what you can tell me about this Mr. Vavasour.'

'Hardly anything, I am sorry to say. I was at his house at tea, two or three times, when I first came, and I had very agreeable evenings, and talks on art and poetry, but I believe I offended him by hinting that he ought to come to church, which he never does, and since then our acquaintance has all but ceased. I suppose you will say, as usual, that I played my cards badly there also.'

'Not at all!' said Tom, who was disposed to take any one's part against Elsie. 'If a clergyman has not a right to tell a man that, I don't see what right he has of any kind. Only,' added he, with one of his quaint smiles, 'the clergyman, if he compels a man to deal at his store, is bound to furnish him with the articles which he wants.'

'Which he needs, or which he likes? For "wanting" has both those meanings.'

'With something that he finds by experience does him good, and so learns to like it, because he knows that he needs it, as my patients do in physic.'

'I wish my patients would do so by mine, but, unfortunately, half of them seem to me not to know what their disease is, and the other half do not think they are diseased at all.'

'Well,' said Tom duly, 'perhaps some of them are more right than you fancy. Every man knows his own business best.'

'If it were so, they would go about it some what differently from what most of the poor creatures do.'

'Do you think so? I fancy myself that not one of them does a wrong thing, but what he knows it to be wrong just as well as you do, and is much more ashamed and frightened about it already than you can ever make him by preaching at him.'

'Do you?'

'I do. I judge of others by myself.'

'Then would you have a clergyman never warn his people of their sins?'

'If I were he, I'd much sooner take the sins for granted, and say to them, "Now, my friends, I know you are all, ninety-nine out of the hundred of you, not such bad fellows at bottom, and would all like to be good, if you only knew how, so I'll tell you as far as I know, though I don't know much about the matter. For the truth is, you must have a hundred troubles every day which I never felt in my life, and it must be a very hard thing to keep body and soul together, and to get a little pleasure on this side the grave without making blackguards of yourselves. Therefore I don't pretend to set myself up as a better or a wiser man than you at all, but I do know a thing or two which I fancy may be useful to you. You can but try it. So come up, if you like, any of you, and talk matters over with me as between gentleman and gentleman. I shall keep your secret, of course, and if you find I can't cure your complaint, why, you can but go away and try elsewhere."

'And so the doctor's model sermon ends in proposing private confession!'

'Of course. The thing itself which will do them good, without the red rag of an official name, which sends them cackling off like frightened turkeys. Such private confession as is going on between you and me now. Here am I confessing to you all my unorthodoxy.'

'And I my ignorance,' said Frank, 'for I really believe you know more about the matter than I do.'

'Not at all. I may be all wrong. But the fault of your cloth seems to me to be that they apply their medicines without dignifying most of them, to take the least diagnosis of the case. How could I cure a man without first examining what was the matter with him?'

'So say the old casuists, of whom I have read enough. Some would say too much, but they do not satisfy me. They deal with actions, and motives, and so forth, but they do not go down to the one root of wrong which is the same in every man.'

'You're getting beyond me. But why do you not apply a little of the worldly wisdom which these same casuists taught you?'

'To tell you the truth, I have tried in past years, and found that the medicine would not act.'

'Humph! Well, that would depend, again, on the previous diagnosis of human nature being correct, and those old monks, I should say, would know about as much of human nature as any clavis in a steeple. Still you wouldn't say that what was the matter with old Heale was the matter also with Vavasour?'

'I believe from my heart that it is.'

'Humph! Then you know the symptoms of his complaint?'

'I know that he never comes to church.'

'Nothing more? I am really speaking in confidence. You surely have heard of disagreements between him and Mrs. Vavasour?'

'Never, I assure you, you shock me.'

'I am exceedingly sorry, then, that I said a word about it, but the whole parish talks of it,' answered Tom, who was surprised at this fresh proof of the little confidence which Abernethy put in their parish.

'Ah!' said Frank sadly, 'I am the last person in the parish to hear any news, but this is very distressing.'

'Very, to me. My honour, to tell you the truth, as a medical man, is concerned in the matter, for she is growing quite ill from unhappiness, and I cannot cure her, so I come to you, as soul-doctor, to do what I, the body doctor, cannot.'

Frank sat pondering for a minute, and then—

'You set me on a task for which I am as little fit as any man, by your own showing.

What do I know of disagreements between man and wife? And one has a delicacy about offering her comfort. She must bestow her confidence on me before I can use it, while he—

'While he, as the cause of the disease, is what you ought to treat, and not her unhappiness, which is only a symptom of it.'

'Spoken like a wise doctor but to tell you the truth, Thurnall, I have no influence over Mr. Vavasour, and see no means of getting any. If he recognised my authority, as his parish priest, then I should see my way. Let him be as bad as he might, I should have a fixed point from which to work, but with his free-thinking notions, I know well—one can judge it too easily from his points—he would look on me as a pedant assuming a spiritual tyranny to which I have no claim.'

Tom sat awhile musing his knee, and then—

'If you saw a man fallen into the water, what do you think would be the shortest way to prove to him that you had authority from heaven to pull him out? Do you give it up? Pulling him out, would it not be, without more ado?'

'I should be happy enough to pull poor Vavasour out, if he would let me. But till he believes that I can do it, how can I even begin?'

'How can you expect him to believe, if he has no proof?'

'There are proofs enough in the Bible and elsewhere, if he will but accept them. If he refuses to examine into the credentials, the fault is his, not mine. I really do not wish to be hard, but would not you do the same, if any one refused to employ you, because he chose to deny that you were a legally qualified practitioner?'

'Not so badly put, but what should I do in that case? Go on quietly curing his neighbours, till he began to alter his mind as to my qualifications, and came in to be cured himself. But here's this difference between you and me. I am not bound to attend any one who don't send for me, while you think that you are, and carry the notion a little too far, for I expect you to kill yourself by it some day.'

'Well?' said Frank, with something of that lazy Oxford tone, which is intended to save the speaker the trouble of giving his arguments, when he has already made up his mind, or thinks that he has so done.

'Well, if I thought myself bound to doctor the man, willy-nilly, as you do, I would certainly go to him, and show him, at least, that I understood his complaint. That would be the first step towards his letting me cure him. How else on earth do you fancy that Paul cured those Corinthians about whom I have been reading lately?'

'Are you, too, going to quote Scripture against me? I am glad to find that your studies extend to St. Paul.'

'To tell you the truth, your sermon last Sunday puzzled me. I could not comprehend (on your showing) how Paul got that wonderful influence over those pagans which he evidently had, and as how to get influence is a very favourite study of mine, I borrowed the book when I went home, and read for myself, and the matter at last seemed clear enough, in Paul's own showing.'

'I don't doubt that, but I suspect your interpretation of the fact and mine would not agree.'

'Mine is simple enough. He says that what proved him to be an apostle was his power. He is continually appealing to his power, and what can he mean by that, but that he could do, and had done, what he professed to do? He promised to make those poor heathen rascals of Greeks better, and wiser, and happier men, and, I suppose, he made them so, and then there was no doubt of his commission, or his authority, or anything else. He says himself he did not require any credentials, for they were his credentials, real and known of every one, he had made good men of them out of bad ones, and that was proof enough whose apostle he was.'

'Well,' said Frank, half sadly, 'I might say a great deal, of course, on the other side of the question, but I prefer hearing what you laymen think about it all.'

'Will you be angry if I tell you honestly?'

'Did you ever find me angry at anything you said?'

'No. I will do you the justice to say that. Well, what we laymen say is this. If the parsons have the authority of which they boast, why don't they use it? If they have commission to make bad people good, they must have power too, for he whose commission they claim is not likely, I should suppose, to set a man to do what he cannot do.'

'And we can do it if people would but submit to us. It all comes round again to the same point.'

'So it does. How to get them to listen. I tried to find out how Paul achieved that first step, and when I looked he told me plainly enough. By becoming all things to all men, by showing these people that he understood them, and knew what was the matter with them. Now do you go and do likewise by Vavasour, and then exercise your authority like a practical man. If you have power to bind and loose, as you told us last Sunday, bind that fellow's ungovernable temper, and loose him from the real slavery which he is in to his miserable conceit and self-indulgence! and then, if he does not believe in your "sacerdotal power," he is even a greater fool than I take him for.'

'Honestly, I will try. God help me,' added Frank in a lower voice, 'but as for quarrelling between man and wife, as I told you, no one understands them less than I.'

'Then marry a wife yourself and quarrel a little with her for experiment, and then you'll know all about it.'

Frank laughed in spite of himself.

'Thank you. No man is less likely to try that experiment than I.'

'Hum!'

'I have quite enough as a bachelor to distract me from my work without adding to them those of a wife and family, and those little home lessons in the frailty of human nature, in which you advise me to copy Mr. Navasour.'

'And so,' said Tom, 'having to doctor human beings, nineteen-twentieths of whom are married, and being aware that three parts of the miseries of human life come either from wanting to be married, or from married cares and troubles—you think that you will improve your chance of doctoring your flock rightly by avoiding carefully the least practical acquaintance with the chief cause of their disease. Philosophical and logical, truly!'

'You seem to have acquired a little knowledge of men and women, my good friend, without encumbering yourself with a wife and children.'

'Would you like to go to the same school to which I went?' asked Thurnall, with a look of such grave meaning that Frank's pure spirit shrank within him. 'And I'll tell you this, whenever I see a woman nursing her baby, or a father with his child upon his knees, I say to myself—they know more, at this minute, of human nature, as of the great law of "C'est l'amour, l'amour, l'amour, which makes the world go round," than I am likely to do for many a day. I'll tell you what, sir! These simple natural ties, which are common to us and the dumb animals—as I live, sir! they are the divinest things I see in the world! I have but one, and that is love to my poor old father, that's all the religion I have as yet—but I tell you it alone has kept me from being a ruffian and a blackguard! And I'll tell you more,' said Tom, warning, 'of all diabolical dodges for preventing the parsons from seeing who they are, or what human beings are, or what their work in the world is, or anything else, the neatest is that celibacy of the clergy. I should like to have you with me in Spanish America, or in France either, and see what you thought of it then. How it ever came into mortal brains is to me the puzzle. I've often fancied, when I've watched those priests—and very good fellows, too, some of them are—that there must be a devil after all abroad in the world, as you say, for no human sanity could ever have hit upon so complete and 'cute a device for making parsons do the more harm, the more good they try to do. There, I've preached you a sermon, and made you angry.'

'Not in the least—but I must go now and see some sick.'

'Well, go, and prosper, only recollect that the said sick are men and women.'

And away Tom went, thinking to himself 'Well, that is a noble, straightforward, honest fellow, and will do yet, if he'll only get a wife. He is not one of those asses who have made up their minds by book that the world is square, and won't believe it to be round for any ocular demonstration. He'll find out what shape the world is before long, and behave as such, and act accordingly.'

Little did Tom think as he went home that day, in full-blown satisfaction with his sermon to Frank, of the misery he had caused, and was going to cause for many a day, to poor Grace Harvey. It was a rude shock to her to find herself thus suspected, though perhaps it was one which she needed. She had never, since one first trouble ten years ago, known any real grief, and had therefore had all the more time to make a luxury of mental ones. She was treated by the simple folk around her as all but inspired, and being possessed of real powers as marvellous in her own eyes as those which were imputed to her were in theirs (for whatever real spiritual experiences but daily miracles?), she was just in that temper of mind in which she required, as ballast, all her real goodness, lest the mental balance should topple headlong after the intellectual, and the downward course of vanity, excitement, deception, blasphemous assumptions, be entered on. Happy for her that she was in Protestant and common-sense England, and in a country parish, where mesmerism and spirit-rapping were unknown. Had she been an American, she might have become one of the most lucrative 'mediums', had she been born in a Romish country, she would have probably become an even more famous personage. There is no reason why she should not have equalled, or surpassed, the ecstasies of St. Theresa, or of St. Hildegardis, or any other sweet dreamer of sweet dreams, have founded a new order of charity, have enriched the clergy of a whole province, and have died in seven years, maddened by alternate paroxysms of self-conceit and revulsions of self-abasement. Her own preachers and class-readers, indeed (so do extremes meet), would not have been sorry to make use of her in somewhat the same manner, however feebly and coarsely, but her innate self-respect and modesty had preserved her from the snares of such clumsy poachers, and more than one good-looking young preacher had fled desperately from a station where, instead of making a tool of Grace Harvey, he could only madden his own foolish heart with love for her.

So Grace had reigned upon her pretty little throne of not unbearable sorrows, till a real and bitter woe came, one which could not be hugged and cherished, like the rest, one which she tried to fling from her angrily, scornfully, and found to her horror that, instead of her possessing it, it possessed her, and coiled itself round her heart, and would not be flung away. She—she, of all beings, to be suspected as a thief, and by the very man whose life she had saved! She was willing enough to confess herself—and confessed herself night and morning—a miserable sinner, and her heart a cage of unclean birds, deceitful, and desperately wicked—except in that. The conscious innocence flashed up in pride and scorn, in thoughts, even when she was alone, in words, of which she would not have believed herself capable. With hot brow and dry eyes she paced her little chamber, sat down on the bed, staring into vacancy, sprang up and paced again, but she went into no trance—she dare not. The grief was too great, she felt that, if she once gave way enough to lose her self-possession, she should go mad. And the first, and perhaps not the least good effect of that fiery trial was, that it compelled her to a stern self-restraint, to which her will, weakened by mental luxuriance, had been long a stranger.

But a fiery trial it was. That first wild (and yet not unnatural) fancy, that heaven had given Thurnall to her, had deepened day by day by the merciful benignity of it. But she never dreamt of him as her husband, only as a friendless stranger to be helped and comforted. And that he was worthy of help, that some great future was in store for him, that he was a chosen vessel marked out for glory, she had persuaded herself utterly, and the persuasion grew in her day by day, as she heard more and more of his cleverness, honesty, and kindness, mysterious and, to her, unaccountable. The closer she did not make haste, she did not even try to see him, or to speak to him, a civil bow in passing was all that she took or gave, and she was content with that, and waited till the time came when she was destined to do for him—what she knew not, but it would be done if she were strong enough. So she set herself to learn, and read, and trained her mind and temper more earnestly than ever, and waited in patience for God's good time. And now, behold, a black, unfathomable gulf of debt and shame had opened between them, perhaps for ever. And a tumult arose in her soul, which cannot be, perhaps ought not to be, analysed in words, but which made her know too well, by her own crimson cheeks, that it was none other than human love strong as death, and jealousy cruel as the grave.

At last long and agonising prayer brought gentler thoughts, and mere physical exhaustion a calmer mood. How wicked she had been, how rebellious! Why not forgive him, as One greater than she had forgiven? It was ungrateful of him, but was he not human? Why should she expect his heart to be better than hers? Besides, he might have excuses for his suspicion. He might be the best judge, being a man, and much cleverer one too. Yes, it was God's cross, and she would bear it, she would try and forget him. No, that was impossible, she must hear of him, if not see him, day by day, besides, was not her fate linked up with his? And yet shut out from him by that dark wall of suspicion! It was very bitter. But she could pray for him, she would pray for him now. Yes, it was God's cross, and she would bear it. He would right her if He thought fit, and if not, what matter? Was she not born to sorrow? Should she complain if another drop, and that the bitterest of all, was added to the cup?

And bear her cross she did, about with her, coming in, and going out, for many a weary day. There was no change in her habits or demeanour, she was never listless for a moment in her school, she was more gay and amusing than ever, when she gathered her little ones around her for a story, but still there was the unseen burden, grinding her heart slowly, till she felt as if every footstep was stained with a drop of her heart's blood. Why not? It would be the sooner over.

Then at times came that strange woman's pleasure in martyrdom, the secret pride of suffering unjustly, but even that, after a while, she cast away from her as a snare, and tried to believe that she deserved all her sorrow. Deserved it, that is, in the real honest sense of the word, that she had worked it out, and earned it, and brought it on herself—how, she knew not, but longed and strove to know. No, it was no martyrdom. She would not allow herself so silly a cloak of pride, and she went daily to her favourite Book of Martyrs, to contemplate there the stories of those who, really innocent, really suffered for well doing. And out of that book she began to draw a new and a strange enjoyment, for she soon found that her intense imagination enabled her to re-enact those sad and glorious stories in her own person, to trouble, agonise, and conquer with those heroines who had been for years her highest ideals—and what higher ones could she have? And many a night, after extinguishing the light and closing her eyes, she would lie motionless for hours on her little bed, not to sleep, but to feel with Perpetua the wild bull's horns, to hang with St. Maura on the cross, or lie with Julia on the rack, or see with triumphant smile, by Anne Askew's side, the fire flare up around her at the Smithfield stake, or to promise, with dying Dorothea, celestial roses to the nursing youth, whose face too often took the form of Thurnall's, till every nerve quivered responsive to her fancy in agonies of actual pain, which died away at last into heavy slumber, as body and mind alike gave way before the strain. Sweet fool! she knew not—how could she know? that she might be rearing in herself the seeds of riotous and death, but who that applauds a Rachel or a Ristori for being able to make awhile their souls and their countenances the homes of the darkest passions, can blame her for enacting in herself, and for herself alone, incidents in which the highest and holiest virtue takes shape in perfect tragedy?

But soon another, and yet darker cause of sorrow arose in her. It was clear, from what Willis had told her, that she had held the lost belt in her hand. The question was, how had she lost it?

Did her mother know anything about it? That question could not but arise in her mind, though for very reverence she dared not put it to her mother, and with it arose the recollection of her mother's strange silence about the matter. Why had she put away the subject carelessly, and yet peevishly, whenever it was mentioned? Yes! Why? Did her mother know anything? Was she - ? Grace dared not pronounce the adjective, even in thought, dashed it away as a temptation of the devil, dashed away, too, the thought which had lured itself on her too often already, that her mother was not altogether one who possessed the single eye, that in spite of her deep religious feeling, her assurance of salvation, her fits of bitter self-humiliation and despondency, there was an inclination to scheming and intrigue, ambition, covetousness, that the secrets which she gained as class-leader too, were too often (Grace could but fear) used to her own advantage, that in her dealings her morality was not above the average of little country shopkeepers, that she was apt to have two prices, to keep her books with unnecessary carelessness when the person is not whom the account stood was no scholar (Grace had more than once remonstrated in her gentle way, and had been silenced, rather than satisfied, by her mother's commonplace as to the right of 'making those who could pay, pay for those who could not', that 'it was very hard to get a living, and the Lord knew her temptations,' and 'that God saw no sin in His elect,' and 'Christ's merits were infinite,' and 'Christians had always been a backsliding generation', and all the other commonplaces by which such people drug their consciences to a degree which is utterly incredible, except to those who have seen it with their own eyes, and heard it with their own ears, from childhood.

Once, too, in those very days, some little weakness on her mother's part brought the tears into Grace's eyes, and a gentle rebuke to her lips, but her mother bore the interference less patiently than usual, and answered, not by cant, but by counter-reproach. 'Was she the person to accuse a poor widowed mother, struggling to leave her child something to keep her out of the workhouse? A mother that lived for her, would die for her, sell her soul for her, perhaps——'

And there Mrs Harvey stopped short, turned pale, and burst into such an agony of tears that Grace, terrified, threw her arms round her neck and entreated forgiveness, all the more intensely on account of those thoughts within which she dared not reveal. So the storm passed over. But not Grace's sadness. For she could not but see, with her clear, pure, spiritual eye, that her mother was just, in that state in which some fearful and shameful fall is possible, perhaps wholesome. 'She would sell her soul for me.' What it she have sold it, and stopped short just now because she had not the heart to tell me that love for me had been the cause? Oh! if she have minded for my sake! Wretch that I am! Miserable myself, and bringing misery with me! Why was I ever born? Why cannot I die—the world be rid of me?'

No, she would not believe it. It was a wicked, horrible temptation of the devil. She would rather believe that she herself had been the thief, tempted during her unconsciousness, that she had hidden it somewhere, that she should recollect, confess, restore all some day. She would carry it to him herself, grovel at his feet, and entreat forgiveness. 'He will surely forgive, when he finds that I was not myself when—that it was not altogether my fault—not as if I had been waking—yes, he will forgive.' And then on that thought followed a dream of what might follow, so wild that a moment after she had had 'er blushes in her hands, and fled to books to escape from thoughts.

CHAPTER XI

THE FIRST INSTALMENT OF AN OLD DEBT

WE must now return to Elsie, who had walked home in a state of mind truly pitiable. He had been flattering his soul with the hope that Thurnall did not know him, that his beard, and the change which years had made, formed a sufficient disguise, but he could not conceal from himself that the very same alterations had not prevented his recognising Thurnall, and he had been living for two months past in continual fear that that would come which now had come.

His rage and terror knew no bounds. Fancying Thurnall a merely mean and self-interested workling, unbought by those higher aspirations which stood to him in place of a religion, he imagined him making every possible use of his power, and longed to escape to the uttermost ends of the earth from his old tormentor, whom the very sea would not put out of the way, but must needs cast ashore at his very feet, to plague him afresh.

What a net he had spread around his own feet by one act of foolish vanity! He had taken his present name, merely as a nom de guerre, when first he came to London as a penniless and friendless scribbler. It would hide him from the ridicule (and, as he believed, spite) of Thurnall, whom he dreaded meeting every time he walked London streets, and who was for years, to his melancholic and too intense fancy, his l'âné noir, his Frankenstein's monster. Besides, he was ashamed of the name of Briggs. It certainly is not an enphannous or aristocratic name, and 'The Soul's Agency,' by John Briggs, would not have sounded as well as 'The Soul's Agency,' by Elsie Vavasour. Vavasour was a very pretty name, and one of those which is supposed by novelists and young ladies to be aristocratic, why so is a puzzle, as its plain meaning is a tenant farmer, and nothing more nor less. So he had played with the name till he became fond of it, and considered that he had a right to it, through seven long years of weary struggles, penury, disappointment, as he climbed the Parnassian Mount, writing for magazines and newspapers, sub-editing this periodical and that, till he began to be known as a ready, graceful, and trustworthy workman, and was befriended by one kind-hearted littérateur after another.

For in London, at this moment, any young man of real power will find friends enough, and too many, among his fellow-bookwrights, and is more likely to have his head turned by flattery than his heart crushed by envy. Of course whatsoever flattery he may receive, he is expected to return, and whatsoever eliquo he may be tossed into on his début, he is expected to stand by, and fight for, against the universe, but that is but fair. If a young gentleman, invited to enrol himself in the Mutual-puffery Society which meets every Monday and Friday in Hatchgoose the publisher's drawing room, is willing to pledge himself thereto in the mystic cup of tea, is he not as solemnly bound thenceforth to support those literary Catulines in their efforts for the subversion of common sense, good taste, and established things in general, as if he had pledged then, as he would have done in Rome of old in his own life blood? Bound he is, alike by honour and by green tea, and it will be better for him to fulfil his bond. For if association is the cardinal principle of the age, will it not work as well in book-making as in clothes-making? And shall not the motto of the poet (who will also do a little reviewing on the sly) be henceforth that which shines triumphant over all the world, on many a valiant Scotchman's shield—

'Caw me, an I'll caw thee''

But to do John Briggs justice, he kept his hands, and his heart also, cleaner than most men do during this stage of his career. After the first excitement of novelty, and of mixing with people who could really talk and think, and who freely spoke out whatever was in them, right or wrong, in language which at least sounded grand and deep, he began to find in the literary world about the same satisfaction for his inner life which he would have found in the sporting world or the commercial world, or the religious world, or the fashionable world, or any other world, and to suspect strongly that where-soever a world is, the flesh and the devil are not very far off. Tired of talking when he wanted to think, of asserting when he wanted to discover, and of hearing his neighbours do the same, tired of little meanesses, envyings, intrigues, jobberies (for the literary world too, has its jobs), he had been for some time withdrawing himself from the Hatchgoose sources into his own thoughts, when his Soul's Agonies appeared, and he found himself, if not a lion, at least a lion's cub.

There is a house or two in town where you may meet, on certain evenings, everybody, where duchesses and unfledged poets, bishops and red republican refugees, fox-hunting noblemen and briefless barristers who have taken to politics, are jumbled together for a couple of hours, to make what they can out of each other, to the exceeding benefit of them all. For each and every one of them finds his neighbour a pleasanter person than he expected, and none need leave those rooms without knowing some thing more than he did when he came in, and taking an interest in some human being who may need that interest. To one of these houses, no matter which, Elsieley was invited on the strength of the Soul's Agonies, found himself, for the first time, face to face with high-bred Englishwomen, and fancied—small blame to him that he was come to the mountains of the Peris, and to Fairy Land itself. He had been flattered already, but never with such grace, such sympathy, or such seeming understanding, for there are few high-bred women who cannot seem to understand, and delude a hapless genius into a belief in their own surpassing brilliance and penetration, while they are cunningly retailing again to him the thoughts which they have caught up from the man to whom they spoke last, perhaps—for this is the very triumph of their art—from the very man to whom they are speaking. Small blame to bashful, clumsy John Briggs, if he did not know his own stammered and fragmentary fancies, when they were re-echoed to him the next minute, in the prettiest shape, and with the most delicate articulation, from lips which (like those in the fairy tale) never opened without dropping pearls and diamonds.

Oh, what a contrast, in the eyes of a man whose sense of beauty and grace, whether physical or intellectual, was true and deep, to that ghastly ring of prophetesses in the Hatchgoose drawing-room, strong minded and emancipated women, who prided themselves on having cast off conventionalities, and on being rule and awkward, and dogmatic and novel, and sometimes slightly improper, women who had missions to amend everything in heaven and earth, except themselves, who had quarrelled with their husbands, and had therefore felt a mission to assert women's rights, and reform marriage in general, or who had never been able to get married at all, and therefore were especially competent to promulgate a novel method of educating the children whom they never had had, women who wrote poetry about Lady Blanches whom they never had met, and novels about male and female blackguards whom (one hopes) they never had met, or about whom (if they had) decent women would have held their peace; and every one of whom had, in obedience to Emerson, 'followed her impulses,' and despised fashion, and was accordingly clothed and bedizened as was right in the sight of her own eyes, and probably in those of no one else.

No wonder that Elsieley, ere long, began drawing comparisons, and using his wit upon ancient patronesses, of course behind their backs, likening them to idols fresh from the car of Juggernaut, or from the stern of a South-sea canoe, or, most of all, to that famous wooden image of Freya, which once leapt lumbering forth from her bullock-cart, creaking and rattling in every oaken joint, to belabour the too daring Viking who was flirting with her priestess. Even so.

whispered Elsley, did those brains and tongues creak and rattle, limbering before the blasts of Pythonic inspiration, and so, he verily believed, would the awkward arms and legs have done likewise, if one of the Pythonesses had ever so far degraded herself as to dance.

No wonder, then, that those gifted dames had soon to complain of Elsley Vavasour as a traitor to the cause of progress and civilisation, a renegade who had fled to the camp of aristocracy, flimkeydom, obscurantism, frivolity, and dissipation, though there was not one of them but would have given an eye—perhaps no great loss to the aggregate loveliness of the universe—for one of his invitations to 999 Cavendish Street, south east, with the chance of being presented to the Duchess of Lyons.

To do Elsley justice, one reason why he liked his new acquaintances so well was that they liked him. He behaved well himself, and therefore people behaved well to him. He was, as I have said, a very handsome fellow in his way, therefore it was easy to him, as it is to all physically beautiful persons, to acquire a graceful manner. Moreover, he had steeped his whole soul in old poetry, and especially in Spenser's Fairy Queen. Good for him, had he followed every lesson which he might have learnt out of that most noble of English books. But one lesson at least he learnt from it, and that was, to be chivalrous, tender, and courteous to all women, however old or ugly, simply because they were women. The Hathegoss Pythonesses did not wish to be women, but very bad imitations of men, and therefore he considered himself absolved from all knightly duties towards them but towards these Peris of the West, and to the dowagers who had been Peris in their time, what adoration could be too great? So he bowed down and worshipped, and, on the whole, he was quite right in so doing. Moreover, he had the good sense to discover that though the young Peris were the prettiest to look at, the older Peris were the better company and that it is, in general, from married women that a poet or any one else will ever learn what woman's heart is like. And so well did he carry out his creed, that before his first summer was over he had quite captivated the heart of old Lady Knockdown, aunt to Lucia St. Just, and wife to Lucia's guardian, a charming old Irishwoman, who affected a pretty brogue, perhaps for the same reason that she wore a wig and who had been, in her day, a beauty and a blar, a friend of the Miss Berrys, and Tommy Moore, and Grattan, and Lord Edward Fitzgerald, and Dan O'Connell, and all other lions and lionesses which had roared for the last sixty years about the Emerald Isle. There was no one whom she did not know, and nothing she could not talk about. Married up, when a girl, to a man for whom she did not care, and having no children, she had indemnified herself by many flirtations, and the writing of two or three novels, in which she penned on paper the superfluous feeling which had no vent in real life. She had deserted, as she grew old, the novel for unfulfilled prophecy, and was a distinguished leader in a distinguished religious coterie but she still prided herself upon having a green head upon gray shoulders, and not without reason, for underneath all the worldliness and intrigue, and petty affectation of girlishness, which she contrived to jumble in with her religiosity, beat a young and kindly heart. So she was charmed with Mr Vavasour's manners, and commended them much to Lucia, who, a shrinking girl of seventeen, was peeping at her first season from under Lady Knockdown's sheltering wing.

"Me dear, let Mr Vavasour be who he will, he has not only the intellect of a true genius, but what is a great deal better for practical purposes, that is, the manners of one. Give me the man who will let a woman of our rank say what we like to him, without supposing that he may say what he likes in return, and considers one's familiarity as an honour, and not as an excuse for taking liberties. A most agreeable contrast, indeed, to the young men of the present day, who come in their shooting jackets, and talk slang to their partners—though really the girls are just as bad—and stand with their backs to the fire, and smell of smoke, and go to sleep after dinner, and pay no respect to old age, nor to youth either, I think. 'Tou me word, Lucia, the answers I've heard young gentlemen make to young ladies, this very season—they'd have been called out the next morning in my time, me dear. As for the age of chivalry, nobody expects that to be restored. But really one might have been spared the substitute for it which we had when I was young, in the grand air of the old school. It was a "sham," I dare say, as they call every thing nowadays—but really, me dear, a pleasant sham is better to live with than an unpleasant reality, especially when it smells of cigars."

So it befall that Elsley Vavasour was asked to Lady Knockdown's, and that there he fell in love with Lucia, and Lucia fell in love with him.

The next winter old Lord Knockdown, who had been decrepit for some years past, died, and his widow, whose income was under five hundred a year—for the estates were entailed, and mortgaged, and everything else which can happen to an Irish property—came to live with her nephew, Lord Scoutbush, in Eaton Square, and take such care as she could of Lucia and Valentin.

So, after a dreary autumn and winter of parting and silence, Elsley found himself the next season invited to Eaton Square, there the mischief, if mischief it was, was done, and Elsley and Lucia started in life upon two hundred a year. He had inherited some fifty of his own, she had about a hundred and fifty, which, indeed, was not yet her own by right, but little Scoutbush (who was her sole surviving guardian) behaved on the whole very well for a young gentleman of twenty-two in a state of fury and astonishment. The old lord had, wisely enough, settled in his will that Lucia was to enjoy the interest of her fortune from the time that she came out, provided she did not marry without her guardian's leave, and Southbush, to avoid scandal and misery, thought it as well to waive the proviso, and paid her her dividends as usual.

But how had she contrived to marry at all without his leave? That is an ugly question I will not say that she had told a falsehood, or that Elsley had forsworn himself when he got the licence, but certainly both of them were guilty of something very like a white lie, when they declared that Lucia had the consent of her sole surviving guardian, on the strength of a half-angry, half-jesting expression of Southbush's, that she might marry whom she chose, provided she did not plague him. In the first triumph of success and intoxication of wedded bliss, Lucia had written him a saucy letter, reminding him of his permission, and saying that she had taken him at his word. But her conscience smote her, and Elsley's smote him likewise, and smote him all the more, because he had been married under a false name, a fact which might have ugly consequences in law which he did not like to contemplate. To do him justice, he had been, half a dozen times during his courtship, on the point of telling Lucia his real name and history. Happy for him had he done so, whatever might have been the consequences, but he wanted moral courage, the indomitable sound of Briggs had become horrible to him, and once his foolish heart was frightened away from honesty, just as honesty was on the point of conquering, by old Lady Knockdown's saying that she could never have married a man with an ugly name, or let Lucia marry one.

'Conceive becoming Mrs. Natty Bunjago, no dear, even for twenty thousand a year! If you could summon up courage to do the deed, I couldn't summon up courage to continue my correspondence with ye.'

Elsley knew that that was a lie, that the old lady would have let her marry the most triumphant snob in England, if he had half that income, but unfortunately Lucia rapped her aunt's nonsense with 'There is no man of my ever marrying any one who has not a graceful name,' and a look at Vavasour, which said, 'And you have one, and therefore I—' For the matter had then been settled between them. This was too much for his vanity, and too much, also, for his fears of losing Lucia by confessing the truth. So Elsley went on, ashamed of his real name, ashamed of having concealed it, ashamed of being afraid that it would be discovered—in a triple complication of shame, which made him gradually, as it makes every man, moody, suspicious, apt to take offence where none is meant. Besides, they were very poor. He, though neither extravagant nor profligate, was, like most literary men who are accustomed to live from hand to mouth, careless, self-indulgent, unmethodical. She knew as much of house-keeping as the Queen of Ondo does, and her charming little dreams of shopping for herself were rudely enough broken ere the first week was out, by the horrified looks of Clara, when she returned from her first morning's marketing for the weekly consumption, with nothing but a woodcock, some truffles, and a bunch of celery. Then the landlady of the lodgings robbed her, even under the nose of the faithful Clara, who knew as little about housekeeping as her mistress, and Clara, faithful as she was, repaid herself by grumbling and taking liberties for being degraded from the luxurious post of lady's maid to that of servant of all work, with a landlady and 'marchioness' to wrestle with all day long. Then, what with imprudence and anxiety, Lucia of course lost her first child, and after that came months of illness, during which Elsley tended her, it must be said for him, as lovingly as a mother, and perhaps they were both really happier during that time of sorrow than they had been in all the delicious bliss of the honey-moon.

Valentia meanwhile defied old Lady Knockdown (whose horror and wrath knew no bounds), and walked off one morning with her maid to see her prodigal sister, a visit which not only brought comfort to the weary heart, but important practical benefits. For, going home, she seized upon Southbush, and so moved his heart with pathetic pictures of Lucia's unheard of prunty and misery, that his heart was softened, and though he absolutely refused to call on Vavasour, he made him an offer, through Lucia, of Penalva Court for the time being, and thither they went, perhaps the best thing they could have done.

There, of course, they were somewhat more comfortable. A very cheap country, a comfortable house rent free, and a lovely neighbourhood, were a pleasant change after dear London lodgings, but it is a question whether the change made Elsley a better man.

In the first place, he became a more idle man. The rich, invigorating climate began to tell upon his mind, as it did upon Lucia's health. He missed that perpetual spur of nervous excitement, change of society, influx of ever-fresh objects, which makes London, after all, the best place in the world for hard working, and which makes even a walk along the streets an intellectual tonic. In the soft and luxurious West country, nature invited him to look at her, and dream, and dream he did, more and more, day by day. He was tired, too—as who would not be?—of the drudgery of writing for his daily bread, and relieved from the importunities of publishers and printers' devils, he sent up fewer and fewer contributions to the magazines. He would keep his energies for a great work, poetry was, after all, his forte, he would not fritter himself away on prose and periodicals, but would win for himself, etc. etc. If he made a mistake, it was at least a pardonable one.

But Elsley became not only a more idle, but a more morose man. He began to feel the evils of solitude. There was no one near with whom he could hold rational converse, save an anti-quarian parson or two, and parsons were not to his taste. So, never measuring his wits against those of his peers, and despising the few men whom he met as inferior to himself, he grew more and more wrapt up in his own thoughts and his own tastes. His own poems, even to the slightest turn of expression, became more and more important to him. He grew more jealous of criticism, more confident in his own little theories about this and that, more careless of the opinion of his fellow-men, and, as a certain consequence, more unable to bear the little crosses and contradictions of daily life, and as Lucia, having brought one and another child safely into the world, settled down into motherhood, he became less and less attentive to her, and more and more attentive to himself which was fast becoming the centre of his universe.

True, there were excuses for him, for whom are there none? He was poor and struggling, and it is much more difficult (as Becky Sharp, I think, pathetically observes) to be good when one is poor than when one is rich. It is (and all rich people should consider the fact) much more easy, if not to go to heaven, at least to think one is going, rather, on three thousand a year, than on three hundred. Not only is respectability more easy, as is proved by the broad fact that it is the poor people who fill the jails, and not the rich ones, but virtue, and religion of the popular sort. It is undeniably more easy to be resigned to the will of Heaven, when that will seems tending just as we would have it, much more easy to have faith in the goodness of Providence, when that goodness seems safe in one's pocket in the form of bank-notes, and to believe that one's children are under the protection of Omnipotence, when one can hire for them in half an hour the best medical advice in London. One need only look into one's own heart to understand the disciples' astonishment at the news that 'How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of heaven.'

'Who then can be saved?' asked they, being poor men, accustomed to see the wealthy Pharisees in possession of 'the highest religious privileges and means of grace.' Who, indeed, if not the rich? If the noblemen, and the bankers, and the dowagers, and the young ladies who go to church, and read good books, and have been supplied from youth with the very best religious articles which money can procure, and have time for all manner of good works, and give their hundreds to charities, and head reformatory movements, and build churches, and work altar-cloths, and can taste all the preachers and father-confessors round London, one after another, as you would taste wines, till they find the spiritual panacea which exactly suits their complaint—if they are not sure of salvation, who can be saved?

Without further comment, the fact is left for the consideration of all readers, only let them not be too hard upon Elsley and Lucia, if, huddling themselves sometimes literally at their wits' end, they went beyond their poor wits into the region where foolish things are said and done.

Moreover, Elsley's ill-temper (as well as Lucia's) had its excuses in physical ill-health. Poor fellow! Long years of sedentary work had begun to tell upon him, and while Tom Thurnall's chest, under the influence of hard work and oxygen, measured round perhaps six inches more than it had done sixteen years ago, Elsley's, thanks to stooping and carbonic acid, measured six inches less. Short breath, lassitude, loss of appetite, heartburn, and all that fair company of miseries which Mr Cockle and his antihumous pills profess to cure, are no cheering bosom friends, but when a man's breast-bone is gradually growing into his stomach, they will make their appearance, and small blame to him whose temper suffers from their gentle hints that he has a mortal body as well as an immortal soul.

But most fretting of all was the discovery that Lucia knew it not altogether his original name—still enough to keep him in dread lest she should learn more.

It was now twelve months and more that this new terror had leapt up and stared in his face. He had left a letter about—a thing which he was apt to do—in which the Whitbury lawyer made some allusions to his little property, and he was sure that Lucia had seen it, the hated name of Buggs certainly she had not seen, for Elsley had torn it out the moment he opened the letter, but she had seen enough, as he soon found, to be certain that he had, at some time or other, passed under a different name.

If Lucia had been a more thoughtful or high-minded woman, she would have gone straight to her husband, and quietly and lovingly asked him to tell her all, but in her left-handed Irish fashion, she kept the secret to herself, and thought it a very good joke to have him in her power, and to be able to torment him about that letter when he got out of temper. It never occurred, however, to her that his present name was the feigned one. She fancied that he had, in some youthful escapade, assumed the name to which the lawyer alluded. So the next time he was cross, she tried laughingly the effect of her newly-discovered spell, and was horror-struck at the storm which she evoked. In a voice of thunder Elsley commanded her never to mention the subject again, and showed such signs of terror and remorse, that she obeyed him from that day forth, except, when now and then she lost her temper as completely, too, as he. Little she thought, in her heedlessness, what a dark cloud of fear and suspicion, ever-deepening and spreading, she had put between his heart and hers.

But if Elsley had dreaded her knowledge of his story, he dreaded ten times more Tom's knowledge of it. What if Thurnall should tell Lucia? What if Lucia should make a confidant of Thurnall? Women told their doctors everything, and Lucia, he knew too well, had cause to complain of him. Perhaps, thought he, maddened into wild suspicion by the sense of his own wrong-doing, she might complain of him, she might combine with Thurnall against him—for what purpose he knew not, but the wildest imaginations flashed across him, as he hurried desperately home, intending as soon as he got there to forbid Lucia's ever calling in his dreaded enemy. No, Thurnall should never cross his door again! On that one point he was determined, but on nothing else.

However, his intention was never fulfilled. For long before he reached home he began to feel himself thoroughly ill. His was a temperament upon which mental anxiety acts rapidly and severely, and the hurrying sun and his rapid walk combined with rage and terror to give him such a 'turn' that, as he hurried down the lane, he found himself feeling like a drunken man. He had just time to hurry through the garden, and into his study, when pulse and sense failed him, and he rolled over on the sofa in a dead faint.

Lucia had seen him come in, and heard him fall, and rushed in. The poor little thing was at her wife's end, and thought that he had had nothing less than a complot-de-solet. And when he recovered from his faintness, he began to be so horribly ill that Clara, who had been called in to help, had some grounds for the degrading hypothesis (for which Lucia all but boxed her ears) that 'Master had got away into the woods, and gone eating toadstools, or some such poisonous stuff', for he lay a full half-hour on the sofa, death cold, and almost pulseless, moaning, shivering, hiding his face in his hands, and refusing cordials, medicines, and, above all, a doctor's visit.

However, this could not be allowed to last. Without Elsley's knowledge, a messenger was despatched for Thurnall, and luckily met him in the lane, for he was returning to the town in the footsteps of his victim.

Elsley's horror was complete when the door opened, and Lucia brought in none other than his tormentor.

'My dearest Elsley, I have sent for Mr Thurnall. I knew you would not let me, if I told you, but you see I have done it, and now you must really speak to him.'

Elsley's first impulse was to motion them both away angrily, but the thought that he was in Thurnall's power stopped him. He must not show his disgust. What if Lucia were to ask its cause, even to guess it? for to his fears even that seemed possible. A fresh anxiety! Just because he shrank so intensely from the man, he must endure him!

'There is nothing the matter with me,' said he languidly.

'I should be the best judge of that, after what Mrs. Vavasour has just told me,' said Tom, in his most professional and civil voice, and slipped, cat-like, into a seat beside the unresisting poet.

He asked question on question, but Elsley gave such unsatisfactory answers, that Lucia had to detail everything afresh for him, with—'You know, Mr Thurnall, he is always overtasking his brain, and will never confess himself ill'—and all a woman's anxious comments.

Rogue Tom knew all the while well enough what was the cause, but he saw, too, that Elsley was very ill. He felt that he must have the matter out at once, and, by a side glance, sent the obedient Lucia out of the room to get a table-spoonful of brandy.

'Now, my dear sir, that we are alone,' began he blandly.

'Now, sir,' answered Vavasour, springing off the sofa, his whole pent-up wrath exploding in hissing steam, the moment the safety-valve was lifted. 'Now, sir! What—what is the meaning of this insolence, this intrusion?'

'I beg your pardon, Mr Vavasour,' answered Tom, rising, in a tone of bland and stolid surprise.

'What do you want here, with your unmannery and meddlesome, when you know the cause of my malady well enough already? Go, sir! and leave me to myself.'

'My dear sir,' said Tom firmly, 'you seem to have forgotten what passed between us this morning.'

'Will you insult me beyond endurance?' cried Elsley.

'I told you that, as long as you chose, you were Elsley Vavasour, and I the country doctor. We have met in that character. Why not sustain it? You are really ill, and if I know the cause, I am all the more likely to know the cure.'

'Cure?' 'Why not? Believe me, it is in your power to become a much happier man, simply by becoming a healthier one.'

'Impertinence!'

'Push! What can I gain by being impertinent, sir? I know very well that you have received a severe shock, but I know equally well, that if you were as you ought to be, you would not feel it in this way. When one sees a man in the state of prostration in which you are, common sense tells one that the body must have been neglected, for the mind to gain such power over it.'

Elsley replied with a grunt; but Tom went on, bland and imperturbable.

'Believe me, it may be a very materialist view of things, but fact is fact—the corpus animi is father to the mens sana—tonics and exercise make the ills of life look marvellously smaller. You have the frame of a strong and active man, and all you want to make you light-hearted and cheerful is to develop what nature has given you.'

'It is too late,' said Elsley, pleased, as most men are, by being told that they might be strong and active.

'Not in the least. Three months would strengthen your muscles, open your chest again, settle your digestion, and make you as fresh as a lark, and able to sing like one. Believe me, the poetry would be the better for it, as well as the stomach. Now, positively, I shall begin questioning you.

So Elsley was won to detail the symptoms of internal malaise, which he was only too much in the habit of watching himself, but there were some among them which Tom could not quite account for on the ground of mere effeminate habits. A thought struck him.

'You sleep ill, I suppose?' said he carelessly.

'Very ill.'

'Did you ever try opiates?'

'No—yes—that is, sometimes.'

'Ah!' said Tom, more carelessly still, for he wished to hide, by all means, the importance of the confession. 'Well, they give relief for a time, but they are dangerous things—disorder the digestion, and have their revenge on the nerves next morning, as spitefully as brandy itself. Much better try a glass of strong ale or water just before going to bed. I've known it give sleep, even in consumption—try it, and exercise. You shoot?'

'No.'

'Pity; there ought to be noble cocking in these woods. However, the season's past. You fish?'

'No.'

'Pity again. I hear Alva is full of trout. Why not try sailing? Nothing oxygenates the lungs like a sail, and your friends the fishermen would be delighted to have you as supercargo. They are always full of your stories to them, and your jacking their brains for old legends and adventures.'

'They are noble fellows, and I want no better company, but, unfortunately, I am always sea-sick.'

'Ah! wholesome, but unpleasant you are fond of gardening?'

'Very, but stooping makes my head swim.'

'True, and I don't want you to stoop. I hope to see you soon as erect as a Guardsman. Why not try walks?'

'Abominable bores—lonely, aimless—'

'Well, perhaps you're right. I never knew but three men who took long constitutionals on principle, and two of them were cracked. But why not try a companion; and persuade that curate, who needs just the same medicine as you, to accompany you, I don't know a more gentleman-like, agreeable, well-informed man than he is.'

'Thank you. I can choose my acquaintances for myself.'

'You touchy as!' said Thurnall to himself. 'If we were in the blessed state of nature now, wouldn't I give you ten minutes' double thonging, and then set you to work, as the runaway nigger did his master, Bird o' freedom Sawin, till you'd learnt a thing or two.' But blandly still he went on.

'Try the dumb-bells then. Nothing like them for opening your chest. And do get a lugh desk made, and stand to your writing instead of sitting.' And Tom actually made Vavasour promise to do both, and bade him farewell with—

'Now, I'll send you up a little tonic, and trouble you with no more visits till you send for me. I shall see by one glance at your face whether you are following my prescriptions. And, I say, I wouldn't meddle with those opiates any more, try good malt and hops instead.'

'Those who drink beer, think beer,' said Elsley, smiling, for he was getting more hopeful of himself, and his terrors were vanishing beneath Tom's skilful management.

'And those who drink water, think water. The Elizabethans, Spencey and Shakespeare, Bulleigh and Queen Bess, worked on beef and ale—and you would not class them among the muddle-headed of the earth. Believe me, to write well, you must live well. If you take it out of your brain, you must put it in again. It's a question of but. Try it for yourself.' And off Tom went, while Lucia rushed back to her husband, covered him with caresses, assured him that he was seven times as ill as he really was, and so nursed and potted him, that he felt himself, for that time at least, a beast and a fool for having suspected her for a moment. Ah, woman, if you only knew how you carry our hearts in your hands, and would but use your power for our benefit, what angels you might make us all!

'So,' said Tom, as he went home, 'he has found his way to the elevation bottle, has he, as well as Mrs. Heale? It's no concern of mine, but as a professional man, I must stop that. You will certainly be no credit to me if you kill yourself under my hands.'

Tom went straight home, showed the blacksmith how to make a pair of dumb-bells, covered them himself with leather, and sent them up the next morning with directions to be used for half an hour morning and evening.

And something—whether it was the dumb-bells, or the tonic, or wholesome fear of the terrible doctor—kept Elsley for the next month in better spirits and temper than he had been in for a long while.

Moreover, Tom set Lucia to coax him into walking with Headley. She succeeded at last, and, on the whole, each of them soon found that he had something to learn from the other. Elsley improved daily in health, and Lucia wrote to Valentin flaming accounts of the wonderful doctor who had been cast on shore in their world's end, and received from her after a while thick and much more—for fancy is not exuberant enough to reproduce the whole of a young lady's letter.

'—I am so ashamed. I ought to have told you of that doctor a fortnight ago, but, rattlo-pate as I am, I forgot all about it. Do you know, he is Salina Mellot's dearest friend, and she begged me to recommend him to you, but I put it off, and then it slipped my memory, like everything else good. She has told me the most wonderful stories of his courage and goodness, and conceive—she and her husband were taken prisoners with him by the savages in the South Seas, and going to be eaten, she says but he helped them to escape in a canoe—such a story—and lived with them for three months on the most beautiful desert island.

It is all like a fairy tale. I'll tell it you when I come, darling—which I shall do in a fortnight, and we shall be all so happy. I have such a box ready for you and the chicks, which I shall bring with me, and some pretty things from Scoutbush besides, who is very low, poor fellow, I cannot conceive what about, but wonderfully tender about you. I fancy he must be in love, for he stood up the other day about you to my aunt, quite solemnly, with, "Let her alone, my lady. She's not the first whom love has made a fool of, and she won't be the last, and I believe that some of the moves which look most foolish turn out best after all. Live and let live, everybody knows his own business best, anything is better than marriage without real affection." Conceive my astonishment at hearing the dear little fellow turn sage on that way!

By the way, I have had to quote his own advice against him, for I have refused Lord Chalkclere after all. I told him (C not S), that he was much too good for me, far too perfect and complete a person, that I preferred a husband whom I could break in for myself, even though he gave me a little trouble. Scoutbush was cross at first, but he said afterwards that it was just like Baby Blake (the wretch always calls me Baby Blake now, after that dreadful girl in Lover's novel), and I told him frankly that it was, if he meant that I had sooner break in a thoroughbred for myself, even though I had a fall or two in the process, than jog along on the most finished little pony in earth, who would never go out of an amble. Lord Chalkclere may be very finished, and learned, and excellent, and so forth, but, ma chère, I want, not a white rabbit (of which he always reminds me), but a lion, even though he be a naughty one. I always fancy people must be very little if they can be finished off so rapidly, if there was any real nerve in them, they would take somewhat longer to grow. Lord Chalkclere would do very well to bind in Russian leather, and put on one's library shelves, to be consulted when one forgot a date, but really even your Ulysses of a doctor—provided, of course, he turned out a prince in disguise, and don't leave out his h's—would be more to the taste of your naughtiest of sisters.

CHAPTER XII

A PEER IN TROUBLE

SOMEWHERE in those days, so it seems, did Mr. Bowie call unto himself a cab at the barrack gate, and, dressed in his best array, repair to the wilds of Brompton, and request to see either Claude or Mrs. Mellot.

Bowie is an ex-Scots Fusilier, who, damaged by the kick of a horse, has acted as valet, first to Scoutbush's father, and next to Scoutbush himself. He is of a patronising habit of mind, is befits a tolerably 'lesterary' Scotsman of forty-five years of age and six feet three in height, who has full confidence in the integrity of his own virtue, the infallibility of his own opinion, and the strength of his own right arm, for Bowie, though he has a rib or two 'duged in,' is mighty still as Theseus's self, and both astonished his red-bearded compatriots, and won money for his master, by his prowess in the late feat of arms at Holland House.

Mr. Bowie is asked to walk into Salma's boudoir (for Claude is out in the garden), to sit down, and deliver his message, which he does after a due military salute, sitting bolt upright in his chair, and in a solemn and monotonous voice.

'Well, madam, it's just this, that his lordship would be very glad to see you and Mr. Mellot, for he's very ill indeed, and that's truth, and if he wunda tell ye the cause, then I will, and it's just a' for love of this play-acting lady here, and more's the pity.'

'More's the pity, indeed!'

'And it's my opinion the poor larkie will just die, if nobody sees to him, and I've taken the liberty of writing to Major Cawmill myself, to beg him to come up and see to him, for it's a pity to see his lordship cast an ay, for want of an understanding body to advise him.'

'So I am not an understanding body, Bowie!'

'Oh, madam, ye're young and bonny,' says Bowie, in a tone in which admiration is not unmingled with pity.

'Young indeed! Mr. Bowie, do you know that I am almost as old as you?'

'Hoot, hnt, hnt,' says Bowie, looking at the wax-like complexion and bright hawk-eyes.

'Really I am. I'm just five and-thirty this many a day.'

'Well, then, madam, if you'll excuse me, ye're old enough to be wiser than to let his lordship be inveigled with any such play-acting.'

'Really he's not inveigled,' says Salma, laughing. 'It is all his own fault, and I have warned him how absurd and impossible it is. She has refused even to see him, and you know yourself he has not been near our house for these three weeks.'

'Ah, madam, you'll excuse me, but that's the way with that sort of people, just to draw back and draw back, to make a poor young gentleman follow them all the keener, as a trout does a minnow, the faster you spin it.'

'I assure you no. I can't let you into ladies' secrets: but there is no more chance of her listening to him than of me. And as for me, I have been trying all the spring to marry him to a young lady with eighty thousand pounds, so you can't complain of me.'

'Eh? No. That's more like and fitting.'

'Well, now Tell his lordship that we are coming, and trust us, Mr Bowie. we do not look very villainous, do we?'

'Faith, 'deed then, and I suppose not,' said Bowie, using the verb which, in his cautious Scotch tongue, expresses complete certainty. The truth is, that Bowie adores both Sabina and her husband, who are, he says, 'just fit to be put under a glass case on the sideboard, like two wee china angels.'

In half an hour they were in Scotchbush's rooms. They found the little man lying on his sofa in his dressing-gown, looking pale and pitiable enough. He had been trying to read, for the table by him was covered with books, but either ginnery and mathematics had injured his eyes, or he had been crying, Sabina inclined to the latter opinion.

'This is very kind of you both, but I don't want you, Claude, I want Mrs. Mellot. You go to the window with Bowie.'

Bowie and Claude shrugged their shoulders at each other, and departed.

'Now, Mrs. Mellot, I can't help looking up to you as a mother.'

'Complimentary to my youth,' says Sabina, who always calls herself young when she is called old, and old when she is called young.

'I didn't mean to be rude. But one does long to open one's heart. I never had any mother to talk to, you know, and I can't tell my aunt, and Valentinia is so flighty, and I thought you would give me one chance more. Don't laugh at me, I say. I am really just laughing at.'

'I see you are, you poor creature,' says Sabina, melting, and a long conversation follows, while Claude and Bowie exchange confidences, and arrive at no result beyond the undeniable assertion, 'it is a very bad job.'

Presently Sabina comes out, and Scotchbush calls cheerfully from the sofa—

'Bowie, get my bath and things to dress, and order me the cab in half an hour. Good-bye, you dear people, I shall never thank you enough.'

Away go Claude and Sabina in a hack-cab.

'What have you done?'

'Given him what he entreated for—another chance with Marie.'

'It will only madden him all the more. Why let him try, when you know it is hopeless?'

'Why, I had not the heart to refuse, that's the truth, and besides, I don't know that it is hopeless.'

'All the naughtier of you, to let him run the chance of making a fool of himself.'

'I don't know that he will make such a great fool of himself. As he says, his grandfather married an actress, and why should not he?'

'Simply because she won't marry him.'

'And how do you know that, sir? You fancy that you understand all the women's hearts in England, just because you have found out the secret of managing one little fool.'

'Managing her, quotha! Being managed by her, till my quiet house is turned into a perfect volcano of match-making. Why, I thought he was to marry Manchestrina.'

'He shall marry who he likes, and if Marie changes her mind, and revenges herself on this American by taking Lord Scotchbush, all I can say is, it will be a just judgment on him. I have no patience with the heartless fellow, going off thus, and never even leaving his address.'

'And because you have no patience, you think Marie will have none?'

'What do you know about women's hearts? Leave us to mind our own matters.'

'Mr Bowie will kill you outright, if your plot succeeds.'

'No, he won't. I know who Bowie wants to marry, and if he is not good, he shan't have her. Besides, it will be such fun to spite old Lady Knockdown, who always turns up her nose at me. How mad she will be! Here we are at home. Now, I shall go and prepare Marie.'

An hour after, Scotchbush was pleading his cause with Marie, and had been met, of course, at starting, with the simple rejoinder—

'But, my lord, you would not surely have me marry where I do not love?'

'Oh, of course not, but you see, people very often get love after they are married, and I am sure I would do all to make you love me. I know I can't bribe you by promising you carriages and jewels, and all that. But you should have what you would like—pictures and statues, and books—and all that I can buy. Oh, madam, I know I am not worthy of you—I never have had any education as you have!'

Marie smiled a sad smile.

'But I would learn—I know I could—for I am no fool, though I say it. I like all that sort of thing, and and if I had you to teach me, I should care about nothing else. I have given up all my nonsense since I knew you, indeed I have—I am trying all day long to read ever since you said something about being useful, and noble and doing one's work. I have never forgotten that, madam, and never shall, and you would find me a pleasant person to live with, I do believe. At all events, I would—oh, madam, I would be your servant, your dog, I would fetch and carry for you like a negro slave!'

Marie turned pale and rose.

'Listen to me, my lord, this must end. You do not know to whom you are speaking. You talk of negro slaves. Know that you are talking to one!'

Scotchbush looked at her in blank astonishment.

'Madam! Excuse me, but my own eyes—'

'You are not to trust them, I tell you bet.'

Scotchbush was silent. She misunderstood his silence, but went on steadily.

'I tell you, my lord, what I expect you to keep secret, and I know that I can trust your honour.'

Scotchbush bowed.

'And what I should never have told you, were it not my only chance of curing you of this foolish passion I am an American slave !'

'Curse them ! Who dared make you a slave !' cried Scoutbush, turning as red as a game-cock.

'I was born a slave. My father was a white gentleman of good family, my mother was a quadroon, and therefore I am a slave, — a negress, a runaway slave, my lord, who, if I returned to America, should be seized, and chained, and scourged, and sold. Do you understand me !'

'What an infernal shame !' cried Scoutbush, to whom the whole thing appeared simply as a wrong done to Marie.

'Well, my lord !'

'Well, madam !'

'Does not this fact put the question at rest for ever !'

'No, madam ! What do I know about slaves ! No one is a slave in England. No, madam, all that it does is to make me long to cut half a dozen fellows' throats.' and Scoutbush stamped with rage. 'No, madam, you are you and if you become my viscountess, you take my rank, I trust, and my name is yours, and my family yours, and let me see who dares interfere !'

'But public opinion, my lord !' said Marie, half pleased, half-terrified to find the shaft which she had fancied fatal fall harmless at her feet.

'Public opinion ! You don't know England, madam ! What's the use of my being a peer, if I can't do what I like, and make public opinion go my way, and not its !' Though I am no great prince, madam, but only a poor Irish viscount, it's hard if I can't marry whom I like — in reason, that is — and expect all the world to call on her, and treat her as she deserves. Why, madam, you will have all London at your feet after a season or two, and all the more if they know your story — or if you don't like that, or if fools did talk at first, why, we'd go and live quietly at Kilarabeggan, or at Penulva, and you'd have all the tenants looking up to you as a goddess, as I do, madam. Oh, madam, I would go anywhere, live anywhere, only to be with you !'

Marie was deeply affected. Making all allowances for the wilfulness of youth, she could not but see that her origin formed no bar whatever to her marrying a nobleman, and that he honestly believed that it would form none in the opinion of his compere, if she proved herself worthy of his choice, and, full of new emotions, she burst into tears.

'There, now, you are melting. I knew you would ! Madam ! Signora !' and Scoutbush advanced to take her hand.

'Never less,' cried she, drawing back. 'Do not ; you only make me miserable ! I tell you it is impossible. I cannot tell you all. You must not do yourself and yours such an injustice ! Go, I tell you !'

Scoutbush still tried to take her hand.

'Go, I entreat you,' cried she, at her wits' end, 'or I will really ring the bell for Mrs Mellot !'

'You need not do that, madam,' said he, drawing himself up, 'I am not in the habit of being troublesome to ladies, or being turned out of drawing-rooms. I see how it is——' and his tone softened, 'you despise me, and think me a vain, frivolous puppy. Well, I'll do something yet that you shall not despise !' And he turned to go.

'I do not despise you, I think you a generous, high-hearted gentleman—nobleman in all senses,' Scoutbush turned again.

'But again, impossible ! I shall always respect you, but we must never meet again.'

She held out her hand. Little Freddy caught and kissed it till he was breathless, and then rushed out, and blundered over Sabina in the next room.

'No hope ?'

'None.' And though he tried to squeeze his eyes together very tight, the great tears would come dropping down.

Sabina took him to a sofa, and sat him down while he made his little moan.

'I told you that she was in love with the American.'

'Then why don't he come back and marry her ! Hang him, I'll go after him and make him !' cried Scoutbush, glad of any object on which to vent his wrath.

'You can't, for nobody knows where he is. Now do be good and patient, you will forget all this.'

'I shan't !'

'You will, not at first, but gradually, and many times one really more fit for you.'

'Ah, but if I marry her I shan't love her, and then, you know, Mrs Mellot, I shall go to the bad again, just as much as ever. Oh, I was trying to be steady for her sake !'

'You can be that still.'

'Yes, but it's so hard, with nothing to hope for. I'm not fit to take care of myself. I'm fit for nothing, I believe, but to go out and be shot by those Russians — and I'll do it !'

'You must not, you are not strong enough. The doctors would not let you go as you are.'

'Then I'll get strong, I'll—'

'You'll go home and be good.'

'Am't I good now ?'

'Yes, you are a good, sensible fellow, and have behaved nobly, and I honour you for it, and Claude shall come and see you every day.'

That evening a note came from Scoutbush.

'DEAR MRS MELLOT—Whom should I find when I went home but Campbell ! I told him all, and he says that you and everybody have done quite right, so I suppose you have, and that I am quite right in trying to get out to the East, so I shall do it. But the doctor says I must rest for six weeks at least. So Campbell has persuaded me to take the yacht, which is at Southampton, and go down to Aberslva, and then round to Snowdon, where I have a little slate-quarry, and get some fishing. Campbell is coming with me, and I wish Claude would come too. He knows that brother-in-law of mine, Vavasour, I think, and I shall go and make friends with him. I've got very merciful to foolish lovers lately, and Claude can help me to face him, for I am a little afraid of geniuses, you know. So there we'll pick up my sister (she goes down by land this week), and then go on to Snowden, and Claude can visit his old quarters at the Royal Oak at Bettas, where he and I had that jolly week among the painters. Do let him come, and beg La Signora not to be angry with me. That's all I'll ever ask of her again.

'Poor fellow! But I can't part with you, Claude.'

'Let him,' said La Cordigliera. 'He will comfort his lordship, and do you come with me.'

'Come with you? Where?'

'I will tell you when Claude is gone.'

'Claude, go and smoke in the garden now.'

'Come with me to Germany, Sabina.'

'To Germany? Why on earth to Germany?'

'I only said Germany because it came first into my mind. Anywhere for rest, anywhere to be free of that poor man's way.'

'He will not trouble you any more, and you will not surely throw up your engagement?'

'Of course not!' said she, half jealously.

'It will be over in a fortnight, and then I must have rest. Don't you see how I want rest?'

Sabina had seen it for some time past. That white cheek had been fading more and more to a wax-like paleness, those black eyes glittered with here a unhealthy light, and dark rings round them told, not merely of late hours and excitement, but of wild passion and midnight tears. Sabina had seen all, and could not but give way, as Marie went on.

'I must have rest, I tell you! I am beginning.'

'I can confess all to you—to your stout heart. I am beginning to long for brandy-and-water—pah! to nerve me up to the excitement of doing, and then for morphine to make me sleep after it. The very eau de Cologne flask tempts me! They say that the fine ladies use it, before a ball, for other purposes than scent. You would not like to see me commence that practice, would you?'

'There is no fear, dear.'

'There is fear! You do not know the craving for exhilaration, the capriciousness of self-indulgence, in our wild Tropic blood! Oh, Sabina, I feel at times that I could sink so low—that I could be so wicked, so utterly wicked, if I once began! Take me away, dearest creature, take me away, and let me have fresh air, and faint quiet scenes, and rest—rest! oh, save me, Sabina!' and she put her hands over her face, and burst into tears.

'We will go, then, to the Rhine, shall it be? I have not been there now for those three years, and it will be such fun running about the world by myself once more, and knowing all the while that——' and Sabina stopped; she did not like to remind Marie of the painful contrast between them.

'To the Rhine? Yes. And I shall see the beautiful old world, the old vineyards, and castles, and hills which he used to tell me of—taught me to read of in those sweet, sweet books of Longfellow's! So gentle, and pure, and calm—so unlike me!'

'Yes, we will see them, and perhaps——'

Marie looked up at her, guessing her thoughts, and blushed scarlet.

'You too, think then that—that—' she could not finish her sentence.

Sabina stooped over her, and the two beautiful mouths met.

'There, darling, we need say nothing. We are both women and can talk without words.'

'Then you think there is hope?'

'Hope? Do you fancy that he is gone so very far? or that if he were I could not hunt him out? Have I wandered lost round the world alone for nothing?'

'No, but hope—hope that—'

'Not hope, but certainty, if some one I know had but come!'

'Come—to do what?'

'To trust him utterly.'

Marie covered her face with her hands, and shuddered in every limb.

'You know my story. Did I gain or lose by telling my Claude all?'

'I will!' she cried, looking up pale but firm.

'I will!' and she looked steadfastly into the mirror over the chimney piece, as if trying to combat the raptures of that ugly vision which haunted it, and so to nerve herself to the utmost, and face the whole truth.

A little more than a fortnight Sabina and Marie, with mind and courage (for Marie was rich now), were away in the old Antares. And Claude was rolling down to Southampton by rail, with Campbell, Scamblush, and last, but not least, the faithful Bowe, who hid under his fringe what he described to the puzzled railway guard as 'gouls and books, and pins and eras, and books and books, enough for a' the coals o' Newfoundland.'

CHAPTER XIII

L'HOMME INCOMPRIS

ESTHER went on, between improved health and the tears of Tom Thonall, a good deal better for the next month. He began to look forward to Valentin's visit with equanimity, and, at last, with interest, and was rather pleased than otherwise when, in the last week of July, a fly drove up to the gate of old Penalva Court, and he handed out therefrom Valentin, and Valentin's maid.

Lucia had discovered that the wind was east, and that she was afraid to go to the gate for fear of catching cold, her real purpose being that Valentia should meet Elsie first.

'She is so impulsive,' thought the good little creature, always plotting about her husband, 'that she will rush upon me, and never see him for the first five minutes, and Elsie is so sensitive—how can he be otherwise, in his position, poor dear!' So she refrained herself, like Joseph, and stood at the door till Valentia was half-way down the garden-walk having taken Elsie's somewhat shyly-offered arm, and then she could refrain herself no longer, and the two women ran upon each other, and kissed, and sobbed, and talked, till Lucia was out of breath, but Valentia was not so easily silenced.

'My darling' and you are looking so much better than I expected, but not quite yourself yet. That naughty baby is killing you I am sure! And Mr Vavasour, too, I shall begin to call him Elsie to-morrow, if I like him as much as I do now—but he is looking quite thin—wearing himself out with writing so many beautiful books, that "Wreck" was perfect! And where are the children? I must rush upstairs and devour them!—and what a delicious old garden! and chrysanthemums, too, so dark and romantic, and such dear old-fashioned flowers! Mr Vavasour must show me all over it, and over that hanging wood, too. What a duck of a place! And oh, my dear, I am quite out of breath!

And so she swept in, with her arm round Lucia's waist, while Elsie stood looking after her, well enough satisfied with her reception of him, and only hoping that the stream of words would slacken after a while.

'What a magnificent creature!' said he to himself. 'Who would have believed that the three years would make such a change!'

And he was right. The tall little girl had bloomed into full glory, and Valentia St Just, though not delicately beautiful, was as splendid an Irish damsel as men need look upon, with a grand masculine, aquiline features, luxuriant black hair, and—though it was the fog-end of the London season—the marvellous Irish complexion, as of the fair damsels of Kilkenny, whose

'I lips were like roses, her cheeks were the same,
Like a dish of fresh strawberries another'd in crime.'

Her figure was perhaps too tall, and somewhat too stout also, but its size was relieved by the delicacy of those hands and feet of which Miss Valentia was most pardonably proud, and by that indescribable lissomeness and lazy grace which Irishwomen inherit, perhaps, with their tinge of southern blood, and when, in half an hour, she reappeared with broad straw hat, and gown tucked up à la beryere over the striped Welsh petticoat, perhaps to show off the ankles, which only looked the liner for a pair of heavy laced boots, Elsie honestly felt it a pleasure to look at her, and a still greater pleasure to talk to her, and to be talked to by her, while she, bent on making herself agreeable, partly from real good taste, partly from natural good-nature, and partly, too, because she saw in his eyes that he admired her, chatted sentiment about all heaven and earth.

For to Miss Valentia—it is sad to have to say it—admiration had been now, for three years, her daily bread. She had lived in the thickest whirl of the world, and, as most do for a while, found it a very pleasant plate.

She had flirted—with how many must not be told, and perhaps with more than one with whom she had no business to flirt. Little Scoutbush had remonstrated with her on some such affair, but she had silenced him with an Irish jest, 'You're a fisherman, Freddy, and when you can't catch salmon, you catch trout, and when you can't catch trout, you'll whip on the shallows for poor little gubbalawus, and say that it is all to keep your hand in and so do I.'

The old ladies said that this was the reason why she had not married, the men, however, asserted that no one dare marry her, and one club-oracle had given it as his opinion that no man in his rational senses was to be allowed to have anything to do with her, till she had been well pitted two or three times to take the spirit out of her—but that catastrophe had not yet occurred, and Miss Valentia still reigned 'triumphant and alone,' though her aunt, old Lady Knockdown, moved all the earth, and some duty places, too, below the earth, to get the wild Irish girl off her hands, 'for, quoth she, 'I feel with Valentia, indeed, just like one of those men who carry about little dogs in the quadrant. I always pity the poor men so, and think how happy they must be when they have sold one. It is one chance less, you know, of having it bite them horribly, and then run away after all.'

There was, however, no more real harm in Valentia than there is in every child of Adam. Town iniquity had not corrupted her. She was giddy, given up to enjoyment of the present, but there was not a touch of meanness about her, and if she was selfish, as every one must needs be whose thoughts are of pleasure, admiration, and success, she was so unintentionally and she would have been shocked and pained at being told that she was anything but the most kind-hearted and generous creature on earth. Major Campbell, who was her Mentor as well as her brother's, had certainly told her no more than once, at which she had pouted a good deal, and cried a little and promised to amend, then packed up a heap of cast-off things to send to Lucia—half of it much too fine to be of any use to the quiet little woman, and, lastly, gone out and bought fresh finery for herself, and forgot all her good resolutions. Whereby it befell that she was tolerably deep in debt at the end of every season, and had to torment and kiss Scoutbush into paying her bills, which he did like a good brother, and often before he had paid his own.

But, howsoever full Valentia's head may have been of fine garments and London flirtations, she had too much tact and good feeling to talk that evening of a world of which even Elsie knew more than her sister. For poor Lucia had been but eighteen at the time of her escapade, and had not been presented twelve months, so that she was as 'inexperienced' as any one can be, who has only a husband, three children, and a household to manage on less than three hundred a year. Therefore Valentin talked only of things which would interest Elsley, asked him to read his last new poem—which, I need not say, he did, told him how she devoured everything he wrote, planned walks with him in the country, seemed to consult his pleasure in every way.

'To-morrow morning I shall sit with you and the children, Lucia, of course I must not interrupt Mr Vavasour but really in the afternoon I must ask him to spare a couple of hours from the Muses.'

Vavasour was delighted to do anything—'Where would she walk?'

'Where? of course to see the beautiful school-mistress who saved the man from drowning, and then to see the chateau across which he was swept. I shall understand your poem so much better, you know, if I can but realise the people and the place. And you must take me to see Captain Willis, too, and even the lieutenant it ~~he~~ does not smell too much of brandy. I will be so gracious and civil, quite the lady of the castle.'

'You will make quite a royal progress,' said Lucia, looking at her with sisterly admiration.

'Yes, I intend to usurp as many of Scoutbush's honours as I can till he comes. I must lay down the sceptre in a fortnight, you know, so I shall make as much use of it as I can meanwhile.'

And so on, and so on, meaning all the while to put Elsley quite at his ease, and let him understand that bygones were bygones, and that with her any reconciliation at all was meant to be a complete one, which was wise and right enough. But Valentin had not counted on the excitable and vain nature with which she was dealing, and Lucia, who had her own fears from the first evening, was the last person in the world to tell her of it, first from pride in herself, and then from pride in her husband. For even if a woman has made a foolish match, it is hard to expect her to confess as much, and after all, a husband is a husband, and let his faults be what they might, he was still her Elsley, her idol, once, and perhaps (so she hoped) her idol again hereafter, and if not, still he was her husband, and that was enough.

'By which you mean, sir, that she considered herself bound to endure everything and anything from him, simply because she had been married to him in church?'

Yes, and a great deal more. Not merely being married in church, but what being married in church means, and what every woman who is a woman understands, and lives up to without flinching, 'though she die a martyr for it, or a confessor, a far higher saint, if the truth was known, as it will be some day, than all the holy virgins who ever fasted and prayed in a convent since the days when Macarius first turned sinner. For, to a true woman, the mere fact of a man's being her husband, put it on the lowest ground that you choose, is utterly sacred, divine, all-powerful, in the might of which she can conquer self in a way which is an everyday miracle, and the man who does not feel about the mere fact of a woman's having given herself utterly to him, just what she herself feels about it, ought to be despised by all his fellows, were it not that, in that case, it would be necessary to despise more human beings than is safe for the soul of any man.

That fortnight was the sunniest which Elsley had passed since he made secret love to Lucia in Eaton Square. Romaine walks, the company of a beautiful woman as ready to listen as she was to talk, free licence to pour out all his fancies, surfs of admiration, if not of flattery, and pardonably satisfied vanity—all these are comfortable things for most men, who have nothing better to comfort them. But, on the whole, this feast did not make Elsley a better or wiser man at home. Why should it? Is a boy's digestion improved by turning him loose into a confectioner's shop? And thus the contrast between what he chose to call Valentin's sympathy and Lucia's want of sympathy made him, unfortunately, all the more cross to her when they were alone, and who could blame the poor little woman for saying one night, angrily enough,

'Ah, yes! Valentin—Valentin is imaginative. Valentin understands you—Valentin sympathises. Valentin thinks Valentin has no children to wash and dress, no accounts to keep, no linen to mend—Valentin's back does not ache all day long, so that she would be glad enough to lie on the sofa from morning till night, if she was not forced to work whether she can work or not. No, no, don't kiss me, for kisses will not make up for injustice, Elsley. I only trust that you will not tempt me to hate my own sister. No don't talk to me now, let me sleep if I can sleep, and go and walk and talk sentiment with Valentin to-morrow, and leave the poor little brood hen to sit on her nest and be despised.' And refusing all Elsley's entreaties for pardon, she sniled herself to sleep.

Who can blame her? If there is one thing more provoking than another to a woman, it is to see her husband Strassengel, Haus teufel, an angel of courtesy to every woman but herself, to see him in society all smiles and good stories, the most amiable and self-restraining of men, perhaps to be complimented on his agreeableness and to know all the while that he is penning up all the accumulated ill-temper of the day, to let it out on her when they get home, perhaps in the very carriage as soon as it leaves the door. Hypocrites that you are, some of you gentlemen! Why cannot the act against cruelty to women, corporal punishment included, be brought to bear on such as you? And yet, after all, you are not most to blame in the matter! Eve herself tempts you, as at the beginning, for who does not know that the man is a thousand times vainer than the woman? He does but follow the analogy of all nature! Look at the Red Indian, in that blissful state of nature from which (so philosophers inform those who choose to believe them) we all sprang. Which is the boaster, the strutter, the bedizener of his sinul carcass with feathers and beads, fox-tails and bears' claws—the brave, or his poor little squaw? An Australian settler's wife bestows on some poor slaving gin a cast-off French bonnet, before she has gone a hundred yards, her husband snatches it off, puts it on his own mop, quiets her for its loss with a tap of the wadding, and struts on in glory. Why not? Has he not the analogy of all nature on his side? Have not the male birds and the male mollus the fine feathers, while the females go soberly about in drab and brown? Does the lioness, or the hen, rejoice in the grandeur of a mane, the hind, or the stag, in antlered pride? How know we but that, in some more perfect and natural state of society, the women will dress like so many quakers, while the frippery shops will become the haunts of men alone, and 'broches, pearls, and owches' be consecrated to the nobler sex? There are signs already, in the dress of our young gentlemen, of such a return to the law of nature from the present absurd state of things, in which the human peacocks carry about the gaudy trains which are the peacocks' right.

For there is a secret feeling in woman's heart that she is in her wrong place, that it is she who ought to worship the man, and not the man her, and when she becomes properly conscious of her destiny, has not he a right to be conscious of his? If the gray hairs will stand round in the mire clucking humble admiration, who can blame the old black cock for clanking and clanking on the top of a moss hag, with outspread wings and stirring tail, glorious and self-glorifying? He is a splendid fellow, and he was made splendid for some purpose, surely? Why did Nature give him his steel-blue coat and his crimson crest, but for the very same purpose that she gave Mr. A — his intellect to be admired by the other sex? And if young dandies, overflowing with sentiment and Ruskinism, will crowd round him, ask his opinion of this book and that picture, treasure his bon-mots, beg for his autograph, looking all the while the praiso which they do not speak (though they speak a good deal of it), and when they go home write letters to him on matters about which in old times girls used to ask only their mothers, — who can blame him if he finds the little wife at home a very uninteresting body, whose head is so full of petty cares and gossip that he and all his talents are quite unappreciated? Les femmes incompréhensibles of France used to (perhaps do now) form a class of married ladies, whose sorrows were especially dear to the novelists, male or female, but what are their woes compared to those of Thomme incompris? What higher vocation for a young maiden than to comfort the martyr during his agonies? And, most of all, where the sufferer is not merely a genius, but a saint, persecuted, perhaps, abroad by vulgar tradesmen and Philistine bishops, and snubbed at home by a stupid wife, who is quite unable to appreciate his magnificent projects for regenerating all Heaven and earth, and only, humdrum, practical creature that she is, tries to do justly, and live merry, and walk humbly with her God? Fly to his help, all you maidens, and pour into the wounded heart of the holy man the healing balm of self-conceit, cover his table with confidential letters, choose him as your father-confessor, and lock yourself up alone with him for an hour or two every week, while the wife is mending his shirts upstairs. True, you may break the stupid wife's heart by year-long misery, as she slaves on, bearing the burden and heat of the day, of which you never dream, keeping the wretched man, by her unassuming good example, from making a fool of himself three times a week, and sowing the seed of which you steal the fruit. What matter? If your immortal soul requires it, what matter what it costs her carnal heart? She will suffer in silence; at least, she will not tell you. You think she does not understand you. Well, and she thinks in return that you do not understand her, and her married joys and sorrows, and her five children, and her butcher's lull, and her long agony of fear for the husband of whom she is ten times more proud than you could be, for whom she has slaved for years, whose defects she has tried to cure, while she cured her own, for whom she would die to-morrow, did he fall into disgrace, when you had flounced off to find some new idol, and so she will not tell you, and what the can be well not, that the heart giveth not. Go on and prosper! You may, too, ruin the man's spiritual side by vanity, you may mar his discontent with the place where God has put him, till he ends by flying off to 'some pure Communion,' and taking you with him. Never mind. He is a most delightful person, and his intercourse is so improving. Why were sweet things made, but to be eaten? Go on and prosper.

Ah, young ladies, if some people had (as it is perhaps well for them that they have not) the ordering of this same British nation, they would certainly follow your example, and try to restore various ancient institutions. And first among them would be that very ancient institution of the cuckoo-stool, to be employed, however, not as of old, against married scolds (for whom those who have been behind the scenes have all respect and sympathy), but against unmarried prophesies, who, under whatsoever high pretence of art or religion, flirt with their neighbours' husbands, be they parson or poet.

Not, be it understood, that Valentin had the least suspicion that Kelsey considered himself 'incompris.' If he had hunted the notion to her, she would have resented it as an insult to the St. Justs in general, and to her sister in particular, and would have said something to him in her off-hand way, the like whereof he had seldom heard, even from adverse reviewers.

Elsley himself soon divined enough of her character to see that he must keep his sorrows to himself, if he wished for Valentin's good opinion, and soon—so easily does a vain man lend himself to meanness—he found himself trying to please Valentin, by praising to her the very woman with whom he was discontented. He felt shocked and ashamed when first his own baseness flashed across him; but the hurt was too pleasant to be left easily, and, after all, he was trying to say to his guest what he knew his guest would like, and what was that but following those very rules of good society, for breaking which Lucia was always calling him gauche and morose? So he actually quieted his own conscience by the fancy that he was bound to be civil, and to keep up appearances, 'even for Lucia's sake,' said the self-deceiver to himself. And thus the mischief was done, and the breach between Lucia and her husband, which had been somewhat bridged over during the last month or two, opened more wide than ever, without a suspicion on Valentin's part that she was doing all she could to break her sister's heart.

She, meanwhile, had plenty of reasons which justified her new intimacy to herself. How could she better please Lucia? How better show that hygeines were to be hygeines, and that Elsley was henceforth to be considered as one of the family, than by being as intimate as possible with him? What matter how intimate? For, after all, he was only a brother, and she his sister.

She had law on her side in that last argument, as well as love of amusement. Whether she had either common sense or Scripture is a very different question.

Poor Lucia, too, tried to make the best of the matter, and to take the new intimacy, as Valentin would have had her take it, in the light of a compliment to herself, and so, in her pride, she said to Valentin, and told her that she should love her for ever for her kindness to Elsley, while her heart was ready to burst.

But ere the fortnight was over the Nemesis had come, and Lucia, woman as she was, could not repress a thrill of malicious joy, even though Elsley became more intolerable than ever at the change.

What was the Nemesis, then?

Simply that this naughty Miss St. Just began to smile upon Frank Headley the curate, even as she had smiled upon Elsley Vavasour.

It was very naughty, but she had her excuses. She had found Elsley out, and it was well for both of them that she had done so. Already, upon the strength of their supposed relationship, she had allowed him to talk a great deal more nonsense to her—harmless perhaps, but nonsense still—than she would have listened to from any other man, and it was well for both of them that Elsley was a man without self-control, who began to show the weak side of his character freely enough as soon as he became at ease with his companion, and excited by conversation. Valentin quickly saw that he was vain as a peacock, and weak enough to be led by her in any and every direction, when she chose to work on his vanity. And she despised him accordingly, and suspected, too, that her sister could not be very happy with such a man.

None are more quick than sisters-in-law to see faults in the brother-in-law, when once they have begun to look for them, and Valentin soon remarked that Elsley showed Lucia no petits soins, while he was ready enough to show them to her, that he took no real trouble about his children, or about anything else, and twenty more faults, which she might have perceived in the first two days of her visit, if she had not been in such a hurry to amuse herself. But she was too delicate to ask Lucia the truth, and contented herself with watching all parties closely, and measuring herself meanwhile—for amusement she must have—in • Breaking a country heart.

For justice, etc. she went to town.

She had met Frank several times about the parish and in the schools, and had been struck at once with his grace and high breeding, and with that air of melancholy which is always interesting in a true woman's eyes. She had seen, too, that Elsley tried to avoid him, naturally enough not wishing an intrusion on their pleasant fraternité. Whereon, half to spite Elsley, and half to show her own right to chat with whom she chose, she made Lucia ask Frank to tea, and next contrived to go to the school when he was teaching there, and to make Elsley ask him to walk with them, and all the more because she had discovered that Elsley had discontinued his walks with Frank as soon as she had appeared at Pinalva.

Lucia was not sorry to countenance her in her naughtiness, it was a comfort to her to have a fourth person in the room at times, and thus to compel Elsley and Valentin to think of something beside each other, and when she saw her sister gradually transferring her favours from the married to the unmarried victim she would have been more than woman if she had not rejoiced thereat. Only, she began soon to be afraid for Frank, and at last told Valentin so.

'Do take care that you do not break his heart!'

'My dear! You forget that I sit under Mr. O'Blacaway, and am to him as a heathen and a publican. Fresh from St. Nepomud's as he is, he would as soon think of falling in love with an "Oniah Protestant" as with a malignant and a turbaned Turk. Besides my dear, if the mischief is going to be done, it's done already.'

'I dare say it is, you naughty beautiful thing. If anybody is goose enough to fall in love with you, he'll be also goose enough, I don't doubt, to do so at first sight. There, don't look perpetually in that glass but take care!

'What use? If it is going to happen at all, I say, it has happened already, so I shall just please myself, as usual.'

And it had happened and poor Frank had been, ever since the first day he saw Valentinia, over head and ears in love. His time had come, and there was no escaping his fate.

But to escape he tried. Convinced, with many good men of all ages and creeds, that a celibate life was the fittest one for a clergyman, he had fled from St. Nepomuc's into the wilderness to avoid temptation, and behold at his cell-door a fairer fiend than ever came to St. Dunstan. A fairer fiend, no doubt, for St. Dunstan's imagination created his temptress for him, but Valentinia was a reality, and fact and nature may be safely backed to produce something more charming than any monk's brain can do. One question whether St. Dunstan's apparition was not something as coarse as his own mind, clever though that mind was. At least, he would never have had the heart to apply the hot tongs to such a nose as Valentinia's, but at most have bowed her out pityingly, as Frank tried to bow out Valentinia from the sacred place of his heart, but failed.

Hard he tried, and humbly too. He had no proud contempt for married parsons. He was ready enough to confess that he, too, might be weak in that respect, as in a hundred others. He conceived that he had no reason, from his own inner life, to believe himself worthy of any higher vocation—proving his own real nobleness of soul by that very humility. He had rather not marry. He might do so some day, but he would sacrifice much to avoid the necessity. If he was weak, he would use what strength he had to the uttermost ere he yielded. And all the more, because he felt, and reasonably enough, that Valentinia was the last woman in the world to make a parson's wife. He had his ideal of what such a wife should be, if she were to be allowed to exist at all—the same ideal which Mr. Paget has drawn in his charming little book (would that all parsons' wives would read and perpend), the Outlet of Orkney Edge. But Valentinia would surely not make a Beatrice. Beautiful she was, glorious, lovable, but not the helpmeet whom he needed. And he fought against the new dream like a brave man. He fasted, he wept, he prayed. But his prayers seemed not to be heard. Valentinia seemed to have enthroned herself, a true Venus victrix, in the centre of his heart, and would not be dispossessed. He tried to avoid seeing her, but even for that he had not strength. He went again and again when asked, only to come home more miserable each time, as hence against himself and his own weakness as if he had given way to wine or to oaths. In vain, too, he represented to himself the ridiculous hopelessness of his passion; the impossibility of the London beauty ever stooping to marry the poor country curate. Fancies would come in, how such things, strange as they might seem, had happened already, might happen again. It was a class of marriage for which he had always felt a strong dislike, even suspicious and contempt, and though he was far more fitted, in family as well as personal excellence, for such a match, than three out of four who make them, yet he shrank with disgust from the notion of being himself classed at last among the match-making parsons. Whether there was 'carnal pride' or not in that last thought, his soul so loathed it that he would gladly have thrown up his cure at Aberlva, and would have done so actually, but for one word which Tom Thurnall had spoken to him, and that was—Cholera.

That the cholera might come, that it probably would come, in the course of the next two months, was news to him which was enough to keep him at his post, let what would be the consequences. And gradually he began to see a way out of his difficulty—and a very simple one, and that was, to die.

'That is the solution after all,' said he. 'I am not strong enough for God's work, but I will not shrink from it, if I can help. If I cannot master it, let it kill me, so at least I may have peace. I have failed utterly here, all my grand plans have crumbled to ashes between my fingers. I find myself a numberer of the ground, where I fancied that I was going forth like a very Michael—fool that I was!—leader of the armies of heaven. And now, in the one remaining point on which I thought myself strong, I find myself weakest of all. Useless and helpless! I have one chance left, one chance to show these poor souls that I really love them, really wish their good—selfish that I am! What matter whether I do show it or not? What need to justify myself to them? Self, self, creeping in everywhere! I shall begin next, I suppose, longing for the cholera to come, that I may show off myself in it, and make spiritual capital out of their dying agonies! Ah me! that it were all over! That this cholera, if it is to come, would wipe out of this head what I verily believe nothing but death will do!' And there, with Frank laid his head on the table, and cried till he could cry no more.

It was not over manly, but he was weakened with overwork and sorrow, and, on the whole, it was perhaps the best thing he could do, for he fell asleep there, with his head on the table, and did not wake till the dawn blazed through his open window.

CHAPTER XIV

THE DOCTOR AT DAY

Did you ever, in a feverish dream, climb a mountain which grew higher and higher as you climbed, and scramble through passages which changed perpetually before you, and up and down broke-neck stairs which broke off just petnally behind you? Did you ever spend the whole night, foot in stirrup, mounting that phantom hunter which never gets mounted, or, if he does, turns into a pen between your knees, or in going to fish that phantom stream which never gets fished? Did you ever, late for that mysterious dinner-party in some enchanted castle, wander disconsolately, in unaccountable rags and dirt, in search of that phantom carpet-bag which never gets found? Did you ever 'realise' to yourself the sieve of the Danaides, the stone of Sisyphus, the wheel of Ixion, the pleasure of shearing that domestic animal who (according to the experience of a very ancient observer of nature) produces more cry than wool, the perambulation of that fishman's moul'd bog, where you slip two steps backward for one forward, and must, therefore, in order to progress at all, turn your face homeward, and progress as a pig does into a steamer, by going the opposite way? Were you ever condemned to spin ropes of sand to all eternity, like Treggalo the wrecker, or to extract the cube roots of a million or two of hopeless surds, like the mad mathematician, or last, and worst of all, to work the Nuisance Removal Act? Then you can enter, as a man and a brother, into the sorrows of Tom Thurnall, in the months of June and July 1854.

He had made up his mind, for certain good reasons of his own, that the cholera ought to visit Aberlva in the course of the summer, and, of course, tried his best to persuade people to get ready for their ugly visitor, but in vain. The cholera came there? Why, it never had come yet, which signified, when he inquired a little more closely, that there had been only one or two doubtful cases in 1837, and five or six in 1849. In vain he answered, 'Very well, and is not that a proof that the causes of cholera are increasing here? If you had one case the first time, and five times as many the next, by the same rule you will have five times as many more if it comes this summer.'

'Nonsense! Aberlva was the healthiest town on the coast.'

'Well but,' would Tom say, 'in the census before last, you had a population of 1300 in 112 houses, and that was close packing enough, in all conscience, and in the last census I find you had a population of over 1400, which must have increased since, and there are eight or nine old houses in the town pulled down, or turned into stores, so you are more closely packed than ever. And mind, it may seem no very great difference, but it is the last drop that fills the cup.'

What had that to do with cholera? And more than one gave him to understand that he must be either a very silly or a very impertinent person, to go poking into how many houses there were in the town, and how many people lived in each. Tardrew, the steward, indeed, said openly that Mr Thurnall was making disturbance enough in people's property up at Pentremochyn, without bothering himself with Aberlva too. He had no opinion of people who had a finger in everybody's pie. Whom Tom tried to soothe with honeyed words, knowing him to be of the original British bulldog breed, which, once stroked against the hair, shows his teeth at you for ever afterwards.

But staniel was Tardrew, unfortunately on the wrong side, and backed by the collective ignorance, pride, laziness, and superstition of Aberlva, showed to his new assailant that terrible front of stupidity, against which, says Schiller, 'the gods themselves light in vain.'

'Does he think we was all fools afore he came here?'

That was the rallying cry of the Conservative party, worshippers of Baalzebub, god of lies, and of that (so say Syrian scholars) from which lies are bred. And, indeed, there were excuses for them, on the Yankee ground, that 'there's a deal of human natur' in man.' It is hard to human nature to make all the humiliating concessions which must precede sanitary repentance, to say, 'I have been a very nasty, dirty fellow. I have lived contented in evil smells, till I care for them no more than my pig does. I have refused to understand nature's broadest hints, that anything which is so disagreeable is not meant to be left about. I have probably been more or less the cause of half my own illnesses, and of three-fourths of the illness of my children, for aught I know, it is very much my fault that my own baby has died of scarlatina, and two or three of my tenants of typhus. No, hang it! that's too much to make any man confess to! I'll prove my innocence by not reforming!' So sanitary reform is thrust out of sight, simply because its necessity is too humiliating to the pride of all, too frightful to the consciences of many.

Tom went to Trehoove.

'Mr Trehoove, you are a man of position in the county, and own some houses in Aberlva. Don't you think you could use your influence in this matter?'

'Own some houses? Yes,' and Mr Trehoove consigned the wind cottages to a variety of unmentionable places, 'cost me more in rates than they bring in in rent, even if I get the rent paid. I should like to get a six pounder, and blow the whole lot into the sea. Cholera coming, eh? D'ye think it will be there before Michaelmas?'

'I do.'

'Pity I can't blow 'em out before Michaelmas. Else I'd have ejected the lot, and pulled the houses down.'

'I think something should be done meanwhile, though, towards cleaning them.'

Let 'em cleanse them themselves! Soap's cheap enough with your . . . free trade, ain't it? Na, sir! That sort of talk will do well enough for my Lord Minchamstead, sir, the old money-lending Jew! . . . but gentlemen, sir, gentlemen, that are half-ruined with free trade, and your Whig policy, sir, you must give 'em back their rights before they can afford to throw away their money on cottages. Cottages, indeed! The upstart of a cotton-spinner, coming down here, buying the land over our heads, and pretending to show us how to manage our estates, oh! families that have been in the county this four hundred years, with the finest property in the world ready to die for them, sir, till these new revolutionary doctrines came in—pride and purse-proud conceit, just to show off his money! What do they want with better cottages than their fathers had? Only put notions into their heads, rouse 'em above their station, where they have, more they'll want.

Sir, make Chartists of 'em all before he's done! I'll tell you what, sir, and Mr Treboore attempted a dignified and dogmatic tone—'I never told it you before, because you were my very good friend, sir, but my opinion is, sir, that by what you're doing up at Pentremochyn, you're just spreading Chartist-Chartism, sir! Of course I know nothing. Of course I'm nobody, in these days, but that's my opinion, sir, and you've got it!'

By which motion Tom took little. Mighty is every always, and mighty ignorance, but you become aware of their truly Titian grandeur only when you attempt to touch their owners' pocket.

Tom tried old Heale, but took as little in that quarter. Heale had heard of sanitary reform, of course, but he knew nothing about it, and gave a general assent to Tom's doctrines, for fear of exposing his own ignorance, acting on this was a very different matter. It is always hard for an old medical man to confess that anything has been discovered since the days of his youth, and besides, there were other reasons behind, which Heale tried to avoid giving, and therefore fenced off, and fenced off, till, pressed hard by Tom, wrath came forth, and truth with it.

'And what be you thinking of, sir, to expect me to attend all my best patients? and not one of 'em but rents some two cottages, some a dozen. And what'll they say to me if I get a roasting and rocking in their drains, like an old sow by the wayside, beside putting 'em to all manner of expense? And all on the chance of this cholera coming, which I have no faith in, nor in this new-fangled sanitary reform neither, which is all a dodge for a lot of young government jumpies to fill their pockets, and into and ride over us. And my opinion always was with the Bible, that 'tis judgment, sir, a judgment of God, and we can't escape His holy will, and that's the plain truth of it.'

Tom made no answer to that latter argument. He had heard that 'tis judgment' from every mouth during the last few days, and had mortally offended the Brimble preachers that very morning, by answering his 'tis judgment' with—

'But, my good sir! the Bible, I thought, says that Aaron stayed the plague among the Israelites, and David the one at Jerusalem.'

'Sir, those was miracles, sir! and they was under the law, sir, and we'm under the Gospel, you'll be pleased to remember.'

'Humph!' said Tom, 'then, by your showing, they were better off under the law than we are now, if they could have their plagues stopped by miracles, and we cannot have ours stopped at all.'

'Sir, be you an infidel?'

To which there was no answer to be made.

In this case, Tom answered Heale with—

'But, my dear sir, if you don't like (as is reasonable enough) to take the responsibility on yourself, why not go to the Board of Guardians, and get them to put the act in force?'

'Board, sir? and do you know so little of Boards as that? Why, there ain't one of them but owns cottages themselves, and it's as much as my place is worth—'

'Your place as medical officer is just worth nothing, as you know, you'll have been out of pocket by it seven or eight pounds this year, even if no cholera comes.'

Tom knew the whole state of the case, but he liked tormenting Heale now and then.

'Well, sir! but if I get turned out next year in such a state that I have to go to Caranow Church town into my district, and into the best of my practice, too. I wonder what sort of a Poor Law district you were medical officer of, if you don't know yet that that's why we take to the poor.'

'My dear sir, I know it, and a good deal more besides.'

'Then why go bothering me this way?'

'Why,' said Tom, 'it's pleasant to have old notions confirmed as often as possible—'

'It is a jest, and all things show it,
I thought no more, but now I know it.'

What an ass the fellow must have been who had that put on his tombstone, not to have found it out many a year before he died!

He went next to Healey the curate, and took little by that move, though more than by any other.

For Frank already believed his doctrines, as an educated London parson of course would, was shocked to hear that they were likely to become fact so soon and so fearfully, offered to do all he could—but confessed that he could do nothing.

'I have been hinting to them, ever since I came, improvements in cleanliness, in ventilation, and so forth—but I have been utterly unheeded—and lally me as you will, doctor, about my cramming doctrines down their throats, and roaring like a Pope's lull, I assure you that, on sanitary reform, my roaring was as of a sucking dove, and ought to have prevailed, if soft persuasion can.'

'You were a dove where you ought to have been a bull, and a bull where you ought to have been a dove. But roar now, if ever you roared, in the pulpit and out. Why not preach to them on it next Sunday?'

'Well, I'd give a lecture gladly, if I could get any one to come and hear it, but that you could do better than me.

'I'll lecture them myself, and show them hogges, if my quarter-inch will do its work. If they want seeing to believe, see they shall, I have half a dozen specimens of water already which will astonish them. Let me lecture, you must preach.'

'You must know that there is a feeling—you would call it a prejudice—against introducing such purely secular subjects into the pulpit.'

Tom gave a long whistle.

'Pardon me, Mr. Headley, you are a man of sense, and I can speak to you as one human being to another, which I have seldom been able to do with your respected cloth.'

'Say on, I shall not be frightened.'

'Well, don't you put up the Ten Commandments in your church?'

'Yes.'

'And isn't one of them run "Thou shalt not kill"?''

'Well?'

'And is not murder a moral offence—what you call a sin?'

'Quæstio.'

'If you saw your parishioners in the habit of ~~say~~ such other's throats, or their own, shouldn't you think that a matter spiritual enough to be a fit subject for a little of the drum celestiation?'

'Well?'

'Well? Ill! There are your parishioners about to commit wholesale murder and suicide and is that a secular question? If they don't know the fact, is not that all the more reason for your telling them of it? You pointed away, as I warned you once, at the sins of which they are just as well aware as you, why on earth do you hold your tongue about the sins of which they are not aware? You tell us every Sunday that we do Heaven only knows how many more wrong things than we dream of. Tell it us again now. Don't strain at gnats like want of faith and resignation, and swallow such a cruel as twenty or thirty deaths. It's no concern of mine, I've seen plenty of people murdered, and may again. I am accustomed to it, but if it's not your concern, what on earth you are here for is more than I can tell.'

'You are right—you are right, but how to put it on religious grounds—'

Tom whistled again.

'If your doctrines cannot be made to fit such plain matters as twenty deaths, but per parum est. If they have nothing to say on such scientific facts, why, the facts must take care of themselves, and the doctrines may, for aught I care, go am!—But I won't be really rude. Only think over the matter if you are God's minister, you ought to have something to say about God's view of a fact which certainly involves the lives of His creatures, not by twos and threes, but by tens of thousands.'

So Frank went home, and thought it through, and went once and again to Thurnall, and condescended to ask his opinion of what he had said, and whether he said ill or well. What Thurnall answered was—'Whether that's sound Church doctrine is your business, but if it be, I'll say, with the man there in the Acts—what was his name? "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian".'

'Would God that you were one! for you would make a right good one.'

'Humph! at least you see what you can do, if you'll only face fact as it stands, and talk about the realities of life. I'll jaul your sermon beforehand, I assure you, and bring all I can to hear it.'

So Frank preached a noble sermon, most rational, and most spiritual withal, but he, too, like his tutor, took little by his auditors.

All the present fruit upon which he had to congratulate himself was, that the Brampton preacher denounced him in chapel next Sunday as a German Rationalist, who impudently pretended to explain away the Lord's visitation into a casual matter of drums, and pipes, and guses, and such like, and that his rival of another denomination, who was a fanatic on the tactical question, denounced him as bitterly for supporting the cause of drunkenness, by attributing cholera to want of cleanliness, while all rational people knew that its true source was intemperance. Poor Frank! he had preached against drunkenness many a time and oft, but because he would not add a Mohammedan church commandment to those ten which men already find difficult enough in keeping, he was set upon it once by a fanatic whose game it was—as it is that of too many—to subvert any reform, and muddy the spread of plain scientific truth, for the sake of pushing their own nostrum for all human ills.

In despair, Tom went off to Elsie Vavasour. Would he help? Would he join, as one of two householders, in making a representation to the proper authorities?

Elsley had never mixed in local matters, and if he had, he knew nothing of how to manage men, or to read an Act of Parliament, so, angry as Tom was inclined to be with him, he found it useless to quarrel with a man so utterly impractical, who would probably, had he been stirred into exertion, have done more harm than good.

'Only come with me, and satisfy yourself as to the existence of one of these nuisances, and then you will have grounds on which to go,' said Tom, who had still hopes of making a cat's paw of Elsie, and, by his power over him, pulling the strings from behind.

Sorely against his will, Elsie went, saw, and smelt, came home again, was very unwell, and was visited nightly for a week after by that most disgusting of all phantoms, salutary nightmare, which some who have worked in the foul places of the earth know but too well. Evidently his health could not stand it. There was no work to be got out of him in that direction.

'Would he write, then, and represent matters to Lord Southbush?'

How could he? He did not know the man, not a line had ever been exchanged between them. Their relations were so very peculiar. It would seem sheer impertinence on his part to interfere with the management of Lord Southbush's property. Really there was a great deal to be said, Tom felt, for poor Elsley's dislike of meddling in that quarter.

'Would Mrs. Vavasour write, then?'

'For Heaven's sake, do not mention it to her. She would be so terrified about the children, she is worn out with anxiety already,'—and so forth.

Tom went back to Frank Headley.

'You see a good deal of Miss St. Just?'

'I?—No—why?—what?' said poor Frank, blushing.

'Only that you must make her write to her brother about this cholera.'

'My dear fellow, it is such a subject for a lady to meddle with.'

'It has no scruple in meddling with ladies, so ladies ought to have none in meddling with it. You must do it as delicately as you will, but done it must be. It is our only chance. Tell her of Tardrew's obstinacy, or Southbush will go by his opinion, and tell her to keep the secret from her sister.'

Frank did it, and well. Valentin was horror-struck, and wrote.

Southbush was away at sea, nobody knew where, and a full fortnight elapsed before an answer came.

'My dear, you are quite mistaken if you think I can do anything. Nine-tenths of the houses in Albermarle are not in my hands, but copyholds and long leases, over which I have no power. If the people will complain to me of any given nuisance, I'll right it if I can, and if the doctor wants money, and sees any way of laying it out well, he shall have what he wants, though I am very high in Queer Street just now, ma'am, having paid your bills before I left town, like a good brother. But I tell you again, I have no more power than you have, except over a few cottages, and Tardrew assured me, three weeks ago, that they were as comfortable as they ever had been.'

So Tardrew had forestalled Thurnall in writing to the Viscount. Well, there was one more chance to be tried.

Tom gave his lecture in the schoolroom. He showed them magnified abominations enough to frighten all the children into fits, and dilated on horrors enough to spoil all appetites. He proved to them that, though they had the finest water in the world all over the town, they had contrived to poison almost every drop of it, he waxed eloquent, witty, sarcastic, and the net result was a general grumble.

'How did he get hold of all the specimens, as he calls them? What business has he poking his nose down people's wells and waterbutts?'

But an unexpected ally arose at this juncture, in the coastguard lieutenant, who, being valiant after his evening's brandy-and-water, rose and declared 'that Dr Thurnall was a very clever man, that by what he'd seen himself in the West Indies, it was all as true as gospel, that the parish might have the cholera if it liked,'—and here a few expletives occurred—but that he'd see that the coast-guard houses were put to rights at once, for he would not have the lives of Her Majesty's servants endangered by such dirty tricks, not fit for heathen savages,' etc. etc.

Tom struck while the iron was hot. He saw that the great man's speech had produced an impression.

'Would he' (so he asked the lieutenant privately), 'get some one to join him, and present a few of those nuisances?'

He would do anything in his contempt for 'a lot of long-shore merchant-skippers and herringers, who went about calling themselves captains, and fancy themselves, sir, as good as if they wore the Queen's uniform.'

'Well, then, can't we find another householder—some cantankerous dog who don't mind a row?'

Yes, the cantankerous dog was found, in the person of Mr John Penruddock, coal-merchant, who had quarrelled with Tardrew, because Tardrew said he gave short weight—which he very probably did—and had quarrelled also with Thomas Berr senior, ship-builder, about right of passage through a back-yard.

Mr Penruddock suddenly discovered that Mr Berr kept up a dirt-heap in the said back-yard, and with virulent indignation vowed 'he'd save the old beggar out at last.'

So far so good. The weapons of reason and righteousness having failed, Tom felt at liberty to borrow the devil's tools. Now to pack a vestry, and to nominate a local committee.

The vestry was packed, the committee nominated, of course half of them refused to act—they 'didn't want to go quarrelling with their neighbours.'

Tom explained to them cunningly and delicately that they would have nothing to do, that one or two (he did not say that he was the one, and the two also) would do all the work, and bear all the odium, whereas the malcontents subsided, considering it likely that, after all, nothing would be done.

Some may fancy that matters were now getting somewhat settled. Those who do so know little of the charming machinery of local governments. One man has 'summat to say,'—utterly irrelevant, another must needs answer him with something equally irrelevant, a long chatter ensues, in spite of all cries to order and question. Soon one and another gets personal, and temper shows here and there. You would fancy that the go-ahead party try to restore order, and help business on. Not in the least. They have begun to cool a little. They are a little afraid that they have committed themselves. If people quarrel with each other, perhaps they may quarrel with them too. And they begin to be wonderfully patient and impartial, in the hope of staving off the evil day, and finding some excuse for doing nothing after all. 'Hear 'mun out!' 'Vair and zoft, let ev'ry man ha' his zay!' 'There's vary gudo reason in it!' 'I dahn't think of that avore,—and so forth, till in a quaster of an hour the whole question has to be discussed over again, through the fog of a dozen fresh tales, and the miserable earnest man hurls himself considerably worse off than when he began. Happy for him if one chance word is not let drop which will afford the whole assembly an excuse for falling on him open-mouthed, as the custom of all their was! That chance word came. Mr. Penruddock gave a spiteful hit, being, as is said, in a tan tankerous turn, to Mr. Treuddra, principal powder, i.e. fish salesman, of Alcralva. Where on Treuddra, whose conscience told him that there was at present in his back yard a cart-load and more of fish in every stage of putrefaction, which he had kept rotting there rather than lower the market-price, rose in wrath.

'An' if any committee juts its nos into my back-yard, if it daunt get the biggest cod's innards as I can collar hold on about its ears, my nose is not Treuddra! A man's house is his castle, says I, and them as takes up with any o' this open-days lurgery, for it's nothing else, has to do wi' me, that's all, and them as knows their interest, knows me!'

Terrible were these words, for old Treuddra, like most powder, combined the profession of money-lender with that of salesman, and there were dozens in the place who were in debt to him for money advanced to buy bait and nets, after wreck and loss. Besides to offend one powder was to offend all. They combined to buy the fish at any price they chose. If angered, they would combine now and then not to buy it at all.

'You old twenty per cent rascal,' roared the lieutenant, 'after making a fortune out of these poor fellows' mishaps, do you want to poison em all with your stinking fish?'

'I say, lieutenant,' says old Beer, whose son owed Treuddra fifty pounds at that moment, 'fair's fair. You mind your coast-guard, and we'll mind our trade. We're free fishermen, by charter and right, you're not our master, and you shall know it.'

'Know it!' says the lieutenant, foaming.

'Iss, you put your head inside my presences, and I'll split 'mun open, if I be hanged for it!'

'You split my head open!'

'Iss, by —'. And the old gray-bearded sea king set his arms akimbo.

'Gentlemen, gentlemen, for Heaven's sake!' cries poor Headley, 'this is really going too far. Gentlemen, the vestry is adjourned!'

'Best thing too! oughtn't never to have been called,' says one and another.

And some one, as he went out, muttered something about 'interloping strange doctors, colloquies with popish curates' which was answered by a—'Put 'mun in the quay jule,' from Treuddra.

Tom stepped up to Treuddra instantly. 'What were you so kind as to say, sir?'

Treuddra turned very pale. 'I didn't say nought.'

'Oh, but I assure you I heard, and I shall be most happy to jump into the quay jule this afternoon, if it will afford you the slightest amusement. Say the word, and I'll borrow a flute, and play you the Roger's March all the while with my right hand, swimming with my left. Now, gentlemen, one word before we part!'

'Who be you?' cries some one.

'A man, at least, and ought to have a fair hearing. Now, I ask you, what possible interest can I have in this matter? I knew when I began that I should give myself a frightful quantity of trouble, and get only what I have got.'

'Why did you begin at all, then?'

'Because I was a very foolish, indolent ass, who fancied that I ought to do my duty once in a way by my neighbours. Now, I have only to say, that if you will but forgive and forget, and let bygones be bygones, I promise you solemnly, I'll never do my duty by you again as long as I live, nor interfere with the sacred privilege of every free-born Englishman, to do that which is right in the sight of his own eyes, and wrong too!'

'You're making fun at us,' said old Beer dubiously.

'Well, Mr. Beer, and isn't that better than quarrelling with you? Come along, we'll all go home and forget it, like good Christians. Perhaps the children won't come, and if it does, what's the odds so long as you're happy, eh?'

And to the intense astonishment both of the lieutenant and Frank, Tom walked home with the malcontents, making himself so agreeable that he was forgiven freely on the spot.

'What does the fellow mean? He's deserted us, sir, after bringing us here to make fools of us!'

Frank could give no answer, but Thimall gave one himself that evening, both to Frank and the lieutenant.

'The cholera will come, and these fellows are just mad, but I mustn't quarrel with them, mad or not.'

'Why, then?'

'For the same reason that you must not. If we keep our influence, we may be able to do some good at the last, which means, in plain English, saving a few human lives. As for you, lieutenant, you have behaved like a hero, and have been served as heroes generally are. What you must do is this. On the first hint of disease, pack up your traps and your good lady, and go and live in the watch-house across the river. As for the men's houses, I'll set them to rights in a day, if you'll get the commander of the district to allow you a little chloride of lime and whetwash.'

And he said, "Dorothea sends you these, out of the heavenly garden which she told you of, will you believe her now?" And then, before they could reply, he vanished away. And Theophilus looked at the flowers, and tasted the fruit, and a new heart grew up within him, and he said, "Dorothea's God shall be my God, and I will die for Him like her."

'So you see, darling, there are sweeter fruits than these, and gayer flowers, in the place to which you go, and all the lovely things in this world here will seem quite poor and worthless beside the glory of that better land which He will show you, and yet you will not care to look at them, for the sight of Him will be enough, and you will care to think of nothing else.'

'And you are sure He will accept me, after all?' asked the mock girl, opening her eyes, and looking up at Grace. 'She saw Him standing in the doorway, and gave a little scream.'

Tom came forward, bowing. 'I am very sorry to have disturbed you. I suspect Miss Harvey was giving you better medicine than I can give.'

Now why did Tom say that, to whom the legend of St. Dorothea, and, indeed, that whole belief in a better land, was as a dream fit only for girls?

Not altogether because he must needs say something civil. True, he felt, on the whole, about the future state as Goethe did—'To the able man this world is too dumb, why should he run off into eternity?' Such incomprehensible subjects he too far off, and only disturb our thoughts, if made the subject of daily meditation. That there was a future state he had no doubt. Our having been born once, he used to say, is the strongest possible presumption in favour of our being born again, and probably, as nature always works upward and develops higher forms, in some higher state. Indeed, for aught he knew, the old ichthyosaurs and plesiosaurs might be alive now as lions, or as men. He himself, indeed, he had said, ere now had been probably a pterodactyl of the Liass, neither fish, flesh, nor good red herring, but crocodile and bat in one, able alike to swim, or run, or fly, eat anything, and live in any element. Still it was no concern of his. He was here, and here was his business. He had not thought of this life before he came into it, and it would be time enough to think of the next life when he got into it. Besides, he had all a doctor's dislike of those terrors of the unseen world with which some men are wont to oppress still more failing nature, and break the bruised reed. His business was to cure his patients' bodies, and if he could not do that, at least to see that life was not shortened in them by nervous depression and anxiety. Accustomed to see men of every character die under every possible circumstance, he had come to the conclusion that the 'safety of a man's soul' could by no possibility be inferred from his death-bed temper. The vast majority, good or bad, died in peace, why not let them die so? If nature kindly took off the edge of sorrow, by blunting the nervous system, what right had man to interfere with so merciful an arrangement? Every man, he held in his easy optimism, would go where he ought to go, and it could be no possible good to him—indeed, it might be a very bad thing for him, as in this life—to go where he ought not to go. So he used to argue, with three-fourths of mankind, mingling truth and falsehood, and would on these grounds have done his best to turn the dissenting preacher out of that house, had he found him in it. But to-day he was in a more lenient, perhaps in a more human, and therefore more spiritual mood. It was all very well for him, full of life, and power, and hope, to look on death in that cold, careless way, but for that poor young thing, cut off just as life opened from all that made life lovely—was not death for her a painful, ugly anomaly? Could she be blamed, if she shuddered at going forth into the unknown blank, she knew not whither? All very well for the old emperor of Rome, who had lived his life and done his work, to play with the dreary question—

'Annulla, vana, blanda,
Hopes consueque corporis,
Qua nunc abibis in loca,
Ignota, nulla, pallida?'

But she, who had lived no life, and done no work—only had passed through weary years of hideous suffering, crippled and ulcerated with scrofula, now dying of consumption, was it not a merciful dream, a beautiful dream, a just dream so beautiful and just that perhaps it might be true that in some far-off world, all this, and more, might be made up to her? If not, was it not a mistake and an injustice that she should ever have come into the world at all? And was not Grace doing a rational as well as a loving work, in telling her, under whatever symbols, that such a home of rest and beauty awaited her? It was not the sort of place to which he expected, perhaps even wished, to go, but it fitted well enough with a young girl's hopes, a young girl's powers of enjoyment. Let it be, perhaps there was such a place—why not?—fitted for St. Dorothea, and those cut off in youth like her, and other places fit for such as he. And he spoke more tenderly than usual (though he was never untender), as he said—

'And you feel better to-day? I am sure you must, with such a kind friend to tell you such sweet tales.'

'I do not feel better, thank you. And why should I wish to do so? You all take too much trouble about me, why do you want to keep me here?'

'We are loth to lose you, and besides, while you can be kept here, it is a sign that you ought to be here.'

'So Grace tells me. Yes, I will be patient, and wait till He has done His work. I am more patient now, am I not, Grace?' And she fondled Grace's hand, and looked up in her face.

'Yes,' said Grace, who was standing near, with downcast face, trying to avoid Tom's eye.

'Yes, you are very good, but you must not talk,' but the girl went on, with kindling eye—

'Ah! I was very fretful at first, because I could not go to Heaven at once, but Grace showed me how it was good to be here, as well as there, as long as He thought that I might be made perfect by sufferings. And since then my pain has become quite pleasant to me, and I am ready to wait and bear—wait and hear.'

'You must not talk, see, you are beginning to cough,' said Tom, who wished somehow to stop a form of thought which so utterly puzzled him. Not that he had not heard it before, commonplace enough indeed it is, thank God, but that day the words came home to him with spirit and power, all the more solemnly from their contrast with the scene around without, all sunshine, joy, and glory, all which could tempt a human being to linger here, and within, that young girl longing to leave it all, and yet content to stay and suffer. What mysteries there were in the human spirit—mysteries to which that knowledge of mankind on which he prided himself gave him no key.

'What if I were laid on my back to-morrow for life, by a fall, a blow, as I have seen many a better man than me, should I not wish to have one to talk to me, as she was talking to that child?' And for a moment a yearning after Grace came over him, as it had done before, and swept from his mind the dark cloud of suspicion.

'Now I must talk with your mother,' said he, 'for you have better company than mine, and I hear her just coming in.'

He settled little matters for his patient's comfort with the farmer's wife. When he returned to find her good-bye Grace was gone.

'I hope I have not driven her away.'

'Oh no, she had been here an hour, and she must go back now, to get her mother's supper.'

'That is a good girl,' said Tom, looking after her as she went down the field.

'She's an angel from Heaven, sir. Not a three days go over without her walking up here all this way after her work to comfort my poor maid, and all of us as well. It's like the dew of heaven upon us. Fity, sir, you didn't see her home.'

'I should have liked it well enough, but folks might talk, if two young people were seen walking together Sunday evening.'

'Oh, sir, they know her too well by now for miles round, and you too, sir, I'll make bold to say.'

'Well, at least I'll go after her.'

So Tom went and kept Grace in sight till she had crossed the little moor, and disappeared in the wood below.

He had gone about a hundred yards into the wood, when he heard voices and laughter, then a loud shriek. He hurried forward. In another minute, Grace rushed up to him; her eyes wide with terror and indignation.

'What is it?' cried he, trying to stop her, but, not seeming to see him, she dashed past him, and ran on. Another moment and a man appeared in full pursuit.

It was Trebooz, of Trebooze, an evil laugh upon his face.

Tom planted himself across the narrow path in an attitude which there was no mistaking.

Not a word passed between them. Silently and instinctively, like two fierce dogs, the two men flew upon each other, Tom full of righteous wrath, and Trebooz of half drunken passion, turned to fury by the interruption.

He was a far taller and heavier man than Thurnall, and, as the bully of the neighbourhood, counted on an easy victory. But he was mistaken. After the first rush was over, he found it impossible to close with his foe, and saw in the doctor's face, now grown cool and business-like as usual, the wily smile of superior science and expected triumph.

'Brandy and water in the morning ought not to improve the wind,' said Tom to himself, as his left hand countered provokingly, while his right rattled again and again upon Trebooz's watch-chain. 'Justice will overtake you in the offending part, which I take to be the epigastric region.'

In a few minutes more the scuffle ended shamefully enough for the sottish squireen.

Tom stood over him for a minute, as he sat grovelling and groaning among the long grass.

'I may as well see that I have not killed him. No, he will do as well as ever—which is not saying much. . . . Now, sir! Go home quietly, and ask Mrs. Trebooz for a little rhubarb and salvolatile. I'll call up in the course of to-morrow to see how you are.'

'I'll kill you if I catch you!'

'As a man, I am open of course to be killed by any fair means; but as a doctor, I am still bound to see after my patient's health.' And Tom bowed civilly, and walked back up the path to find Grace, after washing face and hands in the brook.

He found her up at Tolehard's farm, trembling and thankful.

'I cannot do less than see Miss Harvey safe home.'

Grace hesitated.

'Mrs. Tolehard, I am sure, will walk with us, it would be safer, in case you felt faint again.'

But Mrs. Tolehard would not come to save Grace's notions of propriety, so Tom passed Grace's arm through his own. She offered to withdraw it.

'No, you will require it. You do not know yet how much you have gone through. My fear is, that you will feel it all the more painfully when the excitement is just. I shall send you up a cordial, and you must promise me to take it. You owe me a little debt, you know, to-day, you must pay it by taking my medicines.'

Grace looked up at him adoringly, for there was a playful tenderness in his voice which was new to her, and which thrilled her through and through.

'I will indeed, I promise you. But I am so much better now. Really, I can walk alone!" And she withdrew her arm from his, but not hastily.

After that they walked on a while in silence. Grace kept her veil down, for her eyes were full of tears. She loved that man intensely, utterly. She did not seek to deny it to herself. God had given him to her, and here he was. The very sea, the devourer whom she hated, who hungered to swallow up all young fair life, the very sea had yielded him up to her, alive from the dead. And yet that man, she knew, suspected her of a base and hateful crime. It was too dreadful! She could not exculpate herself, save by blank denial and what would that avail? The large hot drops ran down her cheeks. She had need of all her strength to prevent sobbing.

She looked round. In the bright summer evening, all things were full of joy and love. The hedge-banks were gay as flower gardens, the swills chased each other, screaming harsh delight, the ring-dove murmured in the wood beneath his world-old song, which she had taught the children a hundred times.

Curiously, curiously,
You love me, and I love you."

The woods slept golden in the evening sunlight, and overhead brooded, like one great smile of God, the everlasting blue.

"He will light me," she said. "Hold thee still in the Lord, and abide patiently, and He will make thy righteousness clear as the light, and thy just dealing as the noon day!" And after that thought she wept no more.

Was it as a reward for her faith that Tom began to talk to her? He had gazed on by her side, serious, but not sad. True, he had suspected her, he suspected her still. But that scene with the flying child had been so shaming. There, at least, there was nothing to suspect, nothing to sneer at. The calm purity, self-sacrifice, hope, which was contained in it, had softened his world-hardened spirit, and woke up in him feelings which were always pleasant, feelings which the sight of his father, or the writing to his father, could only awaken. Quietly enough, the thought of Grace and of his father seemed intertwined, inextinguishable. If the old man had but such a nurse as she! And for a moment he felt a glow of tenderness toward her, because he thought she would be tender to his father. She had stolen his money, certainly, or, if not, she knew where it was, and would not tell him. Well, what matter just then? He did not want the money at that minute. How much pleasanter and wiser to take things as they came, and enjoy himself while he could, and fancy that she was always what he had seen her that day. After all, it was much more pleasant to trust people than to suspect them.

"Handsome is who handsome does!" And besides, she did me the kindness of saving my life, so it would but be civil to talk to her a little.

He began to talk to her about the lovely scenes around, and found, to his surprise, that she saw as much of it as he, and saw a great deal more in it than he. Her answers were short, modest, faltering, but each one of them suggestive, and Tom soon found that he had met with a mind which contained all the elements of poetry, and needed only education to develop them.

"What a blood-stocking, pre-Raphaelite, seventh-heaven man she would have been, if she had had the misfortune to be born in that station of life!" But where a clever man is talking to a beautiful woman, talk he will, and must, for the mere sake of showing off, though she be but a village schoolmistress, and Tom soon found himself, with a secret sneer at his own vanity, displaying before her all the much finer things that he had seen in his travels, and as he talked, she answered, with quiet expressions of wonder, sympathy, regret at her own narrow sphere of experience, till, as if the truth was not enough, he found himself running to the very edge of exaggeration, and a little over it in the enjoyment of calling out her passion for the marvellous, especially when called out in honour of himself.

And she, simple creature, drank it all in as sparkling wine, and only dreaded lest the stream should cease. Adventures with noble savages in palm fringed coral islands, with greedy robbers and the finger-hills of Greece, with fierce Indians beneath the snow peaks of the Far West, with coward Mexicans among tumors of cactus and agave, beneath the burning tropic sun. What a man he was! Where had he not been? and what had he not seen? And how he had been preserved for her! And his image seemed to her utterly beautiful and glorious, clothed as it was in the beauty and glory of all that he had seen, and done, and suffered. O Love, Love, Love, the same in peasant and in peer! The more honour to you, then, old Love, to be the same thing in the world which is common to peasant and to peer. They say that you are blind, a deceiver, an exaggerator, a liar, in short. They know just nothing about you, then. You will not see people as they seem, and as they have become, no doubt, but why? because you see them as they ought to be, and are, in some deep way, eternally, in the sight of Him who conceived and created them.

At last she started, as if waking from a pleasant dream, and spoke, half to herself.

"Oh, how foolish of me—to be idling away this opportunity, the only one, perhaps, which I may have! Oh, Mr. Thurnall, tell me about this cholera!"

"What about it?"

"Everything. Ever since I heard of what you have been saying to the people, ever since Mr. Headley's sermon, it has been like fire in my ears!"

"I am truly glad to hear it. If all parsons had preached about it for the last fifteen years as Mr. Headley did last Sunday, if they had told people plainly that, if the cholera was God's judgment at all, it was His judgment of the sin of dirt, and that the repentance which He required was to wash—and be clean in literal earnest, the cholera would be impossible in England by now.

'Oh, Mr Thurnall but is it not God's doing? and can we stop His hand?'

'I know nothing about that, Miss Harvey. I only know that wheresoever cholera breaks out, it is some one's fault and if deaths occur, some one ought to be tried for manslaughter—I had almost said murder—and transported for life.'

'Some one! Who?'

'That will be settled in the next generation, when men have common sense enough to make laws for the preservation of their own lives, against the dirt, and covetousness, and idleness of a set of human hogs.'

Grace was silent for a while.

'But can nothing be done to keep it off now? Must it come?'

'I believe it must. Still, one may do enough to save many lives in the meanwhile.'

'Enough to save many lives—lives!—immortal souls, too! Oh, what could I do?'

'A great deal, Miss Harvey,' said Tom, across whom the recollection of Grace's influence flashed for the first time. What a help she might be to him!

And he talked on and on to her, and found that she entered into his plans with all her wild enthusiasm, but also with sound practical common sense, and Tom began to respect her intellect as well as her heart.

At last, however, she faltered.

'Oh, if I could but believe all this! Is it not fighting against God?'

'I do not know what sort of God yours is, Miss Harvey. I believe in some One who made all that!' and he pointed round him to the glorious woods and glorious sky, 'I should have fancied from your speech to that poor girl, that you believed in Him also. You may, however, only believe in the same being in whom the Methodist parson believes; one who intends to hurl into endless agony every human being who has not had a chance of hearing the said preacher's nostrum for delivering men out of the hands of Him who made them!'

'What do you mean?' asked Grace, startled alike by Tom's words, and the intense scorn and bitterness of his tone.

'That matters little. What do you mean in turn? What did you mean by saying that saving lives is saving immortal souls?'

'Oh, is it not giving them time to repent? What will become of them, if they are cut off in the midst of their sins?'

'If you had a son whom it was not convenient to you to keep at home, would his being a bad fellow—the greatest scoundrel on the earth—be a reason for your turning him into the streets to live by thieving, and end by going to the dogs for ever and a day?'

'No, but what do you mean?'

'That I do not think that God, when He sends a human being out of this world, is more cruel than you or I would be. If we transport a man because he is too bad to be in England, and he shows any signs of mending, we give him a fresh chance in the colonies, and let him start again, to try if he cannot do better next time. And do you fancy that God, when He transports a man out of this world, never gives him a fresh chance in another—especially when one out of ten poor rascals have never had a fair chance yet?'

Grace looked up in his face astonished.

'Oh, if I could but believe that! Oh! it would give me some gleam of hope for my two —' But no—it's not in Scripture. Where the tree falls there it lies.'

'And as the fool dies, so dies the wise man, and there is one account to the righteous and to the wicked. And a man has no pre-eminence over a beast, for both turn alike to dust, and Solomon does not know, he says, or any one else, anything about the whole matter, or even whether there be any life after death at all, and so, he says, the only wise thing is to leave such deep questions alone, for Him who made us to settle in His own way, and just to fear God and keep His commandments, and do the work which lies nearest us with all our might.'

Grace was silent.

'You are surprised to hear me quote Scripture, and well you may be—but that same Book of Ecclesiastes is a very old favourite with me, for I am no Christian, but a worldling, if ever there was one. But it does puzzle me why you, who are a Christian, should talk one half-hour as you have been talking to that poor girl, and the next go for information about the next life to poor old disappointed, broken-hearted Solomon, with his three hundred and odd idolatrous wives, who confesses fairly that this life is a failure, and that he does not know whether there is any next life at all.'

Whether Tom were altogether right or not, is not the question here, the novelist's business is to represent the real thoughts of mankind, when they are not absolutely unfit to be told, and certainly Tom spoke the doubts of thousands when he spoke his own.

Grace was silent still.

'Well,' he said, 'beyond that I can't go, being no theologian. But when a preacher tells people in one breath of a God who so loves men that He gave His own Son to save them, and in the next that the same God so hates men that He will cast nine-tenths of them into hopeless torture for ever (and if that is not hating, I don't know what is), unless he, the preacher, gets a chance of talking to them for a few minutes—Why, I should like, Miss Harvey, to put that gentleman upon a real fire for ten minutes, instead of his comfortable Sunday's dinner, which stands ready frying for him, and which he was going home to eat, as jolly as if all the world was not going to destruction, and there let him feel what fire was like, and reconsider his statements.'

suspicion, of which she had spoken! There was no harm in asking.

'But, Grace—Miss Harvey—You will not be angry with me if I ask? Why speak so often, as if finding this money depended on you alone? You wish me to recover it, I know, and if you can counsel me, why not do so? Why not tell me whom you suspect?'

Her old wild terror returned in an instant. She stopped short—

'Suspect? I suspect! Oh, I have suspected too many already! Suspected till I began to hate my fellow-creatures—hate life itself, when I fancied that I saw "thief" written on every forehead. Oh, do not ask me to suspect any more!'

Tom was silent.

'Oh,' she cried, after a moment's pause. 'Oh, that we were back in those old times I have read of, when they used to put people to the torture to make them confess!'

'Why, in Heaven's name?'

'Because then I should have been tortured, and have confessed it, true or false, in the agony, and have been hanged. They used to hang them then, and put them out of their misery, and I should have been put out of mine, and no one have been blamed but me for evermore.'

'You forget,' said Tom, lost in wonder, 'that then I should have blamed you, as well as every one else.'

'True, yes, it was a foolish faithless word I did not take it, and it would have been no good to my soul to say I did. Lies cannot prosper, cannot prosper, Mr Thurnall!' and she stopped short again.

'What, my dear Grace?' said he, kindly enough, for he began to fear that she was losing her wits.

'I saved your life!'

'You did, Grace.'

'Then, I never thought to ask for payment. But, oh, I must now. Will you promise me one thing in return?'

'What you will, as I am a man and a gentleman, I can trust you to ask nothing which is not worthy of you.'

Tom spoke truth. He felt,—perhaps love made him feel it all the more easily,—that whatever was behind, he was safe in that woman's hands.

'Then promise me that you will wait one month, only one month, ask no questions, mention nothing to any living soul! And if, before that time, I do not bring you that belt back, send me to Bodmin gaol, and let me bear my punishment.'

'I promise,' said Tom. And the two walked on again in silence, till they neared the head of the village.

Then Grace went forward, like Nausicaa when she left Ulysses, lest the townsfolk should talk, and Tom sat down upon a bank and watched her figure vanishing in the dusk.

Much he puzzled, hunting up and down in his cunning head for an explanation of the mystery. At last he found one which seemed to fit the facts so well, that he rose with a whistle of satisfaction, and walked homewards.

Evidently, her mother had stolen the belt, and Grace was, if not a repentant accomplice—for that he could not believe—at least aware of the fact.

'Well, it is a hard knot for her to untie, poor child, and on the strength of having saved my life, she shall untie it her own way. I can wait. I hope the money won't be spent meanwhile, though, and the empty leather returned to me when wanted no longer. However, that's done already, if done at all. I was a fool for not acting at once, a double fool for suspecting her! As that I was, to take up with a false scent, and throw myself off the true one! My everlasting unbelief in people has punished itself this time. I might have got a search-warrant three months ago, and had that old watch safe in the bulboes. But no—I might not have found it, after all, and there would have been only an esculandre, and if I knew that girl's heart, she would have been ten times more miserable for her mother than for herself, so it's as well as it is. Besides, it's really good fun to watch how such a pretty plot will work itself out, as good as a pack of harriers with a cold scent and a squatted hare. So, live and let live. Only, Thomas Thurnall, if you go for to come for to go for to make such an abominable ass of yourself with that young lady any more, like a miserable schoolboy, you will be pleased to make tracks, and vanish out of these parts for ever. For my purse can't afford to have you marrying a schoolmistress in your impoverished old age, and my character, which also is my purse, can't afford worse.'

One word of Grace's had fixed itself in Tom's memory. What did she mean by 'her two'?

He continued to ask Willis that very evening. 'Oh, don't you know, sir? She had a young brother drowned, a long while ago, when she was sixteen or so. He went out bathing on the Sabbath, with another like him, and both were swamped. Wild young lads, both, as lads will be. But she, sweet maid, took it so to heart, that she never held up her head since, nor will, I think at times, to her dying day.'

'Humph! Was she fond of the other lad, then?'

'Sir,' said Willis, 'I don't think it's fair like—not decent, if you'll excuse an old sailor—to talk about young maids' affairs, that they wouldn't talk of themselves, perhaps not even to themselves. So I never asked any questions myself.'

'And think it rude in me to ask any. Well, I believe you're right, good old gentleman that you are. What a nobleman you'd have made, if you had had the luck to have been born in that station of life!'

'I have found too much trouble, in doing my duty in my humble place, to wish to be in any higher one.'

'So!' thought Tom to himself, 'a girl's fancy but it explains so much in the character, especially when the temperament is melancholic. However, to quote Solomon once more, "A live dog is better than a dead lion", and I have not much to fear from a rival who has been washed out of this world ten years since. Heyday! Rival! quotha? Tom Thurnall, you are going to make a fool of yourself. You must go, sir. I warn you, you must flee, for you have recovered your senses."

There appeared next morning in Tom's shop a new phenomenon. A smart youth, dressed in what he considered to be the newest London fashion, but which was really that translation of last year's fashion which happened to be current in the windows of the Bodinn tailors. Tom knew him by sight and name—one Mr. Creed, a squireen like Trebooze, and an especial friend of Trebooze's, under whose tutelage he had learned to smoke cavendish assiduously from the age of fifteen, thereby improving neither his stature nor his digestion, his nerves nor the intelligence of his countenance.

He entered with a lofty air, and paused awhile as he spoke.

"Is it possible," said Tom to himself, "that Trebooze has sent me a challenge? It would be too good fun. I'll wait and see." So he went on rolling jills.

"I say, sir," quoth the youth, who had determined, as an owner of land, to treat the doctor duly de haut en bas, and had a vague notion that a liberal use of the word "sir" would both help thereto, and be consonant with professional style of duel diplomacy, whereof he had read in novels.

Tom turned slowly, and then took a long look at him over the counter through half-shut eyelids, with chin upraised, as if he had been suddenly afflicted with short sight, and worked on meanwhile steadily at his jills.

"That is, I wish—to speak to you, sir—ahem!"—went on Mr. Creed, being gradually but surely discomfited by Tom's steady gaze.

"Don't trouble yourself, sir. I see your case in your face. A slight nervous affection—will pass as the digestion improves. I will make you up a set of jills for the night, but I should advise a little ammonia and valerian at once. May I mix it?"

"Sir! you mistake me, sir."

"Not in the least, you have brought me a challenge from Mr. Trebooze."

"I have, sir!" said the youth, with a grand air, at once relieved by having the awful words said for him, and exalted by the dignity of his first, and perhaps last employment in that line.

"Well, sir," said Tom deliberately, "Mr. Trebooze does me a kindness for which I cannot sufficiently thank him, and you also, as his second. It is full six months since I fought, and I was getting hardly to know myself again."

"You will have to fight now, sir!" said the youth, trying to brazen off by his discourtesy increasing suspicion that he had "caught a Tartar."

"Of course, of course. And of course, too, I fight you afterwards."

"I—I, sir? I am Mr. Trebooze's friend, his second, sir. You do not seem to understand, sir!"

"Parlon me, young gentleman," said Tom, in a very quiet, determined voice. "It is I who have a right to tell you that you do not understand in such matters as these. I had fought my man, and more than one of them, while you were eating blackberries in a short jacket."

"What do you mean, sir?" quoth the youth in fury, and began swearing a little.

"Simple fact. Are you not about twenty-three years old?"

"What is that to you, sir?"

"No business of mine, of course. You may be growing into your second childhood for aught I care. But if, as I guess, you are about twenty-three, I, as I know, am thirty-six. Then I fought my first duel when you were five years old, and my tenth, I should say, when you were fifteen, at which time, I suppose, you were not advanced either of the jacket or the blackberries."

"You will find me a man now, sir, at all events," said Creed, justly wrath at what was, after all, a sophism, for if a man is not a man at twenty, he never will be one.

"Tout mure. You know, I suppose, that as the challenged, I have the choice of weapons?"

"Of course, sir," said Creed, in an off-hand generous tone, because he did not very clearly know.

"Then, sir, I always fight across a handkerchief. You will tell Mr. Trebooze so, he is, I really believe, a brave man, and will accept the terms. You will tell yourself the same, whether you be a brave man or not."

"The youth lost the last words in those which went before them. He was no coward would have stood up to be shot at, at fifteen paces, like any one else, but the deliberate butchery of fighting across a handkerchief—

"Do I understand you, sir?"

"That depends on whether you are clever enough, or not, to comprehend your native tongue. Across a handkerchief, I say, do you hear that?" And Tom rolled on at his jills.

"I do."

"And when I have fought him, I fight you!" And the jills rolled steadily at the same pace.

"But—sir? Why—sir?"

"Because," said Tom, looking him full in the face, "because you, calling yourself a gentleman, and being more shame for you, one by birth, dare to come here, for a foolish vulgar superstition called honour, to ask me, a quiet medical man, to go and be shot at by a man whom you know to be a drunken, profligate blackguard, simply because, as you know as well as I, I interfered to prevent his insulting a poor helpless girl, and in so doing, was forced to give him what you, if you are (as I believe) a gentleman, would have given him also, in my place."

"I don't understand you, sir!" said the lad, blushing all the while, as one honestly conscience stricken, for Tom had spoken the exact truth, and he knew it.

'Don't lie, sir, and tell me that you don't understand, you understand every word which I have spoken, and you know that it is true.'

'Liar!'

'Yes, lie. Look you, sir, I have no wish to fight—'

'You will fight, though whether you wish it or not,' said the youth with a hysterical laugh, 'meant to be defiant.'

'But I can sniff a candle, I can split a bullet on a penknife at fifteen paces.'

'Do you mean to frighten us by boasting? We shall see what you can do when you come on the ground!'

'Across a handkerchief, but on no other condition, and, unless you will accept that condition, I will assuredly, the next time I see you, be where we may, treat you as I treated your friend Mr Trebooz. I'll do it now! Get out of my shop, sir! What do you want here, interfering with my honest business?'

And, to the astonishment of Mr Trebooz's second, Tom vaulted clean over the counter, and rushed at him open mouthed.

Sacred be the honour of the gallant West country, but, 'both being friends,' as Aristotle has it, 'it is a sacred duty to speak the truth.' Mr Creed vanished through the open door.

'I rid myself of the fellow jollily,' said Tom to Frank that day, after telling him the whole story. 'And no credit to me. I saw from the minute he came in there was no fight in him.'

'But suppose he had accepted on suppose Trebooz accepts still?'

'There was my game—to frighten him. He'll take care Trebooz shan't fight, for he knows that he must fight next. He'll go home and patch the matter up, trust him. Meanwhile, the cat had not even savour faire enough to ask for my second. Lucky for me, for I don't know where to have found one, save the lieutenant, and though he would have gone out safe enough, it would have been a bore for the good old fellow.'

'And,' said Frank, utterly taken aback by Tom's business-like levity, 'you would actually have stood to shoot, and be shot at, across a handkerchief?'

Tom stuck out his great chin, and looked at him with one of his quaint sidelong mones.

'You are my very good friend, sir, but not my father-confessor.'

'I know that, but really—as a mere question of human curiosity—'

'Oh, if you ask me on the human ground, and not on the sacerdotal, I'll tell you. I've tried it twice, and I should be sorry to try it again, though it's a very easy dodge. Keep your right elbow up—up to your ear—and the moment you hear the word, fire. A high elbow and a cool heart—that's all, and that wins.'

'Wins? Good heavens! As you are here alive you must have killed your man?'

'No. I only shot my men each through the body, and each of them deserved it, but it is an ugly chance, I should have been sorry to try it on that yokel. The boy may make a man yet. And what's more,' said Tom, bursting into a great laugh, 'he will make a man, and go down to his fathers in peace, quant à moi, and so will that wretched Trebooz. For I'll bet you my head to a China orange, I hear no more of this matter, and don't even lose Trebooz's custody.'

'Upon my word, I envy your sanguine temperament!'

'Mr Headley, I shall quietly make my call at Trebooz's to-morrow, as if nothing had happened. What will you bet me that I am not received as usual?'

'I never bet,' said Frank.

'Then you do well. It is a foolish and a dirty trick, playing with edge tools, and cutting one's own fingers. Nevertheless, I speak truth, as you will see.'

'You are a most extraordinary man. All this is so contrary to your usual caution.'

'When you are driven against the ropes, "hit out" is the old rule of Fustiana and common sense. It is an extreme bore, all the more reason for showing such an ugly front as to give people no chance of its happening again. Nothing so dangerous as half measures, Headley. "Resist the devil and he will flee from you," your creed says. Mine only translates it into practice.'

'I have no liking for half-measures myself.'

'Dul you ever,' said Tom, 'hear the story of the two Sandhurst broomsquires?'

'Broomsquires?'

'So we call, in Berkshire, squatters on the moor who live by tying heath into brooms. Two of them met in Reading market once, and fell out—'

'How ever do you manage to sell your brooms for three halfpence? I steal the heath, and I steal the binds, and I steal the handles, and yet I can't afford to sell them under two pence.'

'Ah, but you see,' says the other, 'I steal mine ready made.'

'Moral. If you're going to do a thing, do it outright.'

That very evening, Tom came in again.

'Well, I've been to Trebooz.'

'And fared how?'

'Just as I warned you. Inquired into his symptoms, prescribed for his digestion—if he goes on as he is doing, he will soon have none left to prescribe for, and finally, plastered, with a sublime generosity, the nose which my own knuckles had contused.'

'Impossible! you are the most miraculously impudent of men!'

'Fish! simple common sense. I know that Mrs Trebooz would suspect that the world had heard of his mishap, and took care to let her know that I knew, by coming up to inquire for him.'

'Cui bono?'

'Power To have them, or any one, a little more in my power. Next I knew that he dared not fly out at me, for fear I should tell Mrs. Treboozie what he had been after—you see? Ah, it was delicious to have the great oaf sitting sulking under my fingers, longing to knock my head off, and I plastering away, with words of deepest astonishment and cordialence. I venily believe that, before we parted, I had persuaded him that his black eye proceeded entirely from his having run up against a tree in the dark.'

'Well,' said Frank, half sadly, though enjoying the joke in spite of himself, 'I cannot help thinking it would have been a fit moment for giving the poor wretch a more solemn lesson.'

'My dear son—a good licking—and he had one, and something over—is the best lesson for that manner of humped. That's the way to school him, but as we are on lessons, I'll give you a hint.'

'Go on, model of self-sufficiency!' said Frank.

'Scull at me if you will, I am proud. But hearken—you mustn't turn out that school mistress. She's an angel, and I know it, and if I say so of any human being, you may believe I have pretty good reasons.'

'I am beginning to be of your mind myself,' said Frank.

CHAPTER XV

THE CRUISE OF THE 'WATERWITCH'

'The middle of August is come at last, and with it the solemn day on which Frederick Viscount Scouthush may be expected to revisit the home of his ancestors. Elsley has gradually made up his mind to the inevitable, with a stately sulkingness—and comforts himself, as the time draws near, with the thought that, after all, his brother-in-law is not a very formidable personage.'

But to the population of Aberlva in general, the coming event is one of awful jubilation. The shipping is all decked with flags, and the Sunday clothes have been looked out, and many a yard of new ribbon and pound of bad powder bought, there have been arrangements for a procession, which could not be got up, for a speech which nobody would undertake to pronounce, and, lastly, for a dinner, about which last there was no hanging back. Yes, also, they have hired from Cararrow Churchtown sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, and all kinds of music, for Frank has put down the old choir band at Aberlva—another of his mistakes—and there is but one fiddle and a clarionet now left in the town. So the said town waits all the day on tiptoe, ready to worship, till out of the soft brown haze the stately Waterwitch comes sliding in, like a white ghost, to fold her wings in Aberlva Bay.

And at that sight the town is all astir. Fishermen shake themselves up out of their mid-day snooze, to admire the beauty, as she slips on and on through water smooth as glass, her hull hidden by the vast curve of the balloon-jib, and her broad wings boomed out aloof and aloft, till it seems marvellous how that vast screen does not topple headlong, instead of floating (as it seems) self-supporting above its image in the mirror. Women hurry to put on their best bonnets, the sexton toddles up with the church key in his hand, and the ringers at his heels, the coast guard lieutenant bustles down to the Manby's mortar, which he has hauled out in readiness on the pebbles. Old Willis hoists a flag before his house, and half a dozen merchant skippers do the same. Bang goes the harmless mortar, humming the British nation's powder without leave or licence, and all the rocks and woods catch up the echo, and kick it from cliff to cliff, playing at football with it till its wrath is beaten out, a rolling fire of old muskets and bird-pieces crackles along the shore, and in five minutes a puff of hot blast has blown a rumour through his hand. Never mind, lords do not visit Penlva every day. Out burst the bells above with merry peal, Lord Scouthush and the Waterwitch are duly 'rung in' to the home of his lordship's ancestors, and he is received, as he scrambles up the four steps from his boat, by the mate, the churchwardens, the lieutenant, and old Tardw, huddled by half a dozen ancient sons of Anak, lineal descendants of the free fishermen to whom, six hundred years before, St. Just of Penlva did grant privileges hard to spell, and harder to understand, on the condition of receiving whosoever he should land at the quay head, three brass bathtubs from the 'free fishermen of Aberlva.'

Scouthush shakes hands with curate, lieutenant, Tardw's churchwardens, and then comes forward the three farthings, in an ancient leather purse.

'Hope your lordship will do us the honour to shake hands with us too, we are your lordship's free fishermen, as we have been your father's,' says a magnificent old man, gravely acknowledging the feudal tie, while he claims the exemption.

Little Scouthush, who is the kindest-hearted of men, clasps the great brown fist in his little white one, and shakes hands heartily with every one of them, saying, 'If your forefathers were as much taller than mine, as you are than me, gentlemen, I shouldn't wonder if they took their own freedom, without asking his leave for it!'

A lord who begins his progress with a jest! That is the sort of ancestor to rule in Aberlva! And all agree that evening, at the Mariner's Rest, that his lordship is as nice a young gentleman as ever trod deck board, and deserves such a yacht as he's got, and long may he sail her!

How easy it is to buy the love of men! Gold will not do it, but there is a little angel, may be, in the corner of every man's eye, who is worth more than gold, and can do it free of all charges unless a man drives him out, and 'hates his brother, and so walks in darkness, not knowing whither he goeth,' but running full butt against men's prejudices, and treading on their corns, till they knock him down in despair—and all just because he will not open his eyes, and use the light which comes by common human good-nature!

Presently Tom hurries up, having been originally one of the deputation, but kept by the necessity of binding up the three fingers which the ramrod had spared to poor Jom Burinan's hand. He bows, and the lieutenant—who (Frank being a little shy) acts as her Majesty's representative—introduces him as 'deputy medical man to our district of the Union, sir—Mr Thurnall.'

'Dr. Heale was to have been here, by the bye. Where is Doctor Heale?' says some one.

'Very sorry, my lord, I can answer for him—professional calls, I don't doubt—nobody more devoted to your lordship.'

One need not inquire where Dr. Heale was, but if elderly men will drink much brandy-and-water in hot summer days, after a heavy early dinner, then will those men be too late for deputations and for more important employments.

'Never mind the doctor, darsay he's asleep after dinner do him good!' says the Viscount, hitting the mark with a random shot, and thereby raising his repute for sagacity immensely with his audience, who laugh outright.

'Ah! Is it so, then? But—Mr Thurnall, I think, you said?—I am glad to make your acquaintance, sir. I have heard your name often: you are my friend Mellot's old friend, are you not?'

'I am a very old friend of Claudio Mellot's.'

'Well, and there he is on board, and will be delighted to do the honours of my yacht to you whenever you like to visit her. You and I must know each other better, sir.'

Tom bows low—his lordship does him too much honour: the cunning fellow knows that his fortune is made in Aberlva, if he chooses to work it out: but he humbly slips into the rear, for Frank has to be supported, not being over popular, and the lieutenant may 'turn rusty,' unless he has his lordship to himself before the gaze of assembled Aberlva.

Scoutbush progresses up the street, bowing right and left, and stopped half a dozen times by red-cloaked old women, who crouch under his nose, and will needs inform him how they knew his grandfather, or nursed his uncle, or how his 'dear mother, God rest her soul, gave me this very cloak as I have on,' and so forth, till Scoutbush comes to the conclusion that they are a very loving and lovable set of people—as indeed they are—and his heart smites him somewhat for not having seen more of them in past years.

No sooner is Thurnall released than he is off to the yacht as fast as oars can take him, and in Claudio's arms.

'Now!' (after all salutations and inquiries have been gone through) 'let me introduce you to Major Campbell.' And Tom was presented to a tall and thin personage, who sat at the cabin table, bending over a microscope.

'Excuse my rising,' said he, holding out a left hand, for the right was busy. 'A single jar will give me ten minutes' work to do again. I am delighted to meet you. Mellot has often spoken to me of you as a man who has seen more, and faced death more carelessly, than most men.'

'Mellot flatters, sir. Whichever I have done, I have given up being careless about death, for I have some one beside myself to live for.'

'Married at last? has Diogenes found his Aspasia?' cried Claudio.

'Tom did not laugh.'

'Since my brothers died, Claudio, the old gentleman has only me to look to. You seem to be a naturalist, sir.'

'A dabbler,' said the major, with eye and hand still busy.

'I ought not to begin our acquaintance by doubting your word: but these things are no dabbler's work,' and Tom pointed to some exquisite photographs of minute corallines, evidently taken under the microscope.

'They are Mellot's.'

'Mellot turned man of science? Impossible!'

'No, only photographer. I am tired of painting nature clumsily, and then seeing a snapshot outdo all my efforts—so I am turned photographer, and have made a vow against painting for three years and a day.'

'Why, the photograph's only gave you light and shade.'

'They will give you colour, too, before seven years are over—and that is more than I can do, or any one else. No; I yield to the new dynasty. The artist's occupation is gone henceforth, and the painter's studio, like "all charms, must fly, at the mere touch of cold philosophy." So Major Campbell prepares the charming little cocky birds, and I call in the sun to immortalise them.'

'And perfectly you are succeeding! They are quite new to me, recollect. When I left Melbourne, the art had hardly risen there above guinea portraits of bearded desperadoes, a nugget in one hand and a £50 note in the other: but this is a new, and what a forward step for science!'

'You are a naturalist, then?' said Campbell, looking up with interest.

'All my profession are, more or less,' said Tom carelessly, 'and I have been lucky enough here to fall on untrodden ground, and have hunted up a few sea-monsters this summer.'

'Really? You can tell me where to search then, and where to dredge, I hope. I have set my heart on a fortnight's work here, and have been dreaming at night, like a child before a twelfth-night party, of all sorts of impossible hydras, gorgons, and chimeras dre, fished up from your western deeps.'

'I have none of them, but I can give you Turbanolia Milletiana and Zoanthus Couchii. I have a party of the last gentlemen alive on shore.'

The major's face worked with almost childish delight.

'But I shall be robbing you.'

'They cost me nothing, my dear sir. I did very well, moreover, without them, for five-and-thirty years, and I may do equally well for five-and-thirty more.'

'I ought to be able to say the same, surely,' answered the major, composing his face again, and rising carefully. 'I have to thank you, exceedingly, my dear sir, for your prompt generosity, but it is better discipline for a man, in many ways, to find things for himself than to have them put into his hands. So, with a thousand thanks, you shall let me see if I can dredge a Turbinella for myself.'

This was spoken with so sweet and polished a modulation, and yet so sadly and severely withal, that Tom looked at the speaker with interest.

He was a very tall and powerful man, and would have been a very handsome man, both in face and figure, but for the high cheekbone, long neck, and narrow shoulders, so often seen north of Tweed. His brow was very high and full, his eyes—grave, but very gentle, with large drooping eyelids—were buried under shaggy gray eyebrows. His mouth was gentle as his eyes, but compressed, perhaps by the habit of command, perhaps by secret sorrow, for of that, too, as well as of intellect and magnanimity, Thurnall thought he could discern the traces. His face was bronzed by long exposure to the sun, his close-cut curls, which had once been auburn, were fast turning white, though his features looked those of a man under five-and-forty, his cheeks were as smooth shaven as his chin. A right, self-possessed, valiant soldier he looked, one who could be very loving to little innocents, and very terrible to full-grown knaves.

'You are practising at self-denial, as usual, said Claude.

'Because I may, at any moment, have to exercise it in earnest. Mr. Thurnall, can you tell me the name of this little glass arrow, which I just found shooting about in the sweeping net?'

Tom did know the wonderful little link between the fish and the insect, and the two clattered over its strange form till the boat returned to take them ashore.

'Do you make any stay here?'

'I propose to spend a fortnight here in my favourite pursuit, I must draw on your kindness and knowledge of the place to point me out lodgings.'

Lodgings, as it befell, were to be found, and good ones, close to the beach, and away from the noise of the harbour, on Mrs. Harvey's first floor, for the local preacher, who generally occupied them, was away.

'But Major Campbell might dislike the noise of the school?'

'The school? What better music for a lonely old bachelor than children's voices?'

So by sunset the major was fairly established over Mrs. Harvey's shop. It was not the place which Tom would have chosen, he was afraid of 'running over' poor Grace, if he came in and out as often as he could have wished. Nevertheless, he accepted the major's invitation to visit him that very evening.

'I cannot ask you to dinner yet, sir, for my ménage will be hardly settled, but a cup of coffee, and an exceedingly good cigar, I think my establishment may furnish you by seven o'clock to-night,—if you think them worth walking down for.'

Tom, of course, said something civil, and made his appearance in due time. He found the coffee really, and the cigars also, but the major was busy, in his shirt sleeves, unpacking and arranging jars, nets, microscopes, and what not of scientific lumber, and Tom rendered his help.

'I am ashamed to make use of you the first moment that you become my guest.'

'I shall enjoy the mere handling of your tackle,' said Tom, and began breaking the tenth commandment over almost every article he touched, for every thing was hirsute of its kind.

'You seem to have devoted money, as well as thought, plentifully to the pursuit.'

'I have little else to which to devote either, and more of both than is, perhaps, safe for me.'

'I should hardly complain of a superfluity of thought, if superfluity of money was the conclusion of it.'

'Pity misunderstand me. I am no Dives, but I have learned to want so little, that I hardly knew how to spend the little which I have.'

'I should hardly have called that an unusual state.'

'The penniless Faquir who lives on chance handfuls of rice has his dangers, as well as the rich Parsee who has his ventures out from Madagascar to Canton. Yes, I have often envied the schemer, the man of business, almost the man of pleasure, then money wants at least absorb them in outward objects, instead of leaving them too easily satisfied, to sink in upon themselves, and waste away in useless dilemmas.'

'You found out the best time for that malady when you took up the microscope and the collecting-box.'

'So I fancied once. I took up natural history in India years ago to drive away thought, as other men might take to opium, or to brandy-paunch, but, like them, it has become a passion now and a tyranny, and I go on hunting, discovering, wondering, craving for more knowledge, and—cas bono? I sometimes ask—'

'Why, this at least, sir, that, without such men as you, who work for mere love, science would be now fifty years behind her present standing-point, and we doctors should not know a thousand important facts which you have been kind enough to tell us, while we have not time to find them out for ourselves.'

'Sic vos non vobis—'

'Yes, you have the work, and we have the pay, which is a very fair division of labour, considering the world we live in.'

'And have you been skilful enough to make science pay you here, in such an out-of-the-way little world as that of Abetia? must be!'

'She is a good stalking-horse anywhere,' and Tom detailed, with plenty of humour, the effect of his microscope and his lecture on the drops of water. But his wit seemed so much lost on Campbell, that he at last stopped almost short, not quite sure that he had not taken a liberty.

'No, go on, I beg you, and do not fancy that I am not interested and amused too, because my laughing muscles are a little stiff from want of use. Perhaps, too, I am apt to take things too much au grand sérieux but I could not help thinking, while you were speaking, how sad it was that people were utterly ignorant of matters so vitally necessary to health.'

'And I, perhaps, might not to jest over the subject but indeed, with cholera staring us in the face here, I must indulge in some emotion, and as it is unprofessional to weep, I must laugh as long as I dare.'

The major dropped his coffee-cup upon the floor, and looked at Thurnall with so horrified a gaze, that Tom could hardly believe him to be the same man. Then recollecting himself, he darted down upon the remains of his cup, and looking up again—'A thousand pardons, but—did I hear you aright? cholera staring us in the face?'

'How can it be otherwise? It is drawing steadily on from the eastward week by week, and in the present state of the town, nothing but some miraculous caprice of Dame Fortune can deliver us.'

'Don't talk of fortune, sir! at such a moment talk of God!' said the major, rising from his chair, and leaving the room. 'It is too horrible! Intolerable! When do you expect it here?'

'Within the month, perhaps, hardly before I should have warned you of the danger, I assure you, had I not understood from you that you were only going to stay a fortnight.'

The major made an impatient gesture.

'Do you fancy that I am afraid for myself? No, but the thought of its coming to—to the poor people in the town, you know. It is too dreadful. I have seen it in India—among my own men—among the natives. Good heavens, I never shall forget—and to meet this fiend again here, of all places in the world! I shudder at so clean and healthy, swept by fresh sea-breezes.'

'And by nothing else. A half-hour's walk round would convince you, sir, I only wish that you could persuade his lordship to accompany you.'

'Scoutbush? Of course he will,—he shall,—he must. Good heavens! whose concern is it more than his? You think, then, that there is a chance of staying it off—by cleansing, I mean?'

'If we have heavy rains during the next week or two, yes. If this drought last, better leave it alone, we shall only provoke the devil by stirring him up.'

'You speak confidently,' said the major, gradually regaining his own self-possession, as he saw Tom so self-possessed. 'Have you—allow me to ask so important a question—have you seen much of cholera?'

'I have worked through three. At Paris, at St. Petersburg, and in the West Indies, and I have been thinking up my old experience for the last six weeks, foreseeing what would come.'

'I am satisfied, sir, perhaps I ought to ask your pardon for the question.'

'Not at all. How can you trust a man, unless you know him?'

'And you expect it within the month? You shall go with me to Lord Scoutbush to-morrow, and—and now we will talk of something more pleasant.' And he began again upon the zoophytes.

Tom, as they chatted on, could not help wondering at the major's unexpected passion, and could not help remarking, also, that in spite of his desire to be agreeable, and to interest his guest in his scientific discoveries, he was yet distraught, and full of other thoughts. What could be the meaning of it? Was it mere excess of human sympathy? The countenance hardly betokened that, but still, who can trust altogether the expression of a weather-hardened visage of forty-five? So the doctor set it down to tenderness of heart, till a fresh vista opened on him.

Major Campbell, he soon found, was as fond of insects as of sea-moulders, and he began inquiring about the woods, the heaths, the climate, which seemed to the doctor, for a long time, to mean nothing more than the question which he put plainly, 'Where have I a chance of rare insects?' But he seemed, after a while, to be trying to learn the geography of the parish in detail, and especially of the ground round Vavasour's house. 'However, it is no business of mine,' thought Thurnall, and told him all he wanted, till

'Then the house lies quite in the bottom of the glen? Is there a good fall to the stream for a stream I suppose there is?'

Thurnall shook his head. 'Cold boggy stew ponds in the garden, such as our ancestors loved damming up the stream. They must needs have fish in Lent, we know, and paid the penalty of it by ague and fever.'

'Stew ponds damming up the stream? Scoutbush ought to drain them instantly!' said the major, half to himself. 'But still the house lies high, with regard to the town, I mean. No chance of malaria coming up!'

'Upon my word, sir, as a professional man, that is a thing that I dare not say. The chances are not great, the house is two hundred yards from the nearest cottage, but if there be an east wind—'

'I cannot bear this any longer. It is perfect madness!'

'I trust, sir, that you do not think that I have neglected the matter. I have pointed it all out, I assure you, to Mr. Vavasour.'

And it is not altered?'

I believe it is to be altered—that is—the truth is, sir, that Mr Vavasour shrinks so much from the very notion of cholera, that—

'That he does not like to do anything which may look like believing in its possibility?'

'He says,' quoth Tom, parrying the question, but in a somewhat shy tone, 'that he is afraid of alarming Mrs Vavasour and the servants.'

The major said something under his breath, which Tom did not catch, and then, in an oppressed tone of voice—

'Well, that is at least a fault on the right side. Mrs Vavasour's brother, as owner of the place, is of course the proper person to make the house fit for habitation.' And he relapsed into silence, while Thornhill, who suspected more than met the ear, rose to depart.

'Are you going? It is not late—not ten o'clock yet.'

'A medical man, who may be called up at my moment, must make some of his "leisure sleep".'

'I will walk with you, and smoke my last cigar.'

So they went out, and up to Heale's. Tom went in, but he observed that his companion, after standing awhile in the street irresolutely, went on up the hill, and, as far as he could see, turned up the lane to Vavasour's.

'A mystery here,' thought he, as he put matters to rights in the surgery ere going upstairs. 'A mystery which I may as well fathom. It may be of use to poor Tom, as most other mysteries are. That is, though, if I do not honourably, for the man is a gallant gentleman. I like him, and I am inclined to trust him. Whatsoever his secret is, I don't think that it is one which he need be ashamed of. Still, "there's a deal of human nature in man," and there may be in him, and what matter if there is?'

Half an hour afterwards the major returned, took the candle from Grace, who was sitting up for him, and went upstairs with a gentle 'good night,' but without looking at her.

He sat down at the open window and looked out, leaning on the sill.

'Well, I was too late, I daresay there was some purpose in it. When shall I learn to believe that God takes better care of His own than I can do? I was faithless and impatient to-night. I am afraid I betrayed myself before that man. He looks like one, certainly, who could be trusted with a secret, yet I had rather that he had not mine. It is my own fault, like everything else. Foolish old fellow that you are, fretting and fussing to the end! Is not that scene a message from above, saying, "Be still, and know that I am God"?''

And the major looked out upon the summer sea, lit by a million globes of living fire, and then upon the waves which broke in flame upon the beach, and then up to the spangled stars above.

'What do I know of these, with all my knowing? Not even a twentieth part of those medusæ, or one in each thousand of those sparks among the foam. Perhaps I need not know. And yet why was the thirst awakened in me, save to be satisfied at last? Perhaps to become more intense with every fresh delicious draught of knowledge. Death, beautiful, wise, kind Death, when will you come and tell me what I want to know? I courted you once and many a time, brave old Death, only to give rest to the weary. That was a coward's wish, and so you would not come. I ran you close in Afghanistan, old Death, and at Solbrion, too, I was not far behind you, and I thought I had you safe among that jungle grass at Allival, but you slipped through my hand, I was not worthy of you. And now I will not hunt you any more, old Death, do you bide your time, and I mine, though who knows if I may not meet you here? Only when you come, give me not rest, but work. Give work to the idle, freedom to the chained, sight to the blind. Tell me a little about inner things than zoophytes—perhaps about the zoophytes as well, and you shall still be brave old Death, my good! I impudently now to marry a year.'

Was Major Campbell mad? That depends upon the way in which the reader may choose to define the adjective.

Meanwhile Scoutbush had walked into Pen-sylvia Court when an affecting scene of reconciliation took place.

Not in the least. Scoutbush kissed Lucia, shook hands with Elsley, hugged the children, and then settled himself in an arm-chair, and talked about the weather, exactly as if he had been running in and out of the house every week for the last three years, and so the matter was done, and for the first time a partie mûre was assembled in the dining room.

The evening passed off at first as unimportant as it could, where three out of the four were well-bred people. Elsley was, of course, shy before Lord Scoutbush, and Scoutbush was equally shy before Elsley, though as civil as possible to him, for the little fellow stood in extreme awe of Elsley's talents, and was afraid of opening his lips before a poet. Lucia was nervous for both their sakes, as well she might be, and Valentin had to make all the talking, and succeeded capitally in drawing out both his brother and her brother-in-law, till both of them found the other, on the whole, more like other people than he had expected. The next morning's breakfast, therefore, was easy and gracious enough, and when it was over, and Lucia fled to household matters—

'You smoke, Vavasour?' asked Scoutbush.

Vavasour did not smoke.

'Really? I thought poets always smoked. You will not forbid my having a cigar in your garden, nevertheless, I suppose? Do walk round with me, too, and show me the place, unless you are going to be busy.'

Oh no, Elsley was at Lord Scoutbush's service, of course, and had really nothing to do. So out they went.

'Charming old pigeon-hole it is,' said its owner. 'I have not seen it since I went into the Guards. Campbell says it's a shame of me, and so it is one, I suppose, but how beautiful you have in it the garden look!'

'Lucia is very fond of gardening,' said Elsley, who was very fond of it also, and had great taste therein, but he was afraid to confess any such tastes before a man who, he thought, would not understand him.

'And that fine old wood full of cocks it used to be—I hope you worked it well last year.'

Elsley did not shout, but he had heard there was plenty of game there.

'Plenty of cocks,' said his guest, correcting him, 'but for game, the less we say about that the better. I really wonder you do not shoot, it fills up time so in the winter.'

'There is really no winter to fill up here, thanks to this delicious climate, and I have my books.'

'Ah! I wish I had. I wish heartily,' said he, in a confidential tone, 'you, or Campbell, or some of your clever men, would sell me a little of their book learning, as Valentinia says to me, "brains are so common in the world, I wonder how none fell to your share."'

'I do not think that they are an article which is for sale, if Solomon is to be believed.'

'And if they were, I couldn't afford to buy, with this Irish Enumbered Estates' Bill. But now, this is one thing I wanted to say. Is overything here just as you would wish? Of course no one could wish a better tenant, but any repairs, you know, or improvements which I ought to do, of course? Only tell me what you think should be done for, of course, you know more about these things than I do—can't know less.'

'Nothing, I assure you, Lord Scoutbush. I have always left those matters to Mr Tardrew.'

'Ah, my dear fellow, you shouldn't do that. He is such a screw, as all honest stewards are. Screws me, I know, and I dare say has screwed you too.'

'Never, I assure you. I never gave him the opportunity, and he has been most civil.'

'Well, in future, just order him to do what you like, and just as if you were landlord, in fact, and if the old man haggles, write to me, and I'll blow him up. Delighted to have a man of taste like you here, who can improve the place for me.'

'I assure you, Lord Scoutbush, I need nothing, nor does the place. I am a man of very few wants.'

'I wish I were,' sighed Scoutbush, pulling out another of Hindson's highest-priced cigars.

'And I am bound to say'—and here Elsley choked a little, but the Viscount's frankness and humility had softened him, and he determined to be very magnanimous—'I am bound in honour, after owing to your kindness such an exquisite retreat—all that either I or Lucia could have fancied for ourselves, and more—not to trouble you by asking for little matters which we really do not need.'

And so Elsley, instead of simply asking to have the house-drains set right, which Lord Scoutbush would have had done upon the spot, chose to be lofty-minded, at the risk of killing his wife and children.

'My dear fellow, you really must not "lord" me any more, I hate it. I must be plain Scoutbush here among my own people, just as I am in the Guards' mess-room. And as for owing me any,—really, it is we that are in your debt,—to see my sister so happy, and such beautiful children, and so well too—and altogether—and Valentinia so delighted with your poems—and, and altogether—'—and there Lord Scoutbush stopped, having hunted, as he considered, the flag of peace once and for all, and very glad that the thing was over.

Elsley was going to say something in return; but his guest turned the conversation as fast as he could. 'And now, I know you want to be busy, though you are too civil to confess it, and I must be with that old fool Tardrew at ten, to settle accounts, he'll scold me if I do not—the precise old pedant—just as if I was his own child. Good-bye.'

'Where are you going, Frederick?' called Lucia, from the window, who had been watching the interview anxiously enough, and could see that it had ended well.

'To old Stot-and-kyo at the farm, do you want anything?'

'No, only I thought you might be going to the yacht, and Valentinia would have walked down with you. She wants to find Major Campbell.'

'I want to walk Major Campbell,' said Valentinia, tripping out on the lawn in her walking dress. 'Why has he not been here an hour ago? I will undertake to say that he was up at four this morning.'

'He wants to be invited, I suppose,' said Scoutbush.

'I suppose I must do it,' said Elsley to himself, sighing.

'Just like his primness,' said Valentinia. 'I shall go down and bring him up myself this minute, and Mr Vavasour shall come with me. Of course you will! You do not know what a delightful person he is, when once you can break the ice.'

Elsley, like most vain men, was of a jealous temper, and Valentinia's eagerness to see Major Campbell jarred on him. He wanted to keep the exquisite creature to himself, and Headley was quite enough of an intruder already. Besides, the accounts of the newcomer, his learning, his military prowess, the reverence with which all, even Scoutbush, evidently regarded him, made him prepared to dislike the Major, and all the more, now he heard there was an excuse to crack. Impulsive men like Elsley, especially when their self-respect and certainty of their own position is not very strong, have instinctively a defiant fear of the strong, calm, self-contained man, especially if he has seen the world, and Elsley set down Major Campbell as a proud, sarcastic fellow, before whom he must be at the pains of being continually on his guard. He wished him a hundred miles away. However, there was no refusing Valentin anything, so he got his hat, but with so bad a grace, that Valentin saw his chagrin, and from mere naughtiness of heart amused herself with it by talking all the way of nothing but Major Campbell.

'And Lucia,' she said at last, 'will be so glad to see him again. We knew him so well, you know, in Eaton Square years ago.'

'Really,' said Elsley, wincing, 'I never met him there.' He recollected that Lucia had expressed more pleasure at Major Campbell's coming than even at that of her brother and a dark, undefined phantom entered his heart, which, though he would have been too proud to confess it to himself, was none other than jealousy.

'Oh—did you not? No, it was the year before we first knew you. And we used to laugh at him together, behind his back, and christened him the wild Indian, because he was so gay and shy. He was a major in the Indian army then, but a few months afterwards he sold out and went into the line—no one could tell why, for he threw away very brilliant prospects, they say, and might have been a general by now, instead of a mere major still. But he is so improved since then, he is like an elder brother to Scoutbush, guides him in everything—I call him the blind man, and the major his dog.'

'So much the worse,' thought Elsley, who disliked the notion of Campbell's having power over a man to whom he was indebted for his home-room, but by this time they were at Mrs Harvey's door.

Mrs Harvey opened it, curtseying to the very ground, and Valentin ran upstairs, and knocked at the sitting-room door herself.

'Come in,' shouted a preoccupied voice inside.

'Is that the proper way in which to address a lady, sir?' answered she, putting in her beautiful head.

Major Campbell was sitting, Elsley could see, in his shirt sleeves, cigar in mouth, bent over his microscope, but instead of the unexpected grim voice, he heard a very gay and arch one answer, 'Is that a proper way in which to come peeping into an old bachelor's sanctuary, ma'am? Go away this moment, till I make myself fit to be seen.'

Valentin shut the door again, laughing.

'You seem very intimate with Major Campbell,' said Elsley.

'Intimate? I look on him as my father almost. Now, may we come in?' said she, knocking again in pretty politeness. 'I want to introduce Mr Vavasour.'

'I shall be only too happy,' said the major, opening his door (this time with his coat on), 'there are few persons in the world whom I have more wished to know than Mr. Vavasour.' And he held out his hand, and quite led Elsley in. He spoke in a tone of grave interest, looking intently at Elsley as he spoke. Valentin remarked the interest—Elsley only the compliment.

'It is a great kindness of you to call on me so soon,' said he. 'I met Mrs Vavasour several times in years past, and though I saw very little of her, I saw enough to long much for the acquaintance of the man who has been worthy to become her husband.'

Elsley blushed, for his conscience smote him a little at that word 'worthy,' and muttered some commonplace civility in return. Valentin saw it, and attributing it to his usual awkwardness, drew off the conversation to herself.

'Really, Major Campbell! You bring in Mr. Vavasour, and let me walk behind as I can, and then let me sit three whole minutes in your house without deigning to speak to me!'

'Ah! my dear Queen Whims!' answered he, returning suddenly to his gay tone, 'and how have you been misbehaving yourself since we met last?'

'I have not been misbehaving myself at all, mon cher Saint Père, as Mr Vavasour will answer for me, during the most delightful fortnight I ever spent!'

'Delightful indeed!' said Elsley, as he was bound to say, but he said it with an earnestness which made the major fix his eyes on him. 'Why should he not find any and every fortnight as delightful as his last?' said he to himself, but now Valentin began bantering him about his books and his animals, wanting to look through his microscope, pulling off her hat for this purpose, laughing when her curls blinded her, letting them blind her in order to toss them back in the prettiest way, jesting at him about 'his old fogies' at the Linnæan Society, clapping her hands in ecstasy when he answered that they were not old fogies at all, but the most charming set of men in England, and that (with no offence to the name of Scoutbush) he was prouder of being an F. L. S. than if he were a peer of the realm and so forth, all which harmless pleasantry made Elsley cross, and more cross—first, because he did not mix in it, next, because he could not mix in it if he tried. He liked to be always in the seventh heaven, and if other people were anywhere else, he thought them bores.

At last—'Now, if you will be good for five minutes,' said the major, 'I will show you something really beautiful.'

'I can see that,' answered she, with the most charming impudence, 'in another glass besides your magnifying one.'

'Be it so—but look here, and see what an exquisite world there is, of which you never dream, and which behaves a great deal better in its station than the world of which you do dream!'

When Campbell spoke in that way, Valentin was good at once, and as she went immediately to the microscope, she whispered, 'Don't be angry with me, mon Saint Père.'

'Don't be naughty, then, ma chère enfant,' whispered he, for he saw something about Elsley's face which gave him a painful suspicion.

She looked long, and then lifted up her head suddenly—'Do come and look, Mr Vavasour, at this exquisite little glass fairy, like—I cannot tell what like, but a pure spirit hovering in some nun's dream! Come!'

Elsley came, and looked, and when he looked he started, for it was the very same zoophyte which Thurnall had shown him on a certain memorable day.

'Where did you find the fairy, mon Saint Père?'

'I had no such good fortune. Mr Thurnall, the doctor, gave it me.'

'Thurnall?' said she, while Elsley kept still looking, to hide cheeks which were growing very red. 'He is such a clever man, they say. Where did you meet him? I have often thought of asking Mr Vavasour to invite him up for an evening with his microscope. He seems so superior to the people round him. It would be a charity, really, Mr Vavasour.'

Vavasour kept his eyes fixed on the zoophyte, and said:

'I shall be only too delighted, if you wish it.'

'You will wish it yourself a second time,' chimed in Campbell, 'if you try it once. Perhaps you know nothing of him but professionally. Unfortunately for professional men, that too often happens.'

'Know anything of him? I! I assure you not, save that he attends Mrs Vavasour and the children,' said Vavasour, looking up at last, but with an expression of anger which astonished both Valentin and Campbell.

Campbell thought that he was too proud to allow rank as a gentleman to a country doctor, and despised him from that moment, though, as it happened, unjustly. But he answered quietly:

'I assure you that, whatever sort country practitioners may be, the average of them, as far as I have seen, are cleverer men, and even of higher tone than their neighbours, and Thurnall is beyond the average—he is a man of the world—even too much of one—and a man of science, and I fairly confess that, with his wit, his amour propre, and his good good temper, I have quite fallen in love with him in a single evening, we began last night on the microscope, and ended on all heaven and earth.'

'How I should like to make a third!'

'My dear Queen Whims would hear a good deal of solar sense, then? at least on one side—but I shall not ask her—for Mr Thurnall and I have our deep secrets together.'

So spoke the major, in the simple wish to exalt Tom in a quarter where he hoped to get him practical, and his 'secret' was a mere jest, unnecessary, perhaps, as he thought afterwards, to pass off Tom's want of orthodoxy.

'I was a babbler then,' said he to himself the next moment 'how much better to have simply held my tongue!'

Alas, yes, I know men have their secrets as well as women,' said Valentin, for the mere love of saying something—but as she looked at Vavasour she saw an expression in his face which she had never seen before. What was it? All that one can picture in l'homme branded into the countenance of a man unable to repress the least emotion, who had worked himself into the belief that Thurnall had betrayed his secret.

'My dear Mrs Vavasour,' cried Campbell, of course unable to guess the truth, and supposing vaguely that he was 'ill', 'I am sure that that the sun has overpowered you' (the only possible thing he could think of). 'Lie down on the sofa a minute' (Vavasour was actually reeling with rage and terror), 'and I will run up to Thurnall's for salvolatile.'

Elsley, who thought him the most consummate of hypocrites, cast on him a look which he intended to have been withering, and rushed out of the room, leaving the two staring at each other.

Valentin was half inclined to laugh, knowing Elsley's petulance and vanity—but the impossibility of guessing a cause kept her quiet.

Major Campbell stood for full five minutes, not as one astounded, but as one in deep and anxious thought.

'What can be the matter, mon Saint Père?' asked she at last, to break the silence.

'That there are more whims in the world than yours, dear Queen Whims, and I fear darker ones. Let us walk up together after this man—I have offended him.'

'Nonsense! I dare say he wanted to get home to write poetry, as you did not press what he had written. I know his vanity and flightiness.'

'You do?' asked he quickly, in a painful tone. 'However, I have offended him, I can see, and deeply. I must go up, and make things right, for the sake of for everybody's sake.'

'Then do not ask me anything. Lucia loves him intensely, and let that be enough for us.'

The major saw the truth of the last sentence no more than Valentin herself did, for Valentin would have been glad enough to point out to him, with every exaggeration, her sister's woes and wrongs, real and fancied, had not the sense of her own folly with Vavasour kept her silent and conscience-stricken.

Valentin remarked the major's pained look as they walked up the street.

'You dear conscientious Saint Père, why will you fret yourself about such a foolish matter? He will have forgotten it all in an hour, I know him well enough.'

Major Campbell was not the sort of person to admire Elsley the more for throwing away capriciously such deep passion as he had seen him show, any more than for showing the same.

'He must be of a very volatile temperament.' 'Oh all gamines are.'

I have no respect for genius, Miss St. Just.

I do not even acknowledge its existence when there is no strength and steadiness of character. If any one pretends to be more than a man, he must begin by proving himself a man at all. Genius? Give me common sense and common decency! Does he give Mrs. Vavasour, pray, the benefit of any of these pretty flights of genius?

Valentia was frightened. She had never heard her Saint Père speak so severely and sarcastically, and she feared that if he knew the truth, he would be terribly angry. She had never seen him angry, but she knew well enough that that passion, when it rose in him in a righteous cause, would be very awful to see, and she was one of those women who always grow angry when they are frightened. So she was angry at his calling her Mrs. St. Just, she was angry because she chose to think he was talking at her, though she reasonably might have guessed it, seeing that he had scolded her a hundred times for want of steadiness of character. She was more angry than all, because she knew that her own vanity had caused at least disagreement—between Lania and Elsley. All which (combined with her natural wish not to confess an unpleasant truth about her sister) puzzled her, of course, in answering—

'Miss St. Just don't intrude into the secrets of my sister's married life, and if she did, she would not repeat them.'

Major Campbell sighed, and walked in a few moments in silence, then

'Pardon, Miss St. Just, I asked a rude question, and I am sorry for it.'

'Pardon you, my dear Saint Père,' cried she, almost catching at his hand. 'Never! I must either believe you infallible, or hate you eternally. It is I that was naughty, I always am, but you will forgive Queen Whims.'

'Who could help it?' said the major, in a sad, sweet tone. 'But here is the postman. May I open my letters?'

'You may do as you like, now you have forgiven me. Why, what is it, mon Saint Père?'

A sudden shock of horror had passed over the major's face, as he read his letter, but it had soon subsided into stately calm.

'A gallant officer, whom we and all the world knew well, is dead of cholera at his post, where a man should die. And, my dear Miss St. Just, we are going to the Crimea.'

'We? you?'

'Yes. The expedition will really sail, I find.'

'But not you?'

'I shall offer my services. My leave of absence will, in any case, end on the first of September, and even if it did not, my health is quite enough restored to enable me to walk up to a cannon's mouth.'

'Ah, mon Saint Père, what words are these?'

'The words of an old soldier, Queen Whims, who has been so long at his trade that he has got to take a strange pleasure in it.'

'In killing?'

'No, only in the chance of— But I will not cast an unnecessary shadow over your bright soul. There will be shadows enough over it soon, without my help.'

'What do you mean?'

'That you, and thousands more as delicate, if not as fan as you, will see, ere long, what the realities of human life are, and in a way of which you have never dreamed.'

And he murmured, half to himself, the words of the prophet, "'Thou saist, I shall sit as a lady for ever: but these two things shall come upon thee in our day, widowhood and the loss of children. They shall even come upon thee.' No! not in our fineness! There are noble elements underneath the crust, which will come out all the purer from the fire, and we shall have heroes and heroines rising up among us as of old, sincere and earnest, ready to face their work, and to do it, and to call all things by their right names once more. And Queen Whims herself will become what Queen Whims might be.'

Valentia was awed, as well she might have been, for there was a very deep sadness about Campbell even.

'You think there will be del. disasters?' said she at last.

'How can I tell? That we are what we always were, I doubt not. Scouthush will light us mainly as I. But we owe the penalty of many sins, and we shall pay it.'

It would be as nothing, perhaps, is easy, to make Major Campbell a prophet after the fact, by attributing to him any distinct expectation of those mistakes which have been but too notorious since. Much of the sadness in his tone may have been due to his habitual melancholy, his strong belief that the world was deeply diseased, and that some terrible purgation would surely come, when it was needed. But it is difficult, again, to conceive that those errors were altogether unforeseen by many an officer of Campbell's experience and thoughtfulness.

'We will talk no more of it just now.' And they walked up to Penolva Court, seriously enough.

'Well, Scouthush, any letters from town?' said the major.

'Yes.'

'You have heard what has happened at D. Barracks?'

'Yes.'

'You had better take care, then, that the like of it does not happen here.'

'Here?'

'Yes. I'll tell you all presently. Have you heard from headquarters?'

'Yes, all right,' said Scouthush, who did not like to let out the truth to fine Valentia.

Campbell saw it, and signed to him to speak out.

'All right?' asked Valentia. 'Then you are not going?'

'Ay, but I am! Orders to join my regiment by the first of October, and to be shot as soon afterwards as is fitting for the honour of my country. So, Miss Val, you must be quick in making good friends with the hen-at-law, or else you won't get your bills paid any more.'

'Oh, dear, dear!' and Valentin began to cry bitterly. It was her first real sorrow.

Strangely enough, Major Campbell, instead of trying to comfort her, took Scoutbush out with him, and left her alone with her tears. He could not rest till he had opened the whole cholera question.

Scoutbush was honestly shocked. Who would have dreamed it! No one had ever told him that the cholera had really been there before. 'What could he do?' said he to Thurnall.

Tom was sent for, and Scoutbush found, to his horror, that what little he could have ever done ought to have been done three months ago, with Lord Munchampstead's improvements at Pentremochyn.

The little man walked up and down, and wrung his hands. He cursed Tardrew for not telling him the truth, he cursed himself for letting the cottages go out of his power, he cursed A, B, and C for taking the said cottages off his hands, he cursed up, he cursed down, he cursed all around, things which ought to have been cursed, and things which really ought not—for half of the worst sanitary sinners, in this blessed age of ignorance, yclept of progress and science (how our grandchildren will laugh at the epithets!), are utterly unconscious and guiltless ones.

But cursing leaves him, as it leaves other men, very much where he had started.

To do him justice, he was in one thing a true nobleman, for he was above all pride, as are most men of rank, who know what their own rank means. It is only the upstart, unaccustomed to his new eminence, who stands on his dignity, and asserts his power.

So Scoutbush begged humbly of Thurnall only to tell him what he could do.

'You might use your moral influence, my lord.'

'Moral influence!' in a tone which implied naively enough, 'I'd better get a little morals myself before I talk of using the same.'

'Your position in the parish—'

'My good sir!' quoth Scoutbush in his shrewd way, 'do you not know yourself what these fine fellows who were ready yesterday to kiss the dust off my feet would say, if I asked leave to touch a single hair of their rights?' 'Tell you what, my lord, we pay you your rent, and you takes it. You mind your business, and we'll mind our'n.' 'You forget that times are changed since my seventeenth progenitor was lord of life and limb over man and maid in Aberlva.'

'And since your seventeenth progenitor took the trouble to live at Penalva Court,' said Campbell, 'instead of throwing away what little moral influence he had by going into the Guards, and spending his time between Rotten Row and Cowes.'

'Hardly fair, Major Campbell!' quoth Tom, 'you forget that in the old times, if the Lord of Aberlva was responsible for his people, he had also by law the power of making them obey him.'

'The long and the short of it is, then,' said Scoutbush, a little tartly, 'that I can do nothing.'

'You can put to rights the cottages which are still in your hands, my lord. For the rest, my only remaining hope lies in the last person whom one would usually depute on such an errand.'

'Who is that?'

'The schoolmistress.'

'The who?' asked Scoutbush.

'The schoolmistress, at whose house Major Campbell lodges.'

And Tom told them, succinctly, enough to justify his strange assertion.

'If you doubt me, my lord, I advise you to ask Mr Headley. He is no friend of hers, being a high churchman, while she is a little inclined to be schismatic, but an enemy's opinion will be all the more honest.'

'She must be a wonderful woman,' said Scoutbush, 'I should like to see her.'

'And I too,' said Campbell. 'I passed a lovely gal on the stairs last night, and thought no more of it. Lovely girls are common enough in West-country parts.'

'We'll go and see her,' quoth his lordship.

Meanwhile Aberlva pier was astonished by a strange phenomenon. A boat from the yacht landed at the pier-head not only Claude Mellot, whose beard was an object of wonder to the fishermen, but a tall three-legged box and a little black tent, which, being set upon the pier, became the scene of various mysterious operations, carried on by Claude and a sailor lad.

'I say!' quoth one of the fishing elders, after long suspicious silence, 'I say, lais, this won't do. We can't have no outlandish foreigners taking observations here!'

And then dropped out one wild suspicion after another.

'Maybe he's spyin' for a railroad!'

'Maybe he's from the Trinity House, going to make a new harbour, or maybe a lighthouse. And then we'd better not meddle wi' him!'

'I'll tell you what he be. He's that here government chap as the doctor said he'd bring down to set our drains right.'

'If he goes meddling with our drains, and knocking of our back-yards about, he'll find himself over quay before he's done.'

'Steady! steady! He come with my lord's mind!'

'He might n' taken in his lordship, and be a Russian spy to the bottom of him after all. They wak' themselves up into all manner of disguisements, specially beards. I've seed the Russians with their beards many a time.'

'Maybe 'tis witchcraft. Look to mun, putting mun's head under that black bag now! He'm after no good, I'll warrant. If they ben't works of darkness, what be?'

'Leastwise he'm no right to go spyin' here on our quay, and nger ax with your heavy, or by your leave. I'll just gon' mak' mun out.'

And Claude, who had just retreated into his tent, had the pleasure of finding the curtain suddenly withdrawn, and as a flood of light rushed in, spilling his daguerrotypo plate, hearing a voice as of a sleepy bear—

'Ax your pardon, sir, but what be you arter here?'

'Murder! shnt the screen!'

But it was too late, and Claude came out, while the eldest-horn of Annk stood sternly inquiring—

'I say, what be you arter herp, in k' so bold?'

'Taking sun-pictures, my good an, and you have spoilt one for me.'

'Sun-pictures, saith a?'

in a very merodulous tone

'Daguerrotypes of the place in Lord Seotlandsh!'

'Oh! if it's his lordship's wish, of course! Only things is very well as they are, and needs no mending, thank God. Only, ax pardon, sir. You see, we don't generally allow no interfering on our pier without lave, an, the pier being ours, we pays for the repairing. So if his lordship intends making of alterations, he'd better to have spoken to us first.'

'Alterations?' said Claude, laughing, 'the plan is fu too pretty to need any improvement.'

'Glad you think so, an! But whatever be you arter here?'

'Taking views! I'm a painter, an artist! I'll take your portrait, if you like!'

said Claude, laughing more and more.

'Bless my heart, what rules we be!'

'Tis a painter gentleman, lads!'

reared he

'What on earth did you take me for? A Russian spy?'

The older shook his head, grinned solemnly, and peace was concluded. 'We're old-fashioned folks here, you see, sir, and don't like no new-fangled meddlesomenes. You'll excuse us, you're very welcome to do what you like, and glad to see you here.' And the old fellow made a stately bow, and moved away.

'No, no! you must stay and have your portrait taken, you'll make a fine picture.'

'Hum, might ha', they used to say, thirty years ago, I'm over old now. Still, my old woman might like it. Make so bold, an, but what's your charge?'

'I charge nothing. Five minutes' talk with an honest man will pay me.'

'Hum, if you'd a let me pay you, sir, well and good, but I cannt take up your time for nought, that's not fair.'

However, Claude prevailed, and in ten minutes he had all the sailors on the quay round him, and one after another came forward blushing and grinning to be 'taken off.' Soon the children gathered round, and when Valentin and Major Campbell came on the pier, they found Claude in the midst of a ring of little dark-haired angels, while a dozen honest fellows grinned when their own visages appeared, and chaffed each other about the sweethearts who were to keep them while they were out at sea. And in the midst little Claude laughed and joked, and told gaudy stories, and gave himself up, the simple, sunny-hearted fellow, to the pleasure of pleasing, till he earned from one and all the character of 'the pleasant-spokenest gentleman that was ever into the town.'

'Here's her ladyship' make room for her ladyship!'

But Claude held up a warning hand. He had just arranged a masterpiece—half a dozen of the prettiest children, sitting beneath a broken boat, on spars, sails, blocks, lobster-pots, and what not, arranged in picturesque confusion, while the black bearded seakings round were promising them rock and bulis-eyes, if they would only sit still like 'gudlo munks.'

But at Valentin's coming the children all looked round, and jumped up and cried, and then were at wad to sit down again.

'You have spoilt my group, Miss St Just, and you must mend it!'

Valentin caught the humour, regrouped them all forthwith, and then placed herself in front of them by Claude's side.

'Now, be good children! Look straight at me, and listen!'

And sitting up in a finger, she began to sing the first song of which she could think, 'The Lamenting of the Pilgrim Fathers.'

She had no need to bid the children look at her and listen, for not only they, but every face upon the pier was fixed upon her, breathless, spell-bound, at once by her magnificent beauty and her magnificent voice, as up rose, leaping into the clear summer air, and rolling away over the still blue sea, that glorious melody which has now become the national anthem to the noblest part of the New World. Honour to woman, and honour to old England, that from Felicia Hemans came the song which will last, perhaps, when modern Europe shall have shared the fate of ancient Rome and Greece!

Valentin's singing was the reflex of her own character, and therefore, perhaps, all the more fitted to the song, the place, and the audience. It was no modest crooning voice, tender, suggestive, trembling with suppressed emotion, such as, even though narrow in compass, and dull in quality, will touch the deepest fibres of the heart, and, as delicate scents will sometimes do, wake up long-forgotten dreams, which seem memories of some antenatal life.

It was clear, rich, massive, of extraordinary compass, and yet full of all the graceful ease, the amiablemishmish, of perfect physical health, and strength, and beauty, and there had been a trace of effort in it, it might have been accused of 'travura' but there was no need of effort where nature had bestowed already an all but perfect organ, and all that was left for science was to teach not power, but control. Above all, it was a voice which you trusted, after the first three notes you felt that that perfect ear, that perfect throat, could never, even by the thousandth part of a note, fall short of melody.

and you gave your soul up to it, and cast yourself upon it, to bear you up and away, like a fairy steed, whither it would, down into the abysses of sadness, and up to the highest heaven of joy, as did those wild and rough, and yet tender-hearted and imaginative men that day, while every face spoke new delight, and hung upon those glorious notes—

'As one who drinks from a charmed cup Of sparkling, and foaming, and murmuring wine—and not one of them, had he had the gift of words, but might have said with the poet—

'I have no life, Constantia, now but thee,
While, like the world-surrounding air, thy song
Flows on, and fills all things with melody
Now is thy voice tempest swift and strong,
On which, like one in a trance upborne,
Secure o'er rocks and waves I sweep,
Rejoicing like a cloud of morn
Now 'tis the breath of summer night,
Which, when the starry waters sleep
Round western isles, with lucense blossoms bright,
Languering, suspends my soul in its voluptuous flight.'

At last it ceased and all men drew their breaths once more, while a low murmur of admiration ran through the crowd, too well-bred to applaud openly, as they longed to do.

'Did you ever hear the like of that, Gentleman Jan?'

'Or see? I used to say no one could hold a candle to our Grace, but she—she looked like a born queen all the time!'

'Well, she belongs to us, too, so we've a right to be proud of her. Why, here's our Grace all the while!'

True enough, Grace has been standing among the crowd all the while, rapt, like them, her eyes fixed on Valentin, and full, too, of tears. They had been called up first by the melody itself, and then, by a chain of thought peculiar to Grace, by the faces round her.

'Ah! if Grace had been here!' cried one, 'we'd have had her dra'd off in the midst of the children.'

'Ah! that would ha' been as nat'ral as life!'

'Silence, you!' says Gentleman Jan, who generally feels a mission to teach the rest of the quay good manners. 'Tis the gentleman's pleasure to settle who he'll dra' off, and not werr'n.'

To which abnormal possessive pronoun Claude rejoined—

'Not a bit! whatever you like. I could not have a better figure for the centre. I'll begin again.'

'Oh, do come and sit among the children, Grace!' says Valentin.

'No, thank your ladyship.'

Valentin began urging her; and many a voice round, old as well as young, backed the entreaty.

'Excuse me, my lady,' and she slipped into the crowd; but as she went she spoke low, but clear enough to be heard by all. 'No, it will be time enough to flatter me, and ask for my picture, when you do what I tell you—what God tells you!'

'What's that, then, Grace dear?'

'You know! I've asked you to save your own lives from cholera, and you have not the common sense to do it. Let me go home and pray for you!'

There was an awkward silence among the men, till some fellow said—

'She's gone mad after that doctor, I think, with his muck-hunting notions.'

And Grace went home, to await the hour of afternoon school.

'What a face!' said Mellot.

'Is it not? Come and see her in her school, when the children go in at two o'clock. Ah! there are Scoutbush and Saint Père.'

'We are going to the school, my lord. Don't you think that, as patron of things in general here, it would look well if you walked in, and signified your full approbation of what you know nothing about?'

'So much so, that I was just on my way there with Campbell. But I must just speak to that lime-burning fellow. He wants a new lease of the kiln, and I suppose he must have it. At least, here he comes, running at me open-mouthed, and as dry as his own waistband. It makes one thirsty to look at him. I'll catch you up in five minutes!'

So the three went off to the school.

Grace was telling, in her own sweet way, that charming story of the Three Trouts, which, by the bye, has been lately pirated (as many things are) by a religious author, whose book differs sufficiently from the liberal and wholesome morality of the true author of the tale.

'What a beautiful story, Grace!' said Valentin. 'You will surpass Hans Andersen some day.'

Grace blushed, and was silent a moment.

'It is not my own, my lady.'

'Not your own? I should have thought that no one but you and Andersen could have made such an ending to it.'

Grace gave her one of those beseeching, half reproachful looks, with which she always answered praise, and then—'Would you like to hear the children repeat a hymn, my lady?'

'No. I want to know where that story came from.'

Grace blushed and stammered.

'I know where,' said Campbell. 'You need not be ashamed of having read the book, Miss Harvey. I doubt not that you took all the good from it, and none of the harm, if harm there be.'

Grace looked at him, at once surprised and relieved.

'It was a foolish romance-book, sir, as you seem to know. It was the only one which I ever read, except Hans Andersen's—which are not romances, after all. But the beginning was so full of God's truth, sir—romance though it was—and gave me such precious new light about educating children, that I was led on unawares. I hope I was not wrong.'

'This schoolroom proves that you were not.'

said Campbell. } "To the pure, all things are pure."

"What is this mysterious book? I must know!" said Valentinia.

"A very noble romance, which I made Mellot read once, containing the ideal education of an English nobleman in the middle of the last century."

"The Fool of Quality!" said Mellot. "Of course! I thought I had heard the story before. What a well-written book it is, too, in spite of all extravagance and prolixity. And how wonderfully ahead of his generation the man who wrote it, in politics as well as in religion!"

"I must read it," said Valentinia. "You must lend it me, Saint Père."

"Not yet, I think."

"Why?" whispered she, pointing. "I suppose I am not as pure as Grace Harvey?"

"She has the children to educate, who are in daily contact with coarse sins, of which you know nothing—of which she cannot help knowing. It was written in an age when the morals of our class (more shame to us) were on the same level with the morals of her class now. Let it alone. I often have fancied I should edit a corrected edition of it. When I do, you shall read that."

"Now, Miss Harvey," said Mellot, who had never taken his eyes off her face, "I want to turn schoolmaster, and give your children a drawing lesson. Get your slates, all of you!"

And taking possession of the black board and a piece of chalk, Claude began sketching them imps and angels, dogs and horses, till the school rang with shrieks of delight.

"Now," said he, wiping the board, "I'll draw something, and you shall copy it."

And without taking off his hand, he drew a single line, and a profile head sprang up, as if by magic, under his firm, unerring touch.

"Somebody!" "A lady!" "No, 'taint, 'tis schoolmistress!"

"You can't copy that, I'll draw you another face." And he sketched a full face on the board.

"That's my lady!" "No, it's schoolmistress again!" "No, it's not!"

"Not quite sure, my dears!" said Claude, half to himself. "Then here!" and wiping the board once more, he drew a three-quarters face, which elicited a shout of approbation.

"That's schoolmistress, her very self!"

"Then you cannot do anything better than try and draw it. I'll show you how." And going over the lines again, one by one, the crafty Claude pretended to be giving a drawing lesson, while he was really studying every feature of his model.

"If you please, my lady," whispered Grace to Valentinia; "I wish the gentleman would not."

"Why not?"

"Oh, madam, I do not judge any one else. but why should this poor perishing flesh be put into a picture? We wear it but for a little while, and are blessed when we are rid of its burden."

Why wish to keep a copy of what we long to be delivered from?"

"It will please the children, Grace," said Valentinia, puzzled. "See how they are all trying to copy it, from love of you!"

"Who am I? I want them to do things from love of God. No, madam, I was pained (and no offence to you) when I was asked to have my likeness taken on the quay. There's no sin in it, of course, but let those who are going away to sea, and have friends at home, have their pictures taken, not one who wishes to leave behind her no likeness of her own, only Christ's likeness in these children, and to paint Him to other people, not to be painted herself. Do ask him to rub it out, my lady!"

"Why, Grace, we were all just wishing to have a likeness of you. Every one has their picture taken for a remembrance."

"The saints and martyrs never had theirs, as far as I ever heard, and yet they are not forgotten yet. I know it is the way of great people like you. I saw your picture once, in a book Miss Heale had, and did not wonder, when I saw it, that people wished to remember such a face as yours, and since I have seen you, I wonder still less."

"My picture? where?"

"In a book, The Book of Beauty, I believe they called it."

"My dear Grace," said Valentinia, laughing and blushing, "if you ever looked in your glass, you must know that you are quite as worthy of a place in The Book of Beauty as I am."

Grace shook her head with a serious smile. "Every one in their place, madam. I cannot help knowing that God has given me a gift, but why, I cannot tell. Certainly not for the same purpose as He gave it to you for—a simple country girl like me. If He have any use for it, He will use it, as He does all His creatures, without my help. At all events it will not last long, a few years more, perhaps a few months, and it will be food for worms, and then people will care as little about my looks as I care now. I wish, my lady, you would stop the gentleman!"

"Mr Mellot, draw the children something simpler, please, a dog or a cat." And she gave Claude a look which he obeyed.

Valentinia felt in a more solemn mood than usual as she walked home that day.

"Well," said Claude, "I have here every line and shade, and she cannot escape me. I'll go on board, and paint her right off from memory, while it is fresh. Why, here come Scoutbush and the major."

"Miss Harvey," said Scoutbush, trying, as he said to Campbell, "to look as grand as a sheep-dog among a pack of fox-hounds, and very thankful all the while he had no tail to be bitten off,"—"Miss Harvey, I—we—have heard a great deal in praise of your school, and so I thought I should like to come and see it."

"Would your lordship like to examine the children?" says Grace, curtsying to the ground.

"No—thanks—that is—I have no doubt you teach them all that's right, and we are exceedingly gratified with the way in which you conduct the school. I say, Val,' cried Scoutbush, who could support the part of patron no longer, 'what pretty little ducks they are, I wish I had a dozen of them! Come you here!' and down he sat on a bench, and gathered a group round him.

'Now, are you all good children? I'm sure you look so!' said he, looking round into the bright pure faces, fresh from heaven, and feeling himself the nearer heaven as he did so. 'Ah! I see Mr. Mellot's been drawing you pictures. He's a clever man, a wonderful man, isn't he? I can't draw you pictures, nor tell you stories, like your schoolmistress. What shall I do?'

'Sing to them, Fred!' said Valentinia.

And he began warbling a funny song, with a child on each knee, and his arms round three or four more, while the little faces looked up into his, half awe-struck at the presence of a live lord, half longing to laugh, but not sure whether it would be right.

Valentinia and Campbell stood close together, exchanging looks.

'Dear fellow!' whispered she, 'so simple and good when he is himself! And he must go to that dreadful war!'

'Never mind. Perhaps by this very act he is earning permission to come back again, a wiser and a more useful man.'

'How then?'

'Is he not making friends with angels who always behold our Father's face? At least he is showing capabilities of good, which God gave, and which therefore God will never waste.'

'Now, shall I sing you another song?'

'Oh yes, please!' rose from a dozen little mouths.

'You must not be troublesome to his lordship,' says Grace.

'Oh no, I like it. I'll sing them one more song, and then—I want to speak to you, Miss Harvey.'

Grace curtsied, blushed, and shook all over. What could Lord Scoutbush want to say to her?

That indeed was not very easy to discover at first; for Scoutbush felt so strongly the oddity of taking a pretty young woman into his counsel on a question of sanitary reform, that he felt mightily inclined to laugh, and began beating about the bush in a sufficiently confused fashion.

'Well, Miss Harvey, I am exceedingly pleased with—with what I have seen of the school—that is, what my sister tells, and the clergyman—'

'The clergyman?' thought Grace, surprised, as she well might be, at what was entirely an impromptu invention of his lordship's.

'And—and—there is ten pounds towards the school, and—and, I will give an annual subscription the same amount.'

'Mr. Headley receives the subscriptions, my lord,' said Grace, drawing back from the proffered note.

'Of course,' quoth Scoutbush, trusting again to an impromptu; 'but this is for yourself' small mark of our sense of your—your usefulness.'

If any one has expected that Grace is about to conduct herself, during this interview, in any wise like a prophetic, tragically queen, or other exalted personage, to stand upon her native independence, and securing the bounty of an aristocrat, to read the said aristocrat a lecture on his duties and responsibilities, as landlord of Aberlva town; then will that person be altogether disappointed. It would have looked very well, doubtless, but it would have been equally untrue to Grace's womanhood, and to her notions of Christianity. Whether all men were or were not equal in the sight of Heaven, was a notion which had never crossed her mind. She knew that they would all be equal in heaven, and that was enough for her. Meanwhile, she found lords and ladies on earth, and seeing no open sin in the fact of their being richer and more powerful than she was, she supposed that God had put them where they were, and she accepted them simply as facts of His kingdom. Of course they had their duties, as every one has, but what they were she did not know, or care to know. To their own master they stood or fell. Her business was with her own duties, and with her own class, whose good and evil she understood by practical experience. So when a live lord made his appearance in her school, she looked at him with vague wonder and admiration, as a being out of some other planet, for whom she had no gauge or measure; she only believed that he had vast powers of doing good unknown to her, and was delighted by seeing him condescend to play with her children. The truth may be degrading, but it must be told. People, of course, who know the hollowness of the world, and the vanity of human wealth and honour, and are accustomed to live with lords and ladies, see through all that, just as clearly as any American republican does, and care no more about walking down Pall Mall with the Marquis of Carabas, who can get them a place or a living, than with Mr. Two-shoes, who can only borrow ten pounds of them; but Grace was a poor simple West-country girl, and as such we must excuse her, if, curtsying to the very ground, with tears of gratitude in her eyes, she took the ten-pound note, saying to herself, 'Thank the Good Lord! This will just pay mother's account at the mill.'

Likewise we must excuse her if she trembled a little, being a young woman—though being also a lady, she lost no jot of self-possession—when his lordship went on in as important a tone as he could—

'And—and I hear, Miss Harvey, that you have a great influence over these children's parents.'

'I am afraid some one has misinformed your lordship,' said Grace, in a low voice.

'Ah!' quoth Scoutbush, in a tone meant to be reassuring; 'it is quite proper in you to say so. What eyes she has! and what hair! and what hands, too!' (This was, of course, spoken mentally) 'But we know better, and we want you to speak to the sin, whenever you can, about keeping their homes clean, and all that, in case the cholera should come.' And Scoutbush stopped. It was a quaint errand enough, and besides, as he told Mellot frankly, 'I could think of nothing but those wonderful eyes of hers, and how like they were to La Signora's.'

Grace had been looking at the ground all the while. Now she threw upon him one of her sudden, startled looks, and answered slowly, as her eyes dropped again—

'I have, my lord, but they will not listen to me.'

'Won't listen to you? Then to whom will they listen?'

'To God, when He speaks Himself,' said she, still looking on the ground. Scoutbush winced uneasily. He was not accustomed to solemn words, spoken so solemnly.

'Do you hear this, Campbell? Miss Harvey has been talking to those people already, and they won't hear her.'

'Miss Harvey, I dare say, is not astonished at that. It is the usual fate of those who try to put a little common sense into their fellow-men.'

'Well, and I shall, at all events, go off and give them my mind on the matter, though I suppose' (with a glance at Grace) 'I can't expect to be heard where Miss Harvey has not been.'

'Oh, my lord,' cried Grace, 'if you would but speak ---' And then she stopped, for was it her place to tell him his duty? No doubt he had wiser people than her to counsel him.

But the moment the party left the school, Grace dropped into her chair, her head fell on the table, and she burst into an agony of weeping, which brought the whole school round her.

'Oh, my darlings! my darlings!' cried she at last, looking up, and clasping them to her by twos and threes, 'is there no way of saving you? No way? Then we must make the most haste to be good, and be all ready when Jesus comes to take us.' And shaking off her passion with one strong effort, she began teaching those children as she had never taught them before, with a voice, a look, as of Stephen himself when he saw the heavens opened.

For that burst of weeping was the one single overflow of long pent passion, disappointment, and shame.

She had tried, indeed. Ever since Tom's conversation and Frank's sermon had poured in a flood of new light on the meaning of epidemics, and bodily misery, and death itself, she had been working as only she could work, exhorting, explaining, coaxing, warning, entreating with tears, offering to perform with her own hands the most sickening offices, to become, if no one else would, the common scavenger of the town. There was no depth to which, in her noble enthusiasm, she would not have gone down. And behold, it had been utterly in vain! Ah! the bitter disappointment of finding her influence fail her utterly, the first time that it was required for a great practical work! They would let her talk to them about their souls, then! They would even amend a few sins here and there, of which they had been all along as well aware as she. But to be convinced of a new sin, to have their laziness, pride, covetousness, touched, that, she found, was what they would not hear, and where she had expected, if not thanks, at least a fair hearing, she had been met with peevishness, ridicule, even anger and insult.

Her mother had turned against her. 'Why would she go getting a bad name from every one, and driving away customers?' The preachers, who were (as is but too common in West country villages) narrow, ignorant, and somewhat miscrepulous men, turned against her. They had considered the cholera, if it was to come, as so much spiritual capital for themselves, an occasion which they could 'improve' into a sensation, perhaps a 'revival', and to explain it upon mere physical causes was to rub them of their harvest. Coarse viages went even further still, and dared to ask her 'whether it was the climate or the doctor she was setting her cap at, for she never had anything in her mouth now but what they had said?' And those words went through her heart like a sword. Was she disinterested? Was not love for Thurnall, the wish to please him, mingling with all her earnestness? And again, was not self-love mingling with it? and mingling, too, with the disappointment, even indignation, which she felt at having failed? Ah—what hidden spots of self-conceit, vanity, pharisaic pride, that bitter trial laid bare, or seemed to lay, till she learned to thank her unseen Guide even for it!

'Perhaps she had more reason to be thankful for her humiliation than she could suspect, with her narrow knowledge of the world. Perhaps that sudden downfall of her fancied queenship was needed, to slant her out, once and for all, from that downward path of spiritual intoxication, followed by spiritual knavery, which, as has been hinted, was but too easy for her.'

But meanwhile the whole thing was but a fresh misery. To bear the burden of Cassandra day and night, seeing in fancy—which yet was truth—the black shadow of death hanging over that doomed place, to dream of whom it might sweep off—perhaps, worst of all, her mother, unconfessed and impotent!

Too dreadful! And dreadful, too, the private troubles which were thickening fast, and which seemed, instead of drawing her mother to her side, to estrange her more and more, for some mysterious reason. Her mother was heavily in debt. Thus ten pounds of Lord Scoutbush's would certainly clear off the miller's bill. Her scanty quarter's salary, which was just due, would clear off a little more. But there was a long-standing account of the wholesale grocer's for five- and twenty pounds, for which Mrs Harvey had given a two months' bill. That bill would become due early in September, and how to meet it, neither mother nor daughter knew, it lay like a black plague-spot on the future, only surpassed in horror by the cholera itself.

It might have been three or four days after, that Claude, lounging after breakfast on deck, was hailed from a dingy, which contained Captain Willis and Gentleman Jan.

'Might we take the liberty of coming aboard to speak with your honour?'

'By all means!' and up the side they came, their faces evidently big with some great purpose, and each desirous that the other should begin.

'You speak, captain,' says Jan, 'you're oldest,' and then he began himself. 'If you please, sir, we've come on a sort of deputation—Why don't you tell the gentleman, captain?'

Willis seemed either doubtful of the success of his deputation or not over desirous thereof, for, after trying to put John Beer forward as spokesman, he began—

'I'm sorry to trouble you, sir, but these young men will have it so—and no shame to them—on a matter which I think will come to nothing. But the truth is, they have heard that you are a great painter, and they have taken it into their heads to ask you to paint a picture for them.'

'Not to ask you a favour, sir, mind!' interrupted Jan, 'we'd soon be so forward, we'll subscribe and pay for it, in course, any price in reason. There's forty and more promised already.'

'You must tell me first what the picture is to be about,' said Claude, puzzled and amused.

'Why didn't you, tell the gentleman, captain?'

'Because I think it is no use, and I told them all so from the first. The truth is, sir, they want a picture of my—of our schoolmistress, to hang up in the school or somewhere—'

'That's it, dra'ed out all natural, in paints, and her bonnet, and her shawl, and all, just like life, we was a-going to ax you to do one of they garrytypes, but she would have'n no price, besides tan't cheerful looking they sort, with your leave, too much blackamoor wise, you see, and over thick about the nozzles, most times, to my liking, so we'll pay you and welcome, all you ask.'

'Too much blackamoor wise, indeed!' said Claude, amused. 'And how much do you think I should ask?'

No answer.

'We'll settle that presently. Come down into the cabin with me.'

'Why, sir, we couldn't make so bold His lordship—'

'Oh, his lordship's on shore, and I am skipper for the time, and if not, he'd be delighted to see two good seamen here. So come along.'

And down they went.

'Bowie, bring these gentlemen some sherry!' cried Claude, turning over his portfolio. 'Now then, my worthy friends, is that the sort of thing you want?'

And he spread on the table a water-colour sketch of Grace.

The two worthies gazed in silent delight, and then looked at each other, and then at Claude, and then at the picture.

'Why, sir,' said Willis, 'I couldn't have believed it! You've got the very smile of her, and the sadness of her too, as if you'd known her a hundred year!'

'Tis beautiful!' sighed Jan, half to himself. Poor fellow, he had cherished, perhaps, hopes of winning Grace after all.

'Well, will that suit you?'

'Why, sir, make so bold—but what we thought on was to have her drawn from head to foot, and a child standing by her like, holding to her hand, for a token as she was schoolmistress, and the pier behind, may be, to signify as she was our maid, and belonged to Abersiva.'

'A capital thought! Upon my word, you're men of taste here in the West, but what do you think I should charge for such a picture as that?'

'Name your price, sir,' said Jan, who was in high good humour at Claude's approbation.

'Two hundred guineas!'

Jan gave a long whistle.

'I told you so, Captain Beer,' said Willis, 'or ever we got into the boat.'

'Now,' said Claude, laughing, 'I've two prices, one's two hundred, and the other is just nothing, and if you won't agree to the one, you must take the other.'

'But we wants to pay, we'd take it an honour to pay, if we could afford it.'

'Then wait till next Christmas.'

'Christmas?'

'My good friend, pictures are not painted in a day. Next Christmas, if I live, I'll send you what you shall not be ashamed of, or she either, and do you club your money and put it into a handsome gold frame.'

'But, sir,' said Willis, 'this will give you a sight of trouble, and all for our fancy.'

'I like it, and I like you.' You're fine fellows, who know a noble creature when God sends her to you, and I should be ashamed to ask a farthing of your money. There, no more words!'

'Well, you are a gentleman, sir,' said Gentleman Jan.

'And so are you,' said Claude. 'Now I'll show you some mere sketches.'

'I should like to know, sir,' asked Willis, 'how you got at that likeness. She would not hear of the thing, and that's why I had no liking to come troubling you about nothing.'

Claude told them, and Jan laughed heartily, while Willis said—

'Do you know, sir, that's a relief to my mind. There is no sin in being drawn, of course, but I didn't like to think my maid had changed her mind, when once she'd made it up.'

So the deputation retired in high glee, after Willis had entrusted Claude and Beer to keep the thing a secret from Grace.

It befell that Claude, knowing no reason why he should not tell Frank Headley, told him the whole story, as a proof of the chivalry of his parishioners, in which he would take delight.

Frank smiled, but said little, his opinion of Grace was altering fast. A circumstance which occurred a few days after altered it still more.

Scoutbush had gone forth, as he threatened, and exploded in every direction, with such effect as was to be supposed. Everybody promised his lordship to do everything. But when his lordship's back was turned, everybody did just nothing. They know very well that he could not make them do anything, and what was more, in some of the very worst cases, the evil was past remedy now, and better left alone. For the drought went on pitiless. A copper sun, a sea of glass, a brown easterly blight, day after day, while Thurnall looked grimly aloft and mystified the sailors with—

'Fine weather for the Flying Dutchman this!'

'Coffins sail fastest in a calm.'

'You'd best all out to the quay-head, and whistle for a wind: it would be an ill one that would blow nobody good just now!'

But the wind came not, nor the rain; and the cholera crept nearer and nearer while the hearts of all in Aberlha were hardened, and out of very spite against the agitators, they did less than they would have done otherwise. Even the inhabitants of the half a dozen cottages which Scoutbush, finding that they were in his own hands, whitewashed by main force, filled the town with lamentations over his lordship's tyranny. True—their pigstyes were either under their front windows, or within two feet of the wall—but to pull down a poor man's pigstye!—they might ever so well be Rooshian slaves! and all the town was on their side, for pigs were the normal inhabitants of Aberlha back-yards.

Tardrew's wrath, of course, knew no bounds, and meeting Thurnall standing at Willis's door, with Frank and Mellot, he fell upon him open-mouthed.

'Well, sir! I've a crow to pick with you.'

'Pick away!'

'What business have you meddling between his lordship and me?'

'That is my concern,' quoth Tom, who evidently was not disinclined to quarrel. 'I'm not here to give an account to you of what I choose to do.'

'I'll tell you what, sir, ever since you've been in this parish you've been meddling, you and Mr. Headley too,—I'll say it to your faces,—I'll speak the truth to any man, gentle or simple, and that ain't enough for you, but you must come over that poor half-crazed girl, to set her plaguing honest people, with telling 'em they'll all be dead in a month, till nobody can eat their suppers in peace. and that again ain't enough for you, but you must go to my lord with your—'

'Hold hard!' quoth Tom. 'Don't start two hares at once. Let's hear that about Miss Harvey again!'

'Miss Harvey? Why, you should know better than I.'

'Let's hear what you know.'

'Why, ever since that night Treboozie caught you and her together—'

'Stop!' said Tom, 'that's a lie!'

'Everybody says so.'

'Then everybody lies, that's all, and you may say I said so, and take care you don't say it again yourself. But what ever since that night?'

'Why, I suppose you come over the poor thing somehow, as you seem minded to do over every one as you can. But she's been running up and down the town ever since, preaching to 'em about windmills, and drains, and smells, and cholera, and it's being a judgment of the Lord against dirt, till she's frightened all the women so, that many's the man as has had to forbid her his house. But you know that as well as I.'

'I never heard a word of it before, but now I have, I'll give you my opinion on it. That she is a noble, sensible girl, and that you are all a set of fools who are not worthy of her, and that the greatest fool of the whole is you, Mr. Tardrew. And when the cholera comes, it will serve you exactly right if you are the first man carried off by it. Now, sir, you have given me your mind, and I have given you mine, and I do not wish to hear anything more of you. Good mornings!'

'You hold your head mighty high, to be sure, since you've had the run of his lordship's yacht.'

'If you are unpertinent, sir, you will repeat it. I shall take care to inform his lordship of this conversation.'

'My dear Thurnall,' said Headley, as Tardrew withdrew, muttering curses, 'the old fellow is certainly right on one point.'

'What then?'

'That you have wonderfully changed your tone. Who was to eat any amount of dirt, if he could but save his influence thereby?'

'I have altered my plans. I shan't stay here long, I shall just see this cholera over, and then vanish.'

'No!'

'Yes. I cannot sit here quietly, listening to the war-news. It makes me mad to be up and doing. I must eastward-ho, and see if trumps will not turn up for me at last. Why, I know the whole country, half a dozen of the languages—oh, if I could get some secret-service work! Go I must! At worst I can turn my hand to doctoring Bashibazouks.'

'My dear Tom, when will you settle down like other men?' cries Claude.

'I would now, if there was an opening at Whitbury, and low as life would be, I'd face it for my father's sake. But here I cannot stay.'

Both Claude and Headley saw that Tom had reasons which he did not choose to reveal. However, Claude was taken into his confidence that very afternoon.

'I shall make a fool of myself with that schoolmistress. I have been near enough to it a dozen times already, and this magnificent conduct of hers about the cholera has given the finishing stroke to my drama. If I stay on here, I shall marry her. I know I shall! and I won't! I'd go to-morrow, if it were not that I'm bound, for my own credit, to see the cholera safe into the town and out again.'

Tom did not hint a word of the lost money, or of the month's delay which Grace had asked of him. The month was drawing fast to a close now, however, but no sign of the belt. Still, Tom had honour enough in him to be silent on the point, even to Chat.

'By the bye, have you heard from the wanderers this week?'

'I heard from Salina this morning. Marie is very poorly, I fear. They have been at Kissingen, bathing, and are going to Bertrich; somebody has recommended the baths there.'

'Bertrich? Where's Bertrich?'

'The most delicious little nest of a place, half way up the Moselle, among the volcano craters.'

'Don't know it. Have they found that Yankee?'

'No.'

'Why, I thought Salina had a whole detective force of jets and gendres, from Boulogne to Rome.'

'Well, she has at least heard of him at Baden, and then again at Stuttgart; but he has escaped them as yet.'

'And poor Marie is breaking her heart all the while! I'll tell you what, Claude, it will be well for him if he escapes me as well as them.'

'What do you mean?'

'I certainly shan't go to the East without shaking hands once more with Marie and Salina, and if in so doing I pass that fellow, it's a pity if I don't have a snap shot at him.'

'Tom! Tom! I had hoped your duelling days were over.'

'They will be over, when one can get the law to punish such puppies, but not till then hang the fellow! What business had he with her at all, if he didn't intend to marry her?'

'I tell you, as I told you before, it is she who will not marry him.'

'And yet she's breaking her heart for him. I can see it all plain enough, Claude. She has found him out only too late. I know him—luxurious, selfish, blues, would give a thousand dollars to-morrow, I believe, like the old Roman, for a new pleasure and then amuse himself with her till he breaks her heart! Of course she won't marry him because she knows that if he found out her Quadroon blood—ah, that's it! I'll lay my life he has found it out already, and that is why he has bolted!'

Claude had no answer to give. That talk at the Exhibition made it only too probable

'You think so yourself, I see! Very well. You know that whatever I have been to others, that girl has nothing against me.'

'Nothing against you? Why, she owes you honour, life, everything.'

'Never mind that. Only when I take a fancy to begin, I'll carry it through. I took to that girl, for poor Wyse's sake, and I'll behave by her to the last as he would wish, and he who insults her, insults me. I won't go out of my way to find Stangrave. But if I do, I'll have it out!'

'Then you will certainly fight. My dearest Tom, do look into your own heart, and see whether you have not a grain or two of spite against him left. I assure you you judge him too harshly.'

'Hum—that must take its chance. At least, if we fight, we fight fairly and equally. He is a brave man. I will do him that justice—and a cool one, and used to be a sweet shot. So he has just as good a chance of shooting me, if I am in the wrong, as I have of shooting him, if he is.'

'But your father!'

'I know. That is very disagreeable, and all the more so because I am going to insure my life—a pretty premium they will make me pay!'

and if I am killed in a duel, it will be forfeited. However, the only answer to that is that either I shan't fight, or if I do, I shan't be killed. You know I don't believe in being killed, Claude.'

'Tom! Tom! The same as ever!' said Claude sadly.

'Well, old man, and what else would you have me? Nobody could ever alter me, you know, and why should I alter myself? Here I am, after all, alive and jolly, and there is old daddy, as comfortable as he ever can be on earth, and so it will be to the end of the chapter. There! let's talk of something else.'

CHAPTER XVI

(TIME AT LAST)

Now, as if in all things Tom Thurnall and John Briggs were fated to take opposite sides, Campbell lost ground with Elsley as fast as he gained it with Thurnall. Elsley had never forgiven himself for his passion that first morning. He had shown Campbell his weak side, and feared and disliked him accordingly. Besides, what might not Thurnall have told Campbell about him? And what use might not the major make of his secret? Besides, Elsley's dread and suspicion increased rapidly when he discovered that Campbell was one of those men who live on terms of peculiar intimacy with many women, whether for his own good or not, still for the good of the women concerned. For only by honest parity, and moral courage superior to that of the many, is that dangerous post earned, and women will listen to the man who will tell them the truth, however sternly, and will bow, even before a guardian angel, to the strong insight of him whom they have once learned to trust. But it is a dangerous office, after all, for laymen as well as for priest, that of father-confessor. The experience of centuries has shown that they in fact rarely exist, wherever fathers neglect their daughters, husbands their wives, wherever the average of the women cannot respect the average of the men. But the experience of centuries should likewise have taught men that the said father-confessors are no objects of envy, that their temptations to become spiritual cowards (the worst species of all cowards), if not intriguers, bullies and worse, are so extreme, that the soul which is proof against them must be either very great or very small indeed. Whether Campbell was altogether proof will be seen hereafter. But one day Elsley found out that such was Campbell's influence, and did not love him the more for the discovery.

They were walking round the garden after dinner, Scoutbush was licking his foolish lips over some commonplace tale of scandal.

'I tell you, my dear fellow, she's looked, and Mellot knows it as well as I. He saw her that night at Lady A——'s.'

'We saw the third act of the comic tragedy. The fourth is playing out now. We shall see the fifth before the winter.'

'Non sine sanguine!' said the major.

'Serve the wretched stick right, at least,' said Scoutbush. 'What right had he to marry such a pretty woman?'

'What right had they to marry her up to him?' said Claude. 'I don't blame poor January. I suppose none of us, gentlemen, would have refused such a pretty toy, if we could have afforded it as he could.'

'Whom do you blame then?' asked Elsley.

'Fathers and mothers who prate hypocritically about keeping their daughters' minds pure, and then abuse a girl's ignorance, in order to sell her to ruin. Let them keep her mind pure, in heaven's name, but let them consider themselves all the more bound in honour to use on her behalf the experience in which she must not share.'

'Well,' drawled Scoutbush, 'I don't complain of her bolting, she's a very sweet creature, and always was, but, as Longreach says,—and a very witty fellow, he is, though you laugh at him,—"If she'd kept to us, I shouldn't have minded, but as Guardsmen we must throw her over." It's an insult to the whole Guards, my dear fellow, after refusing two of us, to marry an attorney, and after all to bolt with a plunger.'

What bolting with a plunger might signify, Elsley knew not, but ere he could ask, the major rejoined, in an abstracted voice—

'God help us all! And this is the girl I recollect, two years ago, singing there in Cavendish Square, as innocent as a nestling through!'

'Poor child!' said Mellot, 'sold at first—perhaps sold again now. The plunger has bills out, and she has ready money. I know her settlements.'

'She shan't do it,' said the major quietly, 'I'll write to her to-night.'

Elsley looked at him keenly. 'You think then, sir, that you can, by simply writing, stop this intrigue?'

The major did not answer. He was deep in thought.

'I shouldn't wonder if he did,' said Scoutbush, 'two to one on his baulking the plunger!'

'She is at Lord——'s now, at those silly private theatricals. Is he there?'

'No,' said Mellot, 'he tried hard for an invitation, stooped to work me and Selina. I believe she told him that she would sooner see him in the Morgue than help him, and he is gone to the moors now, I believe.'

'There is time, then. I will write to her to-night,' and Campbell took up his hat and went home to do it.

'Ah,' said Scoutbush, taking his cigar meditatively from his mouth, 'I wonder how he does it.' It's a gift, I always say, a wonderful gift! Before he has been a week in the house, he'll have the confidence of every woman in it—and 'gad, he does it by saying the rudest things!—and the confidence of all the youngsters the week after.'

'A somewhat dangerous gift,' said Elsley dryly.

'Ah, yes, he might play tricks if he chose. But there's the wonder, that he don't. I'd answer for him with my own sister. I do every day of my life—for I believe he knows how many pins she puts into her dress—and yet there he is. As I said once in the mess room—there was a youngster there who took on himself to be witty, and talked about the stull sow supping the milk the snail! You recollect him, Mellot? the attorney's son from Brompton, who sold out— we shaved his mustaches, put a bear in his bed, and sent him home to his ma. And he said that Major Campbell might be very pious, and all that—but he'd warrant—they were the fellow's own words—that he took his lark on the sly, like other men—the snail! so I told him, I was no better than the rest, and no more I am, but if any man dared to say that the major was not as honest as his own sister, I was his man at fifteen paces, and so I am, Claude.'

All which did not increase Elsley's love to the major, conscious as he was that Lucia's confidence was a thing which he had not wholly, and which it would be very dangerous to him for any other man to have at all.

Into the drawing-room they went. Frank Headley had been asked up to tea, and he stood at the piano, listening to Valentin's singing.

As they came in, the maid came in also. 'Mr Thurnall wished to speak to Major Campbell.'

Campbell went out, and returned in two minutes somewhat hurriedly.

'Mr Thurnall wishes Lord Scoutbush to be informed at once, and I think it is better that you should all know it—that it is a painful surprise but there is a man ill in the street, whose symptoms he does not like, he says.'

'Cholera?' said Elsley

'Call him in,' said Scoutbush

'He had rather not come in, he says.'

'What! is it infectious?'

'Certainly not, if it be cholera, but—'

'He don't wish to frighten people, quite right' (with a half glance at Elsley), 'but is it cholera, honestly?'

'I fear so'

'Oh, my children!' said poor Mrs Vavasour.

'Will five pounds help the poor fellow?' said Scoutbush.

'How far off is it?' asked Elsley.

'Unpleasantly near' I was going to advise you to move at once.'

'You hear what they are saying?' asked Valentin of Frank

'Yes, I hear it,' said Frank, in a quiet meaning tone

Valentin thought that he was half pleased with the news. Then she thought him afraid, for he did not stir.

'You will go instantly, of course?'

'Of course I shall Good-bye! Do not be afraid. It is not infectious.'

'Afraid? And a soldier's sister?' said Valentin, with a toss of her beautiful head, by way of giving force to her somewhat weak logic

Frank left the room instantly, and met Thurnall in the passage

'Well, Headley, it's here before we sent for it, as bad luck usually is'

'I know. Let me go! Where is it? Whose house?' asked Frank in an excited tone

'Humph!' said Thurnall, looking intently at him, 'that is just what I shall not tell you'

'Not tell me.'

'No, you are too pale, Headley Go back and get two or three glasses of wine, and then we will talk of it'

'What do you mean? I must go instantly! It is my duty—my parishioner!'

'Look here, Headley! Are you and I to work together in this business, or are we not?'

'Why not, in heaven's name?'

'Then I want you, not for cure, but for prevention. You can do them no good when they have once got it. You may prevent dozens from having it in the next four-and-twenty hours, if you will be guided by me'

'But my business is with their souls, Thurnall.'

'Exactly, to give them the consolations of religion, as they call it. You will give them to the people who have not taken it. You may bring them safe through it by simply keeping up their spirits, while if you waste your time on poor dying wretches—'

'Thurnall, you must not talk so! I will do all you ask: but my place is at the death-bed, as well as elsewhere. These perishing souls are in my care'

'And how do you know, pray, that they are perishing?' answered Tom, with something very like a sneer 'And if they were, do you honestly believe that any talk of yours can change in five minutes character which has been forming for years, or prevent a man's going where he ought to go,—which, I suppose, is the place to which he deserves to go?'

'I do,' said Frank firmly

'Well It is a charitable and hopeful creed. My great dread was, lest you should kill the poor wretches before their time, by adding to the fear of cholera the fear of hell I caught the Methodist parson at that work an hour ago, took him by the shoulders and shot him out into the street. But, my dear Headley' (and Tom lowered his voice to a whisper), 'where-over poor Tom Beer deserved to go to, he is gone to it already He has been dead this twenty minutes.'

'Tom Beer dead? One of the finest fellows in the town! And I never sent for!'

'Don't speak so loud, or they will hear you I had no time to send for you, and if I had, I should not have sent, for he was past attending to you from the first. He brought it with him, I suppose, from C— Had had warnings for a week, and neglected them Now listen to me that man was but two hours ill, as sharp a case as I ever saw, even in the West Indies You must summon up all your good sense, and play the man for a fortnight, for it's coming on the poor souls like hell!' said Tom between his teeth, and stamped his foot upon the ground Frank had never seen him show so much feeling, he fancied he could see tears glistening in his eyes

'I will, so help me God!' said Frank

Tom held out his hand, and grasped Frank's

'I know you will You're all right at heart.

Only mind three things don't frighten them, don't tire yourself, don't go about on an empty stomach, and then we can face the worst like men And now go in, and say nothing to these people. If they take a panic, we shall have some of them down to-night as sure as fate. Go in, keep quiet, persuade them to bolt anywhere on earth by daylight to-morrow Then go home, eat a good supper, and come across to me, and if I'm out, I'll leave word where'

Frank went back again, he found Campbell, who had had his cue from Tom, urging immediate removal as strongly as he could, without declaring the extent of the danger. Valentin was for sending instantly for a fly to the nearest town, and going to stay at a watering-place some forty miles off Elsley was willing enough at heart, but hesitated, he knew not at the moment, poor fellow, where to find the money. His wife knew that she could borrow of Valentin; but she, too, was against the place. The cholera would be in the air for miles round. The journey in the hot sun would make the children sick and ill, and watering-place lodgings were such horrid holes, never ventilated, and full of smells—people caught fevers at them so often. Valentia was inclined to treat this as 'mother's nonsense', but Major Campbell said gravely that Mrs. Vavasour was perfectly right as to fact, and her arguments full of sound reason, whereon Valentia said that 'of course if Lucia thought it, Major Campbell would prove it, and there was no arguing with such Solons as he—'

Which Elsley heard, and ground his teeth. Whereon little Scoutbush cried joyfully—

'I have it, why not go by sea? Take the yacht, and go! Where? Of course, I have it again. 'Pon my word, I'm growing clever, Valentia, in spite of all your prophecies. Go up the Welsh coast. Nothing so healthy and airy as a sea voyage—sea as smooth as a mill-pond, too, and likely to be. And then land, if you like, at Port Madoc, as I meant to do, and there are my rooms at Boddelegert lying empty. Engaged then a week ago, thinking I should be there by now, so you may as well keep them aired for me. Come, Valentia, pack up your millinery! Lucia, get the cradles ready, and we'll have them all on board by twelve. Capital plan, Vavasour, isn't it? and, by Jove, what stunning poetry you will write there under Snowdon!'

'But will you not want your rooms yourself, Lord Scoutbush?' said Elsley.

'My dear fellow, never mind me. I shall go across the country, I think, see an old friend, and get some otter-hunting. Don't think of me till you're there, and then send the yacht back for me. She must be doing something, you know, and the men are only getting drunk every day here. Come—no arguing about it, or I shall turn you all out of doors into the lane, eh!'

And the little fellow laughed so good-naturedly that Elsley could not help liking him, and feeling that he would be both a fool, and cruel to his family, if he refused so good an offer, he gave in to the scheme, and went out to arrange matters while Scoutbush went out into the hall with Campbell, and scrambled into his pea-jacket, to go off to the yacht that moment.

'You'll see to them, there's a good fellow,' as they lighted their cigars at the door. 'That Vavasour is greener than grass, you know, tant pis for my poor sister.'

'I am not going.'

'Not going!'

'Certainly not, so my rooms will be at their service, and you had much better escort them yourself. It will be much less disagreeable for Vavasour, who knows nothing of commanding sailors,' or himself, thought the major, 'than finding himself master of your yacht in your absence, and you will get your fishing as you intended.'

'But why are you going to stay!'

'Oh, I have not half done with the sea-beasts here. I found two new ones yesterday.'

'Quaint old beetle-hunter you are, for a man who has fought in half a dozen battles!' and Scoutbush walked on silently for five minutes.

Suddenly he broke out—

'I cannot! By George, I cannot, and what's more, I won't!'

'What?'

'Run away. It will look so—so cowardly, and there's the truth of it, before those fine fellows down there, and just as I am come among them, too! The commander-in-chief to turn tail at the first shot! Though I can't be of any use, I know, and I should have liked a fortnight's fishing so,' said he in a dolorous voice, 'before going to be eaten up with flies at Varna—for this Crimean expedition is all moonshine.'

'Don't be too sure of that,' said Campbell. 'We shall go, and some of us who go will never come back, freely. I know those Russians better than many, and I have been talking them over lately with Thurnall, who has been in their service.'

'Has he been at Sevastopol?'

'No. Almost the only place on earth where he has not been—but from all he says, and from all I know, we are undervaluing our foes, as usual, and shall smart for it!'

'We'll lick them, never fear!'

'Yes, but not at the first round. Scoutbush, your life has been child's play as yet. You are going now to see life in earnest,—the sort of life which average people have been living, in every age and country, since Adam's fall, a life of sorrow and danger, tears and blood, mistake, confusion, and perplexity, and you will find it a very new sensation, and, at first, a very ugly one. All the more reason for doing what good deeds you can before you go, for you may have no time left to do any on the other side of the sea.'

Scoutbush was silent awhile.

'Well, I'm afraid of nothing, I hope. Only I wish one could meet this cholera face to face, as one will those Russians, with a good sword in one's hand, and a good horse between one's knees, and have a chance of giving him what he brings, instead of being kicked off by the cowardly Rocket, no one knows how, and not even from behind a turf dyke, but out of the very clouds.'

'So we all say, in every battle, Scoutbush. Who ever sees the man who sent the bullet through him? And yet we fight on. Do you not think the greatest terror, the only real terror, in any battle, is the chance shots which come from no one knows where, and hit no man can guess whom? If you go to the Crimea, as you will, you will feel what I felt at the Cape, and Cabul, and the Punjab, twenty times,—the fear of dying like a dog, one knew not how.'

'And yet I'll fight, Campbell!'

'Of course you will, and take your chance. Do so now!'

'By Jove, Campbell—I always say it—you're the most sensible man I ever met, and, by Jove, the doctor comes the next. My sister shall have the yacht, and I'll go up to Penalva.'

'You will do two good deeds at once, then,' said the major. 'You will do what is right, and you will give heart to many a poor wretch here. Believe me, Scoutbush, you will never repent of this.'

'By Jove, it always does one good to hear you talk in that way, Campbell! One feels—I don't know—so much of a man when one is with you, not that I shan't take uncommonly good care of myself, old fellow, that is but fair—but as for running away, as I said, why—why—why, I can't, and so I won't.'

'By the bye,' said the major, 'there is one thing which I have forgotten, and which they will never recollect. In the yacht victualled—with fresh meat and green stuff, I mean!'

'Whow—w—'

'I will go back, borrow a lantern, and forage in the garden, like an old campaigner. I have cut a salad with my sword before now.'

'And made it in your helmet, with macassar sauce!' And the two went their ways.

Meanwhile, before they had left the room, a notable conversation had been going on between Valentia and Headley.

Headley had re-entered the room so much paler than he went out, that everybody noticed his altered looks. Valentia chose to attribute them to fear.

'So! Are you returned from the sick man already, Mr Headley?' asked she, in a marked tone.

'I have been forbidden by the doctor to go near him at present, Miss St Just,' said he quietly, but in a sort of under voice, which hinted that he wished her to ask no more questions. A shade passed over her forehead, and she began chatting rather noisily to the rest of the party, till Elsie, her brother, and Campbell went out.

Valentia looked up at him, expecting him to go too. Mrs Vavasour began bustling about the room, collecting little valuables, and looking over her shoulders at the now unwelcome guest. But Frank leant back in a cosy arm-chair, and did not stir. His hands were clasped on his knees, he seemed lost in thought, very pale but there was a firm set look about his lips which attracted Valentia's attention. Once he looked up in Valentia's face, and saw that she was looking at him. A flush came over his cheeks for a moment, and then he seemed as unpassive as ever. What could he want there? How very gauché and rufé of him, so unlike him, too! And she said, civilly enough, to him, 'I fear, Mr Headley, we must begin packing up now.'

'I fear you must, indeed,' answered he, as if starting from a dream. He spoke in a tone, and with a look, which made both the women start, for what they meant it was impossible to doubt.

'I fear you must. I have foreseen it a long time; and so, I fear' (and he rose from his seat), 'must I, unless I mean to be very rude. You will at least take away with you the knowledge that you have given to one person's existence, at least for a few weeks, pleasure more intense than he thought earth could hold.'

'I trust that pretty compliment was meant for me,' said Lucia, half playful, half reproving.

'I am sure that it ought not to have been meant for me,' said Valentia, more downright than her sister. 'Both could see for whom it was meant, by the look of passionate worship which Frank fixed on a face which, after all, seemed made to be worshipped.'

'I trust that neither of you,' answered he quietly, 'think me impertinent enough to pretend to make love, as it is called, to Miss St Just. I know who she is, and who I am. Gentleman as I am, and the descendant of gentlemen' (and Frank looked a little proud, as he spoke, and very handsome), 'I see clearly enough the great gulf fixed between us, and I like it, for it enables me to say truth which I otherwise dare not have spoken, as a brother might say it to a sister, or a subject to a queen. Either analogy will do equally well, and equally ill.'

Frank, without the least intending it, had taken up the very strongest military position. Let a man once make a woman understand, or fancy, that he knows that he is nothing to her, and confess boldly that there is a great gulf fixed between them, which he has no mind to bridge over, and then there is little that he may not say or do, for good or for evil.

And therefore it was that Lucia answered gently, 'I am sure you are not well, Mr Headley. The excitement of the night has done too much for you.'

'Do I look excited, my dear madam?' he answered quietly, 'I assure you that I am as calm as a man must be who believes that he has but a few days to live, and trusts, too, that when he dies, he will be infinitely happier than he has ever been on earth, and lay down an office which he has never discharged otherwise than ill, which has been to him a constant source of shame and sorrow.'

'Do not speak so!' said Valentia, with her Irish impetuous generosity, 'you are unjust to yourself. We have watched you, felt for you, honoured you, even when we differed from you.'—What more she would have said, I know not, but at that moment Elsie's peevish voice was heard calling over the stairs, 'Lucia! Lucia!'

'Oh dear! He will wake the children!' cried Lucia, looking at her sister, as much as to say, 'how can I leave you?'

'Run, run, my dear creature!' said Valentia, with a self-confident smile, and the two were left alone.

The moment that Mrs Vavasour quitted the room there vanished from Frank's face that intense look of admiration which had made even Valentia uneasy. He dropped his eyes, and his voice faltered as he spoke again. He acknowledged the change in their position, and Valentia saw that he did so, and liked him the better for it.

'I shall not repeat, Miss St Just, now that we are alone, what I said just now of the pleasure which I have had during the last month. I am not poetical, or given to strong metaphors together, and I could hardly go over the same dull words once more. But I could ask, if I were not asking too much, leave to prolong at least a shadow of that pleasure to the last moment. That I shall die shortly, and of this cholera, is with me a fixed idea, which nothing can remove. No, madam—it is useless to combat it! But had I anything, by which to the last moment I could bring back to my fancy what has been its sunlight for so long, even if it were a scrap of the hem of your garment, ay, a grain of dust off your feet—God forgive me! He and His mercy ought to be enough to keep me up—but one's weakness may be excused for clinging to such slight floating straws of comfort.'

Valentia paused, startled, and yet affected. How she had played with this deep pure heart! And yet, was it true? Did he wish, by exciting her pity, to trick her into giving him what he might choose to consider a token of affection?

And she answered, coldly enough—

'I should be sorry, after what you have just said, to chance hurting you by refusing. I put it to your own good feeling—have you not asked somewhat too much?'

'Certainly too much, madam, in any common case,' said he, quite unmoved. 'Certainly too much, if I asked you for it, as I do not, as the token of an affection which I know well you do not, cannot feel. But—take my words as they stand—were you to—it would be returned if I die, in a few weeks, and returned still sooner if I live. And, madam,' said he, lowering his voice, 'I vow to you, before Him who sees us both, that, as far as I am concerned, no human being shall ever know of this fact.'

Frank had at last touched the wrong chord.

'What, Mr Headley? Can you think that I am to have secrets in common with you, or with any other man? No, sir! If I granted your request, I should avow it as openly as I shall refuse it.'

And she turned sharply toward the door.

Frank Headley was naturally a shy man, but extreme need sometimes bestows on shy ones a miraculous readiness—(oh, why, in the long run, do the shy men win the best wives? which is a fact, and may be proved by statistics, at least as well as anything else can) so he quietly stepped to Valentia's side, and said in a low voice—

'You cannot avow the refusal half as proudly as I shall avow the request, if you will but wait till your sister's return. Both are unnecessary, I think: but it will only be an honour to me to confess that, poor curate as I am—'

'Hush!' and Valentia walked quietly up to the table, and began turning over the leaves of a book, to gain time for her softened heart and puzzled brain.

In five minutes Frank was beside her again. The book was Tompkins's Princess. She had wandered—who can tell why?—to that last exquisite scene, which all know, and as Valentia read, Frank quietly laid a finger on the book, and arrested her eyes at last.

'If you be, what I think you, some sweet dream,

Stoop down, and seem to kiss me ere I die!'

Valentia shut the book up hurriedly and angrily. A moment after she had made up her mind what to do, and with the slightest gesture in the world, motioned Frank proudly and coldly to follow her back into the window. Had she been a country girl, she would have avoided the ugly matter, but she was a woman of the world enough to see that she must, for her own sake and his, talk it out reasonably.

'What do you mean, Mr Headley? I must ask! You told me just now that you had no intention of making love to me.'

'I told you the truth,' said he, in his quiet impassive voice. 'I fixed on these lines as a pis aller, and they have done all, and more than I wished, by bringing you back here for at least a moment.'

'And do you suppose—you speak like a rational man, therefore I must treat you as one that I can grant your request?'

'Why not? It is an uncommon one. If I have guessed your character aright, you are able to do uncommon things. Had I thought you enslaved by etiquette, and by the fear of a world which you can make bow at your feet if you will, I should not have asked you. But' and here his voice took a tone of deepest earnestness—'grant it only grant it, and you shall never repent it. Never, never, never will I cast one shadow over a light which has been so glorious, so life-giving, which I watched with delight, and yet love without regret. Go your way, and God be with you! I go mine, grant me but a fortnight's happiness, and then let what will come!'

He had conquered. The quiet earnestness of the voice, the child-like simplicity of the manner, of which every word conveyed the most delicate flattery—yet, she could see, without intending to flatter, without an afterthought—all these had won the imperious Irish nature. For all the dukes and marquises in Belgrave she would not have done it, for they would have meant more than they said, even when they spoke more charmingly; but for the plain country curate she hesitated, and asked herself, 'What shall I give him?'

The rose from her bosom? No. That was too significant at once, and too commonplace, besides, it might wither, and he find an excuse for not restoring it. It must be something valuable, stately, formal, which he must needs return. And she drew off a diamond hoop, and put it quietly into his hand.

'You promise to return it?'

'I promised long ago.'

He took it, and lifted it—she thought that he was going to press it to his lips. Instead, he put it to his forehead, bowing forward, and moved it slightly. She saw that he made with it the sign of the Cross.

'I thank you,' he said, with a look of quiet gratitude. 'I expected as much, when you came to understand my request. Again, thank you!' and he drew back humbly, and left her there alone, while her heart smote her bitterly for all the foolish encouragement which she had given to one so tender, and humble, and delicate and true.

And so did Frank Headley get what he wanted, by that plain earnest simplicity, which has more power (let worldlings pride themselves as they will on their knowledge of women) than all the cunning wiles of the most experienced rake, and only by asking which, after all, can the rake conquer. It was a strange thing for Valentin to do, no doubt, but the strange things which are done in the world (which are some millions daily) are just what keep the world alive.

CHAPTER XVII

BAALZEBUB'S BANQUET

THE next day there were three cholera cases, the day after there were thirteen.

He had come at last, Baalzebub, god of flies, and of what flies are bred from, to visit his self-blinded worshippers, and bestow on them his own Cross of the Legion of Dishonour. He had come suddenly, capriciously, sportively, as he sometimes comes, as he had come to Newcastle the summer before, while yet the rest of England was untouched. He had wandered all but harmless about the West-country that summer, as if his maw had been full glutted five years before, when he sat for many a week upon the Dartmoor hills, amid the dull brown haze, and sunburnt bents, and dried-up water-courses of white dusty granite, looking far and wide over the plague-struck land, and listening to the dead-bell booming all day long in Tavistock churchyard. But he was come at last, with appetite more fierce than ever, and had darted aside to seize on Aberlona, and not to let it go till he had sucked his fill.

And all men moved about the streets slowly, fearfully, conscious of some awful unseen presence, which might spring on them from round every corner, some dreadful inevitable spell, which lay upon them like a nightmare weight; and walked to and fro warily, looking anxiously into each other's faces, not to ask, 'How are you?' but 'How am I?' 'Do I look as if—?' and glanced up ever and anon restlessly, as if they expected to see, like the Greeks, in their tainted camp by Troy, the pitiless Sun-god shooting his keen arrows down on beast and man.

All night long the curdled cloud lay low upon the hills, wrapping in its hot blanket the sweltering breathless town, and rolled off suddenly when the sun rose high, to let him pour down his glare, and quicker into evil life all evil things. For Baalzebub is a sunny fiend, and loves not storm and tempest, thunder, and lashing rains, but the dead bright sun, and broad blue sky, under which he can take his pastime merrily, and laugh at all the shame and agony below, and, as he did at his great banquet in New Orleans once, madden all hearts the more by the contrast between the pure heaven above and the foul hell below.

And up and down the town the foul fiend sported, now here, now there, snapping daintily at unexpected victims, as if to make confusion worse confounded, to belie Thurnall's theories and prognostics, and harden the hearts of fools by fresh excuses for believing that he had nothing to do with drains and water, that he was 'only'—such an only—the Visitation of God.

He has taken old Beer's second son, and now he clutches at the old man himself, then across the street to Gentleman Jan, his eldest; but he is driven out from both houses by chloride of lime and pat dust, and the colony of the Beers has peace awhile.

Alas! there are victims enough and to spare beside them, too ready for the sacrifice, and up the main street he goes unabashed, springing in at one door and at another, on either side of the street, but fondest of the western side, where the hill slopes steeply down to the house-backs.

He fleshes his teeth on every kind of prey. The drunken cobbler dies, of course, but spotless cleanliness and sobriety does not save the mother of seven children, who has been soaking her brick floor daily with water from a poisoned well, deſtined where she meant to clean. Youth does not save the buxom lass, who has been filling herself, as girls will do, with unripe fruit, nor innocence the two fair children who were sailing their feather-boats yesterday in the quay-pools, as they have sailed them for three years past, and found no hurt, pity does not save the bedridden old dame, bedridden in the lean-to garret, who moans, 'It is the Lord!' and dies. It is 'the Lord' to her, though Baalzebub himself be the angel of release.

And yet all the while sots and fools escape where wise men fall, weakly women, living amid all wretchedness, nurse, unharmed, strong men who have breathed fresh air all day. Of one word of Scripture at least Baalzebub is mindful, for 'one is taken and another left.'

Still, there is a method in his seeming madness. His eye falls on a blind alley, running back from the main street, backed at the upper end by a high wall of rock. There is a Godsend for him—a devil's-send, rather, to speak plain truth; and in he dashes; and never leaves that court, let brave Tom wrestle with him as he may, till he has taken one from every house.

That court belonged to Treluddra, the old fish-jowder. He must do something. Thurnall attacks him, Major Campbell, Headley, the neighbours join in the cry, for there is no mistaking cause and effect there, and no one bears a great love to him, besides, terrified and conscience-stricken men are glad of a scape-goat, and some of those who were his stoutest backers in the vestry are now, in their terror, the londest against him, ready to impute the whole cholera to him. Indeed, old Bear is ready to declare that it was Treluddra's fish-heaps which poisoned him and his, so, all but mobbed, the old sinner goes up—to set the houses to rights! No, to curse the whole lot for a set of jugs, and order them to clean the place out themselves, or he will turn them into the street. He is one of those base natures, whose fact only lashes into greater fury—a Pharos whose heart the Lord himself can only harden, such men there are, and women, too, grown gray in lies, to reap at last the fruit of lies. But he carries back with him to his fish-heaps a little invisible somewhat which he did not bring, and ere nightfall he is dead hideously, he, his wife, his son, and now the Beers are down again, and the whole neighbourhood of Treluddra's house is wild with disgusting agony.

Now the fiend is hovering round the fish-curing houses, but turns back, disgusted with the pure scent of the bayard, where not hides, but nets are baked, skips on board of a brig in the quay-pool, and a poor collier's prentice dies, and goes to his own place. What harm has he done? Is it his sin that, ill-fed and well-beaten daily, he has been left to sleep on board, just opposite the sewer's mouth, in a berth some four feet long by two feet high and broad?

Or is it that poor girl's sin who was just now in Heale's shop, talking to Miss Heale safe and sound, that she is carried back into it, in half an hour's time, fainting, shrieking? One must draw a veil over the too hideous details.

No, not her fault, but there, at least, the curse has not come without a cause. For she is Tardrew's daughter.

But whither have we got, How long has the cholera been in Aberslva? Five days, five minutes, or five years? How many sins have risen and set since Frank Headley put into his bosom Valentia's pledge?

It would be hard for him to tell, and hard for many more, for all the days have passed as in a fever dream. To cowards the time has seemed endless, and every moment, ere their term shall come, an age of terror, of self-reproach, of superstitious prayers and cries, which are not repentance. And to some cowards, too, the days have seemed but as a moment, for they have been drunk day and night.

Strange and hideous, yet true.

It has now become a mere commonplace, the strange power which great crises, pestilences, famines, revolutions, invasions, have to call out in their highest power, for evil and for good alike, the passions and virtues of man, how, during their stay, the most desperate recklessness, the most atrocious crime, side by side with the most heroic and unexpected virtue, are followed generally by a collapse and a moral death, alike of virtue and of vice. We should explain this nowadays, and not ill, by saying that these crises put the human mind into a state of exaltation, but the truest explanation, after all, lies in the old Bible belief, that in those times there goes abroad the unquenchable fire of God, literally kindling up all men's hearts to the highest activity, and showing, by the light of their own strange deeds, the inmost recesses of their spirits, till those spirits burn down again, self-consumed, while the chaff and stubble are left as ashes, not valueless after all, as manure for some future crop, and the pure gold, if gold there be, alone remains behind.

Even so it was in Aberslva during that fearful week. The drunkards drank more, the swearers swore more than ever, the unjust shopkeeper clutched more greedily than ever at the few last scraps of mean gain which remained for him this side the grave, the selfish wrapped themselves up more brutally than ever in selfishness, the shameless women mingled desperate debauchery with fits of frantic superstition, and all base souls cried out together, 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die!'

But many a brave man and many a weary woman possessed their souls in patience, and worked on, and found that as their day their strength should be. And to them the days seemed short indeed, for there was too much to be done in them for any vote of time.

Headley and Campbell, Grace and oh! Willis, and last, but not least, Tom Thurnall, these and three or four brave women organised themselves into a right gallant and well-disciplined band, and commenced at once a visitation from house to house, saving thereby, doubtless, many a life, but ere eight-and-forty hours were passed, the house visitation languished. It was as much as they could do to attend to the acute cases.

And little Scoutbush? He could not nurse, nor doctor, but what he could, he did. He bought and fetched all that money could procure. He galloped over to the justices, and obtained such summary powers as he could; and then, like a true Irishman, exceeded them recklessly, breaking into premises right and left, in an utterly burglarious fashion, he organised his fatigue-party, as he called them, of scavengers, and paid the cowardly clod five shillings a day each to work at removing all removable nuisances, he walked up and down the streets for hours, giving the sailors cigars from his own case, just to show them that he was not afraid, and therefore they need not be; and if it was somewhat his fault that the horse was stolen, he at least did his best after the event to shut the stable-door. The five real workers toiled on, meanwhile, in perfect harmony and implicit obedience to the all-knowing Tom, but with the most different inward feelings. Four of them seemed to forget death and danger, but each remoulded them in his own fashion.

Major Campbell longed to die, and courted death. Frank believed that he should die, and was ready for death. Grace longed to die, but knew that she should not die till she had found Tom's belt, and was content to wait. Wilks was of opinion that an 'old man must die some day, and somehow,—as good one way as another', and all his concern was to run about after his maid, seeing that she did not tire herself, and obeying all his orders with sailor-like precision and cleverness.

And Tom? He just thought nothing about death and danger at all. Always smiling, always cheerful, always busy, yet never in a hurry; he went up and down, seemingly ubiquitous. Sleep he got when he could, and food as often as he could, into the sea his leap, morning and night, and came out fresher every time, the only person in the town who seemed to grow healthier, and actually happier, as the work went on.

'You really must be careful of yourself,' said Campbell at last. 'You carry no claimed life.'

'My dear sir, I am the most cautious and selfish man in the town. I am living by rule. I have got—and what greater pleasure?—a good stand-up fight with an old enemy, and be sure I shall keep myself in condition for it. I have written off for help to the Board of Health, and I shall not be shoved against the ropes till the government man comes down.'

'And then?'

'I shall go to bed and sleep for a month. Never mind me, but mind yourself—and mind that curate, he's a noble lunk—if all persons in England were like him, I'd What's here now?'

Miss Heale came shrieking down the street.

'Oh, Mr Thurnall! Miss Tardrow! Miss Tardrow!'

'Screaming will only make you ill, too, miss. Where is Miss Tardrow?'

'In the surgery,—and my mother!'

'I expected this,' said Tom. 'The old man will go next.'

He went into the surgery. The poor girl was in collapse already. Mrs. Heale was lying on the sofa, stricken. The old man hanging over her, brandy bottle in hand.

'Put away that trash!' cried Tom, 'you've had too much already.'

'Oh, Mr Thurnall, she's dying, and I shall do too!'

'You! you were all right this morning.'

'But I shall die; I know I shall, and go to hell!'

'You'll go where you ought—and if you give way to this miserable cowardice, you'll go soon enough. Walk out, sir! Make yourself of some use, and forget your fear! Leave Mrs. Heale to me.'

The wretched old man obeyed him, utterly cowed, and went out, but not to be of use—he had been hopelessly boozy from the first—half to fortify his body against infection, half to fortify his heart against conscience. Tom had never reproached him for his share in the public folly. Indeed Tom had never reproached a single soul. Poor wretches who had insulted him had sent for him with angry shrieks. 'Oh, doctor, doctor, save me! Oh, forgive me! oh, if I'd minded what you said! Oh, don't think of what I said!' And Tom had answered cheerfully, 'Tut-tut, never mind what might have been, let's feel your pulse.'

But though Tom did not reproach Heale, Heale reproached himself. He had just conscience enough left to feel the whole weight of his abused responsibility, exaggerated and stilled by superstitious horror, and muddled tipsy, he wandered about the street, moaning that he had murdered his wife, and all the town, and asking pardon of every one he met, till seeing one of the meeting-houses open, he staggered in, in the vague hope of comfort which he knew he did not deserve.

In half an hour Tom was down the street again to Healey's. 'Where is Miss Harvey?'

'At the Beers.'

'She must go up to Heale's instantly. The mother will die. Those cases of panto seldom recover. And Miss Heale may very likely follow her. She has shrieked and sobbed herself into it, poor fool! and Grace must go to her at once, she may bring her to common sense and courage, and that is the only chance.'

Grace went, and literally talked and prayed Miss Heale into life again.

'You are an angel,' said Tom to her that very evening, when he found the girl past danger.

'Mr Thurnall!' said Grace, in a tone of sad and most meaning reproof.

'But you are! And these owls are not worthy of you.'

'This is no time for such language, sir! After all, what am I doing more than you?' And Grace went upstairs again, with a cold hard countenance which belied utterly the heart within.

That was the critical night of all. The disease seemed to have done its worst in the likeliest spots, but cases of panto increased all the afternoon, and the gross number was greater than ever.

Tom did not delay inquiring into the cause, and he discovered it. Healey, coming out the next morning, after two hours' fitful sleep, met him at the gate, his usual business-like trot was exchanged for a fierce and hurried stamp. When he saw Frank, he stopped short, and burst out into a story which was hardly intelligible, so interlarded was it with oaths.

'For Heaven's sake! Thurnall, calm yourself, and do not swear so frightfully, it is so unlike you! What can have upset you thus?'

'Why should I not curse and swear in this street,' gasped he, 'while every fellow who calls himself a preacher is allowed to do it in the pulpit with impunity? Fine him five shillings for every curse, as you might, if people had courage and common sense, and then complain of me! I am a fool, I know, though. But I cannot stand it! To have all my work undone by a brutal ignorant fanatic! It is too much! Here, if you will believe it, are those preaching follows getting up a revival, or some such invention, just to make money out of the cholera! They have got down a great gun from the county town. Twice a day they are preaching at them, telling them that it is all God's wrath against their sins, that it is impious to interfere, and that I am fighting against God, and the end of the world is coming, and they and the devil only know what. If I meet one of them, I'll wring his neck, and be hanged for it! O you parsons! you parsons! and Tom ground his teeth with rage.

'Is it possible! How did you find this out?'

'Mrs. Heale had been in, listening to their howling, just before she was taken. Heale went in when I turned him out of doors came home raving mad, and is all but blind now. Three cases of women have I had this morning, all frightened into cholera, by their own confession, by last night's tomfoolery. Came home howling, faint, and were taken before morning. One is dead, the other two will die. You must stop it, or I shall have half a dozen more to-night! Go into the meeting, and curse the cur to his face!'

'I cannot,' cried Frank, with a gesture of despair, 'I cannot!'

'Ah, your cloth forbids you, I suppose, to enter the nonconformist opposition shop!'

'You are unjust, Thurnall! What are such rules at a moment like this! I'd break them, and the bishop would hold me guiltless. But I cannot speak to these people. I have no eloquence—no readiness—they do not trust me—would not believe me—God help me!' and Frank covered his face with his hands, and burst into tears.

'Not that, for Heaven's sake!' said Tom, 'or we shall have you blind next, my good fellow. I'd go myself, but they'd not hear me, for certain, I am no Christian, I suppose, at least, I can't talk their slang—but I know who can! We'll send Campbell!'

Frank hailed the suggestion with rapture, and away they went, but they had an hour's good march from sufferer to sufferer before they found the major.

He heard them quietly. A severe gloom settled over his face. 'I will go,' said he.

At six o'clock that evening the meeting-house was filling with terrified women and half-curious, half-sneering men, and among them the tall figure of Major Campbell, in his undress uniform (which he had put on, wisely, to give a certain dignity to his mission), stalked in, and took his seat in the back benches.

The sermon was what he expected. There is no need to transcribe it. Such discourses may be heard often enough in churches as well as chapels. The preacher's object seemed to be—for some purpose or other which we have no right to judge—to excite in his hearers the utmost intensity of selfish fear, by language which certainly, as Tom had said, came under the law against profane cursing and swearing. He described the next world in language which seemed a strange jumble of Virgil's Æneid, the Koran, the dreams of those rabbi's who crucified our Lord, and of those mediæval inquisitors who tried to convert sinners (and on their own ground, neither illogically nor over-harshly) by making this world for a few hours as like as possible to what, so they held, God was going to make the world to come for ever.

At last he stopped suddenly, when he saw that the animal excitement was at the very highest, and called on all who felt 'convinced' to come forward and confess their sins.

In another minute there would have been (as there have been ere now) four or five young girls raving and tossing upon the floor, in mad terror and excitement, or, possibly, half the congregation might have rushed out (as a congregation has rushed out ere now) headed by the preacher himself, and ran headlong down to the quay-pool, with shrieks and shouts, declaring that they had cast the devil out of Betsy Peunington, and were hunting him into the sea, but Campbell saw that the madness must be stopped at once, and rising, he thundered, in a voice which brought all to their senses in a moment—

'Stop! I, too, have a sermon to preach to you, I trust I am a Christian man, and that not of last year's making, or the year before. Follow me, outside, if you be rational beings, and let me tell you the truth—God's truth! Men!' he said, with an emphasis on the word, 'you, at least, will give me a fair hearing, and you too, modest married women! Leave that fellow with the shameless hussies who like to go into fits at his feet!'

The appeal was not in vain. The soberer majority followed him out, the insane minority soon followed, in the mere hope of fresh excitement, while the preacher was fain to come also, to guard his flock from the wolf. Campbell sprang upon a large block of stone, and taking off his cap, opened his mouth, and spoke unto them.

Readers will doubtless desire to hear what Major Campbell said, but they will be disappointed, and perhaps it is better for them that they should be. Let each of them, if they think it worth while, write for themselves a discourse fitting for a Christian man, who loved and honoured his Bible too much to find in a few scattered texts, all misinterpreted, and some mistranslated, excuses for denying fact, reason, common justice, the voice of God in his own moral sense, and the whole remainder of the Bible from beginning to end.

Whatever words he spoke, they came home to those wild hearts with power. And when he paused, and looked intently into the faces of his auditory, to see what effect he was producing, a murmur of assent and admiration rose from the crowd, which had now swelled to half the population of the town. And no wonder, no wonder that, as the men were enthralled by the matter, so were the women by the manner. The grand head, like a gray granite peak against the clear blue sky, the tall figure, with all its martial stateliness and ease, the gesture of his long arm, so graceful, and yet so self-restrained, the tones of his voice, which poured from beneath that proud moustache, now tender as a girl's, now ringing like a trumpet over roof and sea. There were old men there, old beyond the years of man, who said they had never seen or heard the like; but it must be like what their fathers had told them of, when John Wesley, on the cliffs of St. Ives, out-thundered the thunder of the gale. A To Grace he seemed one of the old Scotch Covenanters of whom she had read, risen from the dead to preach there from his rock beneath the great temple of God's air, a wider and a purer creed than theirs. Frank drew Thurnall's arm through his, and whispered, 'I shall thank you for this to my dying day' but Thurnall held down his head. He seemed deeply moved. At last, half to himself—

'Humph! I believe that between this man and that girl you will make a Christian even of me some day!'

But the hush was only for a moment. For Major Campbell, looking round, discerned among the crowd the preacher, whispering and howling amid a knot of women, and a sudden lit of righteous wrath came over him.

'Stand out there, sir, you preacher, and look me in the face, if you can!' thundered he. 'We are here on common ground as free men, beneath God's heaven and God's eye. Stand out, sir, and answer me if you can, or be for ever silent!'

Half in unconscious obedience to the soldier-like word of command, half in jealous rage, the preacher stepped forward, gasping for breath.

'Don't listen to him! He is a messenger of Satan sent to damn you—a lying prophet! Let the Lord judge between me and him! Stop your ears—a messenger of Satan—a Jesuit in disguise!'

'You ho, and you know that you ho!' answered Campbell, twining slowly his long moustache, as he always did when choking down indignation. 'But you have called on the Lord to judge, so do I. Listen to me, sir! Dare you, in the presence of God, answer for the words which you have spoken this day?'

A strange smile came over the preacher's face.

'I read my title clear, sir, to mansions in the skies. Well for you if you could do the same.'

Was it only the setting sun, or was it some inner light from the depths of that great spirit, which shone out in all his countenance, and filled his eyes with awful inspiration, as he spoke, in a voice calm and sweet, sad and regretful, and yet terrible from the slow distinctness of every vowel and consonant?

'Mansions in the skies? You need not wait till then, sir, for the presence of God. Now, here, you and I are before God's judgment-seat. Now, here, I call on you to answer to Him for the innocent lives which you have endangered and destroyed, for the innocent souls to whom you have slandered their heavenly Father by your devil's doctrines this day! You have said it. Let the Lord judge between you and me. He knows best how to make His judgment manifest.'

He bowed his head awhile, as if overcome by the awful words which he had uttered, almost in spite of himself, and then stepped slowly down from the stone, and passed through the crowd, which reverently made way for him, while many voices cried, 'Thank you, sir! Thank you!' and old Captain Willis, stepping forward, held out his hand to him, a quiet pride in his gray eye.

'You will not refuse an old fighting man's thanks, sir! This has been like Elijah's day with Baal's priests on Carmel.'

Campbell shook his head in silence but turned suddenly, for another and a coarser voice caught his ear. It was Jones, the lieutenant's.

'And now, my lady, take the Methodist parson, neck and heels, and leave him into the quay-pool, to think over his ammonitions!'

Campbell went back instantly. 'No, my dear sir, let me entre it you for my sake. What has passed has been too terrible to me already; if it has done any good, do not let us spoil it by breaking the law.'

'I believe you're right, sir—but my blood is up, and no wonder. Why, where is the preacher?'

He had stood quite still for several minutes after Campbell's adjuration. He had often, perhaps, himself limited forth such words in the excitement of preaching, but never before had he heard them pronounced in spirit and in truth. And as he stood, Thurnall, who had his doctor's eye on him, saw him turn paler and more pale. Suddenly he clenched his teeth and stooped slightly forwards for a moment, drawing his breath. Thurnall walked quickly and steadily up to him.

Gentleman Ian and two other rustous fellows had already laid hold of him, more with the intention of frightening than of really ducking him.

'Don't! don't!' cried he, looking round with eyes wild—but not with terror.

'Hands off, my good lady,' said Tom quietly. 'This is my business now, not yours, I can tell you.'

And passing the preacher's arm through his own, with a serious face, Tom led him off into the house at the back of the chapel.

In two hours more he was blue, in four he was a corpse. The judgment, as usual, had needed no miracle to enforce it.

Tom went to Campbell that night, and apprised him of the fact. 'Those words of yours went through him, sir, like a Minnie bullet. I was afraid of what could happen when I heard them.'

'So was I, the moment after they were spoken. But, sir, I felt a power upon me—you may think it a fancy—that there was no resisting.'

'I dare impute no fancies, when I hear such truth and reason as you speak upon that stone, sir.'

'Then you do not blame me?' asked Campbell, with a subdued, almost deprecatory voice, such as Thimnall had never heard in him before.

'The man deserved to die, and he died, sir. It is well that there are some means left on earth of punishing offenders whom the law cannot touch.'

'It is an awful responsibility.'

'Not more awful than killing a man in battle, which we both have done, sir, and yet have felt no sting of conscience.'

'An awful responsibility still. Yet what else is life made up of, from morn to night, but of deeds which may earn heaven or hell?'

Well, as he did to others, so was it done to him. God forgive him! At least, one cause will be soon tried and judged: there is little fear of my not meeting him again soon enough. And Campbell, with a sad smile, lay back in his chair and was silent.

'My dear sir,' said Tom, 'allow me to remind you, after this excitement comes a collapse and that is not to be trifled with just now. Medicate I dare not give you. Food I must.'

Campbell shook his head.

'You must go now, my dear fellow. It is now half past ten, and I will be at Pennington's at one o'clock, to see how he goes on, so you need not go there. And, meanwhile, I must take a little medicine.'

'Major, you are not going to do for yourself?' cried Tom.

'There is a certain medicine called prayer, Mr Thimnall—an old specific for the heart-ache, as you will find one day—which I have been neglecting much of late, and which I must return to in earnest before midnight. Good-bye, God bless and keep you!'

And the major retired to his bedroom, and did not stir off his knees for two full hours. After which he went to Pennington's, and thence somewhere else, and Tom met him at four o'clock that morning nursing mind unspeakable horrors, quiet, genial, almost cheerful.

'You are a man,' said Tom to himself, 'and I fancy at times something more than a man, more than me at least.'

Tom was right in his fear that after exertment would come collapse, but wrong as to the person to whom it would come. When he arrived at the surgery door, Headley stood waiting for him.

'Anything fresh? Have you seen the Healer?'

'I have been praying with them. Don't be frightened. I am not likely to forget the lesson of this afternoon.'

'Then go to bed. It is full twelve o'clock.'

'Not yet, I hear. I want you to see old Willis. All is not right.'

'Ah! I thought the poor dear old man would kill himself. He has been working too hard, and presuming on his sailor's power of tumbling in and taking a dog's nap whenever he chose.'

'I have warned him again and again. But he was working so magnificently, that one had hardly heart to stop him. And beside, nothing would part him from his mind.'

'I don't wonder at that,' quoth Tom to himself. 'Is she with him?'

'No. He found himself ill, shipped home on some pretence, and will not hear of our tending him.'

'Noble old fellow! Caring for every one but himself to the last.' And they went in.

It was one of those rare cases, that, yet mortal, in which the person seems to seize the very centre of the life, and to preclude the chance of lingering torture, by one draining blow.

The old man lay paralysed, cold, pulseless, but quite collected and cheerful. Tom looked, inquired, shook his head, and called for a hot bath of salt and water.

'Warmth we must have somehow. Anything to keep the fire alight.'

'Why so, sir?' asked the old man. 'The fire's been flickering down this many a year. Why not let it go out quietly, at three-score years and ten? You're sure my mind don't know?'

They put him into his bath, and he revived a little.

'No, I am not going to get well, so don't you waste your time on me, sir. I'm taken while doing my duty, as I hoped to be. And I've lived to see my mind do hers, as I know she would, when the Lord called on her. I have—but don't tell her, she's well employed, and has sorrows enough already, some that you'll know of some day.'

'You must not talk,' quoth Tom, who guessed his meaning, and wished to avoid the subject.

'Yes, but I must, sir. I've no time to lose. If you'd but go and see after those poor Healers, and come again. I'd like to have one word with Mr Headley, and my time runs short.'

'A hunched, if you will,' said Frank.

'And now, sir,' when they were alone, 'only one thing, if you'll excuse an old sailor, and Willis tried vainly to make his usual salutation, but the cramped hand refused to obey, and a dying one too.'

'What is it?'

'Only don't be hard on the people, sir, the people here. They're good-hearted souls, with all their sins, if you'll only take them as you find them, and consider that they've had no chance.'

'Willis, Willis, don't talk of that! I shall be a wiser man henceforth, I trust. At least I shall not trouble Abernethy long.'

'Oh, sir, don't talk so, and you just getting a hold of them!'

'I?'

'Yes, you, sir. They've found you out at last, thank God. I always knew what you were, and said it. They've found you out in the last week and there's not a man in the town but what would die for you, I believe.'

This announcement staggered Frank. Some men it would have only hardened in their pederasty, and have emboldened them to say 'Ah! then these men see that a High Churchman can work like any one else, when there is a practical sacrifice to be made. Now I have a standing ground which no one can dispute, from which to go on and enforce my idea of what he ought to be.'

But, rightly or wrongly, no such thought crossed Frank's mind. He was just as good a churchman as ever—why not? Just as fond of his own ideal of what a parish and a church service ought to be—why not? But the only thought which did rise in his mind was one of utter self-abasement.

'Oh, how blind I have been! How I have wasted my time in laying down the law to these people, fancying myself infallible, as if God were not as near to them as He is to me certainly nearer than to any book on my shelves—offending their little prejudices, little superstitions, in my own cruel self-conceit and self-will! And now, the first time that I forget my own rules, the first time that I forget almost that I am a priest, even a Christian at all! that moment they acknowledge me as a priest, as a Christian. The moment I meet them upon the commonest human ground, helping them as one heathen would help another, simply because he was his own flesh and blood, that moment they soften to me, and show me how much I might have done with them twelve months ago, had I had but common sense!'

He knelt down and prayed by the old man, for him and for himself.

'Would it be troubling you, sir?' said the old man at last. 'But I'd like to take the sacrament before I go.'

'Of course. Whom shall I ask in?'

The old man paused awhile.

'I fear it's selfish but it seems to me I would not ask it, but that I know I'm going. I should like to take it with my maid, once more before I die.'

'I'll go for her,' said Frank, 'the moment Thurnall comes back to watch you.'

'What need to go yourself, sir? Old Sarah will go, and willing.'

Thurnall came in at that moment.

'I am going to fetch Miss Harvey. Where is she, captain?'

'At Janey Headon's, along with her two poor children.'

'Stay,' said Tom, 'that's a bad quarter, just at the fish-house back. Have some brandy before you start!'

'No! no Dutch courage!' and Frank was gone. He had a word to say to Grace Harvey, and it must be said at once.

He turned down the silent street, and turned up over stone stairs, through quaint stone galleries and balconies such as are often huddled together on the cliff sides in fishing towns, into a stifling cottage, the door of which had been set wide open, in the vain hope of fresh air. A woman met him, and clasped both his hands, with tears of joy.

'They're mending, sir! They're mending, else I'd have sent to tell you. I never looked for you so late.'

There was a gentle voice in the next room. It was Grace's.

'Ah, she's praying by them now. She's giving them all their medicines all along! Whatever I should have done without her!—and in and out all day long, too, till one fancies at times the Lord must have changed her into five or six at once, to be everywhere to the same minute.'

Frank went in, and listened to her prayer. Her face was as pale and calm as the pale, calm faces of the two worn-out babes, whose heads lay on the pillow close to hers. But her eyes were lit up with an intense glory, which seemed to fill the room with love and light.

Frank listened but would not break the spell.

At last she rose, looked round and blushed.

'I beg your pardon, sir, for taking the liberty. If I had known that you were about I would have sent—but hearing that you were gone home, I thought you would not be offended, if I gave thanks for them myself. They are my own, sir, as it were.'

'Oh, Miss Harvey, do not talk so! While you can pray as you were praying then, he who would silence you might be silencing unawares the Lord Himself!'

She made no answer, though the change in Frank's tone moved her—and when he told her his errand, that thought also passed from her mind.

At last, 'Happy, happy man!' she said calmly, and putting on her bonnet, followed Frank out of the house.

'Miss Harvey,' said Frank, as they hurried up the street, 'I must say one word to you, before we take that sacrament together.'

'Sir?'

'It is well to confess all sins before the Eucharist, and I will confess mine. I have been unjust to you. I know that you hate to be praised, so I will not tell you what has altered my opinion. But heaven forbid that I should ever do so base a thing as to take the school away from one who is far more fit to rule in it than ever I shall be!'

Grace burst into tears.

'Thank God! And I thank you, sir! Oh, there's never a storm but what some gleam breaks through it! And now, sir, I would not have told you it before, lest you should fancy that I changed for the sake of gain—though, perhaps, that is pride, as too much else has been. But you will never hear of me inside either of those chapels again.'

'What has altered your opinion of them, then?'

'It would take long to tell, sir, but what happened this morning filled the cup. I began to think, sir, that these God and mine are not the same. Though why should I judge them, who worshipped that other God myself till no such long time since, and never knew, poor fool, that the Lord's name was Love?'

'I have found out that, too, in these last days. More shame to me than to you that I did not know it before.'

'Well for us both that we do know it now, sir. For if we believed Him now, sir, to be aught but perfect love, how could we look round here to-night, and not go mad?'

'Amen!' said Frank.

And how had the pestilence, of all things on earth, revealed to these two noble souls that God is Love?

Let the reader, if he have supplied Campbell's sermon, answer the question for himself.

They went in, and upstairs to Willis.

Grace bent over the old man tenderly, but with no sign of sorrow. Dry-eyed, she kissed the old man's forehead, arranged his bed-clothes, woman-like, before she knelt down, and then the three received the sacrament together.

'Don't turn me out,' whispered Tom. 'It's no concern of mine, of course, but you are all good creatures, and somehow, I should like to be with you.'

So Tom stayed, and what thoughts passed through his heart are no concern of ours.

Frank put the cup to the old man's lips, the lips closed, sipped,—then opened. The jaw had fallen.

'Gone,' said Grace quietly.

Frank paused, awe-struck.

'Go on, sir,' said she, in a low voice. 'He hears it all more clearly than he ever did before.' And by the dead man's side, Frank finished the Communion Service.

Grace rose when it was over, kissed the calm forehead, and went out without a word.

'Tom,' said Frank, in a whisper, 'come into the next room with me.'

Tom hardly heard the tone in which the words were spoken, or he would perhaps have answered otherwise than he did.

'My father takes the Communion,' said he, half to himself. 'At least, it is beautiful old—'

Howsoever the sentence would have been finished, Tom stopped short—

'Hoy!—What does that mean?'

'At last!' gasped Frank, gently enough.

'Excuse me!' He was bowed almost double, crushing Thurnall's arm in the fierce grip of pain.

'Fish!—Hang it!'—Impossible!—There, you are all right now!'

'For the time. I can understand many things now. Curious sensation it is, though. Can you conceive a sword put in on one side of the waist, just above the hip-bone, and drawn through, handle and all, till it passes out at the opposite point?'

'I have felt it twice, and therefore you will be pleased to hold your tongue and go to bed. Have you had any warnings?'

'Yes—no—that is—this morning, but I forgot. Never mind! What matter a hundred years hence? There it is again! God help me!'

'Humph!' growled Thurnall to himself. 'I'd sooner have lost a dozen of these herring-hogs, whom nobody misses, and who are well out of their life-scapes, but the parson, just as he was making a man!'

There is no use in complaints. In half an hour Frank is screaming like a woman, though he has bitten his tongue half through to stop his screams.

CHAPTER XVIII

THE BLACK HOUND

PAIN! Let us escape anywhere for a breath of fresh air, for even the scent of a clean turf!

We have been watching saints and martyrs—perhaps not long enough for the good of our souls, but surely too long for the comfort of our bodies. Let us away up the valley, where we shall find, if not indeed a fresh healthful breeze (for the drought lasts on), at least a cool refreshing down draught from Carcarrow Moor before the sun gets up. It is just half-past four o'clock, on a glorious August morning. We shall have three hours at least before the heavens become one great Dutch-oven again.

We shall have good company, too, in our walk, for here comes Campbell fresh from his morning's swim, swinging up the silent street toward Frank Headley's lodging.

He stops, and tosses a pebble against the window-pane. In a minute or two Thurnall opens the street door and slips out to him.

'Ah, major! Overslept myself at last, that sofa is wonderfully comfortable. No time to go down and bathe. I'll get my header somewhere up the stream.'

'How is he?'

'He? sleeping like a babe, and getting well as fast as his soul will allow his body. He has something on his mind. Nothing to be ashamed of, though, I will warrant, for a purer, nobler fellow I never met.'

'When can we move him?'

'Oh, to-morrow, if he will agree. You may all depart and leave me and the government man to make out the returns of killed and wounded. We shall have no more cholera. Eight days without a new case. We shall do now. I'm glad you are coming up with us.'

'I will just see the hounds throw off, and then go back and get Headley's breakfast.'

'No, no! you mustn't, sir, you want a day's play.'

'Not half as much as you. And I am in no hunting mood just now. Do you take your fill of the woods and the streams, and let me see our patient. I suppose you will be back by noon?'

'Certainly.' And the two swung up the street, and out of the town, along the vale toward Trebooze.

For Trebooze, of Trebooze, has invited them, and Lord Southbush, and certain others, to come out after hunting, and after-hunting they will go.

Trebooze has been sorely exercised, during the last fortnight, between fear of the cholera and desire of calling upon Lord Southbush. 'as I ought to do, of course, as one of the gentry round, he's a Whig, of course, and no more to me than anybody else, but one don't like to let politics interfere,' by which Trebooze glosses over to himself and friends the deep slunkyness with which he lusteth after a live lord's acquaintance, and one especially in whom he hopes to find even such a one as himself. 'Good fellow, I hear he is, too—good sportsman, smokes like a chimney,' and so forth.

So at last, when the cholera has all but disappeared, he comes down to Penllyn, and introduces himself, half swaggering, half civil, begins by a string of apologies for not having called before—'Mrs Trebooze so afraid of infection, you see, my lord,' which is a lie, then launches out a few fulsome compliments to Southbush's courage in staying, then takes heart at a little joke of Southbush's, and tries the free and easy style, fingers his lordship's high-priced Hudsons, and gives a broad hint that he would like to smoke one on the spot, which hint is not taken, any more than the lot of a 'pauy' which he offers five minutes afterwards, that he will jump his Irish mare in and out of Aberlva pound, is utterly thrown on his haunches (as he informs his friend Mr Creed afterwards) by Southbush's praise of Tom Thurnall, as an 'invaluable man, a treasure in such an out-of-the-way place, and really better company than ninety-nine men out of a hundred', recovers himself again when Southbush asks after his otter hounds, of which he has heard much praise from Tarrifrow, and launches out once more into sporting conversation of that graceful and lofty stamp which may be perused and perpended in the pages of Handley Cross, and Mr Sponge's Sporting Tour, books painfully true to that ugly and baser side of sporting life which their clever author has chosen so wilfully to portray.

So, at least, said Southbush to himself, when his visitor had departed.

'He's just like a page out of Sponge's Tour, though he's not half as good a fellow as Sponge himself, for Sponge knew he was a snob, and lived up to his calling honestly—but this fellow waits all the while to play at being a gentleman, and—Ugh! how the fellow smelt of brandy, and worse! His hand, too, shook as if he had the palsy, and he chattered and fidgeted like a man with St. Vitus's dance.'

'Did he, my lord?' quoth Tom Thurnall, when he heard the same, in a very meaning tone.

And Trebooze, 'for his part, couldn't make out that lord—unrompingly agreeable, and easy, and all that—but shoves a fellow off, and sets him down somehow, and in such a . . . civil way, that you don't know where to have him.'

However, Trebooze departed in high spirits, for Lord Southbush has deigned to say that he will be delighted to see the otter hounds work any morning that Trebooze likes, and anyhow—no time too early for him. 'He will bring his friend Major Campbell!'

'By all means.'

'Expect two or three sporting gentlemen from the neighbourhood, too. Regular good ones, my lord, though they are county larks—very much honoured to make your lordship's acquaintance.'

Southbush expresses himself equally humbled by making their acquaintance, in a tone of bland sympathy, which utterly puzzles Trebooze, who gives a step further.

'Your lordship'll honour us by taking pot luck afterwards. Can't show you French cookery, you know, and your soufflés and glazes, and all that. Honest souldo o' mutton, and the grounds of old pot. My father laid it down, and I take it up, eh?' And Trebooze gave a wink and a nudge of his elbow, meaning to be witty.

His lordship was exceedingly sorry, it was the most unfortunate accident—but he had the most particular engagement that very afternoon, and must return early from the otter-hunt, and probably sail the next day for Wales. 'But,' says the little man, who knows all about Trebooze's household, 'I shall not fail to do myself the honour of calling on Mrs Trebooze, and expressing my regret,' etc.

So to the otter-hunt is Southbush gone, and Campbell and Thurnall after him, for Trebooze has said to himself, 'Must ask that blackguard of a doctor hang him! I wish he were an otter himself, but if he's so thick with his lordship, it won't do to quarrel.' For, indeed, Thurnall might tell tales. So Trebooze swallows his spite and shame,—as do many folk who call themselves his betters, when they have to deal with a great man's hang-on,—and sends down a note to Tom.

'Mr Trebooze requests the pleasure of Mr Thurnall's company with his hounds at . . .'

And Tom accepts—why not? and chats with Campbell, as they go, on many things, and among other things on this—

'By the bye,' said he, 'I got an hour's shore-work yesterday afternoon, and refreshing enough it was. And I got a prize, too. The sucking barnacle which you asked for—I was certain I should get one or two, if I could have a look at the pools this week. Jolly little dog! he was padding and spanning about last night, and enjoying himself, "ere age with creeping"—what is it?—"hath clawed him in his clutch." That fellow's destiny is not a hopeful analogy for you, sir, who believe that we shall rise after we die into some higher and freer state?

'Why not?'

'Why, which is better off, the free swimming larva, or the perfect enthipod, rooted for ever motionless to the rock?'

'Which is better off, the roving young fellow who is sowing his wild oats, or the man who has settled down, and become a respectable land-owner with a good house over his head?'

'And begun to propagate his species? Well, you have me there, sir, as far as this life is concerned, but you will confess that the barnacle's history proves that all crawling grubs don't turn into butterflies.'

'I dare say the barnacle turns into what is best for him, at all events, what he deserves. That rule of yours will apply to him, to whomsoever it will not.'

'And so does penance for the sins of his youth, as some of us are to do in the next world.'

'Perhaps yes, perhaps no, perhaps neither.'

'Do you speak of us or the barnacle?'

'Of both.'

'I am glad of that. For on the popular notion of our being punished a million years hence for what we did when we were lads, I never could see anything but a misery and injustice in our having come into the world at all.'

'I can,' said the major quietly.

'Of course I meant nothing rule, but I had to buy my experience, and paid for it dearly enough in folly.'

'So had I to buy mine.'

'Then why be punished over and above? Why have to pay for the folly, which was itself only the necessary price of experience?'

'For being, perhaps, so foolish as not to use the experience after it has cost you so dear.'

'And will punishment cure me of the foolishness?'

'That depends on yourself. If it does, it must needs be so much the better for you. But perhaps you will not be punished, but forgiven.'

'Let off? That would be a very bad thing for me, unless I become a very different man from what I have been as yet. I am always right glad now to get a fall whenever I make a stumble. I should have gone to sleep in my tracks long ago else, as one used to do in the backwoods on a long elk hunt.'

'Perhaps you may become a very different man.'

'I should be sorry for that even if it were possible.'

'Why? Do you consider yourself perfect?'

'No. . . . But somehow, Thomas Thurnall is an old friend of mine, the first I ever had, and I should be sorry to lose his company.'

'I don't think you need fear doing so. You have seen an insect go through strange metamorphoses, and yet remain the same individual, why should not you and I do so likewise?'

'Well?'

'Well, there are some points about you, I suppose, which you would not be sorry to have altered?'

'A few,' quoth Tom, laughing. 'I do not consider myself quite perfect yet.'

'What if those points were not really any part of your character, but mere excrescences of disease, or if that be too degrading a notion, mere scars of old wounds, and of the wear and tear of life, and what if, in some future life, all those disappeared, and the true Thomas Thurnall, pure and simple, were alone left?'

'It is a very hopeful notion. Only, say dear sir, one is quite self-content enough in this imperfect state. What intolerable excoombs we should all be if we were perfect, and could sit admiring ourselves for ever and ever!'

'But what if that self-content and self-dependence were the very root of all the disease, the cause of all the scars, the very thing which will have to be got rid of, before our true character and true manhood can be developed?'

'Yes, I understand faith and humility.

. . . You will forgive me, Major Campbell. I shall learn to respect those virtues when good people have defined them a little more exactly, and can show me somewhat more clearly in what faith differs from superstition, and humility from hypocrisy.'

'I do not think any man will ever define them for you. But you may go through a course of experiences, more severe, probably, than pleasant, which may enable you at last to define them for yourself.'

'Have you defined them?' asked Tom bluntly, glancing round at his companion.

'Faith?—Yes, I trust. Humility?—No, I do not.'

'I should like to hear your definition of the former, at least.'

'Did I not say that you must discover it for yourself?'

'Yes. Well. When the lesson comes, if it does come, I suppose it will come in some learnable shape, and till then, I must settle for myself. And if self-dependence be a punishable sin, I shall, at all events, have plenty of company whithersoever I go. There is Lord Southsh and Treboore.'

Why did not Campbell speak his mind more clearly to Thurnall?

Because he knew that with such men words are of little avail. The disease was entrenched too strongly in the very centre of the man's being. It seemed at moments as if all his strange adventures and hair-breadth escapes had been sent to do him harm and not good, to pamper and harden his self-confidence, not to crush it. Therefore Campbell seldom argued with him. But he prayed for him often, for he had begun, as all did who saw much of Tom Thurnall, to admire and respect him, in spite of all his faults.

And now, turning through a woodland path, they descended toward the river, till they can hear voices below them, Southbush laughing quietly, Trebooze laying down the law at the top of his voice.

'How noisy the fellow is, and how he is hopping about!' says Campbell.

'No wonder, he has been soaking, I hear, for the last fortnight, with some worthy companions, by way of keeping off cholera. I must have my eye on him to-day.'

Scrambling down through the brushwood, they found themselves in such a scene as Creswick alone knows how to paint, though one element of beauty, which Creswick uses full well, was wanting, and the whole place was seen, not by slant sun-rays gleaming through the boughs, and dappling all the pebbles with a lacework of leaf-shadows, but in the uniform and sober gray of dawn.

A broad bed of shingle, looking just now more like an ill-made turnpike road than the bed of Alva stream, above it, a long shallow pool, which showed every stone through the transparent water, on the right, a craggy bank, bedded with deep wood sedge and orange-tipped king ferns, clustering beneath sallow and maple bushes already tinged with gold, on the left, a long bar of gravel, covered with giant 'butter-lur' leaves, in and out of which the hounds are brushing—beautiful black-and-tan dogs, of which poor Trebooze may be paragonably proud, while round the burleaf-bed dances a rough white Irish terrier, seeming, by his frantic self-importance, to consider himself the master of the hounds.

Southbush is standing with Trebooze beyond the bar, upon a little lawn set thick with alders. Trebooze is fussing and fidgeting about, wiping his forehead perpetually, telling everybody to get out of the way, and not to interfere, then catching hold of Southbush's button to chatter in his face, then starting aside to put some part of his dress to rights. His usual lazy drawl is exchanged for foolish excitement. Two or three more gentlemen, tired of Trebooze's absurdities, are scrambling over the rocks above in search of spraints. Old Tardrew waddles stooping along the line where grass and shingle meet, his bull-dog visage bent to his very knees.

'Tardrew out hunting?' says Campbell. 'Why, it is but a week since his daughter was buried!'

'And why not? I like him better for it. Would he bring her back again by throwing away a good day's sport? Better turn out, as he has done, and forget his feelings, if he has any.'

'He has feelings enough, don't doubt. But you are right. There is something very characteristic in the way in which the English countryman never shows grief, never lets it interfere with business, even with pleasure.'

'Hillo! Mr Trebooze!' says the old fellow, looking up. 'Here it is!'

'Spraint! Spraint! Spraint! Where? Eh—what?' cries Trebooze.

'No, but what's as good here on this alder stump, not an hour old. I thought they beauties' starns weren't fleamishing for nowt.'

'Here! here! here! here!' Musical, Musical! Sweetlips! Get out of the way!' and Trebooze runs down.

Musical examines, throws her nose into the air, and answers 'y' the rich bell-like note of the true otter-hound, and all the woodlands ring as the pack dashes down the shingle to her call.

'Over!' shouts Tom. 'Here's the fresh spraint our side!'

Through the water splash squire, viscount, steward, and hounds, to the horror of a shoal of par, the only visible tenants of a pool which, after a shower of rain, would be alive with trout. Where those trout are in the meanwhile is a mystery yet unsolved.

Over dances the little terrier, yapping furiously, and expending his superfluous energy by snapping right and left at the par.

'Hark to Musical! hark to Sweetlips! Down the stream! No! the old girl has it, right up the bank!'

'How do, doctor! How do, Major Campbell! Forward! Forward! Forward!' shouts Trebooze, glad to escape a longer parley, as with his spear in his left hand, he clutches at the overhanging boughs with his right, and swings himself up, with Peter, the huntsman, after him. Tom follows him, and why?

Because he does not like his looks. That bull eye is red, and almost bursting, his cheeks are flushed, his lips blue, his hand shakes, and Tom's quick eye has already remarked, from a distance, over and above his new fussiness, a sudden shudder, a quick, half-frightened glance behind him, and perceived, too, that the moment Musical gave tongue, he put the spirit-flask to his mouth.

Away go the hounds at score through tangled cover, their merry peal ringing from brake and hiar, clashing against the rocks, moaning musically away through distant glens aloft.

Southbush and Tardrew 'take down' the river-bed, followed by Campbell. It is in his way home, and though the major has stuck many a pig, shot many a gaur, rhinoceros, and elephant, he disdains not, like a true sportsman, the less dangerous but more scientific excitement of an otter-hunt.

'Hark to the merry merry Christchurch bells! Sho's up by this time, that don't sound like a drag now!' cries Tom, bursting desperately, with elbow-guarded visage, through the tangled scrub. 'What's the matter, Trebooze? No, thanks! "Modest quenchers" won't improve the wind just now.'

For Trebooze has halted, panting and bathed in perspiration, has been at the brandy flask again, and now offers Tom a 'quencher,' as he calls it.

'As you like,' says Trebooze sulkily, having meant it as a token of reconciliation, and pushes on.

They are now upon a little open meadow girdled by green walls of wood, and along the river-bank the hounds are fairly racing. Tom and Peter hold on, Trebooze slackens.

'Your master don't look right this morning, Peter.'

Peter lifts his hand to his mouth, to signify the habit of drinking, and then shakes it in a melancholy fashion, to signify that the sad habit has reached a lamentable and desperate point.

Tom looks back. Trebooze has pulled up, and is walking, wiping still at his face. The hounds have overrun the scent, and are back again, flensing about the plashed fence on the river bank.

'Over! over! over!' shouts Peter, tumbling over the fence into the stream, and staggering across.

Trebooze comes up to it, tries to scramble over, mutters something, and sits down astride of a bough.

'You are not well, squire?'

'Well as ever I was in my life. Only a little weak—have been several times lately, couldn't sleep either—haven't slept an hour this week. Don't know what it is.'

'What dunks of hounds these are!' says Tom, trying, for ulterior purposes, to ingratiate himself. 'How they are working there all by themselves, like so many human beings. Perfect!'

'Yes—don't want us—may as well sit here a minute. Awfully hot, eh? What a splendid creature that Miss St. Just is! I say, Peter!'

'Yes, sir,' shouts Peter, from the other side.

'Those hounds ain't right!' with an oath.

'Not right, sir?'

'Didn't I tell you?—five couple and a half—no, five couple—no, six. Hang it! I can't see, I think! How many hounds did I tell you to bring out?'

'Five couple, sir.'

'Then . . . why did you bring out that other?'

'Which other?' shouts Peter, while Thurnall eyes Trebooze keenly.

'Why, that! He's none o' mine! Nasty black cur, how did he get here?'

'Where? There's never no cur here!'

'You lie, you cat—no—why—doctor—How many hounds are there here?'

'I can't see,' says Tom, 'among those bushes.'

'Can't see, eh? Why don't those brutes hit it off?' says Trebooze, drawing, as if he had forgotten the matter, and lounging over the fence, drops into the stream, followed by Tom, and wades across.

The hounds are all round him, and he is encouraging them on, fussing again more than ever, but without success.

'Gone to holt somewhere here,' says Peter.

' . . . !' cries Trebooze, looking round, with a sudden shudder, and face of terror. 'There's that black brute again! there, behind me! Hang it, he'll bite me next!' and he caught up his leg, and struck behind him with his spear.

There was no dog there.

Peter was about to speak, but Tom silenced him by a look, and shouted—

'Here we are! Goue to holt in this alder root!'

'Now then, little Carlingsford! Out of the way, puppies!' cries Trebooze, righted again for the moment by the exertion, and thrusting the hounds right and left, he stoops down to put in the little terrier.

Suddenly he springs up, with something like a scream, and then bursts out on Peter with a volley of oaths.

'Didn't I tell you to drive that cur away?'

'Which cur, sir?' cries Peter, trembling, and utterly confounded.

'That cur! Can't I believe my own eyes?'

Will you tell me that the beggar didn't bolt between my legs this moment, and went into the hole before the terrier?'

Neither answered Peter from utter astonishment, Tom because he saw what was the matter.

'Don't stoop, squire. You'll make the blood fly to your head! Let me—'

But Trebooze thrust him back with curses.

'I'll have the brute out, and send the spear through him!' and flinging himself on his knees again, Trebooze began tearing madly at the roots and stones, shouting to the half-mad terrier to tear the intruder.

Peter looked at Tom, and then wiping his hands in despair.

'Dirty work—beastly work!' muttered Trebooze. 'Nothing but slugs and ovals! Toads, too,—hang the toads! What a plague brings all this vermin? Curse it!' slumped he, springing back, 'there's an adder!' and he's gone up my sleeve! Help me! doctor! Thurnall! or I'm a dead man!'

Tom caught the aim, thrust his hand up the sleeve, and seemed to snatch out the snake, and hurl it back into the river.

'All right now!—a near chance, though!'

Peter stood open-mouthed.

'I never saw no snake!' cried he.

Tom caught him a buffet which sent him reeling. 'Look after your hounds, you blind ass! How are you now, Trebooze?' And he caught the squire round the waist, for he was reeling.

'The world! The world upside down! rocking and swinging! Who's put me feet upwards, like a fly on a ceiling? I'm falling, falling off, into the clouds into hell-fire—hold me! Toads and adders! and wasps—to go to holt in a wasp's nest! Drive 'em away,—get me a green hough! I shall be stung to death!'

And tearing off a green hough, the wretched man rushed into the river, beating wildly right and left at his fancied tormentors.

'What is it?' cry Campbell and Scoutbush, who have run up breathless.

'Delirium tremens. Campbell, get home as fast as you can, and send me up a bottle of morphine. Peter, take the hounds home. I must go after him.'

'I'll go home with Campbell, and send the bottle up by a man and horse,' cries Seentbush, and away the two trot at a gallant pace, for a cross-country run home.

'Mr Tardrew, come with me, there's a good man! I shall want help.'

Tardrew made no reply, but dashed through the river at his heels.

Trebooze had already climbed the plashed leure, and was running wildly across the meadow. Tom dragged Tardrew up to enter him.

'Thank 'ee, sir,' but nothing more. The two had not met since the cholera.

Trebooze fell, and lay rolling, trying in vain to shield his face from the phantom wasps.

They lifted him up, and spoke gently to him.

'Better get home to Miss Trebooze, sir,' said Tardrew, with as much tenderness as his gruff voice could convey.

'Yes, home! home to Molly! My Molly's always kind. She won't let me be eaten up alive. Molly, Molly!'

And shrieking for his wife, the wretched man started to run again.

'Molly, I'm in hell! Only help me! you're always right! only forgive me! and I'll never, never again.'

And then came out baleful confessions, then fresh hideous delusions.

Three weary up-hill miles lay between them and the house, but home they got at last.

Trebooze dashed at the house-door, tore it open, slammed and bolted it behind him, to shut out the pursuing fiends.

'Quick, round by the back-door!' said Tom, who had not opposed him for fear of making him furious, but dreaded some tragically if he were left alone.

But his fear was needless. Trebooze looked into the breakfast room. It was empty, she was not out of bed yet. He rushed upstairs into her bedroom, shrieking her name, she leaped up to meet him, and the poor wretch buried his head in that faithful bosom, screaming to her to save him from he knew not what.

She put her arms round him, soothed him, wept over him sacred tears. 'My William! my own William! Yes, I will take care of you! Nothing shall hurt you, - my own, own!'

Vain, drunken, brutal, untruthful. Yes, but her husband still!

There was a knock at the door.

'Who is that!' she cried, with her usual heroism, terrified for his character, not terrified for herself.

'Mr. Thurnall, madam. Have you any laudanum in the house!'

'Yes, here! Oh, come in! Thank God you are come! What is to be done!'

Tom looked for the laudanum bottle, and poured out a heavy dose.

'Make him take that, madam, and put him to bed. I will wait downstairs awhile!'

'Thurnall, Thurnall!' calls Trebooze, 'don't leave me, old fellow! You are a good fellow. I say, forgive and forget. Don't leave me!'

Only don't leave me, for the room is as full of devils as—'

An hour after, Tom and Tardrew were walking home together.

'He is quite quiet now, and fast asleep.'

'Will he mend, sir?' asks Tardrew.

'Of course he will, and perhaps in more ways than one. Best thing that could have happened—will bring him to his senses, and he'll start fresh.'

'We'll hope so,-- he's been mad, I think, ever since he heard of that cholera.'

'So have others, but not with brandy,' thought Tom, but he said nothing.

'I say, sir,' quoth Tardrew after a while, 'how's Parson Headley?'

'Getting well, I'm happy to say.'

'Glad to hear it, sir. He's a good man, after all, though we did have our differences. But he's a good man, and worked like one.'

'He did.'

Silence again.

'Never heard such beautiful prayers in all my life, as he made over my poor maid.'

'I don't doubt it,' said Tom. 'He understands his business at heart, though he may have his fancies.'

'And so do some others,' said Tardrew, in a gruff tone, as if half to himself, 'who have no fancies. . . Tell you what it is, sir, you was right this time, and that's plain truth. I'm sorry to hear talk of your going.'

'My good sir,' quoth Tom, 'I shall be very sorry to go. I have found place and people here as pleasant as man could wish, but go I must.'

'Glad you're satisfied, sir, wish you was going to stay,' says Tardrew. 'Seen Miss Harvey this last day or two, sir?'

'Yes. You know she's to keep her school?'

'I know it. Nursed my girl like an angel.'

'Like what she is,' said Tom.

'You said one true word once, that she was too good for us.'

'For this world,' said Tom, and fell into a great musing.

By those curt and surly utterances did Tardrew, in true British bulldog fashion, express a repentance too deep for words, too deep for all confessionals, penances, and emotions or acts of contrition, the repentance not of the excitement and theatre southern, unstable as water, even in his most violent remorse, but of the still, deep-hearted northern, whose pride breaks slowly and silently, but breaks once for all, who tells to God what he will never tell to man, and having told it, is a new creature from that day forth for ever.

CHAPTER XIX

BIDDINGLEET

THE pleasant summer voyage is over. The Waterwitch is lounging off Port Madoc, waiting for her crew. The said crew are busy on shore drinking the ladies' healths, with a couple of sovereigns which Valentin has given them, in her sister's name and her own. The ladies, under the care of Elsley, and the far more practical care of Mr Bowie, are rattling along among children, mugs, and boxes, over the sandy flats of the Traeth Mawr, beside the long reaches of the lazy stream, with the blue surges of the hills in front, and the white sea behind. Soon they begin to pass wooded knolls, islets of rock in the alluvial plain. The higher peaks of Snowdon sink down behind the lower spurs in front, the plain narrows, closes in, walled round with woodlands clinging to the steep hill-sides, and, at last, they enter the narrow gorge of Pont-Aberglaslyn pretty enough, no doubt, but much over-praised, for there are in Devon alone a dozen passes far grander, both for form and size.

Soon they emerge again on flat meadows, mountain cradled, and the grave of the mythic greyhound, and the fair old church, shrouded in tall trees, and last, but not least, stop at the famous Leek Hotel, where inlets Mrs Lewis, great and wise, over the four months' Babylon of gauds, cars, chambermaids, tourists, artists, and reading-parties, camp-stools, telescopes, poetry books, blue ugliers, red petticoats, and parasols of every line.

There they settle down in the best rooms in the house, and all goes as merrily as it can, while the horrors which they have left behind them hang, like a black background, to all their thoughts. However, both Southwell and Campbell send as cheerful reports as they honestly can, and gradually the exceeding beauty of the scenery, and the amusing hustle of the village, make them forget, perhaps, a good deal which they ought to have remembered.

As for poor Lucia, no one will complain of her for being happy for feeling that she has got a holiday, the first for now four years, and trying to enjoy it to the utmost. She has no household cares. Mr Bowie manages everything, and does so, in order to keep up the honour of the family, on a somewhat magnificent scale. The children, in that bracing air, are better than she has ever seen them. She has Valentin all to herself, and Elsley, in spite of the dark laurels over which he has been brooding, is better behaved, on the whole, than usual.

He has escaped, so he considers escaped from Campbell, above all from Thurnall. From himself, indeed, he has not escaped, but the company of self is, on the whole, more pleasant to him than otherwise just now. For though he may turn up his nose at tourists and reading-parties, and long for contemplative solitude, yet there is a certain pleasure to some people, and often strongest in those who pretend most shyness, in the 'dignito monstrari, et dicere, hoc est', in taking for granted that everybody has read his poems, that everybody is saying in their hearts, 'There goes Mr Vavasour, the distinguished poet. I wonder what he is writing now! I wonder where he has been to-day, and what he has been thinking of.'

So Elsley went up Hellog, and looked over the glorious vista of the vale, over the twin lakes, and the rich sheets of woodland, with Aran and Moel Merch guarding them right and left, and the graystone glaciers of the Glyder walling up the valley miles above. And they went up Snowdon, too, and saw little beside fifty fog-blinded tourists, five-and-twenty dripping ponies, and five hundred empty porter bottles, wherefrom they returned, as do many, disgusted, and with great colds in their heads. But most they loved to scramble up the crags of Dinas Emrys, and muse over the ruins of the old tower, 'Where Merlin taught Vortigern the courses of the stars', till the stars set and rose as they had done for Merlin and his pupil, behind the four great pillars of Aran, Siabod, Cnicht, and Hellog, which point to the four quarters of the heavens or to be by the side of the boggy spring, which once was the magic well of the magic castle, till they saw in fancy the white dragon and the red rise from its depths once more, and light high in the air the battle which foretold the fall of the Cymry before the Sassenach invader.

One thing, indeed, troubled Elsley,—that Claude was his only companion, for Valentin avoided carefully any more tele-ut-tille walks with him. She had found out her mistake, and devoted herself now to Lucia. She had a luncheon enough, for Lucia was not just then in a state for rambles and scrambles, and of that Elsley certainly had no right to complain, so that he was forced to leave them both at home, with as good grace as he could muster, and to wander by himself, scribbling his fancies, while they lounged and worked in the pleasant garden of the hotel, with Bowie letting and carrying for them all day long, and intimating pretty roundly to Miss Clara his 'oppression', that he 'was very proud and thankful of the office' but he did think that he had to disagree many things for Mrs Vavasour every day which would come with a much better grace from Mr Vavasour himself, and that, when he married, he should not leave his wife to be misused by other men.

Which last words were spoken with an ulterior object, well understood by the hearer, for between Clara and Bowie there was one of those patient and honorable attachments no common between worthy servants. They had both 'kept company,' though only by letter, for the most part, for now five years, and they had both saved a fair sum of money, and Clara might have married Bowie when she chose, had she not thought it her duty to take care of her mistress, while Bowie considered himself equally indispensable to the welfare of that 'poor reckless ladie,' his master.

So they waited patiently, amusing the time by little equalities of jealousy, real or pretended, and Bowie was faithful, though Clara was past thirty now, and losing her good looks.

'So ye'll see your lassie, Mr Bowie!' said

Sergeant MacArthur, his intimate, when he started for Aberlath that summer 'I'm thinking ye'd better put her out of her pain soon. Five years is ower lang courting, and she's na pullet by now, saving your pardon.'

'Hoooo—' says Bowie, 'leave the green gooseberries to the lads, and gi' me the ripe fruit, sergeant.'

However, he found love-making in his own fashion so pleasant that, not content with carrying Mrs. Vavasour's babies about all day long, he had several times to be gently turned out of the nursery, where he wanted to assist in washing and dressing them, on the ground that an old soldier could turn his hand to anything.

So slipped away a fortnight and more, during which Valentin was the cynosure of all eyes, and knew it also for Claude Molloy, half to amuse her, and half to tease Elsie, made her laugh many a time by retelling little sayings and doings in her praise and dispraise, picked up from rich Manchester gentlemen, who would fain have married her without a penny, and from strong-minded Manchester ladies, who envied her beauty a little, and set her down, of course, as an empty-minded worldling, and a proud aristocrat. The majority of the reading-parties, meanwhile, thought a great deal more about Valentin than about their books. The Oxford men, it seemed, though of the same mind as the Cambridge men in considering her the model of all perfection, were divided as to their method of testifying the same. Two or three of them, who were given to that emptying and flirting tone with young ladies to which Oxford would-be-hue gentlemen are so pitifully prone, hung about the main-door to oggle her, contrived always to be walking in the garden when she was there, dressed out as if for High Street at four o'clock on a May afternoon, tormented Claude by fruitless attempts to get from him an introduction, which he had neither the right nor the mind to give, and at last (so Bowie told Claude one night, and Claude told the whole party next morning) tried to bribe and flatter Valentin's maid into giving them a bit of ribbon, or a cast-off glove, which had belonged to the idol. Whereon that maiden, in virtuous indignation, told Mr. Bowie, and complained moreover (as maids are bound to do to valets for whom they have a penchant) of their having dared to compliment her on her own good looks, by which act succeeded, of course, in making Mr. Bowie understand that other people still thought her pretty, if he did not, and also in arousing in him that jealousy which is often the best helpmate of sweet love. So Mr. Bowie went forth in his mind that very evening, and finding two of the Oxford men, informed them in plain Scotch, that, 'Gin he caught them, or any ither such skellums, phlandering after his leddies, or his leddies' maids, he'd jist knook their empty paws together.' To which there was no reply but silence, for Mr. Bowie stood six feet four without his shoes, and had but the week before performed, for the edification of the Cambridge men, who held him in high honour, a few old Guards' feats, such as cutting in two at one sword-blow a suspended shoulder of mutton, lifting a long table by his teeth, squeezing a quart pewter pot flat between his fingers, and other little recreations of those who are 'born with Rypha.'

But the Cantabs, and a couple of gallant Oxford boating men who had fraternised with them, testified their admiration in their simple honest way, by putting down their pipes whenever they saw Valentin coming, and just lifting their hats when they met her close. It was taking a liberty, no doubt. 'But I tell yon, Molloy,' said Wynd, as brave and pure-minded a fellow as ever pulled in the University eight, 'the Arabs, when they see such a creature, say, "Praise Allah for beautiful women," and quite right, they may remind some fellows of worse things, but they always remind me of heaven and the angels, and my hat goes off to her by instinct, just as it does when I go into a church.'

That was all, simple chivalrous admiration, and delight in her loveliness, as in that of a lake, or a mountain sunset, but nothing more. The good fellows had no time, indeed, to fancy themselves in love with her, or her with them, for every day was too short for them, what with reading all the morning, and starting out in the afternoon in strange garments (which became shabbier and more ragged very rapidly as the weeks slipped on) upon all manner of desperate errands, walking unheard-of distances, and losing their way upon the mountains, scrambling cliffs, and now and then falling down them, camping all night by unpronounceable lakes, in the hope of catching mythical trout, trying in all ways how hungry, thirsty, dirty, and tired a man could make himself, and how far he could go without breaking his neck, any approach to which catastrophe was hailed (as were all other mishaps) as 'all in the day's work,' and 'the finest fun in the world,' by that unconquerable English 'lebens ghekeselgheit,' which is a perpetual wonder to our sober German cousins. Ah, glorious twenty-one, with your inexhaustible powers of doing and enjoying, eating and hungering, sleeping and sitting up, reading and playing! Happy are those who still possess you, and can take their fill of your golden cup, steeled, but not saddened, by the remembrance, that for all things a good and loving God will bring them into judgment. Happier still those who (like a few) retain in body and soul the health and buoyancy of twenty-one on to the very verge of forty, and seeming to grow younger-hearted as they grow older-headed, can cast off care and work at a moment's warning, laugh and frolic now as they did twenty years ago, and say with Wordsworth—

'So was it when my life began . . .
So be it when I shall grow old,
(Or let me die)

Unfortunately, as will appear hereafter, Elsley's especial blues noirs were this very Wynd and his inseparable companion, Naylor, who happened to be not only the best men of the set, but Mellot's especial friends. Both were Rugby men, now reading for their degree. Wynd was a Shropshire squire's son, a husom fair-haired man, the handiest of boxers, rowers, riders, shots, fishermen, with a noisy superabundance of animal spirits, which maddened Elsley. Yet Wynd had sentiment in his way, though he took good care never to show it. Elsley, could repeat Tennyson from end to end, spouted the Mort d'Arthur up hill and 'down dale, and chanted rapturously, 'Come into the garden, Maud!' while he expressed his opinion of Maud's lover in terms more forcible than delicate. Naylor, fidus Achates, was a Gloucestershire parson's son, a huge heavy-looking man, with a thick curling lip and a sleepy eye, but he had brains enough to become a first-rate classic, and in that same sleepy eye and heavy lip lay an infinity of quiet humour, rare old country stories, quaint scraps of out-of-the-way learning, jovial old ballads, which he sang with the mellowest of voices, and a slang vocabulary, which made him the dread of all hargreaves from Nownham pool to Uxmore. Him also Elsley hated, because Naylor looked always as if he was laughing at him; which indeed he was.

And the worst was, that Elsley had always to face them both at once. If Wynd vaulted over a gate into his very face, with a 'How d'ye do, Mr Vavasour! Had any verses this morning?' in the same tone as if he had asked, 'Had any sport?' Naylor's round face was sure to look over the stone-wall, pipe in mouth, with a 'Don't disturb the gentleman, Toin, don't you see he's a composing of his rhymes?' in a strong provincial dialect put on for the nonce. In fact, the two young rogues, having no respect whatsoever for genius, perhaps because they had each of them a little genius of their own, made a butt of the poet, as soon as they found out that he was afraid of them.

But worse blues noirs than either Wynd or Naylor were on their way to fill up the cup of Elsley's discomfort. And at last, without a note of warning, appeared in Beddgelert a phenomenon which rejoiced some hearts, but perturbed also the spirits not only of the Oxford 'philanderers,' but those of Elsley Vavasour, and, what is more, of Valentia herself.

She was sitting one evening at the window with Lucia, looking out into the village and the pleasure-grounds before the hotel. They were both laughing and chatting over the groups of tourists in their pretty Irish way, just as they had done when they were girls, for Lucia's heart was expanding under the quiet beauty of the place, the freedom from household care, and what was more, from money anxieties; for Valentia had slipped into her hand a cheque for fifty pounds from Scotchbush, and assured her that he would be quite angry if she spoke of paying the rent of the rooms, Elsley was mooning down the river by himself, Claude was entertaining his Cambridge acquaintances, as he did every night, with his endless fun and sentiment. Gradually the tourists slipped in one by one, as the last rays of the sun faded off the peaks of Aran, and the mist settled down upon the dark valley beneath, and darkness fell upon that rock-grilled paradise, when up to the door below there drove a car, at sight whereof out rushed, not waiters only and landlady, but Mr Bowie himself, who helped out a very short figure in a pea-jacket and a slurring boating hat, and then a very tall one in a wild shooting-coat and a military cap.

'My brother and man Saint Piro! Lucia! too delightful! This is why they did not write.' And Valentia sprang up, and was going to run downstairs to them, when she paused at Lucia's call.

'Who have they with them? Val,—come and look! who can it be?'

Campbell and Bowie were helping out carefully a tall man, covered up in many wrappers. It was too dark to see the face, but a fancy crossed Valentia's mind which made her look grave, in spite of her pleasure.

He was evidently weak, as from recent illness, for his two supporters led him up the steps, and Scotchbush seemed full of directions and inquiries, and fussed about with the landlady, till she was tired of mishearing to 'my lord.'

A minute afterwards Bowie threw open the door grandly. 'My lord, my ladies!' and in trotted Scotchbush, and began kissing them hereby, and then dancing about.

'Oh, my dears! Here at last—out of that horrid city of the plague! Such sights as I have seen —' and then he paused. 'Do you know, Val and Lucia, I'm glad I've seen it, I don't know, but I feel as if I should be a better man all my life, and those poor people, how well they did believe! And the major, he's an angel! And so's that bric of a doctor, and the mad schoolmistress, and the curate. Everybody, I think, but me. Hang it, Val! but your words shan't come true! I will be of some use yet before I die! But I've —' and Valentia went up to him and kissed him, while he ran on, and Lucia said:

'You have been of use already, dear Fred. You have sent me and the dear children to this sweet place, where we have been safer and happier than —' (she checked herself), 'and your generous present too. I feel quite a girl again, thanks to you. Val and I have done nothing but laugh all day long,' and she began kissing him too.

'How happy could I be with either,
Were either dear charmer away!'

broke out Scotchbush. 'What a pity it is now, that I should have two such sweet creatures making love to me, and can't marry either of them! Why did ye go and be my father's daughters, my mavourneen! I'd have made a peccass of the one of ye, if ye'd had the sense to be anybody else's sisters."

At which they all laughed, and laughed, and chattered broad Irish together as they used to do for fun in old Kilanbhagga Castle, before Lucia was a weary wife, and Valentia a worldly fine lady and Scoutbush a rascally guardsman, breaking half of the ten commandments every week, rather from ignorance than vice.

"Well, I'm glad ye're pleased with me, as I have," said he at last to Lucia. "but I've done another little good deed, I flatter myself, for I've brought away the poor spalpeen of a priest, and have got him safe in the house."

Valentia stopped short in her fun.

"Why, what have ye to say against that, Miss Val?"

"Why, won't he be a little in the way?" said Valentia, not knowing what to say.

"Faith, he needn't trouble you, and I shall take very good care—I wonder when the supper is coming—that neither he nor any one else troubles me. But really," said he, in his natural voice, and with some feeling, "I was ashamed to go away and leave him there. He would have died if we had. He worked day and night. Talk of saints and martyrs! Campbell himself said he was an idler by the side of him."

"Oh! I hope Major Campbell has not over-exerted himself."

"He? nothing hurts him. He's as hard as his own sword. But the poor curate worked on till he got the cholera himself. He always expected it, longed for it," Campbell said—wanted to die. Some love affair, I suppose, poor fellow! and a terrible bout he had for eight and forty hours. Thurnall thought he'd gone again and again, but he pulled the poor fellow through, after all, and we got some use (that is, Campbell did) to take his duty, and brought him away after a good deal of persuasion, for he would not move as long as there was a fresh case in the town, that is why we never wrote. We did not know till the last hour when we should start, and we expected to be with you in two days, and gave you a pleasant surprise. He was half dead when we got him on board, but the week's sea air helped him through, so I must not grumble at these northwesterly breezes. "It's an ill wind that blows nobody good," they say."

Valentia heard all this as in a dream, and watched her chattering brother with a stupefied air. She comprehended all now, and bitterly she blamed herself. He had really loved her, then, set himself manfully to die at his post, that he might forget her in a better world. How shamefully she had trifled with that noble heart! How should she ever meet him with courage to look him in the face? And not love, or anything like love, but sacred pity and self-abasement filled her heart, as his fair, delicate face rose up before her, all wan and shrunken, with sad upbraiding eyes, and round it such a hale, pure and pale, as crowns, in some old German picture, a martyr's halo!

"He has had the cholera?" he has been actually dying?" asked she at last, with that strange wish to hear over again bad news, which one knows too well already.

"Of course he has. Why, you are not going away, Valentia? You need not be afraid of infection. Campbell, and Thurnall, too, says that's all nonsense, and they must know, having seen it so often. Here comes Brown at last with supper."

"Has Mr. Headley had anything to eat?" asked Valentia, who longed to run away to her own room, but dared not.

"He is eating now like any god, ma'am, and Major Campbell's making him eat too."

"No must be very ill," thought she, "for men Saint Père never to have come near us yet," and then she thought with terror that her Saint Père might have guessed the truth, and be angry with her. And yet she trusted in Frank's secrecy. He would not betray her.

Take care, Valentia. When a woman has to trust a man not to betray her, and does trust him, she may soon find it not only easy, but necessary, to do more than trust him.

However, in five minutes Campbell came in. Valentia saw at once that there was no change in his feelings to her. But he could talk of nothing but Headley, his self-devotion, courage, angelic gentleness, and humility, and every word of his praise was a fresh arrow in Valentia's conscience, at last—

"One knows well enough what is the matter, and he almost bitterly 'what is the matter, I sometimes think, with all the noblest men in the world, and nine-tenths of the noblest women—and with many a one, too, God help them! who is none of the noblest, and then how does not know how to take the latter cup, as he knows—'

"What does the philosopher mean now?" asked Scoutbush, looking up from the cold lamb Valentia knew but too well what he meant.

"He has a history, my dear lord."

"A history? What? is he writing a book?"

Campbell laughed a quiet under laugh, half sad, half humorous.

"I am very tired," said Valentia, "I really think I shall go to bed."

She went to her room, but to bed she did not go, she sat down and cried till she could cry no more, and lay awake the greater part of the night, tossing miserably. She would have done better if she had prayed, but prayer, about such a matter, was what Valentia knew nothing of. She was regular enough at church, of course, and said her prayers and confessed her sins in a general way, and prayed about her 'soul,' as she had been taught to do, — unless she was too tired. But to pray really, about a real sorrow, a real sin like this, was a thought which never entered her mind, and if it had, she would have driven it away again just because the anxiety was so real, practical, human, it was a matter which had nothing to do with religion, which it seemed impertinent—almost wrong—to lay before the throne of God.

So she came downstairs next morning, pale, restless, unrefreshed in body or mind, and her peace of mind was not improved by seeing, seated at the breakfast-table, Frank Headley, whom Laura and Scout and were stuffing with all manner of good things.

She blushed scarlet to do what she would she could not help it—when he rose and bowed to her. Half-choked, she came forward and offered her hand. She was 'so shocked to hear that he had been so dangerously ill, no one had even told them of it, it had come upon them so suddenly', and so forth.

She spoke kindly, but avoided the least tone of tenderness, for she felt that if she gave way, she might be only too tender, and to reawaken hope in his heart would be only cruelty. And therefore, and for other reasons also, she did not look him in the face as she spoke.

He answered so cheerfully that she was half-disappointed, in spite of her remorse, at his not being as miserable as she had expected. Still, if he had overcome the passion, it was so much better for him. But yet Valentinia hardly wished that he should have overcome it, so self-contradictory is woman's heart, and her pity had sunk to half-evil, and her self-complacency was rising with a flowing tide, as he chatted on quietly, but generally, about the voyage, and the scenery, and Snowden, which he had never seen, and which he would send that very day.

'You will do nothing of the kind, Mr. Headley,' cried Laura. 'Is he not mad, Major Campbell, quite mad?'

'I know I am mad, my dear Mrs. Vavasour, I have been so a long time—but Snowden points me in their sober senses, and I shall take one of them.'

'Enfil the old gun?' began beside yourself, and end beside your horse? I am sure he is not strong enough to sit over those rocks. No, you shall stay at home comfortably here. Valentinia and I will take care of you.'

'And mon Saint Père too. I have a thousand things to say to him.'

'And so has he to Queen Whims.'

So Southbush sent Bowte in 'John Jones Clerk,' the fisherman (may his days be as many as his salmon and as good as his lies!), and the four stayed at home, and talked over the Aberlona tragedies, till, as it befell, both Laura and Campbell left the room awhile.

Immediately Frank rose, and walking across to Valentinia, laid the fatal ring on the arm of her chair, and returned to his seat without a word.

'You are very—I hope that it—' stammered Valentinia.

'You hope that it was a comfort to me? It was, and I shall be always grateful to you for it.'

'Valentinia heard an emphasis on the 'was.' It checked the impulse (foolish enough) which rose in her, to bid him keep the ring.

So, prim and dignified, she slipped it into its place on her finger, and went on with her work, merely saying—

'I need not say that I am happy that anything which I could do should have been of use to you in such a fearful time.'

'It was a fearful time! but for myself, I cannot be too glad of it. God grant that it may have been as useful to others as to me! It cured me of a great folly. Now I look back, I am astonished at my own absurdity, impudence, presumption. You must let me say it! I do not know how to thank you enough. I cannot thank myself with the fit words, they would be so strong! but I owe this confession to you, and to your exceeding goodness and kindness, when you would have been justified in treating me as a madman. I was glad, I believe, but I am in my right mind now, I assure you,' said he gaily. 'Had I not been, I need hardly say you would not have seen me here. What a prospect this is!' And he rose and looked out of the window.

Valentinia had heard all this with downcast eyes and unmoved face. Was she pleased at it? Not in the least, the naughty child that she was, and more, she grew quite angry with herself, ashamed of herself, for having thought and felt so much about him the night before. 'How silly of me!' He is very well, and does not care for me. And who is he, pray, that I should even look at him?'

And, as it is often to put her words into practice, she looked at him there and then. He was gazing out of the window, leaning gradually and yet fleetly against the shutter with the full glory of the December sun upon his sharp-cut profile and rich chestnut locks, and after all, having looked at him once, she could not help looking at him again. He was certainly a most gentleman-like man, elegant from head to foot, there was not an ungraceful line about him, to his very boots, and the white nails of his slender fingers, even the defects of his figure—the too great length of the neck and slope of the shoulders—increased his likeness to those saintly pictures with which he had been reared up in her mind the night before. He was at one extreme pole of the different types of manhood, and that burly doctor who had saved his life at the other—but her Saint Père alone perfectly combined the two. There was nobody like him, after all. Perhaps her wisest plan, as Headley had forgotten his tape, was to confess all to the Saint Père (as she inwardly did her little ones), and get some sort of absolution from him.

However, she must say something in answer—

'Yes, it is a very lovely view, but really I must say one more word about this matter. I have to thank you, you know, for the good faith which you have kept with me.'

He looked round, seemingly amused. 'C'est une autre affaire,' and he bowed, 'may I not say any more about the matter,' and he looked at her with such humble and thankful eyes, that

Valentia was sorry not to hear more from him than—

'Pray tell me—for of course you know—the name of this exquisite valley up which I am looking'

'Gwynnant. You must go up it when you are well enough, and see the lakes, they are the only ones in Snowdon from the banks of which the primeval forest has not disappeared'

'Indeed! I must make shift to go there this very afternoon, for—do not laugh at me—but I never saw a lake in my life'

'Never saw a lake!'

'No I am a true Lowlander born and bred among bleak Norfolk sands and fens—so much the worse for this chest of mine, and this is my first sight of mountains. It is all like a dream to me, and a dream which I never expected to be realised'

'Ah, you should see our Irish lakes and mountains—you should see Killarney!'

'I am content with these, I suppose it is as wrong to break the tenth commandment about scenery as about anything else'

'Ah, but it seems so hard that you, who I am sure would appreciate fine scenery, should have been debarred from it, while hundreds of stupid people run over the Alps and Italy every summer, and come home, as far as I can see, rather more stupid than they went, having made confusion worse confounded by filling their poor brains with hard names out of Murray'

'Not quite so hard as that thousands, every day, who would enjoy a meat dinner, should have nothing but dry bread, and not enough of that. I fancy sometimes, that in some mysterious way, that want will be made up to them in the next life, and so with all the beautiful things which travelled people talk of—I comfort myself with the fancy that I see as much as is good for me here, and that if I make good use of that, I shall see the Alps and the Andes in the world to come, or something much more worth seeing. Tell me now, how far may that range of crags be from us? I am sure that I could walk there after luncheon, this mountain air is strengthening me so'

'Walk thither? I assure you they are at least four miles off'

'Four? And I thought them near! So clear and sharp as they stand out against the sky, one fancies that one could almost stretch out a hand and touch those knolls and slabs of rock, as distinct as in a photograph, and yet so soft and rich withal, dappled with pearly-gray stone and purple heath. Ah! So it must be, I suppose. The first time that one sees a glorious thing, one's heart is lifted up towards it in love and awe, till it seems near to one—ground on which one may freely tread, because one appreciates and admires, and so one forgets the distance between its grandeur and one's own littleness'

The illusion was palpable; but did he intend it? Surely not, after what he had just said. And yet there was a sadness in the tone which made Valentia fancy that some feeling for her might still linger, but he evidently had been speaking to himself, forgetful, for the moment, of her presence, for he turned to her with a start and a blush—'But now—I have been troubling you too long with this stupid tit-tit sentimentality of mine, I will make my bow, and find the major. I am afraid, if it be possible for him to forget any one, he has forgotten me in some new noose or other.'

He went out, and to Valentia's chagrin, she saw him no more that day. He spent the forenoon in the garden, and the afternoon in lying down, and at night complained of fatigue, and stayed in his own room the whole evening, while Campbell read him to sleep. Next morning, however, he made his appearance at breakfast, well and cheerful.

'I must play at sick man no more, or I shall rob you, I see, of Major Campbell's company, and I owe you all far too much already'

'Unless you are better than you were last night, you must play at sick man,' said the major. 'I cannot conceive what exhausted you so, unless you ladies are better nurses, I must let no one come near him but myself. If you had been scolding him the whole morning, instead of praising him as he deserves, he could not have been more tired last night.'

'Pray do not!' cried Frank, evidently much pained. 'I had such a delightful morning, and every one is so kind—you only make me wretched, when I feel all the trouble I am giving'

'My dear fellow,' said Scotchbush, en grand sérieux, 'after all that you have done for our people at Aberlva, I should be very much shocked if any of my family thought any service shown to you a trouble'

'Pray do not speak so,' said Frank, 'I am fallen among angels, when I least expected'

'Scotchbush as an angel!' shouted Lucia, clapping her hands. 'Elsley, don't you see the wings sprouting already, under his shooting jacket?'

'They are my braces, I suppose, of course,' said Scotchbush, who never understood a joke about himself, though he liked one about other people, while Elsley, who hated all jokes, made no answer—at least none worth recording. In fact, as the reader may have discovered, Elsley, save tit-tit with some one who took his fancy, was somewhat of a silent and morose animal, and, as little Scotchbush confided to Mellot, there was no getting a rise out of him. All which Lucia saw as keenly as any one, and tried to pass off by chatting nervously and fussy for him, as well as for herself, whereby she only made him the more cross, for he could not the least understand her argument—'Why, my dear, if you don't talk to people, I must!'

'But why should people be talked to?'

'Because they like it, and expect it!'

'The more foolish they. Much better to hold their tongues and think.'

'Or read your poetry, I suppose,' and then would begin a squabble.

Meanwhile there was one, at least, of the party, who was watching Lucia with most deep and painful interest. Lord Scoutbush was too busy with his own comforts, especially with his fishing, to think much of this moroseness of Elsley's. 'If he suited Lucia, very well. His taste and hers differed—but it was her concern, not his'—was a very easy way of freeing himself from all anxiety on the matter—but not so with Major Campbell. He saw all this, and knew enough of human nature to suspect that the self-seeking, which allowed as moroseness in company, might show as downright bad temper in private. Longing to know more of Elsley, if possible to guide and help him, he tried to be intimate with him, as he had tried at Aberlona, and him court, asked his opinion, talked to him on all subjects which he thought would interest him. His conclusion was more favourable to Elsley's head than to his heart. He saw that Elsley was vain, and liked his attentions, and that lowered him in his eyes—but he saw too that Elsley shrank from him, at first he thought it pride, but he soon found that it was fear, and that lowered him still more in his eyes.

Perhaps Campbell was too hard on the poet but his own purity itself told against Elsley. 'Who am I, that anyone should be afraid of me, unless they have done something wrong?' So, with his dark suspicious frown, he watched intently every word and every tone of Elsley's to his wife, and here he came to a more unpleasant conclusion still. He saw that they were, sometimes at least, not happy together, and from this he took for granted, too hastily, that they were never happy together, that Lucia was an utterly ill-used person, that Elsley was a bad fellow, who ill-treated her—and a black and awful indignation against the man grew up within him, all the more fierce because it seemed utterly righteous, and because, too, it had, under heavy jealousies, to be utterly concealed beneath a courteous and genial manner till many a time he felt inclined to knock Elsley down for little roughnesses to her, which were really the fruit of mere quichera, and then accused himself for a hypocrite, because he was keeping up the countenance of his wife with such a man. For Campbell, like most men of his temperament, was over-stern, and sometimes a little cruel and unjust, in demanding of others the same lofty code which he had laid down for himself, and in demanding it, too, of some more than of others, by a very questionable exercise of private judgment. On the whole, he was right, no doubt, in being as indulgent as he dared to the publicans and sinners like Scoutbush, and in being as severe as he dared on all Pharisees and pretentious persons whatsoever—but he was too much inclined to draw between the two classes one of those strong lines of demarcation which exist only in the fancies of the human brain, for sin, like all diseased matters, are complicated and confused matters, many a seeming Pharisee is at heart a self-condemned publican, and ought to be comforted, and not cursed, while many a publican is, in the midst of all his foul sins, a thorough exclusive and self-complacent Pharisee, and needs not the right hand of mercy, but the strong arm of punishment.

Campbell, like other men, had his faults and his were those of a man wrapped up in a pure and stately, but an austere and lonely creed, disgusted with the world in all its forms, and looking down upon men in general nearly as much as Thimall did. So he set down Elsley for a bad man, to whom he was forced by hard circumstances to behave as if he were a good one.

The only way, therefore, in which he could vent his feeling, was by showing to Lucia that staid attention which so gently and chivalry demand of a man toward an injured woman. Not that he dared, or wished, to conduct himself with her as he did with Valentin, who had also not been a married woman, but did not know her as intimately as he did her sister—but still he had a right to behave as the most intimate friend of her family, and he asserted that right, and all the more determinedly because Elsley scorned now and then not to like it. 'I will teach him how to behave to a charming woman,' said he to himself, and perhaps he had been wiser if he had not said it—but every man has his weak point, and chivalry was Major Campbell's.

'What do you think of that poet, Elliot?' said he once, on returning from a picnic, during which Elsley had never noticed his wife, and at last, finding Valentin engaged with Headley, had actually gone off, pour pas aller, to watch Lord Scoutbush fishing.

'Oh, clever enough, and to spare, and as well read a man as I know. One of the Shunt-and-drag party, of course, the express locomotive school, screw and-go ahead and thinks me, with my classmate, a half-baked pagan. Still, every man has a right to his opinion. Tave and let bye.'

'I don't care about his taste,' said the major impatiently. 'What sort of man is he?—man, Claude?'

'Ahem, humph! "Inimitable genius poetarum." But one is so accustomed to that among literary men, one never expects them to be like anybody else, and so takes their whims and oddities for granted.'

'And then sink, too, eh?'

'Sink? I know of none on his part.'

'Don't you call temper a sin?'

'No, I call it a determination of blood to the head, or of animal spirits to the wrong place, or—my dear major, I am no moralist. I take people, you know, as I find them. But he is a bore, and I should not wonder if that sweet little woman had found it out ere now.'

Campbell ground something between his teeth. He fancied himself full of righteous wrath—he was really in a very unchristian temper. Be it so—perhaps there were excuses for him (as there are for many men), of which we know nothing.

Elsley, meanwhile, watched Campbell with fast lowering brow. Losing a woman's affections? He who does so deserves his fate. Had he been in the habit of paying proper attention to Lucia, he would have liked Campbell all the more for his conduct. There are few greater pleasures to a man who is what he should be to his wife, than to see other men admiring what he admires, and trying to rival him where he knows that he can have no rival. Let them worship as much as they will. Let her make herself as charming to them as she can. What matter? He smiles at them in his heart, for has he not, over and above all the pretty things which he can say and do ten times as well as they, a talisman—a dozen talismans which are beyond their reach!—in the strength of which he will go home and laugh over with her, amid sacred caresses, all which makes mean men mad? But Elsley, alas for him, had neglected Lucia himself, and therefore dreaded comparison with any other man, and the suspicions which had taken root in him at Aboriva grew into ugly shape and strength. However, he was silent, and contented himself with coldness and all but rudeness.

There were excuses for him. In the first place, it would have been an ugly thing to take notice of any man's attentions to a wife, it could not be done but upon the strongest grounds, and done in a way which would make a complete rupture necessary, so breaking up the party in a sufficiently unpleasant way. Besides, to move in the matter at all would be to implicate Lucia, for of whatsoever kind Campbell's attentions were, she evidently liked them, and a quarrel with her on that score was more than Elsley dared face. He was not a man of strong moral courage, he hated a scene of any kind, and he was afraid of being worsted in any really serious quarrel, not merely by Campbell, but by Lucia. It may seem strange that he should be afraid of her, though not so that he should be afraid of Campbell. But the truth is, that the man who bullies his wife very often does so—as Elsley had done more than once—simply to prove to himself his own strength, and hide his fear of her. He knew well that woman's tongue, when once the 'fair beast' is brought to bay, is a weapon far too trenchant to be faced by any shield but that of a very clear conscience toward her, which was more than Elsley had.

Besides—and it is an honour to Elsley Vavasour, amid all his weakness, that he had justice and chivalry enough left to know what nine men out of ten ignore—behind all, let the worst come to the worst, lay one just and terrible rejoinder, which he, though he had been no worse than the average of men, could only answer by silent shame—

'At least, sir, I was pure when I came to you! You best know whether you were so likewise.'

And yet even that, so all-forgiving is woman, might have been faced by some means; but the miserable complication about the false name still remained. Elsley believed that he was in his wife's power, that she could, if she chose, turn upon him, and proclaim him to the world as a scoundrel and an impostor. And, as it is of the nature of man to hate those whom he fears, Elsley began to have dark and ugly feelings toward Lucia. Instead of throwing them away, as a strong man would have done, he pampered them almost without meaning to do so. For he let them run riot through his too vivid imagination, in the form of possible speeches, possible scenes, till he had looked and looked through a hundred thoughts which no man has a right to entertain for a moment. True he had entertained them with horror, but he ought not to have entertained them at all, he ought to have kicked them contemptuously out and back to the devil, from whence they came. It may be, again, that this is impossible to man, that prayer is the only refuge against that Walpurgis-dance of the witches and the hounds, which will, at hapless moments, whirl unbidden through a mortal brain, but Elsley did not pray.

So, leaving these fancies in his head too long, he soon became accustomed to them, and accustomed, too, to the Nemesis which they bring with them, of chronic moodiness and concealed rage. Day by day he was lashing himself up into fresh fury, and yet day by day he was becoming more careful to conceal that fury. He had many reasons moral cowardice, which made him shrink from the tremendous consequences of an explosion—equally tremendous, were he right or wrong. Then the secret hope, perhaps the secret consciousness, that he was wrong, and was only saying to God, like the self-deceiving prophet, 'I do well to be angry', then the honest fear of going too far, of being surprised at last into some hideous and irreparable speech or deed, which he might find out too late was utterly unjust, then at moments (for even that would cross him) the devilish notion that, by concealment, he might lure Lucia on to give him a safe ground for attack. All these, and more, tormented him for a wretched fortnight, during which he became, at such an expense of self-control as he had not exercised for years, courteous to Campbell, more than courteous to Lucia, hiding under a smiling face wrath which increased with the pressure brought to bear upon it.

Campbell and Lucia, Melot, Valentin, and Frank, utterly deceived, went on more merrily than ever, little dreaming that they walked and talked daily with a man who was fast becoming glad to flee to the pit of hell, but for the fear that 'God would be there also.'

They meanwhile chatted on, enjoying, as human souls are allowed to do at rare and precious moments, the mere sensation of being, of which they would talk at times in a way which led them down into deep matters: for instance—

'How pleasant to sit here for ever!' said

Claude, one afternoon, in the inn garden at Beddgelert, 'and say, not with Descartes, "I think, therefore I exist," But simply, "I enjoy, therefore I exist." I almost think those Emersonians are right at times when they crave the "life of plants, and stones, and iam." Stangrave said to me once, that his ideal of perfect bliss was that of an oyster in the Indian seas, drinking the warm salt water motionless, and troubling himself about nothing, while nothing troubled itself about him.'

'Till a diver came and tore him up for the sake of his pearls!' said Valentin.

'He did not intend to contain any pearls. A pearl, you know, is a disease of the oyster, the product of some irritation. He wished to be the oyster pure and simple, a part of nature.'

'And to be of no use?' asked Frank.

'Of none whatsoever. Nature had made him what he was, and all beside was his business, and not his. I don't deny that I laughed at him, and made him wroth by telling him that his doctrine was "the apotheosis of loafing." But my heart went with him, and with the jolly oyster too. It is very beautiful after all, that careless nymph and shepherd life of the old Greeks, and that Marquesas romance of Herman Melville's to enjoy the simple fact of living, like a Neapolitan lazzarone, or a fly upon a wall.'

'But the old Greek heroes fought and laboured to till the land, and rid it of giants and monsters,' said Frank. 'And as for the Marquesas, Mr Melville found out, did he not—as you did once—that they were only petting and fattening him for the purpose of eating him? There is a dark side to that pretty picture, Mr Mellot.'

'Tant pis pour eux!' But that is an unnecessary appendage to the idea, surely. It must be possible to realise such a simple, rich, healthy life, without wickedness, if not without human sorrow. It is no dream, and no one shall rob me of it. I have seen fragments of it scattered up and down the world, and I believe they will all meet in Paradise—where and when I care not, but they will meet. I was very happy in the South Sea Islands, after that, when nobody meant to eat me, and I am very happy here, and do not intend to be eaten, unless it will be any pleasure to Miss St Just. No, let man enjoy himself when he can, and take his fill of those flaming red geraniums, and glossy rhododendrons, and feathered crown ferns, and the gold green lace of those acacias tossing and whispering overhead, and the purple mountains sleeping there aloft, and the murmur of the brook over the stones, and drink in scents with every breath—what was his nose made for, save to smell? I used to torment myself once by asking them all what they meant. Now I am content to have done with symbolisms, and say, "What you all mean, I care not, all I know is, that I can draw pleasure from the mere sight of you, as, perhaps, you do from the mere sight of me, so let us sit together, nature and I, and stare into each other's eyes like two young lovers, careless of the morrow and its griefs." I will not even take the trouble to paint her. Why make ugly copies of perfect pictures? Let those who wish to see her take a railway ticket, and save us academicians colours and canvas. Quant à moi, the public must go to the mountains, as Mahomet had to do, for the mountains shall not come to the public.'

'One of your wilful paradoxes, Mr Mellot, why, you are photographing them all day long.'

'Not quite all day long, madam. And after all, il faut vivre. I want a few luxuries, I have no capacity for keeping a shop, photographing pays better than painting, considering the time it takes, and it is only nature reproducing herself, not caricaturing her. But if any one will ensure me a poor two thousand a year, I will promise to photograph no more, but vanish to Sicily or Calabria, and sit with Sabina in an orchard all my days, turning rose garlands for her pretty head, like Theocritus and his friends, while the "pears drop on our shoulders, and the apples by our side."

'What do you think of all this?' asked Valentin of Frank.

'That I am too like the Emersonian oyster here, very happy, and very useless, and, therefore, very anxious to be gone.'

'Surely you have earned the right to be idle awhile.'

'No one has a right to be idle.'

'Oh!' groaned Claude, 'where did you find that eleventh commandment?'

'I have done with all eleven commandments, for I find it quite hard work enough to keep the ancient ten. But I find it, Mellot, in the deepest abyss of all, in the very depth from which the commandments sprang. But we will not talk about it here.'

'Why not?' asked Valentin, looking up. 'Are we so very naughty as to be unworthy to listen?'

'And are these mountains,' asked Claude, 'so ugly and ill-made that they are an unfit pulpit for a sermon? No, tell me what you mean. After all, I am half in jest.'

'Do not courtesy, pity, chivalry, generosity, self-sacrifice—in short, being of use—do not our hearts tell us that they are the most beautiful, noble, lovely things in the world?'

'I suppose it is so,' said Valentin.

'Why does one admire a soldier? Not for his epaulettes and red coat, but because one knows that, coxcomb though he be at home here, there is the power in him of that same self-sacrifice, that, when he is called, he will go and die, that he may be of use to his country. And yet—it may seem invidious to say so just now—but there are other sorts of self-sacrifice, less showy, but even more beautiful.'

'Oh, Mr Headley, what can a man do more than die for his countrymen?'

'Live for them. It is a longer work, and therefore a more difficult and a nobler one.'

Frank spoke in a somewhat sad and abstracted tone.

'But tell me,' she said, 'what all this has to do with—with the deep matter of which you spoke?'

'Simply that it is the law of all earth, and heaven, and Him who made them. That God is perfectly powerful, because He is perfectly and infinitely of use, and perfectly good, because He delights utterly and always in being of use, and that, therefore, we can become like God as the very heathens felt that we can, and ought to become—only in proportion as we become of use. I did not see it once. I tried to be good, not knowing what good meant. I tried to be good, because I thought it would pay me in the world to come. But, at last, I saw that all life, all devotion, all piety, were only worth anything, only Divine, and God-like, and God-beloved, as they were means to that one end—to be of use.'

'It is a noble thought, Headley,' said Claude, but Valentinia was silent.

'It is a noble thought, Mollot, and all thoughts become clear in the light of it, even that most difficult thought of all, which so often torments good people, when they feel, "I ought to love God, and yet I do not love Him." Easy to love Him, if one can once think of Him as the concentration, the ideal perfection of all which is most noble, admirable, lovely in human character! And easy to work, too, when one once feels that one is working for such a thing, and with such a Being as that! The whole world round us, and the future of the world, too, seem full of light, even down to its innermost and lowest depths, when we can but remember that great idea. An infinitely useful God over all, who is trying to make each of us useful in His place. If that be not the best and wisest vision of which old mystics spoke so rapturously, one glimpse of which was perfect bliss, I at least know none nobler, dearer none more blessed. Pray forgive me, Miss St. Just! I ought not to intrude thus!'

'Go on!' said Valentinia.

'I—I really have no more to say. I have said too much. I do not know how I have been betrayed so far,' stammered Frank, who had the just dislike of his school of anything like display on such solemn matters.

'Can you tell us too much truth? Mr. Headley is right, Mr. Mollot, and you are wrong.'

'It will not be the first time, Miss St. Just. But what I spoke in jest, he has answered in earnest.'

'He was quite right. We are none of us half earnest enough. There is Lucia with the children.' And she rose and walked across the garden.

'You have moved the fair trifler somewhat,' said Claude.

'God grant it! but I cannot think what made me.'

'Why think? You spoke out nobly, and I shall not forget your sermon.'

'I was not preaching at you, most affectionate and kindly of men.'

'And laziest of men, likewise. What can I do now, at this moment, to be of use to any one? Set me my task.'

But Frank was following with his eyes Valentinia, as she went hurriedly across to Lucia. He saw her take two of the children at once on her sister's hands, and carry them away down a walk. A few minutes afterwards he could hear her laughing with them, but he could not have guessed, from the silver din of those merry voices, that Valentinia's heart was heavy within her.

For her conscience was really smitten. Of what use was she in the world? Major Campbell had talked to her often about her duties to this person and to that, of this same necessity of being useful, but she had escaped from the thought, as we have seen her, in laughing at poor little Scotchman on the very same score. But why had not Major Campbell's sermons touched her heart as this one had? Who can tell? Who is there among us to whom an oft-heard truth has not become a tiresome and superfluous commonplace, till one day it has flashed before us utterly new, indelible, not to be disobeyed, written in letters of fire across the whole vault of heaven! All one can say is, that her time was not come. Besides, she looked on Major Campbell as a being utterly superior to herself, and that very superiority, while it allowed her to be as familiar with him as she chose, excused her in her own eyes from opening to him her real heart. She could safely jest with him, let him pet her, play at being his daughter, while she felt that between him and her lay a gulf as wide as between earth and heaven—and that very notion comforted her in her naughtiness, for in that case, of course, his code of morals was not meant for her, and while she took his warnings (as many of them at least as she chose), she thought herself by no means bound to follow his examples. She all but worshipped him as her guardian angel—but she was not meant for an angel herself, so she could indulge freely in those little escapades and frivolities for which she was born, and then, whenever frightened, run for shelter under his wings. But to hear the same, and even loftier words, from the lips of the curate, whom she had made her toy, almost her butt, was to have them brought down unexpectedly and painfully to her own level. It was his ideal, why ought it not to be hers? Was she not his equal, perhaps his superior? And so her very pride humbled her, as she said to herself, 'Then I too ought to be useful. I can be. I will be.'

'Lucia,' asked she, that very afternoon, 'will you let me take the children off your hands while Clara is busy in the morning?'

'Oh, you dear good creature! but it would be such a gêne! They are really stupid, I am afraid, sometimes, or else I am. They make me so miserably cross at times.'

'I will take them. It would be a relief to you, would it not?'

'My dear!' said poor Lucia, with a doleful smile, which seemed to Valentin's self-accusing heart to say, 'Have you only now discovered that fact?'

From that day Valentin courted Headley's company more and more. To fall in love with him was of course absurd, and he had cured himself of his passing fancy for her. There could be no harm, then, in her making the most of conversation so different from what she heard in the world, and which in her heart of hearts she liked so much better. For it was with Valentin as with all women, in this common fault of frivolity, as in most others, the men rather than they are to blame. Valentin had cultivated in herself those qualities which she saw admired by the men whom she met, and some one of whom, of course, she meant to marry, and as their female ideal was a butterfly ideal, a butterfly she became. But beneath all lay, deep and strong, the woman's love of nobleness and wisdom, the woman's longing to learn and to be led, which has shown itself in every age in so many a fantastic and even ugly shape, and which is their real excuse for the flirting with 'geniuses,' casting themselves at the feet of directors, which had tempted her to coquetry with Elsie, and was now bringing her into 'undesirable' intimacy with the poor curate.

She had heard that day, with some sorrow, his announcement that he wished to be gone, but as he did not refer to it again, she left the thought alone, and all but forgot it. The subject, however, was renewed about a week afterwards. 'When you return to Aberlady,' she had said, in reference to some commission.

'I shall never return to Aberlady.'

'Not return?'

'No, I have already resigned the curacy. I believe your uncle has appointed to it the man whom Campbell found for me, and an excellent man, I hear, he is. At least he will do better there than I.'

'But what could have induced you? How sorry all the people will be.'

'I am not sure of that,' said he with a smile.

'I did what I could at last to win back at least their respect, and to leave at least not hatred behind me, but I am unfit for them. I did not understand them. I meant—no matter what I meant, but I failed. God forgive me! I shall now go somewhere where I shall have simpler work to do, where I shall at least have a chance of practising the lesson which I learnt there. I learnt it all, strange to say, from the two people in the parish from whom I expected to learn least.'

'Whom do you mean?'

'The doctor and the schoolmistress.'

'Why from them less than from any in the parish? She so good, and he so clever?'

'That I shall never tell to any one now. Suffice it that I was mistaken.'

Valentin could obtain no further answer, and so the days ran on, every one becoming more and more intimate, till a certain afternoon, on which they were all to go and picnic, under Claude's pilotage, above the lake of Gwynnant. Scotchbush was to have been with them, but a heavy day's rain in the meanwhile swelled the streams into fishing order, so the little man ordered a car, and started at three in the morning for Bettws with Mr. Bowie, who, however, loth to give up the arrangement of plates and the extraction of champagne corks, considered his presence by the river side a natural necessity.

'My dear Miss Clara, ye see, there'll be nobody to see that his lordship puts on dry stockings, and he's always getting over the tops of his water boots, being young and duff, as we've all been, and no offence to you, and to tell you truth, I can stand all temptations in moderation, that is,—save an' except the chance o' drinkin' a bit.'

CHAPTER XX

BOTH SIDES OF THE MOON AT ONCE

THE spot which Claude had chosen for the picnic was on one of the lower spurs of that great mountain of The Maiden's Peak, which bounds the vale of Gwynnant to the south. Above, a wilderness of gnarled volcanic dykes and purple heather ledges, below, broken into glens, in which still linger pale green ash woods, relics of that great primeval forest in which, in less days, great Leicester used to rouse the hart with horn and horn.

Among the Sc Claude had found a little lawn, guarded by great rocks, out of every many of which the ashes grew as freely as on flat ground. Their feet were beddled deep in sweet fern and wild raspberries, and golden roil, and purple scabious, and tall blue campanulas. Above them, and before them, and below them, the ashes shook their green flagges in the bright sunshine, and through their glimpses were seen of the purple hills above, and, right in front, of the great cataract of Aunt Gwynnant, a long snow-white line zigzagging down cool black chills for many a hundred feet, and above it, depth beyond depth of purple shadow away into the very heart of Snowdon, up the long valley of Cwm-dyll, to the great amphitheatre of Clogwyn-y-Garnedd, while over all the cone of Snowdon rose, in perfect symmetry, between his attendant peaks of Lliwedd and Crib Coch.

There they sat, and laughed, and talked, the pleasant summer afternoon, in their pleasant summer bower, and never regretted the silence of the birds, so sweetly did Valentin's song go up in many a rich and Irish melody, while the lowing of the milk kine, and the wild cooing of the herd-boys, came softly up from the vale below, 'and all the air was filled with pleasant noise of waters.'

Then Claude must needs photograph them all, as they sat, and group them first according to his fancy, and among his fancies was one, that Valentinia should sit as queen, with Headley and the major at her feet. And Headley lounged there, and looked into the grass, and thought it well for him could he be there for ever.

Then Claude must photograph the mountain itself, and all began to talk of it.

'See the breadth of light and shadow,' said Claude, 'how the purple depth of the great lap of the mountain is thrown back by the sheet of green light on Lhwedd, and the red glory on the cliffs of Crib Coch, till you seem to look away into the bosom of the hill, mile after mile.'

'And so you do,' said Headley. 'I have learnt to distinguish mountain distances since I have been here. That peak is four miles from us now, and yet the shadowed hills at its foot seem double that distance.'

'And look, look,' said Valentinia, 'at the long line of glory with which the western sun is gilding the edge of the left-hand slope, bringing it nearer and nearer to us every moment, against the deep blue sky.'

'But what a form! Perfect lightness, perfect symmetry!' said Claude. 'Curves sweeping over curve, peak towering over peak, to the highest point, and then sinking down again as gracefully as they rose. One can hardly help fancying that the mountain moves, that those dancing hues are not instinct with life.'

'At least,' said Headley, 'that the mountain is a leaping wave, frozen just ere it fell.'

'Perfect,' said Valentinia. 'That is the very expression! So concise, and yet so complete.'

And Headley, poor fool, felt as happy as if he had found a gold mine.

'To me,' said Elsley, 'the fancy rises of some great Eastern monarch sitting in royal state, with ample shoulders sloping right and left, he lays his purple-mantled arms upon the heads of two of those Titan guards who stand on either side his footstool.'

'While from beneath his throne,' said Headley, 'as Eastern poets would say, flow everlasting streams, life-giving, to fertile broad lands below.'

'I did not know that you, too, were a poet,' said Valentinia.

'Nor I, madam. But if such scenes as these, and in such company, cannot inspire the fancy of even a poor country curate to something of exaltation, he must be dull indeed.'

'Why not put some of these thoughts into poetry?'

'What use?' answered he in so low, said, and meaning a tone, meant only for her ear, that Valentinia looked down at him but he was gazing intently upon the glorious scene. Was he hunting at the vanity and vexation of spirit of poor Elsley's versifying? Or did he mean that he had now no purpose in life—no prize for which it was worth while to win honour?

She did not answer him: but he answered himself—perhaps to explain away his own speech—

'No, madam! God has written the poetry already, and there it is before me. My business is not to rewrite it clumsily, but to read it humbly, and give Him thanks for it.'

More and more had Valentinia been attracted by Headley during the last few weeks. Accustomed to men who tried to make the greatest possible show of what small wits they possessed, she was surprised to find one who seemed to think it a duty to keep his knowledge and taste in the background. She gave him credit for more talent than appeared, for more, perhaps, than he really had. She was piqued, too, at his very modesty and self-restraint. Why did not he, like the rest who dangled about her, spread out his peacock's train for her eyes, and try to show his worship of her by setting himself off in his brightest colours? and yet this modesty awed her into respect of him, for she could not forget that, whether he had sentiment much or little, sentiment was not the staple of his manhood, she could not forget his chimney work, and she knew that, under that delicate and bashful outside, lay virtue and heroism, enough and to spare.

'But if you put these thoughts into words, you would teach others to read that poetry.'

'My business is to teach people to do right, and if I cannot, to pray God to find some one who can.'

'Right, Headley!' said Major Campbell, laying his hand on the curate's shoulder. 'God dwells no more in books written with pens than in temples made with hands, and the sacrifice which pleases Him is not verse, but righteousness. Do you recollect, Queen Whims, what I wrote once in your album?'

"Be good, sweet maid, and let who will be clever,
Thou shalt be a great one then, all day long,
That is what I do, that I do, that I do,
That I do, that I do, that I do, that I do."

'But, you naughty, hypocritical Saint Père, you write poetry yourself, and beautifully.'

'Yes, as I smoke my cigar, to comfort my poor rheumatic old soul. But if I lived only to write poetry, I should think myself as wise as if I lived only to smoke tobacco.'

Valentinia's eyes could not help glancing at Elsley, who had wandered away to the neighbouring brook, and was gazing with all his eyes upon a ferny rock, having left Lucia to help Claude with his photographing.

Frank saw her look, and read its meaning, and answered her thoughts, perhaps too hastily.

'And what a really well-read and agreeable man he is, all the while! What a mine of quaint learning, and beautiful old legend! If he would but bring it into the common stock for every one's amusement, instead of hoarding it up for himself!'

'Why, what else does he do but bring it into the common stock, when he publishes a book which every one can read?' said Valentinia, half out of the spirit of contradiction.

'And few understand,' said Headley quietly.

'You are very unjust, he is a very discerning and agreeable person, and I shall go and talk to him.' And away went Valentin to Elsley, somewhat cross. Woman-like, she allowed, for the sake of her sister's honour, no one but herself to depreciate Vavasour, and chose to think it impertinent on Headley's part.

Headley began quietly talking to Major Campbell about botany, while Valentin, a little ashamed of herself all the while, took her revenge on Elsley by socking him for his unsocial ways, in the very terms which Headley had been using.

At last Claude, having finished his photographing, departed downward to get some new view from the road below, and Lucia returned to the rest of the party. Valentin joined them at once, bringing up Elsley, who was not in the best of humours after her duties, and the whole party wandered about the woodland, and rambled down beside the torrent beds.

At last they came to a point where they could descend no farther, for the stream, falling over a cliff, had worn itself a narrow chasm in the rock, and thundered down it into a deep narrow pool.

Lucia, who was basking in the sunshine and the flowers as simply as a child, would needs peep over the brink, and made Elsley hold her while she looked down. A quiet happiness, as of old recollections, came into her eyes, as she watched the sparkling and foaming water—

'And beauty, born of murmuring sound,
Did pass into her face.

Campbell started. The Lucia of seven years ago seemed to bloom out again in that pale face and wrinkled forehead, and a smile came over his face, too, as he looked.

'Just like the dear old waterfall at Kilnabeggan. You recollect it, Major Campbell?'

Elsley always disliked recollections of Kilnabeggan, recollections of her life before he knew her, recollections of pleasures in which he had not shared, especially recollections of his old acquaintance with the major.

'I do not, I am ashamed to say,' replied the major.

'Why, you were there a whole summer. Ah! I suppose you thought about nothing but your salmon fishing. If Elsley had been there he would not have forgotten a rock or a pool. Would you, Elsley?'

'Really, in spite of all salmon, I have not forgotten a rock or a pool about the place which I ever saw, but at the waterfall I never was.'

'So he has not forgotten! What cause had he to remember so carefully?' thought Elsley.

'Oh, Elsley, look! What is that exquisite flower, like a ball of gold, hanging just over the water?'

If Elsley had not had the evil spirit haunting about him, he would have joined in Lucia's admiration of the beautiful creature, as it dropped into the foam from its narrow ledge, with its fan of palmate leaves bright green against the black mosses of the rock, and its golden petals glowing like a tiny sun in the darkness of the chasm, as it was, he answered—

'Only a buttercup.'

'I am sure it's not a buttercup! It is three times as large, and a so much paler yellow! Is it a buttercup, now, Major Campbell?'

Campbell looked down.

'Very nearly one, after all, but its real name is the globe flower. It is common enough here in spring, you may see the leaves in every pasture. But I suppose this plant, hidden from the light, has kept its flowers till the autumn.'

'And till I come to see it, darling that it is! I should like to reward it by wearing it home.'

'I dare say it would be very proud of the honour, especially if Mr Vavasour would enbalm it in verse, after it had done service to you.'

'It is doing good enough service where it is,' said Elsley. 'Why pluck out the very eye of that perfect picture?'

'Strange,' said Lucia, 'that such a beautiful thing should be born there all alone upon these rocks, with no one to look at it.'

'It enjoys itself sufficiently without us, no doubt,' said Elsley.

'Yes, but I want to enjoy it. Oh, if you could but get it for me!'

Elsley looked down. There was fifteen feet of somewhat slippery rock, then a ragged ledge a foot broad, in a crack of which the flower grew, then the dark boiling pool. Elsley shrugged his shoulders, and said, smiling, as if it were a fine thing to say, 'Really, my dear, all men are not knight-errants enough to endanger their necks for a bit of weed, and I cannot say that such rough tour de force are at all to my fancy.'

Lucia turned away. But she was vexed. Campbell could see that a strange fancy for the plant had seized her. As she walked from the spot, he could hear her talking about its beauty to Valentin.

Campbell's blood boiled. To be asked by that woman—by any woman—to get her that flower and to be afraid! It was bad enough to be ill-tempered, but to be a coward, and to be proud thereof! He yielded to a temptation, which he had much better have left alone, seeing that Lucia had not asked him, swinging himself easily enough down the ledge, got the flower, and put it, quietly bowing, into Mrs Vavasour's hand.

He was frightened when he had done it, for he saw, to his surprise, that she was frightened. She took the flower, smiling thanks, and expressing a little commonplace horror and astonishment at his having gone down such a dangerous cliff, but she took it to Elsley, drew his arm through hers, and seemed determined to make as much of him as possible for the rest of the afternoon. 'The fellow was jealous, then, in addition to his other sins!' And Campbell, who felt that he had put himself unnecessarily forward between husband and wife, grew more and more angry, and somehow, unlike his usual wont, refused to confess himself in the wrong, because he was in the wrong. Certainly it was not pleasant for poor Elsley, and so Lucia felt, and bore with him when he refused to be comforted, and rendered blessing for railing when he said to her more than one angry word, but she had become accustomed to angry words by this time.

All might have passed off, but for that careless Valentin, who had not seen the details of what had passed, and so advised himself to ask where Lucia got that beautiful plant?

'Major Campbell picked it up for her from the cliff,' said Elsley dilly.

'Ah! at the risk of his neck, I don't doubt. He is the most matchless cavaliers servent.'

'I shall leave Mr. Vavasour to his care, then—that is, for the present,' said Elsley, drawing his arm from Lucia's.

'I assure you,' answered she, roused in her turn by his determined bad temper, 'I am not the least afraid of being left in the charge of so old a friend.'

Elsley made no answer, but sprang down through the thickets, calling loudly to Claude Mellet.

It was very naughty of Lucia, no doubt, but even a woman will turn, and there are times when people who have not courage to hold their peace must say something or other, and do not always, in the hurry, get out what they ought, but only what they have time to think of. And she forgot what she had said the next minute, in Major Campbell's question—

'Am I, then, so old a friend, Mrs. Vavasour?'

'Of course, who else?'

Campbell was silent a moment. If he was inclined to choke, at least Lucia did not see it.

'I trust I have not offended you—Mr. Vavasour?'

'Oh!' she said, with a forced gaiety, 'only one of my poetic fancies. He wanted so much to see Mr. Mellet photograph the waterfall. I hope he will be in time to find him.'

'I am a plain soldier, Mrs. Vavasour, and I only ask because I do not understand. What are poetic fancies?'

Lucia looked up in his face puzzled, and saw there an expression so grave, pitying, tender, that her heart leaped up toward him, and then sank back again.

'Why do you ask? Why need you know? You are no poet.'

'And for that very cause I ask you.'

'Oh, but,' said she, guessing at what was in his mind, and trying, woman-like, to play purposely at cross purposes, and to defend her husband at all risks, 'he has an extraordinary poetic faculty, all the world agrees to that, Major Campbell.'

'What matter?' said he. Lucia would have been very angry, and perhaps ought to have been so, for what business of Campbell's was it whether her husband were kind to her or not?

but there was a deep sadness, almost despair, in the tone, which disarmed her.

'Oh, Major Campbell, is it not a glorious thing to be a poet? And is it not a glorious thing to be a poet's wife? Oh, for the sake of that—I could but see him honoured, appreciated, famous, as he will be some day.' Though I think (and she spoke with all a woman's pride), 'he is somewhat famous now, is he not?'

'Famous? Yes,' answered Campbell, with an abstracted voice, and then rejoined quickly, 'If you could but see that, what then?'

'Why then,' said she, with a half smile (for she had nearly entrapped herself into an admission of what she was determined to conceal), 'why then, I should be still more what I am now, his devoted little wife, who cares for nobody and nothing but putting his study to rights, and bringing up his children.'

'Happy children,' said he, after a pause and half to himself 'who have such a mother to bring them up.'

'Do you really think so? But flattery need not to be one of your sins. Ah, I wish you could give me some advice about how I am to train them.'

'So it is she who has the work of education, not he?' thought Campbell to himself, and then answered gaily—

'My dear madam, what can a confirmed old bachelor like me know about children?'

'Oh, don't you know?' (and she gave one of her pretty Irish laughs) 'that it is the old maids who always write the children's books for the benefit of us poor ignorant married women? But' (and she spoke earnestly again) 'we all know how wise and good you are. I did not know it in old times. I am afraid I used to torment you when I was young and foolish.'

'Where on earth can Mellet and Mr. Vavasour be?' asked Campbell.

'Oh, never mind. Mr. Mellet has gone wandering down the loch with his apparatus, and my Elsley has gone wandering after him, and will find him in due time, with his head in a black bag, and a great tail just going to change him from behind, like that hapless man in Punch. I always tell Mr. Mellet that will be his end.'

Campbell was deeply shocked to hear the light tone in which she talked of the passionate temper of a man whom she so surely loved. How many outbreaks of it there must have been, how many paroxysms of astonishment, shame, grief—perhaps, alas! counterbursts of anger ere that heart could have become thus proof against the ever-lowering thunderstorm!

'Well,' he said, 'all we can do is to walk down to the car, and let them follow, and, meanwhile, I will give you my wise opinion about this education question, whereof I know nothing.'

'It will be all oracular to me, for I know nothing either,' and she put her arm through his, and walked on.

'Did you hurt yourself then? I am sure you are in pain.'

'I! Never less free from it, with many thanks to you. What made you think so?'

'I heard you breathe so hard, and quite stamp your feet, I thought I suppose it was fancy.'

It was not fancy, nevertheless. Major Campbell was stamping down everything, and succeeded, too, in crushing it.

They walked on toward the car, Valentia and Headley following them, ere they arrived at the place where they were to meet it, it was quite dark, but what was more important, the car was not there.

'The stupid man must have mistaken his orders, and gone home.'

'Or let the horse go home of itself, while he was asleep inside. He was more than half tipsy when we started.'

So spoke the major, divining the exact truth. There was nothing to be done but to walk the long miles home, and let the two tenants follow as they could.

'We shall have plenty of time for our educational lecture,' said Lucia.

'Plenty of time to waste, then, my dear lady.'

'Oh, I never talk with you five minutes—I do not know why—without feeling wiser and happier. I envy Valentia for having seen so much of you of late.'

Little thought poor Lucia, as she spoke these innocent words, that within ten yards of her, crouched behind the wall, his face and every limb writhing with mangled enmity and rage, was none other but her husband.

He had given place to the devil and the devil (for the 'superstitious' and 'old world' notion which attributes such frenzies to the devil has not yet been superseded by a better one) had entered into him, and concentrated all the evil habits and passions which he had indulged for years into one flaming hell within him.

Miserable man! His torments were sevenfold and if he had sinned, he was at least punished. Not merely by all which a husband has a right to feel in such a case, or fancies that he has a right, not merely by tortured vanity and self-conviction, by the agony of seeing any man preferred to him, which to a man of Elsie's character was of itself unbearable—not merely by the loss of trust in one whom he had once trusted utterly—but, over and above all, and worst of all, by the feeling of shame, self-reproach, self-hatred, which burns a jealous man, and which ought to haunt him, for few men lose the love of women who have once loved them, save by their own folly or baseness—by the recollection that he had traded on her trust, that he had drugged his own conscience with the fancy that she must love him always, let him do what he would, and had neglected and insulted her affection, because he fancied, in his conceit, that it was inalienable. And with the loss of self-respect came recklessness of it, and drove him on, as it has jealous men in all ages, to meannesses unspeakable, which have made them for centuries, poor wretches, the butt of worthless playwrights, and the scorn of their fellow-men.

Elsey had wandered, he hardly knew how or whither, for his calling to Melist was the merest blind,—stumbling over rocks, bracing himself against tree-trunks, to this wall. He knew they must pass it. He waited for them, and had his reward. Blind with rage, he hardly waited for the sound of their footsteps to die away before he had sprung into the road, and hurried up it in the opposite direction, anywhere, everywhere, — to escape from them, and from self. Whipt by the furies, he fled along the road and up the vale, he cared not whither.

And what were Headley and Valentia, who of necessity had paired off together, doing all the while?

They walked on silently side by side for ten minutes, then Frank said:

'I have been impertinent, Miss St. Just, and I beg your pardon.'

'No, you have not,' said she, quite hastily. 'You were right, too right, has it not been proved within the last five minutes? My poor sister! What can be done to mend Mr. Vavasour's temper? I wish you could talk to him, Mr. Headley.'

'He is beyond my art. His age, and his talents, and his consciousness of them,' said Frank, using the mildest term he could find, 'would prevent so insignificant a person as me having any influence. But what I cannot do, God's grace may.'

'Can it change a man's character, Mr. Headley? It may make good men better—but can it cure temper?'

'Major Campbell must have told you that it can do anything.'

'Ah, yes—with men as wise, and strong, and mild as he is, but with such a weak, vain man—'

'Miss St. Just, I know one who is neither wise, nor strong, nor noble, but as weak and vain as any man, in whom God has conquered— as He may conquer yet in Mr. Vavasour—all which makes man cling to life.'

'What, all?' asked she, suspecting, and not wrongly, that he spoke of himself.

'All, I suppose, which it is good for them to have crushed. There are feelings which last on, in spite of all struggles to quench them. I suppose, because they ought to last, because, while they torture, they still ennoble. Death will quench them—or if not, satisfy them—or if not, set them at rest somehow.'

'Death?' answered she, in a startled tone.

'Yes. Our friend, Major Campbell's friend, death. We have been seeing a good deal of him together lately, and have come to the conclusion that he is the most useful, pleasant, and instructive of all friends.'

'Oh, Mr. Headley, do not speak so! Are you in earnest?'

'So much in earnest, that I have resolved to go out as an army chaplain, to see in the war somewhat more of my new friend.' "

'Impossible! Mr Headley, it will kill you! All that horrible fever and cholera!'

'And what possible harm can it do me, if it does kill me, Miss St. Just?'

'Mr Headley, this is madness! I—we can not allow you to throw away your life thus—so young, and—and such prospects before you! And there is nothing that my brother would not do for you, were it only for your heroism at Aleralva. There is not one of the family who does not love and respect you, and long to see all the world appreciating you as we do, and your poor mother—'

'I have told my mother all, Miss St. Just, and she has said, Go, it is your only hope. She has other sons to comfort her. Let us say no more of it. Had I thought that you would have disapproved of it, I would never have mentioned the thing.'

'Disapprove of—your going to die? You shall not! And for me, too, for I guess all—all is my fault!'

'All is mine,' said he quietly, 'who was fool enough to fancy that I could forget you—conquer my love for you,' and at these words his whole voice and manner changed in an instant into wildest passion. 'I must speak—now and never more—I love you still, fool that I am! Would God I had never seen you! No, not that. Thank God for that to the last, but would God I had died of that cholera! that I had never come here, conceited fool that I was, fancying that it was possible, after having once — No! Let me go, go anywhere, where I may burden you no more with my absurd dreams! You, who have had the same thing said to you, and in finer words, a hundred times, by men who would not deign to speak to me!' and covering his face in his hands, he strode on, as if to escape.

'I never had the same thing said to me!'

'Never! How often have my gentlemen, noblemen, sworn that they were dying for you?'

'They never have said to me what you have done.'

'No—I am clumsy, I suppose—'

'Mr Headley, indeed you are unjust to yourself—unjust to me!'

'I—to you? Never! I know you better than you know yourself—see in you what no one else sees. Oh, what fools they are who say that love is blind! Blind? He sees souls with God's own light, not as they have become but as they ought to become—can become—are already in the sight of Him who made them!'

'And what might I become?' asked she, half-frightened by the new earnestness of his utterance.

'How can I tell! Something infinitely too high for me, at least, who even now am not worthy to kiss the dust off your feet.'

'Oh, do not speak so. little do you know —! No, Mr. Headley, it is you who are too good for me, too noble, single-eyed, self-sacrificing, to endure my vanity and meanness for a day.'

'Madam, do not speak thus! Give me no word which my folly can distort into a ray of hope, unless you wish to drive me mad. No! it is impossible, and, were it possible, what but ruin to my soul! I should live for you, and not for my work. I should become a schemer, ambitious, intriguing, in the vain hope of proving myself to the world worthy of you. No, let it be "Let the dead bury their dead, and follow thou me".'

She made no answer—what answer was there to make? And he strode on by her side in silence for full ten minutes. At last she was forced to speak.

'Mr Headley, recollect that this conversation has gone too far for us to avoid coming to some definite understanding—'

'Then it shall, Miss St. Just. Then it shall, once and for all formally and deliberately, it shall end now. Suppose—I only say suppose—that I could, without failing in my own honour, my duty to my calling, make myself such a name among good men, that, poor parson though I be, your family need be ashamed of nothing about me, save my poverty. Tell me, now and for ever, could it be possible—'

He stopped. She walked on, silent, in her turn.

'Say no, as a matter of course, and end it!'

said he bitterly.

She drew a long breath, as if leaving off a weight.

'I cannot—dare not say it.'

'It? Which of the two? yes, or no?'

She was silent.

He stopped, and spoke calmly and slowly. 'Say that again, and tell me that I am not dreaming. You! the adored! the worshipped! the luxurious!—and no blame to you that you are what you were born—could you endure a little parsonage, the teaching village school-children, tending dirty old women, and petty cares the whole year round?'

'Mr Headley,' answered she, slowly and calmly, in her turn, 'I could endure a cottage—a prison, I fancy, at moments to escape from this world, of which I am tired, which will soon be tired of me, from women who envy me, unites to me ambitious as base as their own, from men who admire—not me, for they do not know me, and never will—but what in me—I hate them!—will give them pleasure. I hate it all, despise it all, despise myself for it all every morning when I wake! What does it do for me, but rouse in me the very parts of my own character which are most despicable, most tormenting? If it goes on, I feel I could become as frivolous, as mean, ay, as wicked as the worst. You do not know—you do not know —. I have envied the nuns their convents. I have envied Selkirk his desert island. I envy now the milkmaids there below: anything to escape and be in earnest, anything for some one to teach me to be of use! Yes, this cholera—' and this war—though only, only its coming shadow has passed over me—and your words too—cried she, and stopped and hesitated, as if afraid to tell too much—‘they have wakened me—to a new life—at least to the dream of a new life!’

‘Have you not Major Campbell?’ said Headley, with a terrible effort of will.

‘Yes—but has he taught me? He is dear, and good, and wise—but he is too wise, too great for me. He plays with me as a lion might with a mouse, he is like a grand angel far above in another planet, who can pity and advise, but who cannot—What am I saying?’ and she covered her face with her hand.

She dropped her glove as she did so. Headley picked it up and gave it to her—as he did so their hands met, and their hands did not part again.

‘You know that I love you, Valentia St Just’

‘Too well! too well!’

‘But you know, too, that you do not love me’

‘Who told you so? What do you know? What do I know? Only that I long for some one to make me—to make me as good as you are!’ And she burst into tears.

‘Valentia, will you trust me?’

‘Yes!’ cried she, looking up at him suddenly ‘if you will not go to the war’

‘No—no—no! Would you have me turn traitor and coward to God, and now, of all moments in my life?’

‘Noble creature!’ said she, ‘you will make me love you whether I wish or not’

What was it, after all, by which Frank Headley won Valentia’s love? I cannot tell. Can you tell, sir, how you won the love of your wife? As little as you can tell of that still greater miracle—how you have kept her love since she found out what manner of man you were.

So they paced homeward, hand in hand, beside the shining ripples, along the Dunes shore. The birches breathed fragrance on them, the night-hawk whurred softly round their path, the stately mountains smiled above them in the moonlight, and seemed to keep watch and ward over their love, and to shut out the noisy world, and the harsh babble and vain fashions of the town. The summer lightning flickered to the westward; but round them the rich soft night seemed full of love,—as full of love as their own hearts were, and, like them, brooding silently upon its joy. At last the walk was over, the kind moon sank low behind the hills, and the darkness hid their blushes as they paced into the sleeping village, and their hands parted unwillingly at last.

When they came into the hall through the group of lounging gownsmen and tourists, they found Bowre arguing with Mrs. Lewis, in his dogmatic Scotch way—

‘So you see, madam, there’s no use defending the drunken loon any more at all, and here will my leddies have just walked their bonny legs off, all through that carnal sin of drunkenness, which is the curse of your Welsh population’

‘And not quite unknown north of Tweed either, Bowre,’ said Valentia, laughing. ‘There now, say no more about it. We have had a delightful walk, and nobody is the least tired. Don’t say any more, Mrs. Lewis—but tell them to get us some supper. Bowre, so my lord has come in?’

‘This half-hour good!’

‘Has he had any sport?’

‘Sport! ay, troth! Five fish in the day. That’s a river indeed at Bettws! Not a pawky wee lun, like this Aberglaslyn thing!’

‘Only five fish!’ said Valentia in a frightened tone.

‘Fish, my leddy, not trouts, I said. I thought ye knew better than that by this time’

‘Oh, salmon!’ cried Valentia, relieved.

‘Delightful! I’ll go to him this moment!’

And upstairs to Scoutbush’s room she went.

He was sitting in dressing-gown and slippers, sipping his claret, and frowning his fly-book (the only one he ever studied en amuse) with a most complacent face. She came in and stood demurely before him, holding her broad hat in both hands before her knees, like a schoolgirl, her face half-hidden in the black curls. Scoutbush looked up and smiled affectionately, as he caught the light of her eyes and the arch play of her lips.

‘Ah! there you are, at a pretty time of night! How beautiful you look, Val! I wish my wife may be half as pretty!’

Valentia made him a prim courtesy.

‘I am delighted to hear of my lord’s good sport. He will choose to be in a good humour, I suppose’

‘Good humour! ça va sans dire! Three stone of fish in three hours!’

‘Then his little sister is going to do a very foolish thing, and wants his leave to do it, which if he will grant, she will let him do as many foolish things as he likes without scolding him, as long as they both shall live’

‘Do it then, I beg. What is it? Do you want to go up Snowdon with Headley to-morrow, to see the sun rise? You’ll kill yourself!’

‘No,’ said Valentia very quietly, ‘I only want to marry him’

‘Marry him!’ cried Scoutbush, starting up.

‘Don’t try to look majestic, my dear little brother, for you are really not tall enough, as it is, you have only looked all your flies into your dressing-gown’

Scoutbush dashed himself down into his chair again.

‘I’ll be shot if you shall!’

‘You may be shot just as surely, whether I do or not,’ said she softly, and she knelt down before him, and put her arms round him, and laid her head upon his lap. ‘There, you can’t run away now, so you must hear me quietly. And you know it may not be often that we shall be together again thus, and oh, Scoutbush!

brother! if anything was to happen to you—I only say if—in this horrid war, you would not like to think that you had refused the last thing your little Val asked for, and that she was miserable and lonely at home?

'I'll be shot if you shall!' was all the poor viscount could get out.

'Yes, miserable and lonely, you gone away, and mon Saint Père too, and Lucia, she has her children—and I am so wild and weak—I must have some one to guide me and protect me indeed I must!'

'Why, that was what I always said! That was why I wanted you so to marry this season! Why did not you take Chalkclere, or half a dozen good matches who were dying for you, and not this confounded black parson, of all lords in the air?'

'I did not take Lord Chalkclere for the very reason that I do take Mr Headley. I want a husband who will guide me, not one whom I must guide.'

'Guide!' said Scouthush bitterly, with one of those little sparks of practical shrewdness which sometimes fell from him. 'Ay, I see how it is! These intriguing rascals of parsons—they begin as titler confessors, like so many popish priests, and one fine morning they blossom out into lovers, and so they get all the pretty women, and all the good fortunes—the sneaking, ambitious, low-lived—'

'He is neither! You are unjust, Scouthush!' cried Valeria, looking up. 'He is the very soul of honour! He might be rich now, and have had a fine living, if he had not been too conscientious to let his uncle buy him one, and that offended his uncle, and he would allow him nothing. And as for being low-lived, he is a gentleman, as you know, and if his uncle born business, his mother is a lady, and he will be well enough off one day.'

'You seem to know a great deal about his affairs.'

'He told me all, months ago—before there was any dream of this. And, my dear,' she went on, relapsing into her usual arch tone, 'there is no fear but his uncle will be glad enough to patronise him again, when he finds that he has married a viscount's sister.'

Scouthush laughed. 'You scheming little Irish rogue! But I won't. I've said it, and I won't. It's enough to have one sister married to a poor poet, without having another married to a poor parson. Oh! what have I done that I should be bothered in this way! Isn't it bad enough to be a landlady, and to have an estate, and be responsible for a lot of people that will die of the cholera, and have to vote in the house about a lot of things I don't understand, nor anybody else, I believe, but that, over and above, I must be the head of the family, and answerable to all the world for whom my mad sisters marry? I won't, I say!'

'Then I shall just go and marry without your leave! I'm of age, you know, and my fortune's my own, and then we shall come in as the runaway couples do in a play, while you sit there in your dressing-gown as the stern father—won't you borrow a white wig for the occasion, my lord?—and we shall fall down on our knees so, —and she put herself in the prettiest attitude in the world,—and beg your blessing—please forgive us this time, and we'll never do so any more! And then you will turn your face away, like the barman the ballad—'

"And brushed away the springing tear
He proudly strove to hide, etcetera, etcetera. Finish the scene for yourself, with a "Bless ye, my children, live as ye list."

'Go along, and marry the cat if you like! You are mad, and I am mad, and all the world's mad, I think.'

'There,' she said, 'I knew that he would be a good boy at last!' And she sprang up, threw her arms round his neck, and, to his great astonishment, burst into the most violent fit of crying.

'Good gracious, Valeria! do be reasonable! You'll go into a fit, or somebody will hear you! You know how I hate a scene! Do be good, there's a darling! Why didn't you tell me at first how much you wished for it, and I would have said yes in a moment.'

'Because I didn't know myself,' cried she passionately. 'There, I will be good and love you better than all the world, except one. And if you let those horrid Russians hurt you, I will hate you as long as I live, and be miserable all my life afterwards.'

'Why, Valeria, do you know, that sounds very like a bull!'

'Am I not a wild Irish girl?' said she, and laughed out, leaving Scouthush to return to his flies.

She bounded into Lucia's room, there to pour out a bursting heart—and stopped short.

Lucia was sitting on the bed, her shawl and bonnet tossed upon the floor, her head sunk on her bosom, her arms sunk by her side.

'Lucia, what is it? Speak to me, Lucia!'

She pointed faintly to a letter on the floor. Valeria caught it up. Lucia made a gesture as if to stop her.

'No, you must not read it. Too dreadful!'

But Valeria read it, while Lucia covered her face in her hands, and uttered a long, low, shuddering moan of bitter agony.

Valeria read, with flashing eyes and bursting brow. It was a hideous letter. The words of a man trying to supply the place of strength by violence. A hideous letter, unfit to be written here.

'Valeria! Valeria! It is false—a mistake, he is dreaming. You know it is false! You will not leave me too!'

Valeria dashed it on the ground, clasped her sister in her arms, and covered her head with kisses.

'My Lucia! My own sweet good sister! Base, cowardly,' sobbed she in her rage, while Lucia's agony began to find a vent in words, and she moaned out—

'What have I done! All that flower, that horrid flower, but who would have dreamed—and Major Campbell, too, of all men upon earth! Valentia, it is some horrid delusion of the devil! Why, he was there all the while, and you too! Could he think that I should before his very face? What must he fancy me? Oh, it is a delusion of the devil, and nothing else!'

'He is a wretch! I will take the letter to my brother, he shall right you!'

'Ah no! no! never! Let me tear it to atoms! Hide it! It is all a mistake! He did not mean it! He will recollect himself to-morrow and come back!'

'Let him come back if he dare!' cried Valentia, in a tone which said, 'I could kill him with my own hands!'

'Oh, he will come back! He cannot have the heart to leave his poor little Lucia. Oh, cruel, cowardly, not to have said one word—not one word to explain all, but it was all my fault, my wicked, odious temper, and after I had seen how vexed he was, too! Oh, Elsie, Elsie, come back, only come back, and I will beg your pardon on my knees! anything! Scold me, beat me, if you will! I deserve it all! Only come back, and let me see you free, and hear your voice, instead of having me here all alone, and the poor children too! Oh, what shall I say to them to-morrow, when they wake and find no father!'

Valentia's indignation had no words. She could only sit on the bed, with Lucia in her arms, looking down at all the world above that fair head which one moment dropped on her bosom, and the next gazed up into her face in pitiful childlike pleading.

'Oh, if I but knew where he was gone! If I could find him! One word—one word would set all right! It always did, Valentia, always! He was so kind, so dear in a moment, when I quit away my naughty, naughty temper, and smiled in his face like a good wife. Wicked creature that I was! and this is my punishment. Oh, Elsie, one word, one word! I must find him if I went barefoot over the mountains. I must go, I must—'

And she tried to rise, but Valentia held her down, while she entreated piteously—

'I will go, and see about finding him! I should at last, as my only resource. Promise me to be quiet here, and I will!'

'Quiet! Yes, quiet here!' and she threw herself upon her face on the floor.

She looked up eagerly. 'You will not tell Seenthush?'

'Why not?'

'He is so—so hasty. He will kill him! Valentia, he will kill him! Promise me not to tell him, or I shall go mad!' And she sat up again, pressing her hands upon her head, and rocking from side to side.

'Oh, Valentia, if I dared only scream! but keeping it in kills me. It is like a sword through my brain now!'

'Let me call Clara.'

'No, no! not Clara. Do not tell her. I will be quiet, indeed I will, only come back soon, soon, for I am all alone, alone!' And she threw herself down again upon her face.

Valentia went out. Certain as she was of her sister's innocence, there was one terrible question in her heart which must be answered, or her belief in all truth, goodness, religion, would reel and rock to its very foundations. And till she had an answer to that, she could not sit still by Lucia.

She walked hurriedly, with compressed lips, but quivering limbs, downstairs, and into the sitting-room. Seenthush was gone to bed. Campbell and Mellet sat chatting still.

'Where is my brother?'

'Gone to bed, as someone else ought to be, for it is past twelve. Is it wason come in yet?'

'No.'

'Very odd,' said Claude, 'I never saw him after I left you.'

'He said certainly that he was going to find you,' said Campbell.

'There is no need for speculating,' said Valentia quietly, 'my sister has a note from Mr. Vansour at Pen-y-gwyd.'

'Pen-y-gwyd!' cried both men at once.

'Yes. Major Campbell, I wish to show it to you.'

Valentia's tone and manner were significant enough to make Claude Mellet lead them both good night.

When he had shut the door behind him, Valentia put the letter into the major's hand.

He was too much absorbed in it to look up at her, but if he had done so, he would have been startled by the awful capacity of passion which changed, for the moment, that gay Queen Whims into a terrible Ravanna, as she stood, leaning against the mantelpiece, but drawn up to her full height, her lips tight shut, eyes which gazed through and through him in awful scrutiny, bidding her very breath, while a nervous clanking of the little hand said, 'If you have tampered with my sister's heart, better for you that you were dead!'

He read it through, once, twice, with livid face, then dashed it on the floor.

'Fool—fool—fool! she is as pure as God's sunlight!'

'You need not tell me that,' said Valentia, through her closed teeth.

'Fool—fool!' And then, in a moment, his voice changed from indignation to the bitterest self-reproach. 'And fool I, thrice fool! Who am I, to rail on him? O God! what have I done?' And he covered his face with his hands.

'What have you done?' literally shrieked Valentia.

'Nothing that you or man can blame, Miss St. Just! Can you dream that, sinful as I am, I could ever harbour a thought toward her of which I should be ashamed before the angels of God?'

He looked up as he spoke, with an utter humility and an intense honesty which unnerved her at once.

'Oh, my Saint Père !'—and she held out both her hands. 'Forgive me, if—only for a moment—'

'I am not your Saint Père, nor any one's ! I am a poor, weak, converted, miserable man, who by his accursed unpertinence has broken the heart of the being whom he loves best on earth.'

Valentia started but ere she could ask for an explanation, he rejoined wildly—

'How is she ! Tell me only that, this once ! Has it killed her ! Does she hate him !'

'Adores him more than ever ! Oh, Major Campbell ! it is too pitious, too pitious !'

He covered his face with his hands, shuddering. 'Thank God ! yes, thank God ! So it should be. Let her love him to the last, and win her martyr's crown ! Now, Valentia St. Just, sit down, if but for five minutes, and listen, once for all, to the last words, perhaps, you will ever hear me speak, unless she wants you !—'

'No, no ! Tell me all, Saint Père !' said Valentia, 'for I am walking in a dream—a double dream !' as the new thought of Hewlley, and that walk, came over her. 'Tell me all at once, while I have wits left to comprehend !'

'Miss St. Just,' said he, in a clear calm voice, 'it is fit, for her honour and for mine, that you should know all. The first day that I ever saw your sister, I loved her, as a man loves who can never cease to love, or love a second time I was a raw, awkward Scotchman then, and she used to laugh at me. Why not ! I kept my secret, and determined to become a man at whom no one would wish to laugh. I was in the Company's service, then. You recollect her jesting once about the Indian army, and my commanding black people, and saying that the Lane only was fit for—some girl's jest !'

'No, I recollect nothing of it.'

'I never forgot it. I threw up all my prospects, and went into the Lane. Whether I won honour there or not, I need not tell you. I came back to England years after, not unworthy, as I fancied, to look your sister in the face as an equal. I found her married.'

He paused a little, and then went on, in a quiet business-like tone.

'Good. Her choice was sure to be a worthy one, and that was enough for me. You need not doubt that I kept my secret then more sacredly than ever. I returned to India, and tried to die. I dared not kill myself, for I was a soldier and a Christian, and belonged to God and my Queen. The Sikhs would not kill me, do what I would to help them. Then I threw myself into senecence, that I might stifle passion, and I stifled it. I fancied myself cured and I was cured ; and I returned to England again. I loved your brother for her sake, I loved you at first for her sake, then for your own. But I presumed upon my cure, I accepted your brother's invitation ; I caught at the opportunity of seeing her again,—happy—as I fancied, and of proving to myself my own soundness. I considered myself a sort of Melancthedek, neither young nor old, without passions, without purpose on earth—a fakeer who had licence to do and to dare what others might not. But I kept my secret, ~~personally~~ inviolate. I do not believe at this moment she dreams that—do you !'

'She does not.'

'Thank God ! I was a most conceited fool, puffed up with spiritual pride, tempting God needlessly. I want, I saw her. Heaven is my witness that, as far as passion goes, my heart is as pure as yours. But I found that I still cared more for her than for any being on earth. And I found too the sort of man upon whom—God forgive me ! I must not talk of that—I despised him, hated him, pretended to teach him his duty, by behaving better to her than he did—the spiritual coxcomb that I was ! What business had I with it ! Why not have left all to God and her good sense ! The devil tempted me to-day, in the shape of an angel of courtesy and civility, and here the end is come. I must find that man, Miss St. Just, if I travel the world in search of him. I must ask his pardon frankly, humbly, for my unpertinence. Perhaps so I may bring him back to her, and not die with a curse on my head for having parted those whom God has joined. And then to the old fighting-trade once more—the only one, I believe, I really understand, and see whether a Russian bullet will not fly straighter than a clumsy Sikh's.'

Valentia listened, awestricken, and all the more so because this was spoken in a calm, half-abstracted voice, without a note of feeling, save where he alluded to his own mistakes. When it was over, she rose without a word, and took both his hands in her own, sobbing bitterly.

'You forgive me, then, all the misery which I have caused !'

'Do not talk so ! Only forgive me for having fancied for one moment that you were anything but what you are, an angel out of heaven.'

Campbell hung down his head.

'Angel, truly ! Azrael, the angel of death, then. Go to her now—go, and leave a humble penitent man alone with God !'

'Oh, my Saint Père !' cried she, bursting into tears. 'This is too wretched—all a horrid dream—and when, too—when I had been counting on telling you something so different !—I cannot now, I have not the heart.'

'What, more misery !'

'Oh no ! no ! no ! You will know all to-morrow. Ask Scoutbush.'

'I shall be gone in search of that man long before Scoutbush is awake.'

'Impossible ! You do not know whether he is gone.'

'If I employ every detective in Bow Street, I will find him.'

'Wait, only wait, till the post comes in tomorrow. He will surely write, if not to her,—wrote that he is!—at least to some of us.'

'If he be alive. No I must go up to Pen-y-gwryd, where he was last seen, and find out what I can.'

'They will all be in bed at this hour of the night, and if—if anything has happened, it will be over by now,' added she with a shudder.

'God forgive me! It will indeed, but he may write—perhaps to me. He is no coward, I believe, and he may send me a challenge. Yes, I will wait for the post.'

'Shall you accept it if he does?'

Major Campbell smiled sadly.

'No, Miss St. Just, you may set your mind at rest upon that point. I have done quite enough harm already to your family. Now, good-bye! I will wait for the post to-morrow do you go to your sister.'

Valentia went, utterly bewildered. She had forgotten Frank, but Frank had not forgotten her. He had hurried to his room, lay till morning, sleepless with delight, and pouring out his pure spirit in thanks for this great and unexpected blessing. A new life had begun for him, even in the jaws of death. He would still go to the East. It seemed easy to him to go there in search of a grave, how much more now, when he felt so full of magic life, that fever, cholera, the clamours of war, could not harm him! After this proof of God's love, how could he doubt, how fear?

Little he thought that, three doors off from him, Valentia was sitting up the whole night through, vainly trying to quiet Lucia, who refused to undress, and paced up and down her room, hour after hour, in wild misery, which I leave no skill to detail.

CHAPTER XXI

NATURE'S MELODRAMA

WHAT, then, had become of Elsley? And whence had he written the fatal letter? He had hurried up the high road for half an hour and more, till the valley on the left sloped upward more rapidly, in dark dreary boxes, the moonlight shining on their runnels, while the mountain on his right sloped downwards more rapidly in dark dreary down, strewn with rocks which stood out black against the sky. He was nearing the head of the watershed, soon he saw slate roofs glittering in the moonlight, and found himself at the little inn of Pen-y-gwryd, at the meeting of the three great valleys, the central heart of the mountains.

And a genial, jovial little heart it is, and an honest, kindly little heart too, with warm blood within. So it looked that night, with every window red with comfortable light, and a long stream of glare pouring across the road from the open door, gilding the fir-tree tops in front but its geniality only made him shudder. He had been there more than once, and knew the place and the people, and knew, too, that of all people in the world, they were the least like him. He hurried past the doorway, and caught one glimpse of the bright kitchen. A sudden thought struck him. He would go in and write his letter there. But not yet—he could not go in yet, for through the open door came some sweet Welsh air, so sweet, that even he paused to listen. Men were singing in three parts, in that rich metallic temper of voice, and that perfect time and tune, which is the one gift still left to that strange Cynary race, worn out with the long burden of so many thousand years. He knew the air, it was 'The rising of the Lark.' Heavens! what a lathyr contrast to his own thoughts! But his blood roared, as if spell-bound, to hear it to the end. The lark's upward flight was over, and Elsley heard him come quivering down from heaven's gate, fluttering, sinking, trilling self-complacently, springing aloft in one bar, only to sink lower in the next, and call more softly to his brooding mate below, till worn out with his ecstasy, he murmured one last sigh of joy, and sank into the nest. The picture flashed through Elsley's brain as swiftly as the notes did through his ears. He breathed more freely when it vanished with the sounds. He strode hastily in, and down the little passage to the kitchen.

It was a low room, ceiled with dark beams, from which hung gun and fishing rods, harness and drying stockings, and all the miscellanea of a fishing inn kept by a farmer, and beneath it the usual happy, hearty, honest group. There was Harry Owen, bland and stalwart, his baby in his arms, smiling upon the world in general, old Mrs. Pritchard, bewailing over the fire, putting the last touch to one of those miraculous souillies, compact of clouds and nectar, which transport alike palate and fancy, at the first mouthful, from Snowdon to Belgrave Square. A sturdy four-limbed Saxon Gourbanneg sat with his back to the door, and two of the beautiful children on his knee, their long locks flowing over the elbows of his shooting-jacket, as, with both arms round them, he made Punch for them with his handkerchief and his fingers, and chattered to them in English, while they chattered in Welsh. By him sat another Englishman, to whom the three tuneful Snowdon guides, their music score upon their knees, sat listening approvingly, as he rolled out, with voice as of a jolly blackbird, or jollier monk of old, the good old Welsh song—

'My dog he has his master's nose,
To smell a knave through silken hose,
If friends or honest men go by,
Welcome, quoth my dog and I!

'Of foreign tongues let scholars brag,
With fifteen names for a pudding-bag.
Two tongues I know as er told a lie,
And their wearers be, my dog and I!

'That ought to be Harry's song, and the colly's too, eh?' said he, pointing to the dear old dog, who sat with his head on Owen's knee—'oh, my men! Here's a health to the honest man and his dog!'

And all laughed and drank, while Elsley's dark face looked in at the doorway, and half turned to escape. Handsome ladylike Mrs Owen, bustling out of the kitchen with a suppetry, ran full against him, and uttered a Welsh scream.

'Show me a room, and bring me a pen and paper,' said he, and then started in his turn, as all had started at him, for the two Englishmen looked round, and behold, to his disgust, the singer was none other than Naylor, the actor of Punch was Wynd!

To have found his l'les noirs even here, and at such a moment! And what was worse, to hear Mrs. Owen say, 'We have no room, sir, unless these gentlemen—'

'Of course,' said Wynd, jumping up, a child under each arm. 'Mr. Vavasor! we shall be most happy to have your company,—for a week if you will!'

'Ten minutes' solitude is all I ask, sir, if I am not intruding too far.'

'Two hours, if you like.' 'We'll stay here Mrs. Owen, the thicker the merrier.' But Elsley had vanished into a chamber bedstrewn with plaids, pipes, tobacco, and fishing-tackle, mathematical books, scraps of cut, and the wild confusion of a gowanusman's den.

'The party is taken ill with a poem,' said Wynd.

Naylor stuck out his heavy under-lip, and glanced sidelong at his friend.

'With something worse, Ned. That man's eye and voice had something uncanny in them. McIllet said he would go to bed to-night, and he hanged if I don't think he is so now.'

Another five minutes, and Elsley rang the bell violently for hot brandy and water.

Mrs. Owen came back looking a little startled, a letter in her hand.

'The gentleman had drunk the liquor off at one draught, and ran out of the house like a wild man. Harry Owen must go down to Bachelors' instantly with the letter, and there was five shillings to pay for all.'

Harry Owen rises, like a strong and patient beast of burden, ready for any amount of walking, at any hour in the twenty-four. He has been up Snowdon once to-day already. He is going up again at twelve to-night, with a German who wants to see the sun rise, he departs that office to John Roberts, and strikes out.

'Which way did the gentleman go, Mrs. Owen?' asks Naylor.

'Capel Curig road.'

Naylor whispers to Wynd, who sets the two little girls on the table, and hurries out with him. They look up the road, and see no one, run a couple of hundred yards, where they catch a sight of the next turn, clear in the moonlight. There is no one on the road.

'Run to the bridge, Wynd,' whispers Naylor. 'He may have thrown himself over.'

'Tally ho!' whispers Wynd in return, laying his hand on Naylor's arm, and pointing to the left of the road.

A hundred yards from them, over the boggy upland, among scattered boulders, a dark figure is moving. Now he stops short, gesticulating; turns right and left resolutely. At last he hurries on and up again, he is running, springing from stone to stone.

'There is but one thing, Wynd. After him, or he'll drown himself in Llyn Cwm Fynnon.'

'No, he's striking to the right. Can he be going up the Glyder?'

'We'll see that in five minutes. All in the day's work, my boy! I could go up Mount Blane with such a dinner in me.'

The two gallant men run in, struggle into their wet boots again, and provisioned with meat and bread, whisky, tobacco, and planks, are away upon Elsley's tracks, having left Mrs. Owen desolate by their announcement, that a sudden fancy to sleep on the Glyder has seized them. Nothing more will they tell her, or any one, being gentlemen, however much slang they may talk in private.

Elsley left the door of Pen y gwyl, careless whether he went, if he went only far enough.

In front of him rose the Glyder Vawr, its head shrouded in soft mist, through which the moonlight gleamed upon the chequered quivers of that enormous desolation, the dark lines of the eldest born of time. A wild lunging seized him, he would escape up that, up onto those clouds, up anywhere to be alone—alone with his miserable self. That was dreadful enough, but less dreadful than having a companion, ay, even a stone by him, which could remind him of the same which he had left, even remind him that there was another human being on earth beside himself. Yes, to part that cliff between him and all the world! Away he plunged from the high road, splashing over boggy uplands, scrambling among scattered boulders, across a stormy torrent bed, and then across another and another—when would he reach that dark, untroubled wall which rose into the infinite blank, looking within a stone throw of him, and yet no nearer after he had walked a mile?

He reached it at last, and rushed up the talus of boulders, springing from stone to stone, till his breath failed him, and he was forced to settle into a less frantic pace. But upward he would go, and upward he went, with a strength which he never had felt before. Strong? How should he not be strong, while every vein felt filled with molten lead, while some unseen power seemed not so much to attract him upwards, as to drive him by magical repulsion from all that he had left below?

So upward and upward ever, driven on by the terrible gale-fly, like he of old he went, stumbling upwards along torrent beds of slippery slate, writhing himself upward through crannies where the waterfall plashed cold upon his chest and face, yet could not cool the inward fire, clanking, hand and knee, up cliffs of sharp-edged rock striding over downs where huge rocks lay crouched in the grass, like fossil monsters of some ancient world, and seemed to stare at him with still and angry brows. Upward still, to black terraces of lava, standing out hard and black against the gray cloud, gleaming like iron in the moonlight, stair above stair, like those over which Vathek and the princess climbed up to the halls of Eblis. Over their crumbling steps, up through their cracks and crannies, out upon a dreary slope of broken stones, and then—before he dives upward into the cloud ten yards above his head—one breathless look back upon the world.

The horizontal curtain of mist, gauzy below, fringed with white tufts and streamers, deepening above into the blackness of utter night. Below it a long gulf of soft yellow haze, in which, as in a bath of gold, lie delicate bars of far-off western cloud, and the faint glimmer of the western sea, above long knotted spurs of hill, in deepest shade, like a bunch of purple grapes flecked here and there from behind with gleams of golden light, and beneath them again, the dark woods sleeping over Gwynnant, and their dark double sleeping in the bright lake below.

On the right hand Snowdon rises. Vast sheets of utter blackness—vast sheets of shining light. He can see every crag which juts from the green walls of Galt-y-Wennant, and far past it into the Great Valley of Cwm Dylh, and then the red peak, now as black as night, slants out to the world with its huge mist-topped cone. But on the left hand all is deepest shade. From the highest saw-edges where Moel Merth cuts the golden sky, down to the very depths of the abyss, all is lustrous darkness, sooty, and yet golden still. Let the darkness lie upon it for ever! Hidden be those woods where she stood an hour ago! Hidden that road down which, even now, they may be pacing home together! Curse the thought! He covers his face in his hands and shudders in every limb.

He lifts his hands from his eyes at last—what has befallen?

Before the golden haze a white veil is falling fast. Sea, mountain, lake, are vanishing, fading as in a dream. Soon he can see nothing but the twinkle of a light in Pen-y-gwryd, a thousand feet below, happy children are nestling there in innocent sleep. Joyous voices are chatting round the fire. What has he to do with youth, and health, and joy? Lower, lower, ye clouds! Shut out that insolent and intruding spark, till nothing be seen but the silver sheet of Cwm Fynnon, and the silver zig-zag lines which wander into it among black morasses, while down the mountain side go, softly sliding, troops of white mist-angels. Softly they slide, swift and yet motionless, as if by some inner will, which needs no force of limbs, gliding gently round the crags, diving gently off into the abyss, their long white robes trailing about their feet in upward-floating folds. 'Let us go hence,' they seem to whisper to the God-forsaken, as legends say they whispered when they left their doomed shrine in old Jerusalem. Let the white fringe fall between him and the last of that fair troop, let the gray curtain follow, the black pall above descend, till he is alone in darkness that may be felt, and in the shadow of death.

T. Y. A.

Now he is safe at last, hidden from all living things—hidden, it may be, from God, for at least God is hidden from him. He has desired to be alone, and he is alone, the centre of the universe, if universe there be. All created things, suns and planets, seem to revolve round him, and he a point of darkness, not of light. He seems to float self-poised in the centre of the boundless nothing, upon an ell-broad slab of stone—and yet not even on that for the very ground on which he stands he does not feel. He does not feel the mist which wets his cheek, the blood which throbs within his veins. He only is, and there is none besides.

Horrible thought! Permitted but to few, and to them—thank God!—but rarely. For two minutes of that absolute self-isolation would bring madness, if, indeed, it be not the very essence of madness itself.

There he stood, he knew not how long, without motion, without thought, without even rage or hate, now—in one blank paralysis of his whole nature, conscious only of self, and of a dull, inward fire, as if his soul were a dark vault, lighted with lurid smoke.

What was that? He started, shuddered—as well he might. Had he seen heaven opened? or another place? So momentary was the vision, that he scarce knew what he saw—

There it was again! Lasting but for a moment, but long enough to let him see the whole western heaven transfigured into one sheet of pale blue gauze, and before it Snowdon towering black as ink, with every saw and crest cut out, hard and terrible against the lightning-glare, and then the blank of darkness.

Again! The awful black giant, towering high in air, before the gates of that blue abyss of flame—but a black crown of cloud settled upon his head, and out of it the lightning sparks leap to and fro, ringing his brows with a coronet of fire.

Another moment, and the roar of that great battle between earth and heaven crashed full on Ebley's ears.

He heard it leap from Snowdon, sharp and rattling, across the gulf toward him, till it crashed full upon the Glyder overhead, and rolled and flapped from crag to crag, and died away along the dreary downs. No! There it boomed out again, thundering full against Siahod on the left, and Siahod tossed it on to Moel Merth, who answered from all her clefts and peaks with a long confused battle-growl, and then tossed it across to Aran, and Aran, with one dull, bluff report from her flat cliff, to nearer Lhwedd. till, worn out with the long buffetings of that giant ring, it sank and died on Gwynnant far below—but ere it died, another and another thunder-crash burst, sharper and nearer every time, to hurry round the hills after the one which roared before it.

Another minute, and the blue glare filled the sky once more, but no black Titan towered before it now. The storm had leapt Llanberis pass, and all around Elsley was one howling chaos of cloud, and rain, and blinding snow. He turned and fled again.

By the sensation of his feet, he knew that he was going up-hill, and if he but went upward, he cared not whether he went. The rain gushed through, where the lightning pierced the cloud, in drops like musket balls. He was drenched to the skin in a moment, dazzled and giddy from the flashes, stunned by the everlasting roar, peal over-rushing peal, echo out-shooting echo, till rocks and air quivered alike beneath the continuous battle-cannonade. 'What matter? What fitter guide for such a path as mine than the blue lightning flashes?'.

Poor wretch! He had gone out of his way for many a year, to give himself up, a willing captive, to the melodramatic view of nature, and had let sighs and sounds, not principles and duties, mould his feelings for him: and now, in his utter need and utter weakness, he had met her in a mood which was too awful for such as he was to resist. The Nemesis had come, and, swept away helplessly, without faith and hope, by those outward impressions of things on which he had lested his soul so long, he was the puppet of his own eyes and ears, the slave of glare and noise.

Breathless, but still untired, he toiled up a steep incline, where he could feel beneath him neither moss nor herb. Now and then his feet brushed through a soft tuft of parsley fern, but soon even that sign of vegetation ceased, his feet only rasped over rough lava rock, and he was alone in a desert of stone.

What was that sudden apparition above him, seen for a moment dim and gigantic through the mist, hid the next in darkness? The next flash showed him a line of obelisks, like guards crouching side by side, staring down on him from the clouds. Another five minutes, and he was at their feet, and past them, to see above them again another line of awful watchers through the storms and rains of many a thousand years, waiting, grim and silent, like those doomed senators in the Capitol of Rome, till their own turn should come, and the last lightning stroke hurl them too down, to lie for ever by their fallen brothers, whose mighty bones bedrew the scree below.

He groped his way between them, saw some fifty yards beyond a higher peak, gained it by fierce struggles and many falls, saw another beyond that, and, rushing down and up two slopes of moss, reached a region where the upright lava-ledges had been split asunder into chasms, crushed together again into caves, toppled over each other, hurled up into spires, in such chaotic confusion that progress seemed impossible.

A flash of lightning revealed a lofty cairn above his head. There was yet, then, a higher point! He would reach it, if he broke every limb in the attempt! and madly he hurried on, feeling his way from ledge to ledge, squeezing himself through crannies, crawling on hands and knees along the sharp chimes of the rocks, till he reached the foot of the cairn, climbed it, and threw himself at full length on the summit of the Glyder Fawr.

An awful place it always was, and Elsley saw it at an awful time, as the glare unveiled below him a sea of rock-waves, all sharp on edge, pointing toward him on every side, or rather one wave crest of a sea, for twenty yards beyond, all sloped away into the abysmal dark.

Terrible were those rocks below, and ten times more terrible as seen through the lurid glow of his distempered brain. All the weird peaks and slabs seemed pointing up at him, sharp-toothed jaws gaped upward, tongues hissed upward, and pointed upward—hundreds leaped upward—monstrous snake heads perched upward out of cracks and caves. Did he not see them move, writher? or was it the ever shifting light of the flashes? Did he not hear them howl, yell at him? or was it but the wind, tortured in their labyrinthine caverns?

The next moment, and all was dark again, but the images which had been called up remained, and fastened on his brain, and grew there, and when, in the light of the next flash, the scene returned, he could see the red lips of the phantom howls, the bright eyes of the phantom snakes, the tongues wagged in mockery, the hands brandish great stones to hurl at him, the mountain-top was rustled with hideous life, a very Blockberg of all hideous shapes and sons.

And yet he did not shrink. Horrible it was, he was going mad before it. And yet he took a strange and fierce delight in making it more horrible, in making himself more and more, in clothing those fantastic stones with every fancy which could inspire another man with dread. But he had no dread. Perfect rage, like perfect love, casts out fear. He rejoiced in his own misery, in his own danger. His life hung on a thread, any instant might hurl him from that cairn, a blackened corpse.

What better end? Let it come! He was Prometheus on the peak of Caucasus, hurling defiance at the unjust Jove! His hopes, his love, his very honour—curse it!—ruined! Let the lightning stroke come! He were a coward to shrink from it. Let him face the worst, unprotected, hair-headed, naked, and do battle, himself, and nothing but himself, against the universe! And, as men at such moments will do, in the mad desire to free the self-tortured spirit from some unseen and choking bond, he began wildly tearing off his clothes.

But merciful nature brought relief, and stopped him in his mad efforts, or he had been a frozen corpse long ere the dawn. His hands, stiff with cold, refused to obey him; as he delayed he was saved. After the paroxysm came the collapse, he sank upon the top of the cairn half senseless. He felt himself falling over its edge, and the animal instinct of self-preservation, unconsciously to him, made him slide down gently, till he sank into a crack between two rocks, where he lay somewhat, as it befell happily, from the falling of the rain.

Another minute, and he slept a dreamless sleep.

But there are two men upon that mountain, whom neither rock nor rain, storm nor thunder, have conquered, because they are simply brave honest men, and who are, perhaps, far more 'poetic' characters at this moment than Elsie Vavasour, or any dozen of mere verse-writers, because they are hazarding their lives on an errand of mercy, and all the while having little notion that they are hazarding their lives or doing anything dangerous or heroic, that, instead of being touched for a moment by nature's melodrama, they are jesting at each other's troubles, greeting each interval of darkness with muck slunts of misery and despair, likening the crags to various logics of their acquaintance, male and female, and only jolling the catty pupes out of their mouths to chant snatches of jovial songs. They are Wynd and Naylor, the two Cambridge boating men, in their double flannel trunks, and shooting-pockets pocketful of water, who are both fully aware that hunting a mud-pot over the mountains in a thunder-storm is, on the whole, 'the jolliest lark they ever had in their lives'.

'He must have gone up here somewhere. I saw the poor beggar against the sky as plain as I see you - which I don't -' for darkness cut the speech short.

'Where he you, William? says the keeper.'

'Here I be, sir, says the beater, with my cells above my 'ed.'

'Very well, William, when you get your 'ed above your 'eds, go on.'

'But I'm stuck fast between two shops! Hung the stones!' And Naylor bursts into an old seventeenth-century ditch, at the day of 'three-man glee.'

'They stouns, they stouns, they stouns they stouns -
They stouns that built George Robbler a oven,
O they was fished from Blackney quarr,
And George he was a jolly old man
And his head did grow above his bar'

'One thing in George Robbler I must commend,
And I hold it for a valiant thing,
With any three ladders in Gloucestershire
He swore that his three sons should sing.'

'There was Daik the table, and Tom the corn,
Let every man sing in his own place,
And William he was the eldest brother,
And therefore he should sing the base -'

'I'm down again! This is my thirteenth fall.'

'So am I! I shall just be and light a pipe.'

'Come on, now, and look round the hill side of this crag. We shall find him bundled up under the lee of one of them.'

'He don't know lee from windward, I dare say.'

'He'll soon find out the difference by his skin, if it's half as wet, at least, as mine is.'

'I'll tell you what, Naylor, if the poor fellow has crossed the ridge, and tried to go down on the 'Twill duff he's a dead man by this time.'

'He'll have sunk it, when he comes to the edge, and sees nothing but mist below. But if he has wandered on to the cliffs above Trisfen, he's a dead man, then, at all events. Get out of the way of that flash! A close shave, that! I believe my whiskers are singed.'

'Tom my honour, Wynd, we ought to be saying our prayers rather than joking in this way.'

'We may do both, and be none the worse. As for coming to grief, old boy, we're on a good ground, I suppose, and the devil himself can't harm us. Still, shame to him who's ashamed of saying his prayers, as Arnold used to say.'

And all the while, these two brave lads have been thrusting their lantern into every crack and cranny, and beating round every crag carefully and cunningly, till long past two in the morning.

'Here's the ordinance came at last, and - here am I astute of evening-knife, I think! Come and help me out, or I shall be split to the chin!'

'I'm coming! What's this soft under my feet? Who-o-oop! Run him to earth at last!'

And diving down into a crack, Wynd drags out by the collar the unconscious Flash.

'What a wale! Take a peep of wet blotting-paper. Lucky he's not made of salt.'

'He's dead!' says Naylor.

'Not a bit! I can feel his heart. There's life in the old dog yet.'

And they began, under the lee of a rock, cladding him, wrapping him in their plants, and pouring whisky down his throat.

It was some time before Vavasour recovered his consciousness. The first use which he made of it was to bid his preservers leave him, querulously at first, and then fiercely, when he found out who they were.

'Leave me, I say! Cannot I be alone if I choose? What right have you to dog me in this way?'

'My dear sir, we have as much right here as any one else, and if we find a man dying here of cold and fatigue -'

'What business of yours, if I choose to die?'

'There is no harm in your dying, sir,' says Naylor. 'The harm is in our letting you die, I assure you it is entirely to satisfy our own consciences we are troubling you thus,' and he begins pressing him to take food.

'No, sir, nothing from you! You have shown me impertinence enough in the last few weeks, without pressing on me benefits for which I do not wish. Let me go! If you will not leave me, I shall leave you!'

And he tried to rise, but, stiffened with cold, sank back again upon the rock.

In vain they tried to reason with him, begged his pardon for all past jests, he made effort after effort to get up, and at last, his limbs, regaining strength by the fierceness of his passion, supported him, and he struggled onward toward the northern slope of the mountain.

'You must not go down till it is light, it is as much as your life is worth.'

'I am going to Bangor, sir, and go I will.'

'I tell you, there are fifteen hundred feet of slippery scree below you.'

'As steep as a house roof, and with every tile on it loose. You will roll from top to bottom before you have gone a hundred yards.'

'What care I! Let me go, I say! Curse you, sir! Do you mean to use force?'

'I do,' said Wynd quietly, as he took him round arms and body, and set him down on the rock like a child.

'You have assaulted me, sir! The law shall avenge this insult, if there be law in England!'

'I know nothing about law. But I suppose it will justify me in saving any man's life who is rushing to certain death.'

'Look here, sir!' said Naylor. 'Go down, if you will, when it grows light. But from this place you do not stir yet. Whatever you may think of our conduct to-night, you will thank us for it to-morrow morning, when you see where you are.'

The unhappy man stamped with rage. The red glare of the lantern showed him his two powerful warders, standing right and left. He felt that there was no escape from them but in darkness, and suddenly he dashed at the lantern, and tried to tear it out of Wynd's hands.

'Steady, sir!' said Wynd, springing back, and parrying his outstretched hand. 'If you wish us to consider you in your senses, you will be quiet.'

'And if you don't choose to appear sane,' said Naylor, 'you must not be surprised if we treat you as men are treated who you understand me.'

Elsley was silent a while, his rage, finding itself impotent, subsided into dark cunning. 'Really, gentlemen,' he said at length, 'I believe you are right, I have been very foolish, and you very kind, but you would excuse my absurdities if you know their provocation.'

'My dear sir,' said Naylor, 'we are bound to believe that you have good cause enough for what you are doing. We have no wish to interfere impertinently. Only wait till daylight, and wrap yourself in one of our plaids, as the only possible method of carrying out your own intentions, for dead men can't go to Bangor, whithersoever else they may go.'

'You really are too kind! but I believe I must accept your offer, under penalty of being called mad,' and Elsley laughed a hollow laugh, for he was by no means sure that he was not mad. He took the proffered wrapper, lay down, and seemed to sleep.

Wynd and Naylor, congratulating themselves on his better mind, lay down also beneath the other plaid, intending to watch him. But, worn out with fatigue, they were both fast asleep ere ten minutes had passed.

Elsley had determined to keep himself awake at all risks, and he paid a bitter penalty for so doing, for now that the fury had passed away, his brain began to work freely again, and inflicted torture so exquisite, that he looked back with regret on the unreasoning madness of last night, as a less fearful hell than that of thought, of deliberate, accurate recollections, suspicious, trains of argument, which he tried to thrust from him, and yet could not. Who has not known in the still, sleepless hours of night, how dark thoughts will possess the mind with terrors, which seem logical, irrefragable, inevitable?

So it was then with the wretched Elsley, within his mind a whole train of devil's advocates seemed arguing, with triumphant subtlety, the certainty of Lucas's treason, and justifying to him his rage, his hatred, his flight, his desertion of his own children—if indeed (so far had the devil led him astray) they were his own. At last he could bear it no longer. He would escape to Bangor, and then to London, cross to France, to Italy, and there bury himself amid the forests of the Apennines, or the sunny glens of Calabria. And for a moment the vision of a poet's life in that glorious land brightened his dark imagination. Yes! He would escape thither, and be at peace, and if the world heard of him again, it should be in such a thunder-voice as those with which Shelly and Byron, from their southern seclusion, had shaken the ungrateful motherland which cast them out. He would escape, and now was the time to do it! For the rain had long since ceased, the dawn was approaching fast, the cloud was thinning from black to pearly gray. Now was his time—were it not for those two men! To be kept, guarded, stopped by them, or by any man! Shameful! intolerable! He had fled hither to be free, and even here he found himself a prisoner. True, they had promised to let him go if he waited till daylight, but perhaps they were deceiving him, as he was deceiving them—why not? They thought him mad. It was a ruse, a stratagem to keep him quiet awhile, and then bring him back to restore him to his afflicted friends! His friends, truly! He would be too cunning for them yet. And even if they meant to let him go, would he accept liberty from them, or any man? No, he was free. He had a right to go, and go he would, that moment!

He roused himself cautiously. The lantern had burned to the socket, and he could not see the men, though they were not four yards off, but by their regular and heavy breathing he could tell that they both slept soundly. He slipped from under the plaid, drew off his shoes for fear of noise among the rocks, and rose. What if he did make a noise? What if they woke, chased him, brought him back by force? Curse the thought! And gliding close to them, he listened again to their heavy breathing.

How could he prevent their following him?

A horrible, nameless temptation came over him. Every vein in his body throbb'd fire, his brain seem'd to swell to bursting, and ere he was aware, he found himself feeling about in the darkness for a loose stone.

He could not find one. Thank God that he could not find one! But after that dreadful thought had once cross'd his mind, he must flee from that place ere the sound of Cam be on his brow.

With a cunning and activity utterly new to him, he glided away like a snake, downward over crags and boulders, he knew not how long or how far, all he knew was, that he was going down, down, down, into a dim abyss. There was just light enough to discern the upper surface of a rock within arm's length, beyond that all was blank. He seem'd to be hours descending, to be going down miles after miles, and still he reach'd no level spot. The mountain-side was too steep for him to stand upright, except at moments. It seem'd one uniform quarry of smooth broken slate, slipping down for ever beneath his feet. Whither? He grew giddy, and more giddy, and a horrible fantastic notion seized him, that he had lost his way, that somehow the precipice had no bottom, no end at all, that he was going down some infinite abyss, into the very depths of the earth, and the molten roots of the mountains, never to ascend. He stopp'd, trembling, only to slide down again, terrified, he tried to struggle upward, but the shale gave way beneath his feet, and go he must.

What was that noise above his head? A falling stone? Were his enemies in pursuit? Down to the depth of hell rather than that they should take him! He drov his heels into the slippery shale, and rush'd forward blindly, springing, slipping, falling, rolling, till he stopp'd breathless on a jutting slab.

And lo! below him, through the thin pearly veil of cloud, a dim world of dark cliffs, blue lakes, gray mountains with their dark heads wrapped in cloud, and the straight vale of Nant Francon, magnified in mist, till it seem'd to stretch for hundreds of leagues toward the rosy north-east dawning and the shining sea.

With a wild shout he hurried onward. In five minutes he was clear of the cloud. He reach'd the foot of that enormous slope, and hurried over rocky ways, till he stopp'd at the top of a precipice, full six hundred feet above the lonely tarn of Idwal.

Never mind. He knew where he was now, he knew that there was a passage somewhere, for he had once seen one from below. He found it, and almost ran along the boggy shore of Idwal, looking back every now and then at the black wall of the Tŵllŵn, in dread lest he should see two moving specks in hot pursuit.

And now he had gain'd the shore of Ogwen, and the broad coach-road, and down it he strode, running at times, past the roaring cataract, past the enormous cliffs of the Carnedd, past Tŵl-y-maes, where nothing was stirring but a barking dog, on through the sleeping streets of Bethesda, past the black stairs of the Penrhyn quarry. The huge creaking ant-heap was silent now, save for the roar of Ogwen, as he swirl'd and bubbled down, rich coffee-brown from last night's rain.

On, past rich woods, past trim cottages, gardens gay with flowers, past rhododendron shrubberies, broad fields of golden stubble, sweet clover, and gray swedes, with Ogwen making music far below. The sun is up at last, and Colonel Pennant's grim slate castle, towering above black woods, glitters metallic in its rays, like Chaucer's house of fame. He stops to look back once. Far up the vale, eight miles away, beneath a roof of cloud, the pass of Nant Francon gapes high in air between the great jaws of the Carnedd and the Glyder, its cliffs marked with the upright white line of the waterfall. He is clear of the mountains, clear of that cursed place, and all its cursed thoughts. On, past Llandegai and all its rose-clad cottages, past yellow quarrymen walking out to their work, who stare as they pass at his haggard face, drenched clothes, and streaming hair. He does not see them. One fixed thought is in his mind, and that is, the railway station at Bangor.

He is striding through Bangor streets now, beside the summer sea, from which fresh scents of shore weed greet him. He had rather smell the smoke and gas of the Strand.

The station is shut. He looks at the bill outside. There is no train for full two hours, and he throws himself, worn out with fatigue, upon the doorstep.

Now a new terror seizes him. Has he money enough to reach London? Has he his purse at all? Too dreadful to hug himself stopp'd short, on the very brink of deliverance! A cold perspiration breaks from his forehead, as he feels in every pocket. Yes, his purse is there, but he turns sick as he opens it, and dare hardly look. Hurrah! Five pounds, six—eight! That will take him as far as Paris. He can walk, beg the rest of the way, if need be.

What will he do now? Wander over the town, and gaze vacantly on one little object and another about the house fronts. One thing he will not look at, and that is the bright summer sea, all golden in the sun rays, fleck'd with gay white sails. From all which is bright and calm, and cheerful, his soul shrinks as from an impertinence, he longs for the lurid gas-light of London, and the roar of the Strand, and the everlasting stream of faces, among whom he may wander free, sure that no one will recognise him, the disgraced, the desperate.

The weary hours roll on. Too tired to stand longer, he sits down on the shafts of a cart, and tries not to think. It is not difficult. Body and mind are alike worn out, and his brain seems fill'd with uniform dull mist.

A shop-door opens in front of him, a boy comes out. He sees bottles inside, and shelves, the look of which he knows too well.

The bottle-boy, whistling, begins to take the shutters down. How often, in Wintbury of old, had Elsley done the same! Half amused, he watched the lad, and wondered how he spent his evenings, and what works he read, and whether he ever thought of writing poetry.

And as he watched, all his past life rose up before him, ever since he served out malheimes fifteen years ago—his wild aspirations, heavy labours, struggles, plans, brief triumphs, long disappointments, and here was what it had all come to—a future—a miserable, shameful future! Not that he thought of it with repentance, with a single wish that he had done otherwise, but only with disappointed rage. 'Yes!' he said bitterly to himself—

"We poets in our youth begin in gladness,
But after come despondency and madness."

This is the way of the world with all who have nobler feelings in them than will fit into its cold rules. Curse the world! what on earth had I to do with mixing myself up in it, and marrying a fine lady? Fool that I was! I might have known from the first that she could not understand me, that she would go back to her own! Let her go! I will forget her, and the world, and everything, and I know how!

And, springing up, he walked across to the druggist's shop.

Years before, Elsley had tried opium, and found, unhappily for him, that it fed his fancy without mitigating those tortures of indigestion which keep many, happily for them, from its magic snare. He had tried it more than once of late, but Lucia had had a hint of the fact from Thimall, and in just terror had exacted from him a solemn promise never to touch opium again. Elsley was a man of honour, and the promise had been kept. But now—"I promised her, and therefore I will break my promise! She has broken hers, and I am free!"

And he went in and bought his opium. He took a little on the spot, to allay the cravings of hunger. He reserved a full dose for the railway-carriage. It would bridge over the weary gulf of time which lay between him and town.

He took his second-class place at last, not without stares and whispers from those round at the wild figure which was starting for London without bag or baggage. But as the clerks agreed, 'If he was running away from his creditors, it was a shame to stop him. If he was running from the police, they would have the more sport the longer the run. At least it was no business of theirs.'

There was one thing more to do, and he did it. He wrote to Campbell a short note.

"If, as I suppose, you expect from me 'the satisfaction of a gentleman,' you will find me at . . . Adelphi. I am not escaping from you, but from the whole world. If, by shooting me, you can quicken my escape, you will do me the first and last favour which I am likely to ask for from you."

He posted his letter, settled himself in a corner of the carriage, and took his second dose of opium. From that moment he recollected little more. A confused whirl of hedges and woods, rattling stations, screaming and flashing trains, great red towns, white chalk cuttings, while the everlasting roar and rattle of the carriages shaped themselves in his brain into a hundred snatches of old tunes, all full of a strange morbidness, as if mocking at his misery, striving to keep him awake and conscious of who and what he was. He closed his eyes and shut out the hateful, garish world, but that sound he could not shut out. Too tired to sleep, too tired even to think, he could do nothing but submit to the ridiculous torment, watching in spite of himself every note, as one pig-tune after another was hidled by all the imps close to his ear, mile after mile, and county after county, for all that weary day, which seemed full seven years long.

At Euston Square the porter called him several times ere he could rouse him. He could hear nothing for a while but that same imps' melody, even though it had stopped. At last he got out, staring round him, shook himself awake by one strong effort, and hurried away, not knowing whether he went.

Wrapt up in self, he wandered on till dark, slept on a doorstep, and awoke, not knowing at first where he was. Gradually all the horror came back to him, and with the horror the craving for opium which with it he forgot.

He looked round to see his whereabouts. Surely this must be Golden Square! A sudden thought struck him. He went to a chemist's shop, bought a fresh supply of his poison, and, taking only enough to allay the cravings of his stomach, hurried tottering in the direction of Drury Lane.

CHAPTER XXII

TUESDAY, 11TH NOVEMBER 1881

Next morning, only Claude and Campbell made their appearance at breakfast.

Frank came in, found that Valentinia was not down, and, too excited to sit, went out to walk till she should appear. Neither did Lord Scoutlash come. Where was he?

Ignorant of the whole matter, he had started at four o'clock to fish in the Trach Mawr, half 'on fishing' saki, half (as he confessed) to gun time for his puzzled brains before those explanations with Frank Headley, of which he stood in mortal awe.

Mellot and Campbell sat down together to breakfast, but in silence. Claude saw that something had gone very wrong, Campbell ate nothing, and looked nervously out of the window every now and then.

At last Bowie entered with the letters and a message. There were two gentlemen from Pen-y-gwryd must speak with Mr Mellot immediately.

He went out and found Wynd and Naylor.

What they told him we know already. He returned instantly, and met Campbell leaving the room.

'I have news of Vavasour,' whispered he. 'I have a letter from him. Bowie, order me a car instantly for Bangor. I am off to London, Claude. You and Bowie will take care of my things, and send them after me.'

'Major Cawmull has duly to command,' said Bowie, and vanished down the stairs.

'Now, Claude, quick, read that and counsel me. I ought to ask Scoutbush's opinion, but the poor dear fellow is out, you see.'

Claude read the note written at Bangor.

'Fight him I will not! I detest the notion a soldier should never fight a duel. His life is the Queen's, and not his own. And yet, if the honour of the family has been compromised by my folly, I must pay the penalty, if Scoutbush thinks it proper.'

So said Campbell, who, in the over-sensitiveness of his conscience, had actually worked himself round during the past night into this new fancy, as a chivalrous act of utter self-abasement. The proud self-possession of the man was gone, and nothing but self-distrust and shame remained.

'In the name of all wit and wisdom, what is the meaning of all this?'

'You do not know, then, what passed last night?'

'I—I can only guess that Vavasour has had one of his rages.'

'Then you must know,' said Campbell with an effort 'for you must explain all to Scoutbush when he returns, and I know no one more fit for the office.' And he briefly told him the story.

Mellot was much affected. 'The wretched ape!' Campbell, your first thought was the true one: you must not fight that man. After all, it's a farce: you won't fire at him, and he can't hit you—so leave it alone. Beside, for Scoutbush's sake, her sake, every one's sake, the thing must be hushed up. If the fellow chooses to duck under into the London mire, let him be there, and forget him!'

'No, Claude, his pardon I must beg, ere I go out to the war—or I shall die with a sin upon my soul.'

'My dear, noble creature! if you must go, I go with you. I must see fair play between you and that madman, and give him a piece of my mind, too, while I am about it. He is in my power, or if not quite that, I know one in whose power he is! and to reason he shall be brought.'

'No, you must stay here. I cannot trust Scoutbush's head, and these poor dear souls will have no one to look to but you. I can trust you with them, I know. Me you will perhaps never see again.'

'You can trust me!' said the affectionate little painter, the tears starting to his eyes, as he wrung Campbell's hand.

'Mind one thing! If that Vavasour shows his teeth, there is a spell will turn him to stone. Use it!'

'Heaven forbid! Let him show his teeth. It is I who am in the wrong. Why should I make him more my enemy than he is?'

'Be it so. Only, if the worst comes to the worst, call him not Elsley Vavasour, but plain John Briggs—and see what follows.'

Valentia entered.

'The post has come in.' Oh, dear Major Campbell, is there a letter?'

He put the note into her hand in silence. She read it, and darted back to Lucia's room.

'Thank God that she did not see that I was going! One more pang on earth spared!' said Campbell to himself.

Valentia hurried to Lucia's door. She was holding it ajar and looking out with pale face, and wild hungry eyes. 'A letter? Don't be silent, or I shall go mad! Tell me the worst! Is he alive?'

'Yes.'

She gasped, and staggered against the door-post.

'Where? Why does he not come back to me?' asked she, in a confused, abstracted way.

It was best to tell the truth, and have it over.

'He has gone to London, Lucia. He will think over it all there, and be sorry for it, and then all will be well again.'

But Lucia did not hear the end of that sentence. Muttering to herself, 'To London! to London!' she hurried back into the room.

'Clara! Clara! have the children had their breakfast?'

'Yes, mamma,' says Clara, appearing from the inner room.

'Then help me to pack up, quick! Your master is gone to London on business, and we are to follow him immediately.'

And she began bustling about the room.

'My dearest Lucia, you are not fit to travel now!'

'I shall die if I stay here, she if I do not! I must find him!' whispered she. 'Don't speak loud, or Clara will hear. I can find him, and nobody can lose me! Why don't you help me to pack, Valentia?'

'My dearest! but what will Scoutbush say when he comes home, and finds you gone?'

'What right has he to interfere? I am Elsley's wife, am I not? and may I follow my husband if I like,' and she went on desperately collecting not her own things, but Elsley's.

Valentia watched her with tear-brimming eyes, collecting all his papers, counting over his clothes, muttering to herself that he would want this and that in London. Her sanity seemed failing her, under the fixed idea that she had only to see him, and set all right with a word.

'I will go and get you some breakfast,' said she at last.

'I want none. I am too lousy to eat. Why don't you help me?'

Valentia had not the heart to help, believing, as she did, that Lucia's journey would be as bootless as it would be dangerous to her health.

'I will bring you some breakfast, and you must try, then I will help you to pack' and utterly bewildered she went out, and the thought uppermost in her mind was, 'Oh, that I could find Frank Headley!'

Happy was it for Frank's love, paradoxical as it may seem, that it had conquered just at that moment of terrible distress. Valentia's acceptance of him had been hasty, founded rather on sentiment and admiration than on deep affection, and her feeling might have faltered, waned, died away in self-distrust of its own reality, if giddy amusement, if mere easy happiness, had followed it. But now the fire of affliction was branding in the thought of him upon her softened heart.

Living at the utmost strain of her character, Campbell gone, her brother useless, and Lucia and the children depending utterly on her, there was but one to whom she could look for comfort while she needed it most utterly, and happy for her and for her lover that she could go to him.

'Poor Lucia! thank God that I have some one who will never treat me so' who will lift me up and shield me, instead of crushing me' dear creature! Oh that I may find him! And her heart went out after Frank with a gush of tenderness which she had never felt before.

'Is this, then, love?' she asked herself, and she found time to slip into her own room for a moment and arrange her dishevelled hair, ere she entered the breakfast-room.

Frank was there, luckily alone, pacing nervously up and down. He hurried up to her, caught both her hands in his, and gazed into her wan and haggard face with the intensest tenderness and anxiety.

Valentia's eyes looked into the depths of his, passive and confiding, till they failed before the keenness of his gaze, and swam in glittering mist.

'Ah!' thought she, 'sorrow is a light price to pay for the feeling of being so loved by such a man.'

'You are tired—all! What a night you must have had! Mollot has told me all.'

'Oh, my poor sister!' and wildly she poured out to Frank her wrath against Elsie, her inability to comfort Lucia, and all the misery and confusion of the past night.

'This is a sad dawning for the day of my triumph!' thought Frank, who longed to pour out his heart to her on a thousand very different matters, but he was content, it was enough for him that she could tell him all, and confide in him, a truer sign of affection than any selfish love-making, and he asked, and answered, with such tenderness and thoughtfulness for poor Lucia, with such a deep comprehension of Elsie's character, pitying while he blamed, that he won his reward at last.

'Oh! it would be intolerable, if I had not through it all the thought—and blushing crimson, her head drooped on her bosom. She seemed ready to drop with exhaustion.

'Sit down, sit down, or you will fall!' said Frank, leading her to a chair, and as he led her, he whispered with flinching heart, new to its own happiness, and longing to make assurance sure—'What though?'

She was silent still, but he felt her hand tremble in his.

'The thought of me?'

She looked up in his face, how beautiful! And in another moment, neither knew how, she was clasped to his bosom.

He covered her face, her hair, with kisses, she did not move, from that moment she felt that he was her husband.

'Oh, guide me! counsel me! pray for me!' sobbed she. 'I am all alone, and my poor sister, she is going mad, I think, and I have no one to trust but you, and you—you will leave me to go to those dreadful wars, and then, what will become of me? Oh, stay! only a few days!' and holding him convulsively, she answered his kisses with her own.

Frank stood as in a dream, while the room reeled round and vanished, and he was alone for a moment upon earth with him and his great love.

'Tell me,' said he at last, trying to awaken himself to action. 'Tell me! Is she really going to seek him?'

'Yes, selfish and forgetful that I am! You must help me! she will go to London, nothing can stop her, and it will kill her!'

'It may drive her mad to keep her here.'

'It will! and that drives me mad also. What can I choose?'

'Follow where God leads. It is she, after all, who must reclaim him. Leave her in God's hands, and go with her to London.'

'But my brother?'

'Mollot or I will see him. Let it be me, Mollot shall go with you to London.'

'Oh that you were going!'

'Oh that I were! I will follow, though. Do you think that I can be long away from you? . . . But I must tell your brother. I had a very different matter on which to speak to him this morning,' said he with a sad smile. 'But better as it is. He shall find me, I hope, reasonable and trustworthy in this matter, perhaps enough so to have my Valentia committed to me. Precious jewel! I must learn to be a man now, at least, now that I have you to care for.'

'And yet you go and leave me?'

'Valentia! Because God has given us to each other, shall our thank-offering be to shrink cowardly from His work?'

He spoke more sternly than he intended, to awe into obedience rather himself than her, for he felt, poor fellow, his courage failing fast, while he held that treasure in his arms.

She shuddered in silence.

'Forgive me!' he cried, 'I was too harsh, Valentia!'

'No!' she cried, looking up at him with a glorious smile. 'Sould me! Be harsh to me! It is so delicious now to be reproved by you.' And as she spoke she felt as if she would rather endure torture from that man's hand than bliss from any other. How many strange words of Lucia's that new feeling explained to her, words at which she had once grown angry, as doting weaknesses, unjust and degrading to self-respect. Poor Lucia! She might be able to comfort her now, for she had learnt to sympathise with her by experience the very opposite to hers. Yet there must have been a time when Lucia clung to Elsie as she to Frank. How horrible to have her eyes opened thus! To be torn and flung away from the bosom where she longed to rest! It could never happen to her. Of course her Frank was true, though all the world were false—but poor Lucia! She must go to her. This was mere selfishness at such a moment.

'You will find Scotland, then?'

'This moment. I will order the car now, if you will only eat. You must!'

And he rang the bell, and then made her sit down and eat, almost feeding her with his own hand. That, too, was a new experience, and one so strangely pleasant, that when Bowie entered, and stared solemnly at the pair, she only looked up smiling, though blushing a little.

'Get a car instantly,' said she.

'For Mrs Vavasour, my lady? She has ordered hers already.'

'No, for Mr Headley. He is going to find my lord. Frank, pour me out a cup of tea for Lucia.'

Bowie vanished, mystified. 'It's no concern of mine, but better tak' up wi' a godly meenister than a godless pawet,' said the worthy warrior to himself as he marched downstairs.

'You see that I am asserting our rights already before all the world,' said she, looking up.

'I see you are not ashamed of me.'

'Ashamed of you?'

'And now I must go to Lucia.'

'And to London.'

Valentia began to cry like any baby, but rose and carried away the tea in her hand.

'Must I go? and before you come back, too?'

'Is she determined to start instantly?'

'I cannot stop her. You see she has ordered the car.'

'Then go, my darling! My own! my Valentia! Oh, a thousand things to ask you, and no time to ask them in! I can write!' said Frank, with an inquiring smile.

'Write! Yes, every day—twice a day. I shall live upon those letters. Good-bye! And out she went, while Frank sat himself down at the table, and laid his head upon his hands, stupefied with delight, till Bowie entered.

'The car, sir.'

'Which? Who? asked Frank, looking up as if from a dream.

'The car, sir.'

Frank rose, and walked downstairs abstractedly. Bowie kept close to his side.

'Ye'll pardon me, sir,' said he in a low voice, 'but I see how it is—the more blessing for you. Ye'll be pleased, I trust, to take more care of this jewel than others have of that one or—'

'Or you'll shoot me yourself, Bowie!' said Frank, half-amused, half-awed, too, by the stern tone of the Guardsman. 'I'll give you leave to do it if I deserve it.'

'It's no my duty, either as a soldier or as a valet. And, naked, I've that opinion of you, sir, that I don't think it'll need to be any one else's duty either.'

And so did Mr Bowie signify his approbation of the new family romance, and went off to assist Mrs Clara in getting the trunks downstairs.

Clara was in high dudgeon. She had not yet completed her flirtation with Mr Bowie, and felt it hard to have her one amusement in life snatched out of her hard-worked hands.

'I'm sure I don't know why we're moving. I don't believe it's business. Some of his tantrums, I dare say. I heard her walking up and down the room all last night, I'll swear. Neither she nor Miss Valentia has been to bed. He'll kill her at last, the brute!'

'It's no concern of either of us, that. Have ye got another trunk to bring down?'

'No concern! Just like your hard-heartedness, Mr Bowie. And as soon as I'm gone, of course you will be flirting with these impudent Welshwomen, in their hoard hats.'

'May be, yes, may be, no. But flirting's no marrying, Mrs Clara.'

'True for you, sir! Men were deceivers ever,' quoth Clara, and flounced upstairs, while Bowie looked after her with a grim smile, and caught her, when she came down again, long enough to give her a great kiss—the only language which he used in wooing, and that but rarely.

'Dinna fash, lassie. Mind your lady and the poor bannet, like a godly handmaiden, and I'll buy the ring when the sawmon fishing's over, and we'll just be married ere I start for the Crimea.'

'The sawmon!' cried Clara. 'I'll see you turned into a mermaid first, and married to a sawmon!'

'And ye won't do anything o' the kind,' said Bowie to himself, and shouldered a valise.

In ten minutes the ladies were packed into the carriage, and away, under Mellot's care. Frank watched Valentia looking back, and smiling through her tears, as they rolled through the village, and then got into his car, and rattled down the southern road to Port Aberglaslyn, his hand still tingling with the last pressure of Valentia's.

CHAPTER XXIII

THE BROAD STONE OF HONOUR

BUT where has Stangrave been all this while?

Where any given bachelor has been, for any given month, is difficult to say, and no man's business but his own. But where he happened to be on a certain afternoon in the first week of October, on which he had just heard the news of Alma, was—upon the hills between Ems and Coblenz. Walking over a high tableland of stubbles, which would be grass in England, and yet with all its tillage is perhaps not worth more than English grass would be, thanks to that small-farm system much he-praised by some who know not wheat from turnips. Then along a road, which might be a Devon one, cut in the hillside, through authentic 'Devonian' slate, where the deep chocolate soil is lodged on the top of the upright strata, and a thick coat of moss and wood sedge clusters about the oak-scrub roots, round which the delicate and rare oak-fern mingles its fronds with great blue campanulas, while the 'white admurals' and silver-washed 'intallines' flit round every bramble bed, and the great 'purple emperors' come down to drink in the road puddles, and sit fearless, flashing off their velvet wings a line as of that cupycean which is 'dark by excess of light.'

Down again through cultivated lands, corn and clover, flax and beet, and all the various crops with which the industrious German yeoman ekes out his little patch of soil. Past the thrifty husbandman himself, as he guides the two milch-kine in his tiny plough, and stops at the furrow's end, to greet you with the hearty German smile and bow, while the little fair-haired maiden, walking beneath the shade of standard cherries, walnuts, and pears, all gray with fruit, fills the cow's months with daisy, and wild carnations, and pink santolin, and many a fragrant weed which richer England wastes.

Down once more into a glen, but such a glen as neither England nor America has ever seen, or, please God, ever will see, glorious as it is Stangrave, who knew all Europe well, had walked the path before, but he stopped then, as he had done the first time, on a eve. On the right, slope up the bare slate downs, up to the foot of cliffs, but only half of those cliffs God has made. Above the gray slate ledges rise cliffs of man's handiwork, pored with a hundred square black embrasures, and above them the long barrack-ranges of a soldiers' town, which a foeman stormed once, when it was young; but what foeman will ever storm it again! What conqueror's foot will ever tread again upon the 'broad stone of honour,' and call Ehrenbreitstein his!

On the left the clover and the corn range on, beneath the orchard boughs, up to yon knoll of chestnut and acacia, tall poplar, feathered larch:

but what is that stonework which gleams gray between their stems? A summer-house for some great duke, looking out over the glorious Rhine vale, and up the long vineyards of the bright Moselle, from whence he may bid his people eat, drink, and take then ease, for they have much goods laid up for many years!

Bank over bank of earth and stone, cleft by deep embrasures, from which the great guns grin across the rich gardens, studded with standard fruit-trees, which clothe the glaciers to its topmost edge. And there, below him, lie the vineyards, every rock-ledge and narrow path of soil tossing its golden tendrils to the sun, gray with ripening clusters, rich with noble wine, but what is that wall which winds among them, up and down, creeping and sneaking over every ledge and kind of vantage ground, jarred with cyclet-loops, backed by strange stairs and galleries of stone, till it rises close before him, to meet the low round tower full in his path, from whose deep casemates, as from dark scowling eye-holes, the ugly cannon-eyes stare up the glen?

Stangrave knows them all—as far as any man can know. The warls of the key which locks apart the nations, the yet mahlen Troy of Europe, the greatest fortress of the world.

He walks down, turns up to the vineyards, and lies down beneath the mellow shade of vines. He has no sketch book—article forgotten, his passport is in his pocket, and he speaks all tongues of German men, soldiers, and sailors, he has down in a 'note-book' the names of the men, upon the shaly soil, and watches the bright-eyed hawks hunt flies along the roosting walls, and the great locusts buzz and patch and leap, green locusts with red wings, and gray locusts with blue wings, he notes the species, for he is tired and lazy, and has so in my thoughts within his head that he is glad to toss them all away, and give up his soul, if possible, to locusts and hawks, vines and slate.

And far below him fleets the mighty Rhine, rich with the memories of two thousand stormy years, and on its further bank the gray-walled Coblenz town, and the long arches of the Moselle bridge, and the rich flats of Kaiser Franz, and the long poplar-crested uplands, which look so gay, and are so stern, for everywhere between the poplar-stems the saw-toothed outline of the western forts cuts the blue sky.

And far beyond it all sleeps, high in air, the Taifel with its hundred crater peaks, blue mound behind blue mound, melting into white haze. Stangrave has walked upon those hills, and stood upon the crater-lip of the great Moselkopf, and dreamed beside the Laacher See, beneath the ancient abley walls, and his thoughts flit across the Moselle flats towards his ancient haunts, as he asks himself—How long has that old Eifel lain in such soft sleep? How long ere it awake again?

It may awake, geologists confess—why not? and blacken all the skies with smoke of Tophet, pouring its streams of boiling mud once more to dam the Rhine, whelming the works of men in flood, and ash, and fire. Why not? The old earth seems so solid at first sight but look a little nearer, and this is the stuff of which she is made! The wreck of past earthquakes, the leavings of old floods, the washings of cold cinder heaps—which are smothering still below.

Stangrave knew that well enough. He had climbed Vesuvius, Etna, Popocatepetl. He had felt many an earthquake shock, and knew how far to trust the everlasting hills. And was old David right, he thought that day, when he held the earthquake and the volcano as the truest symbols of the history of human kind, and of the dealings of their Maker with them? All the magnificent Palestine imagery of the Hebrew poets, had it no meaning for men now? Did the Lord still uncover the foundations of the world, spiritual as well as physical, with the breath of His displeasure? Was the self-tara of Tophet still ordained for tyrants? And did the Lord still arise out of His place to shake terribly the earth? Or had the moral world grown as sleepy as the physical one had seemed to have done? Would anything awful, unexpected, tragical, ever burst forth again from the heart of earth, or from the heart of man?

Surprising question! What can ever happen henceforth, save mighty railroads and crystal palaces, peace and plenty, cosmogony and dilettantism, to the end of time? Is it not full sixty whole years since the first French revolution, and six whole years since the revolution of all Europe? But change is a thing of the past, and tragedy a myth of our forefathers, was a bad habit of old barbarians, eradicated by the spread of an enlightened philanthropy. Men know now how to govern the world far too well to need any divine visitations, much less divine punishments, and Stangrave was a Utopian dreamer, only to be excused by the fact that he had in his pocket the news that three great nations were gone forth to tear each other as of yore.

Nevertheless, looking round upon those grim earth-mounds and embasements he could not but give the men who put them there credit for supposing that they might be wanted. Ah! but that might be only one of the diabolical necessities of the decaying civilisation of the old world. What a contrast to the unarmed and peaceful prosperity of his own country! Thank heaven, New England needed no fortresses, military roads, or standing armies! True, but why that flash of contemptuous pity for the poor old world, which could only hold its own by such expensive and ugly methods?

He asked himself that very question, a moment after, angrily, for he was out of humour with himself, with his country, and indeed with the universe in general. And across his mind flashed a memorable conversation at Constantinople long since, during which he had made some such unwise remark to Thurnall, and received from him a sharp answer, which parted them for years.

It was natural enough that that conversation should come back to him just then, for, in his jealousy, he was thinking of Tom Thurnall often enough every day, and in spite of his civility, he could not help suspecting more and more that Thurnall had had some right on his side in the quarrel.

He had been twitting Thurnall with the miserable condition of the laborers in the south of England, and extolling his own country at the expense of ours. Tom, unable to deny the fact, had waxed all the more wroth at having it pressed on him, and at last had burst forth—

‘Well, and what right have you to crow over us on that score? I suppose, if you could hire a man in America for eightpence a day, instead of a dollar and a half, you would do it? You Americans are not accustomed to give more for a thing than its worth in the market, are you?’

‘But,’ Stangrave had answered, ‘the glory of America is, that you cannot get the man for less than the dollar and a half, that he is too well fed, too prosperous, too well educated, to be made a slave of.’

‘And therefore makes slaves of the niggers instead? I’ll tell you what, I’m sick of that shallow fallacy the glory of America! Do you mean, by America, the country or the people? You boast, all of you, of your country, as if you had made it yourselves, and quite forget that God made America, and America has made you.’

‘Made us, sa?’ quoth Stangrave fiercely enough.

‘Made you!’ replied Thurnall, exaggerating his half-truth from anger. ‘To what is your comfort, your high feeding, your very education, owing, but to your having a thin population, a virgin soil, and unlimited means of emigration? What credit to you if you need no poor laws, when you pack off your children, as fast as they grow up, to clear more ground westward? What credit to your yeomen that they have read more books than our clods have, while they can earn more in four hours than our poor fellows in twelve? It all depends on the mere physical fact of your being in a new country, and we in an old one—and as for moral superiority, I shan’t believe in that while I see the whole of the northern states so utterly given up to the “almighty dollar,” that they leave the honour of their country to be made ducks and drakes of by a few southern slave holders. Moral superiority? We hold in England that an honest man is a match for three rogues. If the same law holds good in the United States, I leave you to settle whether Northerners or Southerners are the honestest men.’

Whereupon (and no blame to Stangrave) there was a heavy quarrel, and the two men had not met since.

But now, those words of Thurnall’s, hacked by far bitterer ones of Marie’s, were fretting Stangrave’s heart. What if they were true? They were not the whole truth. There was beside, and above them all, a nobleness in the American heart, which could, if it chose and when it chose, give the lie to that bitter taunt but had it done so already?

At least, he himself had not. . . If Thurnall and Marie were unjust to his nation, they had not been unjust to him. He, at least, had been making, all his life, mere outward blessings causes of self-congratulation, and not of humility. He had been priding himself on wealth, ease, luxury, cultivation, without a thought that these were God's gifts, and that God would require an account of them. If Thurnall were right, was he himself too truly the typical American? And bitterly enough he accused at once himself and his people.

'Noble! Marie is right! We boast of our nobleness better to take the only opportunity of showing it which we have had since we have become a nation! Heaped with every blessing which God could give, beyond the reach of sorrow, a clock, even an interference, shut out from all the world in God's new Eden, that we might freely eat of all the trees of the garden, and grow, and spread, and enjoy ourselves like the birds of heaven—God only laid on us one duty, one command, to right one simple, confessed, conscious wrong.

'And what have we done?—what have even I done? We have steadily, deliberately, cringed at the foot of the wrong doer, even while we boasted our superiority to him at every point, and at last, for the sake of our own selfish ease, helped him to forge new chains for his victims, and received as our only reward fresh insults. White slaves! We, perhaps, and not the English peasant, are the white slaves! At least, if the Irishman emigrates to England, or the Englishman to Canada, he is not hunted out with bloodhounds, and delivered back to his landlord to be scourged and chained. He is not practically out of the pale of law, misrepresented, forbidden even the use of books, and even if he were, there is an excuse for the old country for she was founded on no political principles, but discovered what she knows step by step—a sort of political Topsy, as Claude Mellet calls her, who has "kinder growed," doing from hand to mouth what seemed best. But that we, who profess to start as an ideal nation, on fixed ideas of justice, freedom, and equality—that we should have been stultifying ever since every great principle of which we so loudly boast!—'

'The old Jew used to say of his nation, "It is God that hath made us, and not we ourselves." We say, "It is we that have made ourselves, while God—". Ah, yes, I recollect. God's work is to save a soul here and a soul there, and to leave America to be saved by the Americans who made it. We must have a broader and deeper creed than that if we are to work out our destiny. The battle against Middle Age slavery was fought by the old Catholic Church, which held the Jewish notion, and looked upon the Deity as the actual king of Christendom, and every man in it as God's own child I see now! No wonder that the battle in America has as yet been fought by the Quakers, who believe that there is a divine light and voice in every man, while the Calvinist preachers, with their isolating and individualising creed, have looked on with folded hands, content to save a negro's soul here and there, whatsoever might become of the bodies and the national future of the whole negro race. No wonder, while such men have the teaching of the people, that it is necessary still in the nineteenth century, in a Protestant country, amid sane human beings, for such a man as Mr Sumner to rebut, in sober earnest, the argument that the negro was the descendant of Canaan, doomed to eternal slavery by Noah's curse!'

He would rouse himself. He would act, speak, write, as many a noble fellow-countryman was doing. He had avoided them of old as bores and fanatics who would needs wake him from his luxurious dreams. He had even hated them, simply because they were more righteous than he. He would be a new man henceforth.

He strode down the hill through the cannon-guarded vineyards, among the busy groups of peasants.

'Yes, Marie was right. Life is meant for work, and not for ease, to labour in danger and in dread, to do a little good ere the night comes, when no man can work, instead of trying to realize for oneself a Paradise, not even Bunyan's shepherd-paradise, much less Fourier's casino-paradise, and perhaps least of all, because most selfish and isolated of all, my own heart-paradise—the apothecary of loathing, as Claude calls it. Ah, Tennyson's Palace of Art is a true word—too true, too true!'

'Art? What if the most necessary human art, next to the art of agriculture, be, after all, the art of war? It has been so in all ages. What if I have been befooled—what if all the Anglo-Saxon world has been befooled by forty years of peace? We have forgotten that the history of the world has been as yet written in blood, that the history of the human race is the story of its heroes and its martyrs—the slayers and the slain. Is it not becoming such once more in Europe now? And what divine exemption can we claim from the law? What right have we to suppose that it will be aught else, as long as there are wrongs unredressed on earth, as long as anger and ambition, cupidity and wounded pride, canker the hearts of men? What if the wise man's attitude, and the wise nation's attitude, is that of the Jews rebuilding their ruined walls—the tool in one hand, and the sword in the other, for the wild Arabs are close outside, and the time is short, and the storm has only lulled awhile in mercy, that wise men may prepare for the next thunder-burst? It is an ugly fact but I have thrust it away too long, and I must accept it now and henceforth. This, and not luxurious Broadway, this, and not the comfortable New England village, is the normal type of human life and this is the model city! Armed industry, which tills the corn and vino among the cannons' mouths, which never forgets their need, though it may mask and beautify their terror, but knows that as long as cruelty and wrong exist on earth, man's destiny is to dare and suffer, and, if it must be so, to die.

'Yes, I will face my work, my danger, it need be. I will find Marie. I will tell her that I accept her quest, not for her sake, but for its own. Only I will demand the right to work at it as I think best, patiently, moderately, wisely if I can, for a fanatic I cannot be, even for her sake. She may hate those slaveholders—she may have her reasons—but I cannot. I cannot deal with them as ferus natura. I cannot deny that they are no worse men than I, that I should have done what they are doing, have said what they are saying, had I been bred up, as they have been, with irresponsible power over the souls and bodies of human beings. God! I shudder at the fancy! The brute that I might have been—that I should have been!

'Yes, one thing at least I have learnt, in all my experiments on poor humanity—never to have seen a man do a wrong thing, without feeling that I could do the same in his place. I used to undo myself on that once, fool that I was, and call it comprehensiveness. I used to make it an excuse for sitting by, and seeing the devil have it all his own way, and call that toleration. I will see now whether I cannot turn the said knowledge to a better account, as common sense, patience, and charity, and yet do work of which neither I nor my country need be ashamed.'

He walked down, and on to the bridge of boats. They opened in the centre, as he reached it a steamer was passing. He lounged on the rail as the boat passed through, looking carelessly at the groups of tourists.

Two ladies were standing on the steamer, close to him, looking up at Ehrenbreitstein. Was it! Yes, it was Sabina, and Maria by her!

But ah, how changed! The cheeks were pale and hollow, dark rings—he could see them but too plainly as the face was lifted up toward the light—were round those great eyes, bright no longer. Her face was listless, careworn, looking all the more sad and impassive by the side of Sabina's, as she pointed, smiling and sparkling, up to the fortress, and seemed trying to interest Marie in it, but in vain.

He called out. He waved his hand wildly, to the amusement of the officers and peasants who waited by his side, and who, looking first at his excited face, and then at the two beautiful women, were not long in making up their minds about him, and had their private jests accordingly.

They did not see him, but turned away to look at Coblenz, and the steamer swept by.

Stangrave stamped with rage—upon a Prussian officer's thin boot.

'Ten thousand pardons!'

'You are excused, dear sir, you are excused,' says the good-natured German, with a wicked smile, which raises a blush on Stangrave's cheek. 'Your eyes were dazzled, why not? it is not often that one sees two such suns together in the same sky. But calm yourself, the boat stops at Coblenz.'

Stangrave could not well call the man of war to account for his impertinence, he had had his toes half crushed, and had a right to indemnify himself as he thought fit. And with a hundred more apologies, Stangrave prepared to dart across the bridge as soon as it was closed.

Alas! after the steamer, as the fates would have it, came lumbering down one of those monster timber rafts, and it was a full half hour before Stangrave could get across, having suffered all the while the torments of Tantalus, as he watched the boat sweep round to the pier and discharge its freight, to be scattered whither he knew not. At last he got across, and went in chase to the nearest hotel, but they were not there, thence to the next, and the next, till he had hunted half the hotels in the town, but hunted all in vain.

He is rushing wildly back again, to try if he can obtain any clue at the steamboat pier, through the narrow, dirty street at the back of the Rhine Cavalier, when he is stopped short by a mighty German embrace, and a German kiss on either cheek, as the kiss of a housemaid's broom, while a jolly voice shouts in English—

'Ah, my dear, dear friend! and you would pass me! Whither the hangman so fast are you running in the mud!'

'My dear Salomon! But let me go, I beseech you, I am in search—'

'In search?' cries the jolly Jew banker, 'for the philosopher's stone? You had all that man could want a week since, except that. Search no more, but come home with me, and we will have a night as of the gods on Olympus!'

'My dearest fellow, I am looking for two ladies!'

'Two? ah, rugie! shall not one suffice!'

'Don't, my dearest fellow! I am looking for two English ladies.'

'Pot!' You shall find two hundred in the hotels, ugly and fat, but the two fairest are gone this two hours!'

'When? which?' cries Stangrave, suspecting at once.

'Sabina Mellot, and a Sultana. I thought her of The Nation, and would have offered my hand on the spot, but Madame Mellot says she is a Gentle.'

'Gone? And you have seen them? Where?'

'To Bertrich. They had luncheon with my mother, and then started by private post.'

'I must follow.'

'Ach lieber! But it will be dark in an hour.'

'What matter?'

'But you shall find them to-morrow, just as well as to-day. They stay at Bertrich for a fortnight more. They have been there now a month, and only left it last week for a pleasure tour, across to the Ahrthal, and so back by Andernach.

'Why did they leave Coblenz, then, in such hot haste?'

'Ah, the ladies never give reasons. There were letters waiting for them at our house, and no sooner read, but they leaped up and would forth. Come home now, and go by the steamer to-morrow morning.'

'Impossible? most hospitable of Israelites.'

'To go to-night—for see the clouds! Not a postilion will dare to leave Coblenz, under that quick coming allgemein und ungeheuer hecker-lund-und-teufel's-quitter.'

Stangrave looked up, growling, and gave in. A Rhine storm was rolling up rapidly.

'They will be caught in it.'

'No. They are far beyond its path by now, while you shall endure the whole visitation, and if you try to proceed, pass the night in a flea-pestered post-house, or in a ditch of water.'

So Stangrave went home with Herr Salomon, and heard from him, amid clouds of Latakia, of wars and rumours of wars, distress of nations, and perplexity, seen by the light, not of the Gospel, but of the stock-exchange, while the storm fell without in lightning, hail, rain, of right Rheinish potency.

CHAPTER XXIV

THE THIRTEEN OF SEPTEMBER

We must go back a week or so, to England, and to the last day of September. The world is shooting partridges, and asking nervously, when it comes home, what news from the Crimea? The flesh who serves it is bustling at Margate. The devil is keeping up his usual correspondence with both. Eaton Square is a desolate wilderness, where dusty sparrows alone disturb the dreams of frowzy charwomen, who, like Anchorites amid the tombs of the Thelwiel, fulfil the contemplative life each in her subterranean cell. Beneath St. Peter's spire the calman sleeps within his cab, the horse without, the waterman, seated on his empty bucket, contemplates the untrodden pavement between his feet, and is at rest. The blind butcher's boy trots by, with empty cart, five miles an hour, instead of full fifteen, and stops to chat with the red postman, who, his occupation done, smokes with the green gatekeeper, and reviews the Gazette. Along the whole north pavement of the square only one figure moves, and that is Major Campbell.

His face is haggard and anxious, he walks with a quick, excited step, earnest enough, whoever else is not. For in front of Lord Scutbush's house the road is laid with straw. There is sickness there, anxiety, bitter tears. Lucia has not found her husband, but she has lost her child.

Trembling, Campbell raises the muffled knocker and Bowie appears. 'What news to-day?' he whispers.

'As well as can be expected, sir, and as quiet as a lamb now, they say. But it has been a bad time, and a bad man is he that caused it.'

'A bad time, and a bad man. How is Miss St. Just?'

'Just gone to lie down, sir. Mrs. Clara is on the stairs, if you'd like to see her.'

'No, tell Miss St. Just that I have no news yet. And the major turns wearily away.'

Clara, who has seen him from above, hurries down after him into the street, and coaxes him to come in. 'I am sure you have had no breakfast, sir, and you look so ill and worn. And Miss St. Just will be so vexed not to see you. She will get up the moment she hears you are here.'

'No, my good Miss Clara,' says Campbell, looking down with a weary smile. 'I should only make gloom more gloomy. Bowie, tell his lordship that I shall be at the afternoon train to-morrow, let what will happen.'

'Ay, ay, sir. We're 'r ready to march. The major looks very ill, Miss Clara. I wish he'd have taken your counsel. And I wish you'd take mine, and marry me ere I march, just to try what it's like.'

'I must mind my mistress, Mr. Bowie,' says Clara.

'And how should I interfere with that, as I've said twenty times, when I'm safe in the Crimea? I'll get the licence this day, say what ye will: and then ye would not have the heart to let me spend two pounds twelve and sixpence for nothing.'

Whether the last most Caledonian argument conquered or not, Mr. Bowie got the licence, was married before breakfast the next morning, and started for the Crimea at ten o'clock in the afternoon, most astonished, as he confided in the train to Sergeant M. Arthur, 'to see a lassie that never gave him a kind word in her life, and had not been married but barely six hours, greet and greet at his going, till she vanished away into hysterics. They're a very unattractive species, servant, are they women, and if they were taken out o' man, they took the best part o' Adam wi' them, and left us to shift with the worst.'

But to return to Campbell. The last week has altered him frightfully. He is no longer the stern, self-possessed warrior which he was, he no longer even walks upright, his cheek is pale, his eye dull, his whole countenance sunken together. And now that the excitement of anxiety is past, he draws his feet along the pavement slowly, his hands clasped behind him, his eyes fixed on the ground, as if the life was gone from out of him, and existence was a heavy weight.

'She is safe, at least, then! One burden off my mind. And yet had it not been better if that pure spirit had returned to him who gave it, instead of waking again to fresh misery! I must find that man! Why, I have been saying so to myself for seven days past, and yet no ray of light. Can the coward have given me a wrong address? Yet why give me an address at all if he meant to hide from me? Why, I have been saying that, too, to myself every day for the last week! Over and over again the same dreary round of possibilities and suspicions. However, I must be quiet now, if I am a man. I can hear nothing before the detective comes at two. How to pass the weary, weary time? For I am past thinking—almost past praying—though not quite, thank God!

He paces up still noisily, and then up silent Bond Street, pauses to look at some strange fish on Groves's counter, anything to while away the time, then he plops on toward the top of the street, and turns into Mr. Piltscher's shop, and upstays to the microscope club room. There, at least, he can forget himself for an hour.

He looks round the neat pleasant little place, with its cases of curiosities, and its exquisite photographs, and bright brass instruments, its glass vases stocked with delicate water-plants and animalcules, with the sunlight gleaming through the green and purple seaweed fronds, while the air is fresh and fragrant with the seaweed scent, a quiet, cool little hermitage of science amid that great, noisy, luxurious west-end world. At least, it brings back to him the thought of the summer sea, and Aberlvy, and his shut studies. But he cannot think of that any more. It is past, and may God forgive him!

At one of the microscopes on the slab opposite him stands a sturdy bearded man, his back toward the major, while the wise little Cornau, hopeless of customers, is leaning over him in his shut sleeves.

'But I never have seen its like, it had just like a painter's easel in its stomach yesterday.'

'Why, it's an Echinus lava, a sucking sea urchin.' Hang it, if I had known you hadn't seen one, I'd have brought up half a dozen of them.'

'My I look, sir? asked the major, 'I, too, never have seen an Echinus lava.'

The bearded man looks up.

'Major Campbell?'

'Mr. Thurnall? I thought I could not be mistaken in the voice.'

'This is too pleasant, sir, to renew our water-lives together here,' said Tom. But a second look at the major's face showed him that he was in no jesting mood. 'How is the party at Beddgelert? I hurried you with them still.'

'They are all in London, at Lord Southbush's house, in Eaton Square.'

'In London, at this dull time? I trust nothing unpleasant has brought them here.'

'Mrs. Vavasour is very ill. We had thoughts of sending for you, as the family physician was out of town, but she was out of danger, thank God, in a few hours. Now let me ask in turn after you. I hope no unpleasant business brings you up three hundred miles from your practice?'

'Nothing, I assure you. Only I have given up my Aberlvy practice. I am going to the East.'

'Like the rest of the world?'

'Not exactly. You gave a disguised soldier of Her Majesty's, I am an undignified Abel Dragger, to dose Basil-Bazanka.'

'Impossible! and with such an opening as you had there? You must excuse me, but my opinion of your prudence must not be so rudely shaken.'

'Why do you not ask the question which Balie's old Tommigeons judge asks, whenever a culprit is brought before him,—"Who is she?"'

'Taking for granted that there was a woman at the bottom of every mishap? I understand you,' said the major, with a sad smile. 'Now let you and I walk a little together, and look it the Echimus another day, or when I return from Sevastopol—'

Tom went out with him. A new ray of hope had crossed the major's mind. His meeting with Thurnall might be providential, for he recollected now, for the first time, Mellot's parting hint.

'You knew Flisby Vavasour well?'

'No man better.'

'Did you think that there was any tendency to madness in him?'

'No more than in any other selfish, vain, irritable man, with a strong imagination left to run riot.'

'Humph! you seem to have divined his character. May I ask if you knew him before you met him at Aberlvy?'

Tom looked up sharply at the major's face.

'You would ask what cause I have for inquiring? I will tell you presently. Meanwhile I may say, that Mellot told me frankly that you had some power over him, and mentioned, mysteriously, a name. John Bugges, I think—which it appears that he once assumed.'

'If Mellot thought fit to tell you anything, I may frankly tell you all. John Bugges is his real name. I have known him from childhood. And then Tom poured into the ears of the surprised and somewhat disgusted major all he had to tell.

'You have kept your secret mercifully, and used it wisely, sir, and I and others shall be always your debtors for it. Now I dare tell you in turn, in strictest confidence of course—'

'I am far too poor to afford the luxury of babbling.'

And the major told him what we all know.

'I expected as much,' said he dryly. 'Now, I suppose that you wish me to exert myself in tending the man?'

'I do.'

'Were Mrs. Vavasour only concerned, I should say—Not I! Better that she should never set eyes on him again.'

'Better, indeed!' said he bitterly: 'but it is

I who must see him, if but for five minutes. I must!'

'Major Campbell's wish is a command. Where have you searched for him?'

'At his address, at his publisher's, at the houses of various literary friends of his, and yet no trace.'

'Has he gone to the Continent?'

'Heaven knows! I have inquired at every passport office for news of any one answering his description, indeed, I have two detectives, I may tell you, at this moment, watching every possible place. There is but one hope, if he be alive. Can he have gone home to his native town?'

'Never! Anywhere but there.'

'Is there any old friend of the lower class with whom he may have taken lodgings?'

Tom pondered.

'There was a fellow, a noisy blackguard, whom Briggs was asking after this very summer—a fellow who went off from Whitbury with some players. I know Briggs used to go to the theatre with him as a boy—what was his name? He tried acting, but did not succeed, and then became a scene-shifter, or something of the kind, at the Adelphi. He has some complaint, I forget what, which made him an out-patient at St. Munipamus's some months every year. I know that he was there this summer, for I wrote to ask, at Briggs's request, and Briggs sent him a sovereign through me.'

'But what makes you fancy that he can have taken shelter with such a man, and one who knows his secret?'

'It is but a chance. But he may have done it from the mere feeling of loneliness—just to hold by some one whom he knows in this great wilderness, especially a man in whose eyes he will be a great man, and to whom he has done a kindness, still, it is the nearest chance.'

'We will take it, nevertheless, for a hope though it be.'

They took a cab to the hospital, and, with some trouble, got the man's name and address, and drove in search of him. They had some difficulty in finding his abode, for it was up an alley at the back of Drury Lane, in the top of one of those foul old houses which hold a family in every room, but, by dint of knocking at one door and the other, and bearing meekly with reviling consequent thereon, they arrived, per modum tollendi, at a door which must be the right one, as all the rest were wrong.

'Does John Barker live here?' asks Thurnall, putting his head in cautiously for fear of drunken Irishmen, who might be seized with the national impulse to 'slate' him.

'What's that to you?' answers a shrill voice from among soapends and steaming rags.

'Here is a gentleman wants to speak to him.'

'So do a many as won't have that pleasure, and would be little the better for it if they had. Get along with you, I knows your lay.'

'We really want to speak to him, and to pay him, if he will—'

'Go along! I'm up to the something-to-your advantage dodge, and to the mustachio dodge too. Do you fancy I don't know a bailiff, because he's dressed like a swell?'

'But, my good woman!' said Tom, laughing.

'You put your crocodile foot in here, and I'll hit the hot water over the both of you!' and she caught up the pan of soapends.

'My dear soul! I am a doctor belonging to the hospital which your husband goes to, and have known him since he was a boy, down in Berkshire.'

'You?' and she looked keenly at him.

'My name is Thurnall. I was a medical man once in Whitbury, where your husband was born.'

'You?' said she again, in a softened tone.

'I knows that name well enough.'

'You do? What was your name, then?' said Tom, who recognised the woman's Berkshire accent beneath its coat of cockneyism.

'Never you mind. I'm no credit to it, so I'll let it be. But come in, for the old county's sake. Can't offer you a chair, he's pawned 'em all. Pleasant old place it was down there, when I was a young girl, they say it's growed a grand place now, wi' a railroad. I think many times I'd like to go down and die there.' She spoke in a rough, sullen, careless tone, as if life-weary.

'My good woman,' said Major Campbell, a little impatiently, 'can you find your husband for us?'

'Why, then?' asked she sharply, her suspicion seeming to return.

'If he will answer a few questions, I will give him five shillings. If he can find out for me what I want, I will give him five pounds.'

'Shouldn't I do as well? If you go to him, it's little out of it I shall see, but he coming home tapsy when it's spent. Ah, dear! it was a sad day for me when I first fell in with they play-goers.'

'Why should she not do it as well?' said Thurnall. 'Mrs. Barker, do you know anything of a person named Briggs—John Briggs, the apothecary's son, at Whitbury?'

She laughed a harsh bitter laugh.

'Know he? yes, and too much reason. That was where it all begun, along of that play-going of he's and my master's.'

'Have you seen him lately?' asked Campbell eagerly.

'I seen 'im? I'd hit this water over the fellow, and all his play-acting merryandrews, if ever he set a foot here!'

'But have you heard of him?'

'Ees—' said she carelessly, 'he's round here now, I heard my master say, about the Delphy, with my master a-drinking, I suppose. No good, I'll warrant.'

'My good woman,' said Campbell, panting for breath, 'bring me face to face with that man, and I'll put a five-pound note in your hand there and then.'

'Five pounds is a sight to me, but it's a sight more than the sight of he's worth,' said she suspiciously again.

'That's the gentleman's concern,' said Tom, 'The money's yours. I suppose you know the worth of it by now?'

'Ees, none better. But I don't want he to get hold of it, he's made away with enough already,' and she began to think.

'Chiously impassive people, wo Wessex worthies, when we are a little ground down with trouble. You must give her time, and she will do our work. She wants the money, but she is long past being excited at the prospect of it.'

'What's that you're whispering?' asked she sharply.

Campbell stamped with impatience.

'You don't trust us yet, eh?—then, there!' and he took five sovereigns from his pocket, and tossed them on the table. 'There's your money! I trust you to do the work, as you've been paid beforehand.'

She caught up the gold, rang every piece on the table to see if it was sound, and then—

'Sally, you go down with these gentlemen to the Juniper's Head, and if he isn't there, go to the Fighting Cocks, and if he isn't there, go to the Duke of Wellington, and tell he there's two gentlemen has heard of his poetry, and wants to hear 'im excite. And then you give he a glass of humor, and praise up his nonsense, and he'll tell you all he knows, and a sight more 'th' 'un plenty to drink. It'll be a saving and a charity, for if he don't get it out of you, he will out of me.'

And she returned doggedly to her washing.

'Can't I do anything for you?' asked Tom, whose heart always yearned over a Berkshire soul. 'I have plenty of friends down at Whitebury still.'

'More than I have. No, sir,' said she sally, and with the first touch of sweetness they had yet heard in her voice. 'I've cured my own bacon, and I must eat it. There's none down there minds me, but then that would be ashamed of me. And I couldn't go without he, and they wouldn't take him in, so I must just bide.' And she went on wishing.

'God help her!' said Campbell, as he went downstairs.

'Misery breeds that temper, and only misery, in our people. I can show you as thorough gentlemen and ladies, people round Whitebury, living on ten shillings a week, as you will show me in Belgravia living on five thousand a year.'

'I don't doubt it,' said Campbell. So 'she couldn't go without he,' drunken dog as he is! Thus it is with them all the world over.

'So much the worse for them,' said Tom cynically, 'and for the men too. They make fools of us first with our over-faithfulness of them, and then they let us make fools of ourselves with their over-faithfulness of us.'

'I fancy sometimes that they were all meant to be the mates of angels, and stooped to men as a pis aller; reversing the old story of the sons of heaven and the daughters of men.'

'And accounting for the present degeneracy.

T Y A

When the sons of heaven married the daughters of men, then offspring were giants and men of renown. Now the sons of men marry the daughters of heaven, and the offspring is Wiggle, Waggle, Windbag, and Redtape.'

They visited one public-house after another, till the girl found for them the man they wanted, a shabby, sudden-visaged fellow, with a world he jannity all of conscious shrewdness and vanity, who stood before the bar, his thumbs in his minholes, and laying down the law to a group of coster boys, for want of a better audience.

The girl, after smugly plucks at his coat-tail, stopped him in the midst of his oration, and explained her errand somewhat harshly.

Mr. Barker bent down his head on one side, to signify that he was absorbed in attention to her news, and then drawing himself up once more, lifted his greasy hat high in air, bowed to the very floor, and broke forth—

'Most potent, grave, and reverend signiors
A man of war, and like a man of peace,
Therein, if you come jangleful and if not,
Have we not thrived here?'

And the fellow put himself into a fresh attitude.

'We come in peace, my good sir,' said Tom, 'first to listen to your talented effusions, and next for a little private conversation on a subject on which—' but Mr. Barker interrupted—

'To listen, and to drink? The nose is dry,
And Pegasus doth thirst for Hippocrene,
And fun would paint imbrals the vulgar call—
Or hot or cold, or long or short. Alfordant.'

The bar girl, who knew his humour, came forward.

'Glasses all round!—these noble knighthits will pay—
Of hottest hot, and stuffiest stuff. Then mark'st me?
Now to your quest!'

And he bowed round with a third attitude.

'Do you know Mr. Briggs?' asked the straight forward major.

He rolled his eyes to every quarter of the seventh sphere, clapped his hand upon his heart, and assumed an expression of angelic gratitude.

'My benefactor! Were the world a waste,
A thistle-waste, ass-milch'd, goldfinch-pecked,
And all the men and women merely asses,
I still could lay this hand upon this heart
And cry, "Not yet alone!" I know a man—
A man low troated, and his person curled—
A gushing, flushing, blushing human heart.'

'As sure as you live, sir,' said Tom, 'if you won't talk honest prose, I won't pay for the brimby and-wine.'

'Here is the slave who pays, and baser prose—
Hing unimpaired pattern. 'Tis in verse
That this is prose, and tends in Jimbo curae.'

'And asses buy, I think,' said Tom, in deepspan. 'Do you know where Mr. Briggs is now?'

'And why the devil do you want to know?
For that's a verse, sir, although somewhat slow.'

The two men laughed in spite of themselves.

'Better tell the fellow the plain truth,' said Campbell to Thurnall.

N

'Come out with us, and I will tell you' And Campbell threw down the money, and led him off, after he had gulped down his own brandy, and half Tom's beside.

'What? leave the nepenthe untasted?'

They took him out, and he tucked his arms through theirs, and strutted down Drury Lane.

'The fact is, sir—I speak to you, of course, in confidence, as one gentleman to another—'

Mr Barker replied by a lofty and gracious bow.

'That his family are exceedingly distressed at his absence, and his wife, who, as you may know, is a lady of high family, dangerously ill, and he cannot be aware of the fact. This gentleman is the medical man of her family, and I—I am an intimate friend. We should esteem it, therefore, the very greatest service if you would give us any information which—'

'Weep no more, gentle shepherdess, weep no more,
For Lycidas your sorrow is not dead,
Sunk though he be upon a purgatory shore,
With fumes of Morphoeus crown about his head.'

'Fumes of Morphoeus' crown?' asked Thurnall.

'That crimson flower which crowns the sleepy god,
And sweeps the soul aloft, though flesh may nod.'

'He has taken to opium,' said Thurnall to the bewildered major. 'What I should have expected.'

'God help him! we must save him out of that last lowest deep!' cried Campbell. 'Where is he, sir?'

'A vow! a vow! I have a vow in heaven!
Why guide the hounds toward the trembling hare?
Our Adonis hath drunk poison, Oh!
What deaf and vigorous murderer could crown
Life's early cup with such a draught of woe?'

'As I live, sir,' cried Campbell, losing his self-possession in disgust at the lull, 'you may rhyme your own nonsense as long as you will, but you shan't quote the Adonians about that fellow in my presence.'

Mr Barker shook himself fiercely free of Campbell's arm, and faced round at him in a fighting attitude. Campbell stood eyeing him sternly, but at his wit's end.

'Mr Barker,' said Tom blandly, 'will you have another glass of brandy-and-water, or shall I call a policeman?'

'Sn,' sputtered he, speaking prose at last, 'this gentleman has insulted me.' He has called my poetry nonsense, and my friend a fellow. And blood shall not wipe out—what liquor may!'

The hint was sufficient. But ere he had drained another glass, Mr Barker was decidedly incapable of managing his affairs, much less theirs, and became withal exceedingly quarrelsome, returning angrily to the grievance of Briggs having been called a fellow, in spite of all their enreaties, he talked himself into a passion, and at last, to Campbell's extreme disgust, rushed out of the bar into the street.

'This is too vexatious! To have kept half an hour's company with such an animal, and then to have him escape me after all! A just punishment on me for pandering to his drunkenness.'

Tom made no answer, but went quietly to the door, and peeped out.

'Pay for his liquor, major, and follow. Keep a few yards behind me, there will be less chance of his recognising us than if he saw us both together.'

'Why, where do you think he's going?'

'Not home, I can see. Ten to one that he will go ragging off straight to Briggs, to put him on his guard against us. Just like a drunkard's cunning it would be. There, he has turned up that side street. Now follow me quick. Oh that he may only keep his legs!'

They gained the bottom of that street before he had turned out of it, and so through another, and another, till they ran him to earth in one of the courts out of St. Martin's Lane.

Into a doorway he went, and up a stair. Tom stood listening at the bottom, till he heard the fellow knock at a door far above, and call out in a drunken tone. Then he beckoned to Campbell, and both, careless of what might follow, ran upstairs, and pushing him aside, entered the room without ceremony.

Then chances of being on the right scent were small enough, considering that, though every one was out of town, there were a million, and a half of people in London at that moment, and, unfortunately, at least fifty thousand who would have considered Mr. John Barker a desirable visitor, but somehow, in the excitement of the chase, both had forgotten the chances against them, and the probability that they would have to retire downstairs again, apologising humbly to some wrathful Joseph Higgins, whose convivialities they might have interrupted. But no, Tom's cunning had, as usual, played him true, and as they entered the door, they beheld none other than the lost Elsie Vivasour, alias John Briggs.

Major Campbell advanced bowing, hat in hand, with a courteous apology on his lips.

It was a low lean to garret, there was a deal table and an old chair in it, but no bed. The windows were broken, the paper hanging down in strips. Elsie was standing before the empty fireplace, his hand in his bosom, as if he had been startled by the rattle outside. He had not shaved for some days.

So much Tom could note, but no more. He saw the glance of recognition pass over Elsie's face, and that an ugly one. He saw him draw something from his bosom, and spring like a cat almost upon the table. A flash—a crack. He had fired a pistol full in Campbell's face.

Tom was startled, not at the thing, but that such a man should have done it. He had seen souls, and too many, flit out of the world by that same tiny crack, in Californian taverns, Arabian deserts, Australian gullies. He knew all about that; but he liked Campbell; and he breathed more freely the next moment, when he saw him standing still erect, a quiet smile on his face, and felt the plaster dropping from the wall upon his own head. The bullet had gone over the major. All was right.

'He is not man enough for a second shot,' thought Tom quietly, 'while the major's eye is on him.'

'I beg your pardon, Mr Vavasour,' he heard the major say, in a gentle unimoved voice, 'for this intrusion. I assure you that there is no cause for any anger on your part, and I am come to entreat you to forget and forgive any conduct of mine which may have caused you to mistake either me or a lady whom I am unworthy to mention.'

'I am glad the beggar fired at him,' thought Tom. 'One space of danger, and he's himself again, and will overawe the poor cur by mere civility. I was afraid of some abject Methodist parson humbly, which would give the other party a handle.'

Elsley heard him with a stupefied look, like that of a trapped wild beast, in which rage, shame, suspicion, and fear were mingled with the vacant glare of the opium-eater's eye. Then his eyes drooped beneath Campbell's steady gentle gaze, and he looked uneasily round the room, still like a trapped wild beast, as if for a hole to escape by, then up again, but sidelong, at Major Campbell.

'I assure you, sir, on the word of a Christian and a soldier, that you are labouring under an entire misapprehension. For God's sake and Mrs Vavasour's sake, undo luck, sir, to those who will receive you with nothing but affection! Your wife has been all but dead, she thinks of no one but you, asks for no one but you! In God's name, sir, what are you doing here, while a wife who adores you is dying from you?—I do not wish to be rude, sir, but let me say at least—neglect?'

Elsley looked at him still askance, puzzled, inquiring. Suddenly his great beautiful eyes opened to preternatural wideness, as if trying to grasp a new thought. He started, shifted his foot to and fro, his arms straight down by his sides, his fingers chattering after something. Then he looked up hurriedly again at Campbell, and Thurnall looked at him also, and his face was as the face of an angel.

'Miserable ass!' thought Tom, 'if he don't see innocence in that man's countenance, he wouldn't see it in his own child's.'

Elsley suddenly turned his back to them, and thrust his hand into his bosom. Now was Tom's turn.

In a moment he had vaulted over the table, and seized Elsley's wrist ere he could draw the second pistol.

'No, my dear Jack,' whispered he quietly, 'once is enough in a day!'

'Not for him, Tom, for myself!' moaned Elsley.

'For neither, dear lad! Let bygones be bygones, and do you be a new man, and go home to Mrs Vavasour.'

'Never, never, never, never, never, never!' shrieked Elsley like a baby, every word increasing in intensity, till the whole house rang, and then threw himself into the crazy chair, and dashed his head between his hands upon the table.

'This is a case for me, Major Campbell. I think you had better go now.'

'You will not leave him?'

'No, sir. It is a very curious psychological study, and he is a Whitbury man.'

Campbell knew quite enough of the would-be cynical doctor, to understand what all that meant. He came up to Elsley.

'Mr Vavasour, I am going to the war, from which I expect never to return. If you believe me, give me your hand before I go.'

Elsley, without lifting his head, beat on the table with his hand.

'I wish to die at peace with you and all the world. I am innocent in word, in thought. I shall not insult another person by saying that she is so. If you believe me, give me your hand.'

Elsley stretched his hand, his head still buried. Campbell took it and went silently downstairs.

'Is he gone?' moaned he, after a while.

'Yes.'

'Does she—does she care for him?'

'Good heavens! How did you ever dream such an absurdity?'

Elsley only beat upon the table.

'She has been ill.'

'Is ill. She has lost her child.'

'Which?' shrieked Elsley.

'A boy whom she should have had.'

Elsley only beat on the table, then—

'Give me the bottle, Tom!'

'What bottle?'

'The laudanum,—there in the cupboard.'

'I shall do no such thing. You are poisoning yourself.'

'Let me, then! I must, I tell you! I can live on nothing else. I shall go mad if I do not have it. I should have been mad by now. Nothing else keeps off these fits. I feel one coming now. Curse you! Give me the bottle!'

'What fits?'

'How do I know? Agony and torture—ever since I got wet on that mountain.'

Tom knew enough to guess his meaning, and felt Elsley's pulse and forehead.

'I tell you it turns every bone to red-hot iron!' almost screamed he.

'Neuralgia, rheumatic, I suppose,' said Tom to himself. 'Well, this is not the thing to cure you, but you shall have it to keep you quiet.' And he measured him out a small dose.

'More, I tell you, more!' said Elsley, lifting up his head, and looking at it.

'Not more while you are with me.'

'With you! Who the devil sent you here?'

'John Briggs, John Briggs, if I did not mean you good, should I be here now? Now do, like a reasonable man, tell me what you intend to do.'

'What is that to you, or any man?' said Elsley, writhing with neuralgia.

'No concern of mine, of course. But your poor wife—you must see her.'

'I can't, I won't!—that is, not yet! I tell you I cannot face the thought of her, much less the sight of her, and her family—that Valentin! I'd rather the earth should open and swallow me! Don't talk to me, I say!'

And hiding his face in his hands he writhed with pain, while Thurnall stood still patiently watching him, as a pointer dog does a partridge. He had found his game, and did not intend to lose it.

'I am better now, quite well!' said he, as the laudanum began to work. 'Yes! I'll go that will be it—go to . . . at once. He'll give me an order for a magazine article, I'll earn ten pounds, and then off to Italy.'

'If you want ten pounds, my good fellow, you can have them without racking your brains over an article.'

Elsley looked up proudly

'I do not borrow, sir!'

'Well—I'll give you five for those pistols. They are of no use to you, and I shall want a spare brace for the East.'

'Ah! I forgot them. I spent my last money on them,' said he with a shudder, 'but I won't sell them to you at a fancy price. No dealings between gentleman and gentleman. I'll go to a shop, and get for them what they are worth.'

'Very good. I'll go with you if you like. I fancy I may get you a better price for them than you would yourself, being rather a knowing one about the pretty little barkers.' And Tom took his arm, and walked him quietly down into the street.

'If you ever go up those kennel-stairs again, friend,' said he to himself, 'my name's not Tom Thurnall.'

They walked to a gunsmith's shop in the Strand, where Tom had often dealt, and sold the pistols for some three pounds.

'Now then, let's go into 333, and get a mutton chop.'

'No.'

Elsley was too shy, he was 'not fit to be seen.'

'Come to my rooms, then, in the Adelphi, and have a wash and a shave. It will make you as fresh as a lark again, and then we'll send out for the catables, and have a quiet chat.'

Elsley did not say no. Thurnall took the thing as a matter of course, and he was too weak and tired to argue with him. Beside, there was a sort of relief in the company of a man who, though he knew all, chatted on to him cheerily and quietly, as if nothing had happened, who at least treated him as a sane man. From any one else he would have shrunk, lest they should find him out. But a companion, who knew the worst, at least saved him suspicion and dread. His weakness, now that the collapse after passion had come on, clung to any human friend. The very sound of Tom's clear sturdy voice seemed pleasant to him, after long solitude and silence. At least it kept off the hands of memory.

Tom, anxious to keep Elsley's mind employed on some subject which should not be painful, began chatting about the war and its prospects. Elsley soon caught the cue, and talked with wild energy and pathos, opium-fed, of the coming struggle between despotism and liberty, the arising of Poland and Hungary, and all the grand dreams which then haunted minds like his.

'By Jove!' said Tom, 'you are yourself again now. Why don't you put all that into a book?'

'I may, perhaps,' said Elsley proudly.

'And if it comes to that, why not come to the war, and see it for yourself? A new country—one of the finest in the world. New scenery, new actors,—why, Constantinople itself is a poem! Yes, there is another "Revolt of Islam" to be written yet. Why don't you become our war poet? Come and see the fighting, for there'll be plenty of it, let them say what they will. The old bear is not going to drop his dead donkey without a snap and a lug. Come along, and tell people what it's all really like. There will be a dozen Cockneys writing battle songs, I'll warrant, who never saw a man shot in their lives, not even a hare. Come and give us the real genuine grit of it,—for if you can't, who can?'

'It is a grand thought! The true war poets, after all, have been warriors themselves. Homer and Aeneas fought as well as sang, and sang because they fought. Old Homer, too,—who can believe that he had not hewn his way through the very battles which he describes, and seen every wound, every shape of agony? A noble thought, to go out with that army against the northern Anarch, singing in the van of battle, as Taillefer sang the song of Roland before William's knights, and to die like him, the proto-martyr of the crusade, with the melody yet upon one's lips!'

And his face blazed up with excitement.

'What a handsome fellow he is, after all, if there were but more of him!' said Tom to himself. 'I wonder if he'd fight, though, when the singing-fever was off him.'

He took Elsley upstairs into his bedroom, got him washed and shaved, and sent out the woman of the house for mutton chops and stout, and began himself setting out the luncheon table, while Elsley in the room within chanted to himself snatches of poetry.

'The notion has taken, he's composing a war song already, I believe.'

It actually was so, but Elsley's brain was weak and wandering, and he was soon silent and motionless so long, that Tom opened the door and looked in anxiously.

He was sitting on a chair, his hands fallen on his lap, the tears running down his face.

'Well?' asked Tom smilingly, not noticing the tears; 'how goes on the opera? I heard through the door the orchestra tuning for the prelude.'

Elsley looked up in his face with a puzzled piteous expression.

'Do you know, Thurnall, I fancy at moments that my mind is not what it was. Fancies flit from me as quickly as they come. I had twenty verses five minutes ago, and now I cannot recollect one.'

'No wonder,' thought Tom to himself. 'My dear fellow, recollect all that you have suffered with this neuralgia. Believe me, all you want is animal strength. Chops and porter will bring all the verses back, or better ones instead of them.'

He tried to make Elsley eat, and Elsley tried himself but failed. The moment the meat touched his lips he loathed it, and only courtesy prevented his leaving the room to escape the smell. The laudanum had done its work upon his digestion. He tried the porter, and drank a little. Then, suddenly stopping, he pulled out a phial, dropped a heavy dose of his poison into the porter, and tossed it off.

'Sold, am I?' said Tom to himself. 'He must have hidden the bottle as he came out of the room with me. Oh, the cunning of those opium-eaters! However, it will keep him quiet just now, and to Katon Square I must go.'

'You had better be quiet now, my dear fellow, after your dose, talking will only excite you. Settle yourself on my bed, and I'll be back in an hour.'

So he put Elsley on his bed, carefully removing razors and pistols (for he had still his fears of an outburst of passion), then locked him in, ran down into the Strand, threw himself into a cab for Katon Square, and asked for Valentina.

Campbell had been there already, so Tom took care to tell nothing which he had not told, expecting, and rightly, that he would not mention Elsley's having fired at him. Luena was still all but senseless, too weak even to ask for Elsley, to attempt any meeting between her and her husband would be madness.

'What will you do with the unhappy man, Mr Thurnall?'

'Keep him under my eye, day and night, till he is either rational again, or ---'

'Do you think that he may? Oh, my poor sister!'

'I think that he may yet end very sadly, madam. There is no use concealing the truth from you. All I can promise is, that I will treat him as my own brother.'

Valentina held out her fair hand to the young doctor. He stooped, and lifted the tips of her fingers to his lips.

'I am not worthy of such an honour, madam. I shall study to deserve it.' And he bowed himself out, the same sturdy, self-confident Tom, doing right, he hardly knew why, save that it was all in the way of business.

And now arose the puzzle, what to do with Elsley? He had set his heart on going down to Whitbury the next day. He had been in England nearly six months, and had not yet seen his father, his heart yearned, too, after the old place, and Mark Armsworth, and many an old friend, whom he might never see again.

'However, that fellow I must see to, come what will: business first and pleasure afterwards. If I make him all right if I even get him out of the world decently, I get the Scoutbush interest on my side—though I believe I have it already. Still, it's as well to lay people under as heavy an obligation as possible. I wish Miss Valentina had asked me whether Elsley wanted any money: it's expensive keeping him myself. However, poor thing, she has other matters to think of, and, I dare say, never knew the pleasures of an empty purse. Here we are! Three and-sixpence—eh, (ahman? I suppose you think I was born Saturday night? There's three shillings. Now, don't chaff me, my excellent friend, or you will find you have met your match, and a little more!'

And Tom hurried into his rooms, and found Elsley still sleeping.

He set to work, packing and arranging, for with him every moment found its business, and presently heard his patient call faintly from the next room.

'Thurnall!' said he, 'I have been a long journey. I have been to Whitbury once more, and followed my father about his garden, and sat upon my mother's knee. And she taught me one text, and no more. Over and over again she said it, as she looked down at me with still sad eyes, the same text which she spoke the day I left her for London. I never saw her again. "By this, my son, be admonished, of making of books there is no end, and much study is a weariness of the flesh. Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter. Fear God, and keep His commandments, for this is the whole duty of man." Yes, I will go down to Whitbury, and be a little child once more. I will take poor lodgings, and crawl out day by day, down the old lanes, along the old river bank, where I fed my soul with fair and mad dreams, and reconsider it all from the beginning,—and then die. No one need know me, and if they do, they need not be ashamed of me, I trust—ashamed that a poet has risen up among them, to speak words which have been heard across the globe. At least, they need never know my shame—never know that I have broken the heart of an angel, who gave herself to me, body and soul—attempted the life of a man whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose—never know that I have killed my own child—that a blacker brand than Cain's is on my brow!—Never know—Oh, my God, what care I? Let them know all, as long as I can have done with shams and affectations, dreams and vain ambitions, and be just my own self once more for one day, and then die!'

And he burst into convulsive weeping.

'No, Tom, do not comfort me! I ought to die, and I shall die. I cannot face her again, let her forget me, and find a husband who will—and be a father to the children whom I neglected! Oh, my darlings, my darlings! If I could but see you once again—but no! you too would ask me where I had been so long. You too would ask me—your innocent faces at least would—why I had killed your little brother!—Let me weep it out, Thunall, let me face it all! This very misery is a comfort, for it will kill me all the sooner.

'If you really mean to go to Whithury, my poor dear fellow,' said Tom at last, 'I will start with you to-morrow morning. For I too must go, I must see my father.'

'You will really?' asked Elsley, who began to cling to him like a child.

'I will indeed. Believe me, you are right, you will find friends there, and admirers too I know one.'

'You do?' asked he, looking up.

'Mary Arnsworth, the banker's daughter.'

'What! That nurse-proud, vulgar nun?'

'Don't be afraid of him. A true and more delicate heart don't beat. No one has more cause to say so than I. He will receive you with open arms, and need be told no more than is necessary, while, as his friend, you may defy gossip, and do just what you like.'

Tom slipped out that afternoon, paid Elsley's pittance of rent at his old lodgings, bought him a few necessary articles, and lent him, without saying anything, a few more. Elsley sat all day as one in a dream, moaning to himself at intervals, and following Tom vacantly with his eyes, as he moved about the room. Excitement, misery, and opium were fast wearing out body and mind, and Tom put him to bed that evening, as he would have put a child.

Tom walked out into the Strand to smoke in the fresh air, and think, in spite of himself, of that fair saint from whom he was so perversely flying. Gay girls shivered past him, looked round at him, but in vain, those two great sad eyes hung in his fancy, and he could see nothing else. Ah—if she had but given him back his money—why, what a fool he would have made of himself! Better as it was. He was meant to be a vagabond and an adventurer to the last, and perhaps to find at last the luck which had flitted away before him.

He passed one of the theatre doors; there was a group outside, more noisy and more earnest than such groups are wont to be, and ere he could pass through them, a shout from within rattled the doors with its mighty pulse, and seemed to shake the very walls. Another, and another!—What was it? Fire?

No. It was the news of Alma.

And the group surged to and fro outside, and talked, and questioned, and rejoiced, and smart gents forgot their vulgar pleasures, and looked for a moment as if they too could have fought—had fought—at Alma, and sinful girls forgot their shame, and looked more beautiful than they had done for many a day, as, beneath the flaring gas-light, their faces glowed for a while with noble enthusiasm and woman's sacred pity, while they questioned Tom, taking him for an officer, as to whether he thought there were many killed.

'I am no officer—but I have been in many a battle, and I know the Russians well, and have seen how they fight, and there is many a brave man killed, and many a one more will be.'

'Oh, does it hurt them much?' asked one poor thing.

'Not often,' quoth Tom.

'Thank God, thank God!' and she turned suddenly away, and with the impulsive nature of her class, burst into violent sobbing and weeping.

'Poor thing! perhaps among the men who fought and fell that day was he to whom she owed the curse of her young life; and after him her lonely heart went forth once more, faithful even in the lowest pit.'

'You are strange creatures, women, women!' thought Tom. 'but I know that many a year ago. Now then—the game is growing fast and furious, it seems. Oh, that I may find myself soon in the thickest of it!'

So said Tom Thunall, and so said Major Campbell, too, that night, as he prepared everything to start next morning to Southampton. 'The better the day, the better the deed,' quoth he. 'When a man is travelling to a better world, he need not be afraid of starting on a Sunday.'

CHAPTER XXV

THE BANKER AND HIS DAUGHTER

TOM and Elsley are safe at Whithury at last; and Tom, ere he has seen his father, has packed Elsley safe away in lodgings with an old dame whom he can trust. Then he asks his way to his father's new abode, a small old-fashioned house, with low bay windows jutting out upon the narrow pavement.

Tom stops, and looks in the window. His father is sitting close to it, in his arm-chair, his hands upon his knees, his face lifted to the sunlight, with chin slightly outstretched, and his pale eyes feeling for the light. The expression would have been painful, but for its perfect sweetness and resignation. His countenance is not, perhaps, a strong one; but its delicacy and calm, and the high forehead, and the long white locks, are most venerable. With a blind man's exquisite sense, he feels Tom's shadow fall on him, and starts, and calls him by name, for he has been expecting him, and thinking of nothing else all the morning, and takes for granted that it must be he.

In another moment Tom is at his father's side. What need to describe the sacred joy of those first few minutes, even if it were possible? But unrestrained tenderness between man and man, rare as it is, and, as it were, unaccustomed to itself, has no passionate flueney, no metaphor or poetry, such as man pours out to woman, and woman again to man. All its language lies in the tones, the looks, the little half-concealed gestures, hints which pass themselves off modestly in jest; and such was Tom's first interview with his father, till the old Isaac, having felt Tom's head and hands again and again, to be sure whether it were his very son or no, made him sit down by him, holding him still fast, and began—

'Now tell me, tell me, while Jane gets you something to eat. No, Jane, you mustn't talk to Master Tom yet, to bother about how much he's grown,—nonsense, I must have him all to myself, Jane. Go and get him some dinner. Now, Tom,' as if he was afraid of losing a moment, 'you have been a dear boy to write to me every week, but there are so many questions which only word of mouth will answer, and I have stored up dozens of them! I want to know what a coral reef really looks like, and if you saw any trepangs upon them? And what sort of strata is the gold really in? And you saw one of those giant rays, I want a whole hour's talk about the fellow. And what an old babbler I am! talking to you when you should be talking to me. Now begin. Let us have the trepangs first. Are they real Holothurians or not?'—

And Tom began, and told for a full half hour, interrupted then by some little comment of the old man's, which pivoted how prodigious was the memory within, imprisoned and forced to feed upon itself.

'You seem to know more about Australia than I do, father,' said Tom at last.

'No, child, but Mary Armesworth, God bless her! comes down here almost every evening to read all your letters to me, and she has been reading to me a book of Mrs. Lee's, Adventures in Australia, which reads like a novel, delicious book—to me at least. Why, there is her step outside, I do believe, and her father's with her!'

The lighter woman's step was mandible to Tom, but the heavy, deliberate waddle of the banker was not. He opened the house-door, and then the parlour-door, without knocking. But when he saw the visitor, he stopped on the threshold with outstretched arms.

'Hillo, ho! who have we here? Our prodigal son returned, with his pockets full of nuggets from the diggings. Oh, mum's the word, is it?' as Tom laid his finger on his lips. 'Come here, then, and let's have a look at you!' And he catches both Tom's hands in his, and almost shakes them off. 'I knew you were coming, old boy! Mary told me—she's in all the old man's secrets. Come along, Mary, and see your old playfellow. She has got a little fruit for the old gentleman. Mary, where are you? always colloquial with Jane.'

Mary comes in: a little dumpty body, with a yellow face, and a red nose, the smile of an angel, and a heart full of many little secrets of other people's—and of one great one of her own, which is no business of any man's—and with fifty thousand pounds as her portion, for she is an only child. But no man will touch that fifty thousand, for no one would marry me for myself,' says Mary, 'and no one shall marry me for my money.'

So she greets Tom shyly and humbly, without looking in his face, yet very cordially, and then slips away to deposit on the table a noble pineapple.

'A little bit of fruit from her greenhouse,' says the old man in a disparaging tone. 'and, oh, Jane, bring me a saucer. Here's a sprat I've just capered out of Hemmelford mill-pot, perhaps the doctor would like it fried for supper, if it's big enough not to fall through the gridiron.'

Jane, who knows Mark Armesworth's humour, brings in the largest dish in the house, and Mark pulls out of his basket a great three pound trout.

'Aha! my young rover, old Mark's right hand hasn't forgot its cunning, eh? And this is the month for them, hah! all quiet now. When fools go a shooting, wise men go a fishing! Eh? Come here, and look me over. How do I wear, eh? As like a Muscovy duck as ever, you young rogues! Do you recollect asking me, at the Club dinner, why I was like a Muscovy duck? Because I was a fat thing in green velvet, with a bald red head, that was always waddling about the river bank. Ah! those were the days! We'll have some more of them. Come up to-night and try the old '21 bin.'

'I must have him myself to-night, indeed I must, Mark,' says the doctor.

'All to yourself, you wretched old rogue!'

'Why, no.'

'We'll come down, then, Mary and I, and bring the '21 with us, and hear all his cock and bull stories. Full of travellers' lies as ever, eh? Well, I'll come and smoke my pipe with you. Always the same old Mark, my lad,' nudging Tom with his elbow, 'one fellow comes and borrows my money, and goes out and calls me a stingy old hunk because I won't let him cheat me, another comes, and cuts my janes, and drinks my port, goes home, and calls me a purse proud upstart, because he can't match 'em. Never mind, old Mark's old Mark, sound in the heart, and sound in the liver, just the same as thirty years ago, and will be till he takes his last quouset—'

'—And drops into his grubby nest.'

Bye, bye, doctor! Come, Mary!'

And out he toddled, with silent little Mary at his heels.

'Old Mark wears well, body and soul,' said Tom.

'He is a noble, generous fellow, and as delicate-hearted as a woman within, in spite of his conceit and roughness. Fifty and odd years now, Tom, have we been brothers, and I never found him change. And brothers we shall be, I trust, a few years more, till I see you back again from the East, comfortably settled. And then—'

'Don't talk of that, sir, please!' said Tom, quite quickly and sharply 'How ill poor Mary looks!'

'So they say, poor child, and one hears it in her voice. Ah, Tom, that girl is an angel, she has been to me daughter, doctor, clergyman, eyes, and library, and would have been nurse, too, if it had not been for making old Jane jealous. But she is ill. Some love affair, I suppose—'

'How quaint it is, that the father has kept all the animal vigour to himself, and transmitted none to the daughter.'

'He has not kept the soul to himself, Tom, or the eyes either. She will hang me in wild flowers, and talk to me about them, till I fancy I can see them as well as ever. Ah, well! It is a sweet world still, Tom, and there are sweet souls in it. A sweet world. I was too fond of looking at it once, I suppose, so God took away my sight, that I might learn to look at Him.' And the old man lay back in his chair, and covered his face with his handkerchief, and was quite still awhile. And Tom watched him, and thought that he would give all his cunning and power to be like that old man.

Then Jane came in, and laid the cloth on a coarse one enough, and Tom picked a cold mutton bone with a steel fork, and drank his pint of beer from the public-house, and lighted his father's pipe and then his own, and vowed that he had never dined so well in his life, and began his traveller's stories again.

And in the evening Mark came in, with a bottle of the '21 in his coat-tail pocket, and the three sat and chatted, while Mary brought out her work, and stitched, listening silently, till it was time to lead the old man upstairs.

Tom put his father to bed, and then made a hesitating request.

'There is a poor sick man whom I brought down with me, sir, if you could spare me half an hour. It really is a professional case, he is under my charge, I may say.'

'What is it, boy?'

'Well, landaunum and a broken heart.'

'Exercise and ammonia for the first. For the second, God's grace and the grave, and those latter medicines you can't exhibit, my dear boy. Well, as it is professional duty, I suppose you must. But don't exceed the hour, I shall be awake till you return, and then you must talk me to sleep.'

So Tom went out and homeward with Mark and Mary, for their roads lay together, and as he went, he thought good to tell them somewhat of the history of John Briggs, alias Elsley Vavasour.

'Poor fool!' said Mark, who listened in silence to the end. 'Why didn't he mind his bottles, and just do what Heaven sent him to do? Is he in want of the rhino, Tom?'

'He had not five shillings left after he had paid his fare, and he refuses to ask his wife for a farthing.'

'Quite right—very proper spirit.' And Mark walked on in silence a few minutes.

'I say, Tom, a fool and his money are soon parted. There's a five-pound note for him, you begging, insinuating dog, and be hanged to you both! I shall die in the workhouse at this rate.'

'Oh, father, you will never miss—'

'Who told you I thought I should, pray? Don't you go giving another five pounds out of your pocket-money behind my back, ma'am. I know your tricks of old. Tom, I'll come and see the poor beggar to-morrow with you, and call him Mr Vavasour—Lord Vavasour, if he likes—if you'll warrant me against laughing in his face.' And the old man did laugh, till he stopped and held his sides again.

'Oh, father, father, don't be so cruel. Remember how wretched the poor man is.'

'I can't think of anything but old Bolus's boy turned poet. Why did you tell me, Tom, you had fellow? It's too much for a man at my time of life, and after his dinner too.'

And with that he opened the little gate by the side of the grand one, and turned to ask Tom—

'Won't come in, boy, and have one more cigar?'

'I promised my father to be back as quickly as possible.'

'Good-lul—that's the plan to go on—'

'You'll be churchwarden in five all's over, And so arrive at wealth and fame.'

Instead of writing p-o-o-t-y! Do you recollect that morning, and the black draught? Oh dear, my side!

And Tom heard him keeking to himself up the garden walk to his house, went off to see that Elsley was safe, and then home, and slept like a top, no wonder, for he would have done so the night before his execution.

And what was little Mary doing all the while?

She had gone up to the room, after telling her father, with a kiss, not to forget to say his prayers. And then she fed her canary bird, and made up the Persian cat's bed, and then sat long at the open window, gazing out over the shadow-dappled lawn, away to the poplars sleeping in the moonlight, and the shining silent stream, and the shining silent stars, till she seemed to become as one of them, and a quiet heaven within her eyes took counsel with the quiet heaven above. And then she drew in suddenly, as if stung by some random thought, and shut the window. A picture hung over her mantelpiece—a portrait of her mother, who had been a country beauty in her time. She glanced at it, and then at the looking-glass. Would she have given her fifty thousand pounds to have exchanged her face for such a face as that?

She caught up her little Thomas à Kempis, marked through and through with lines and references, and sat and read steadfastly for an hour and more. That was her school, as it has been the school of many a noble soul. And, for some cause or other, that stinging thought returned no more, and she knelt and prayed like a little child; and like a little child slept sweetly all the night, and was away before breakfast the next morning, after feeding the canary and the cat, to old women who worshipped her as their ministering angel, and said, looking after her, 'That dear Miss Mary, pity she is so plain! Such a match as she might have made! But she'll be handsome enough when she is a blessed angel in heaven.'

Al! true sisters of mercy, whom the world sneers at as 'old maids,' if you pour out on cats and dogs and parrots a little of the love which is yearning to spend itself on children of your own flesh and blood! As long as such as you walk this lower world, one needs no Butler's Analogy to prove to us that there is another world, where such as you will have a fuller and a fairer (I dare not say a juster) portion.

Next morning Mark started with Tom to call on Elsley, chatting and pushing all the way.

'I'll butter him, trust me. Nothing comforts a poor beggar like a bit of praise when he's down, and all fellows that take to writing are as greedy after it as trout after the drape, even if they only scribble in county newspapers. I've watched them when I've been electioneering, my boy!'

'Only,' said Tom, 'don't be angry with him if he is proud and peevish. The poor fellow is all but mad with misery.'

'Poh! quarrel with him? Whom did I ever quarrel with? If he barks, I'll stop his mouth with a good dinner. I suppose he's gentleman enough to invite!'

'As much a gentleman as you and I, not of the very first water, of course. Still, he eats like other people, and don't break many glasses during a sitting. Think! he couldn't have been a very great end to marry a nobleman's daughter!'

'Why, no. Speaks well for him, that, considering his breeding. He must be a very clever fellow to have caught the trick of the thing so soon.'

'And so he is, a very clever fellow, too clever by half, and a very fine-hearted fellow, too, in spite of his conceit and his temper. But that don't prevent his being an awful fool!'

'You speak like a book, Tom!' said old Mark, clapping him on the back. 'Look at me! no one can say I was ever troubled with genius, but I can show my money, pay my way, eat my dinner, kill my trout, hunt my hounds, help a lame dog over a stile' (which was Mark's phrase for doing a generous thing), 'and thank God for all, and who wants more, I should like to know! But here we are—you go up first!'

They found Elsley crouched up over the empty grate, his head in his hands, and a few scraps of paper by him, on which he had been trying to scribble. He did not look up as they came in, but gave a sort of impatient half-turn, as if angry at being disturbed. Tom was about to announce the banker; but he announced himself

'Come to do myself the honour of calling on you, Mr Vavasour. I am sorry to see you so poorly, I hope our Whitbury air will set all right.'

'You mistake me, sir, my name is Briggs!'

said Elsley, without turning his head, but a moment after he looked up angrily.

'Mr Arnsworth! I beg your pardon, sir, but what brings you here? Are you come, sir, to use the rich successful man's right, and lecture me in my misery?'

'Pon my word, sir, you must have forgotten old Mark Arnsworth, indeed, if you fancy him capable of any such dirt. No, sir, I came to pay my respects to you, sir, hoping that you'd come up and take a family dinner. I could do no less, run on the banker, seeing that Elsley was preparing a peevish answer, 'considering the honour that, I hear, you have been to your native town. A very distinguished person, our friend Tom tells me, and we ought to be proud of you, and behave to you as you deserve, for I am sure we don't send too many clever fellows out of Whitbury.'

'Would that you had never sent me!' said Elsley in his bitter way.

'Ah, sir, that's matter of opinion! You would never have been heard of down here, never have had justice done you, I mean, for heard of you have been. There's my daughter has read your poems again and again—always quoting them, and very pretty they sound too. Poetry is not in my line, of course, still, it's a credit to a man to do anything well, if he has the gift, and she tells me that you have it, and plenty of it. And though she's no hue lady, thank Heaven, I'll back her for good sense against any woman. Come up, sir, and judge for yourself if I don't speak the truth, she will be delighted to meet you, and bade me say so.'

By this time good Mark had talked himself out of breath, and Elsley flushing up, as of old, at a little praise, began to stammer an excuse. 'His nerves were so weak, and his spirits so broken with late troubles.'

'My dear sir, that's the very reason I want you to come. A bottle of port will cure the nerves, and a pleasant chat the spirits. Nothing like forgetting all for a little time, and then to it again with a fresh lease of strength, and beat it at last like a man.'

'Too late, my dear sir, I must pay the penalty of my own folly,' said Elsley, really won by the man's cordiality.

'Never too late, sir, while there's life left in us. And,' he went on in a gentler tone, 'if we all were to pay for our own follies, or lie down and die when we saw them coming full ery at our heels, where would any one of us be by now? I have been a fool in my time, young gentleman, more than once or twice, and that too when I was old enough to be your father, and down I went, and deserved what I got, but my rule always was—fight fair, fall soft, know when you've got enough, and don't cry out when you've got it: but just go home, train again.

and say—better luck next fight' And so old Mark's sermon ended (as most of them did) in somewhat Socratic allegory, savouring rather of the market than of the study, but Elsley understood him, and looked up with a smile.

'You too are somewhat of a poet in your way, I see, sir.'

'I never thought to live to hear that, sir. I can't doubt now that you are cleverer than your neighbours, for you have found out something which they never did. But you will come?—for that's my business.'

Elsley looked inquiringly at Tom, he had learnt now to consult his eye, and lean on him like a child. Tom looked a stout yes, and Elsley said languidly—

'You have given me so much flow and good advice in a few minutes, sir, that I must really do myself the pleasure of coming and hearing more.'

'Well done, our side!' cried old Mark. 'Dinner at half-past five. No London late hours here, sir. Miss Arnsworth will be out of her mind when she hears you're coming.'

And off he went.

'Do you think he'll come up to the scratch, Tom?'

'I am very much afraid his courage will fail him. I will see him again, and bring him up with me; but now, my dear Mr. Arnsworth, do remember one thing, that if you go on with him at your usual rate of hospitality, the man will as surely be drunk, as his nerves and brain are all but ruined, and if he is so, he will most probably destroy himself to-morrow morning.'

'Destroy himself?'

'He will. The shame of making a fool of himself just now before you will be more than he could bear. So be stingy for once. He will not wish for it unless you press him, but if he talks (and he will talk after the first half-hour), he will forget himself, and half a bottle will make him mad, and then I won't answer for the consequences.'

'Good gracious! why, these poets want as tender handling as a bag of gunpowder over the fire.'

'You speak like a book there in your turn.' And Tom went home to his father.

He returned in due time. A new difficulty had arisen. Elsley, under the excitement of expectation, had gone out and dined to his landanum—so will an unhealthy craving degrade a man!—of old Bolus himself, who luckily did not recognise him. He had taken his fullest dose, and was now unable to go anywhere or do anything. Tom did not disturb him, but went away, sorely perplexed, and very much minded to tell a white lie to Arnsworth, in whose eyes this would be an offence—not unpardonable, for nothing with him was unpardonable, save lying or cruelty—but very grievous. If a man had drunk too much wine in his house, he would have simply kept his eye on him afterwards, as a fool who did not know when he had his 'quotum'; but laudanum drinking—involving, too, the breaking of an engagement, which, well managed, might have been of immense use to Elsley—was a very different matter. So Tom knew not what to say or do, and not knowing, determined to wait on Providence, smartened himself as best he could, went up to the great house, and found Miss Mary.

'I'll tell her. She will manage it somehow, if she is a woman, much more if she is an angel, as my father says.'

Mary looked very much shocked and grieved, answered hardly a word, but said at last, 'Come in while I go and see my father.' He came into the smart drawing-room, which he could see was seldom used, for Mary lived in her own room, her father in his counting house, or in his 'den'. In ten minutes she came down. Tom thought she had been crying.

'I have settled it. Poor unhappy man! We will talk of something more pleasant. Tell me about your shipwreck, and that place—Aberlona, is it not? What a pretty name!'

Tom told her, wondering then, and wondering long afterwards, how she had 'settled it' with her father. She chatted on artlessly enough, till the old man came in, and to dinner, in capital humour, without saying one word of Elsley.

'How has the old lion been tamed?' thought Tom. 'The two greatest affronts you could offer him in old times were, to break an engagement, and to despise his good cheer.' He did not know what the quiet oil on the waters of such a spirit as Mary's can effect.

The evening passed pleasantly enough till nine, in chatting over old times, and listening to the history of every extraordinary trout and fox which had been killed within twenty miles, when the footboy entered with a somewhat scared face.

'Please, sir, is Mr. Vavasour here?'

'Here? Who wants him?'

'Mrs. Brown, sir, in Hemmelford Street. Says he lodges with her, and has been to seek for him at Dr. Thurnall's.'

'I think you had better go, Mr. Thurnall,' said Mary quietly.

'Indeed you had, boy. Bother poets; and the day they first began to breed in Whitbury! Such an evening spent! Have a cup of coffee? No? then a glass of sherry?'

Out went Tom. Mrs. Brown had been up, and seen him seemingly sleeping, then had heard him run downstairs hurriedly. He passed her in the passage, looking very wild. 'Seemed, sir, just like my nery's wife's brother, Will Ford, before he made away with hisself.'

Tom goes off post-haste, revolving many things in a crafty heart. Then he stops for Bolus's shop. Bolus is at 'The Angler's Arms', but his assistant is in.

'Did a gentleman call here just now, in a long cloak, with a felt wide-awake?'

'Yes.' And the assistant looks confused enough for Tom to reform—

'And you sold him laudanum?'

'Why—ah—'

'And you had sold him landanum already this afternoon, you young rascal! How dare you, twice in six hours! I'll hold you responsible for the man's life!'

'You dare call me a rascal!' blusters the youth, terror-stricken at finding how much Tom knows.

'I am a member of the College of Surgeons,' says Tom, recovering his coolness, 'and have just been dining with Mr. Annsworth. I suppose you know him?'

The assistant shook in his shoes at the name of that terrible justice of the peace and of the war also, and meekly and contently he replied—

'Oh, sir, what shall I do?'

'You're in a very neat scrape, you could not have feathered your nest better,' says Tom, quietly filling his pipe, and thinking 'As you behave now, I will get you out of it, or leave you to—you know what, as well as I. Get your hat.'

He went out, and the youth followed trembling, while Tom formed his plans in his mind.

'The wild beast goes home to his lair to die, and so may he, for I fear it's life and death now. I'll try the house where he was born. Somewhere in Water Lane it is, I know.'

And toward Water Lane he hurried. It was a low-lying offshoot of the town, leading along the water-meadows, with a straggling row of houses on each side, the perennial haunts of fever and ague. Before them, on each side of the road, and fringed with pollard willows and tall poplars, ran a tiny branch of the Wharf, to feed some mill below, and spread out, meanwhile, into ponds and mires full of offal and duckweed and rank floating grass. A thick mist hung knee-deep over them, and over the gardens right and left, and as Tom came down on the lane from the main street above, he could see the mist spreading across the water-meadows and reflecting the moonbeams like a lake, and as he walked into it, he felt as if he were walking down a well. And he hurried down the lane, looking out anxiously ahead for the long cloak.

At last he came to a better sort of house. That might be it. He would take the chance. There was a man of the middle class, and two or three women, standing at the gate. He went in.

'Bray, sir, did a medical man named Briggs ever live here?'

'What do you want to know that for?'

'Why?'—Tom thought matters were too serious for delicacy—'I am looking for a gentleman, and thought he might have come here.'

'And so he did, if you mean one in a queer hat and a cloak.'

'How long since?'

'Why, he came up our garden an hour or more ago, walked right into the parlour without any—your leave, or by your leave, and stared at us all round like one out of his mind, and so away, as soon as ever I asked him what he was at—'

'Which way?'

'To the river, I expect. I ran out, and saw him go down the lane, but I was not going far by night alone with any such strange customers.'

'Lend me a lantern, then, for Heaven's sake!'

The lantern is lent, and Tom starts again down the lane.

Now to search! At the end of the lane is a cross road parallel to the river. A broad still ditch lies beyond it, with a little bridge across, where one gets minkows for bait, then a broad water-meadow, then silver White.

The bridge-gate is open. Tom hurries across the road to it. The lantern shows him fresh footmarks going into the meadow. Forward!

Up and down in that meadow for an hour or more did Tom and the trembling youth beat like a brace of pointer dogs, stumbling into grips and over sleeping cows, and more than once stopping short just in time, as they were walking into some broad and deep feeder.

Almost in despair, and after having searched down the river bank for full two hundred yards, Tom was on the point of returning, when his eye rested on a part of the stream where the mist lay higher than usual, and let the reflection of the moonlight off the water reach his eye, and in the moonlight ripples, close to the farther bank of the river—what was that black lump?

Tom knew the spot well, the river there is very broad, and very shallow, flowing round low islands of gravel and turf. It was very low just now too, as it generally is in October, there could not be four inches of water where the black lump lay, but on this side nearest him the water was full knee-deep.

The thing, whatever it was, was forty yards from him, and it was a cold night for wading. It might be a hassock of rushes, a tuft of the great water-dock, a dead dog, one of the 'hangs' with which the club-water was studded, torn up and stranded—but yet to Tom it had not a canny look.

'As usual! Here am I getting wet, dirty, and miserable, about matters which are not the slightest concern of mine! I believe I shall end by getting hanged or shot in somebody else's place, with this confounded spirit of meddling. Yeh! how cold the water is!'

For in he went, the grumbling honest dog, stepped across to the black lump, and lifted it up hastily enough—for it was Elsie Vavasour Drowned!

No. But wet through, and senseless from muddled cold and landanum.

Whether he had meant to drown himself, and lighting on the shallow, had stumbled on till he fell exhausted, or whether he had merely blundered into the stream, careless whither he went, Tom knew not, and never knew; for Elsie himself could not recollect.

Tom took him in his arms, carried him ashore and up through the water-meadow, borrowed a blanket and a wheelbarrow at the nearest cottage, wrapped him up, and made the offending surgeon's assistant wheel him to his lodgings.

He sat with him there an hour, and then entered Mark's house again with his usual composed face, to find Mark and Mary sitting up in great anxiety.

'Mr Arnsworth, does the telegraph work at this time of night?'

'I'll make it, if it is wanted. But what's the matter?'

'You will indeed?'

'Gad, I'll go myself and kick up the station-master. What's the matter?'

'That if poor Mrs Vavasour wishes to see her husband alive, she must be here in four-and-twenty hours. I'll tell you all presently——'

'Mary, my coat and comforter!' cries Mark, jumping up.

'And, Mary, a pen and ink to write the message,' says Tom.

'Oh! cannot I be of any use?' says Mary.

'No, you angel!'

'You must not call me an angel, Mr Thurnall. After all, what can I do which you have not done already?'

Tom started. Grace had once used to him the very same words. By the bye, what was it in the two women which made them so like? Certainly, neither face nor fortune. Something in the tones of their voices.

'Ah! if Grace had Mary's fortune, or Mary Grace's face!' thought Tom, as he hurried back to Elsley, and Mark rushed down to the station.

Elsley was conscious when he returned, and only too conscious. All night he screamed in agonies of rheumatic fever, by the next afternoon he was falling fast, his heart was affected, and Tom knew that he might die any hour.

The evening train brings two ladies, Valentinia and Lucia. At the risk of her life, the poor faithful wife has come.

A gentleman's carriage is waiting for them, though they have ordered none, and as they go through the station-room, a plain little well-dressed body comes humbly up to them—

'Is either of these ladies Mrs. Vavasour?'

'Yes! I—I—is he alive?' gasps Lucia.

'Alive, and better! and expecting you.'

'Better!—expecting me!' almost shrieks she, as Valentinia and Mary (for it is she) help her to the carriage. Mary puts them in, and turns away.

'Are you not coming too?' asks Valentinia, who is puzzled.

'No thank you, madam, I am going to take a walk. John, you know where to drive these ladies.'

Little Mary does not think it necessary to say that she, with her father's carriage, has been down to two other afternoon trains, upon the chance of finding them.

But why is not Frank Headley with them, when he is needed most? And why are Valentinia's eyes more red with weeping than even her sister's sorrow need have made them?

Because Frank Headley is rolling away in a French railway on his road to Marseilles, and to what Heaven shall find for him to do.

Yes, he is gone Eastward. He among the many, will he come Westward. He again among the few?

They are at the door of Elsley's lodgings now. Tom Thurnall meets them there, and bows them upstairs silently. Lucia is so weak that she has to cling to the banister a moment; and then, with a strong shudder, the spirit conquers the flesh, and she hurries up before them both.

It is a small low room—Valentinia had expected that. But she had expected, too, confusion and wretchedness for a note from Major Campbell, ere he started, had told her of the condition in which Elsley had been found. Instead, she finds neatness—even gaiety, fresh damask linen, comfortable furniture, a vase of hothouse flowers, while the air is full of cool perfumes. No one is likely to tell her that Mary has furnished all at Tom's hint—'We must smarten up the place, for the poor wife's sake. It will take something off the shock, and I want to avoid shocks for her.'

So Tom had worked with his own hands that morning, arranging the room as carefully as any woman, with that fine doctor's forethought and consideration, which often issues in the loftiest, because the most unconscious, benevolence.

He paused at the door.

'Will you go in?' whispered he to Valentinia, in a tone which meant—'you had better not.'

'Not yet—I dare say he is too weak.'

Lucia darted in, and Tom shut the door behind her, and waited at the stair-head. 'Better,' thought he, 'to let the two poor creatures settle their own concerns. It must end soon, in any case.'

Lucia rushed to the bedside, drew back the curtains—

'Tom!' moaned Elsley.

'Not Tom!—Lucia!'

'Lucia!—Lucia St. Just!' answered he, in a low abstracted voice, as if trying to recollect.

'Lucia Vavasour!—your Lucia!'

Elsley slowly raised himself upon his elbow, and looked into her face with a sad inquiring gaze.

'Elsley—darling Elsley!—don't you know me?'

'Yes, very well indeed; better than you know me. I am not Vavasour at all. My name is Briggs—John Briggs, the apothecary's son, come home to Whitbury to die.'

She did not hear, or did not care for those last words.

'Elsley! I am your wife!—your own wife!—who never loved any one but you—never, never!'

'Yes, my wife at least!—Curse them, that they cannot deny!' said he, in the same abstracted voice.

'Oh God! is he mad?' thought she 'Elsley, speak to me!—I am your Lucia—your love—'

And she tore off her bonnet, and threw herself beside him on the bed and clasped him in her arms, murmuring—'Your wife! who never loved any one but you!'

Slowly his frozen heart and frozen brain melted beneath the warmth of her great love but he did not speak off he passed his weak arm round her neck, and she felt that his cheek was wet with tears, while she murmured on, like a cooing dove, the same sweet words again—

'Call me your love once more, and I shall know that all is past'

'Then call me no more Elsley, love!' whispered he 'Call me John Bugge, and let us have done with shams for ever'

'No, you are my Elsley—my Vavasour I and I am your wife once more!' and the poor thing fondled his head as it lay upon the pillow 'My own Elsley, to whom I gave myself, body and soul, for whom I would die now—oh, such a death!—any death!'

'How could I doubt you?—soul that I was!'

'No, it was all my fault! It was all my odious temper! But we will be happy now, will we not?'

Elsley smiled sadly, and began laughing. Yes, they would take a farm, and he would plough, and sow, and be of some use before he died 'But promise me one thing!' cried he, with sudden strength

'What?'

'That you will go home and burn all the poetry—all the manuscripts, and never let the children write a verse—a verse—when I am dead!' And his head sank back, and his jaw dropped

'He is dead!' cried the poor impulsive creature, with a shudder which brought in Tom and Valentin.

'He is not dead, madam, but you must be very gentle with him, if we are to—'

Tom saw that there was little hope

'I will do anything—only save him!—save him! Mr Thurnall, till I have atoned for all'

'You have little enough to atone for, madam,' said Tom, as he hurried himself about the sufferer. He saw that all would soon be over, and would have had Mrs Vavasour withdraw, but she was so really good a nurse as long as she could control herself, that he could hardly spare her

So they sat together by the sick bedside, as the short hours passed into the long, and the long hours into the short again, and the October dawn began to shine through the shutterless window.

A weary eventless night it was, a night as of many years, as worse and worse grew the weak frame, and Tom looked alternately at the heaving chest, and shortening breath, and rattling throat, and then at the pale still face of the lady 'Better she should sit by,' thought he, 'and watch him till she is tired out. It will come on her the more gently, after all! He will die at sunrise, as so many die'

At last he began gently feeling for Elsley's pulse. Her eye caught his movement, and she half sprang up, but at a gesture from him she sank quietly on her knees, holding her husband's hand in her own.

Elsley turned toward her once, ere the film of death had fallen, and looked her full in the face, with his beautiful eyes full of love. Then the eyes paled and faded, but still they sought for her painfully long after she had buried her head in the coverlet, unable to bear the sight

And so vanished away Elsley Vavasour, poet and genius, into his own place.

'Let us pray,' said a deep voice from behind the curtain—it was Mark Armsworth's. He had come over with the first dawn, to bring the ladies food, had slipped upstairs to ask what news, found the door open, and entered in time to see the last gasp.

Lucia kept her head still bowed; and Tom, for the first time for many a year, knelt, as the old banker commended to God the soul of one dear brother just departing this life. Then Mark ghided quietly downstairs, and Valentin, rising, tried to lead Mrs Vavasour away

But then broke out in all its wild passion the Irish temperament. Let us pass it over, why try to earn a little credit by depicting the agony and the weakness of a sister?

At last Thurnall got her downstairs. Mark was there still, having sent off for his carriage. He quietly put her arm through his, led her oil, worn out and nursing, drove her home, delivered her and Valentin into Mary's keeping, and then asked Tom to stay and sit with him

'I hope I've no very bad conscience, boy, but Mary's busy with the poor young thing, mere child she is, too, to go through such a night, and, somehow, I don't like to be left alone after such a sight as that!'

'Tom!' said Mark, as they sat smoking in silence, after breakfast, in the study. 'Tom!'

'Yes, sir!'

'That was an awful deathbed, Tom!'

Tom was silent

'I don't mean that he died hard, as we say, but so young, Tom! And I suppose poets' souls are worth something, like other people's—perhaps more. I can't understand em but my Mary seems to, and people, like her, who think a poet the finest thing in the world. I laugh at it all when I am angry, and call it sentiment and cant but I believe that they are nearer heaven than I am though I think they don't quite know where heaven is, nor where' (with a wicked wink, in spite of the sadness of his tone) —'where they themselves are either'

'I'll tell you, sir! I have seen men enough die—we doctors are hardened to it; but I have seen unprofessional deaths—men we didn't kill ourselves, I have seen men drowned, shot, hanged, run over, and worse deaths than that, sir, too,—and somehow, I never felt any death like that man's. Granted, he began by trying to set the world right, when he hadn't yet set himself right, but wasn't it some credit to see that the world was wrong?

'I don't know that. The world's a very good world.'

'To you and me, but there are men who have higher notions than I of what this world ought to be, and, for aught I know, they are right. That Abielva curate, Headley, had, and so had Briggs, in his own way. I thought him once only a poor discontented devil, who quarrelled with his bread and butter because he hadn't teeth to eat it with, but there was more in the fellow, coxcomb as he was. "Tisn't often that I let that croaking old boggy, Maulm-night-have been, trouble me, but I cannot help thinking that if, fifteen years ago, I had listened to his vapourings more, and bailed him about them less, he might have been here still.'

'You wouldn't have been, then. Well for you that you didn't catch his fever.'

'And write verses too? Don't make me laugh, sir, on such a day as this, I always comfort myself with—"It's no business of mine," but, somehow, I can't do so just now.' And Tom sat silent, more softened than he had been for years.

'Let's talk of something else,' said Mark at last. 'You had the cholera very bad down there, I hear?'

'Oh, sharp, but short,' said Tom, who disliked any subject which brought Grace to his mind.

'Any on my lord's estate with the queer name?'

'Not a one. We stopped the devil out there, thanks to his lordship.'

'So did we here. We were very near in for it, though, I fancy. At least, I chose to fancy so—thought it a good opportunity to clean Whinbry once for all.'

'It's just like you. Well?'

'Well, I offered the Town Council to drain the whole town at my own expense, if they'd let me have the sewage. And that only made things worse, for as soon as the beggars found out the sewage was worth anything, they were down on me, as if I wanted to do them. I, Mark Armaworth!—and would sooner let half the town rot with an epidemic, than have reason to fancy I'd made any money out of them. So a pretty fight I had, for half a dozen meetings, till I called in my lord, and, sir, he came down by the next express, like a crump, all the way from town, and gave them such a piece of his mind—was going to have the Board of Health down, and turn on the Government tap, commissioners and all, and cost 'em hundreds till the fellows shook in their shoes,—and so I conquered, and here we are, as clean as a nut—and a fig for the cholera!—except down in Water Lane, which I don't know what to do with, for if tradesmen will run up houses on spec in a water-meadow, who can stop them? There ought to be a law for it, say I, but I say a good many things in the twelve months that nobody minds. But, my dear boy, if one man in a town has pluck and money, he may do it. It'll cost him a few. I've had to pay the main part myself, after all, but I suppose God will make it up to a man somehow. That's old Mark's faith, at least. Now I want to talk to you about yourself. My lord comes into town to-day, and you must see him.'

'Why, then? He can't help me with the Bash-bazouks, can he?'

'Bash-biddles! I say, Tom, the more I think over it, the more it won't do. It's throwing yourself away. They say that Turkish contagion is getting on terribly ill.'

'More need of me to make them well.'

'Hang it—I mean—hasn't justice done it, and so on. The papers are full of it.'

'Well,' quoth Tom, 'and why should it?'

'Why, man alive, if England spends all this money on the men, she ought to do her duty by them.'

'I don't see that. As Pecksniff says, "If England expects every man to do his duty, she's very sanguine, and will be much disappointed." They don't intend to do their duty by her, any more than I do, so why should she do her duty by them?'

'Don't intend to do your duty?'

'I'm going out because England's money is necessary to me, and England hires me because my skill is necessary to her. I didn't think of duty when I settled to go, and why should she? I'll get all out of her I can in the way of pay and practice, and she in my get all she can out of me in the way of work. As for being ill-used, I never expect to be anything else in this life. I'm sure I don't care, and I'm sure she don't, so live and let live, talk plain truth, and leave bunkum for right hononables who keep their places thereby. Give me another word.'

'Queer old philosopher you are, but go you shan't!'

'Go I will, sir, don't stop me. I've my reasons, and they're good ones enough.'

The conversation was interrupted by the servant,—Lord Munchampstead was waiting at Mr. Armaworth's office.

'Early lord, his lordship, and gets the worn accordingly,' says Mark, as he hurries off to attend on his ideal hero. 'You come over to the shop in half an hour, mind.'

'But why?'

'Unsound you, sir! you talk of having your reasons. I love mine.'

Mark looked quite cross, so Tom gave way, and went in due time to the bank.

Standing with his back to the fire in Mark's inner room, he saw the old cotton prince.

'And a prince he looks like,' quoth Tom to himself, as he waited in the bank outside, and looked through the glass screen. 'How well the old man wears! I wonder how many fresh thousands he has made since I saw him last, seven years ago.'

And a very noble person Lord Munchampstead!

did look; one to whom hats went off almost without their owners' will, tall and portly, with a soldier-like air of dignity and command, which was relieved by the good-nature of the countenance. Yet it was a good-nature which would stand no trifling. The jaw was deep and broad, though finely shaped, the mouth firm set, the nose slightly aquiline, the brow of great depth and height, though narrow,—altogether a Julius Cæsar's type of head, that of a man born to rule self, and therefore to rule all he met.

Tom looked over his dress, not forgetting, like a true Englishman, to mark what sort of boots he wore. They were boots not quite fashionable, but carefully cleaned on trees, trousers strapped tightly over them, which had adopted the military stripe, but retained the slit at the ankle which was in vogue forty years ago; frock coat with a velvet collar, buttoned up, but not too far, high and tight blue cravat below an immense shirt collar, a certain care and richness of dress throughout, but soberly behind the fashion while the hat was a very shabby and broken one, and the whip still more shabby and broken, all which indicated to Tom that his lordship let his tailor and his valet dress him, and though not unaware that it behoved him to set out his person as it deserved, was far too fine a gentleman to trouble himself about looking fine.

Mark looks round, sees Tom, and calls him in.

'Mr Thurnall, I am glad to meet you, sir. You did me good service at Pentremochyn, and did it cheaply. I was agreeably surprised, I confess, at receiving a bill for ten pounds seven shillings and sixpence, where I expected one or twenty or thirty.'

'I charged according to what my time was really worth there, my lord. I heartily wish it had been worth more.'

'No doubt,' says my lord, in the blindest, but the driest tone.

Some men would have, under a sense of Tom's merits, sent him a check off-hand for five and twenty pounds, but that is not Lord Minchampstead's way of doing business. He had paid simply the sum asked, but he had set Tom down in his memory as a man whom he could trust to do good work, and to do it cheaply, and now—

'You are going to join the Turkish contingent?'

'I am.'

'You know that part of the world well, I believe?'

'Intimately.'

'And the languages spoken there?'

'By no means all. Russian and Tartar well, Turkish tolerably, with a smattering of two or three Circassian dialects.'

'Humph! A fair list. Any Persian?'

'Only a few words.'

'Humph! If you can learn one language, I presume you can learn another. Now, Mr Thurnall, I have no doubt that you will do your duty in the Turkish contingent.'

Tom bowed.

'But I must ask you if your resolution to join it is fixed?'

'I only join it because I can get no other employment at the seat of war.'

'Humph! You wish to go, then, in any case, to the seat of war?'

'Certainly.'

'No doubt you have sufficient reasons. . . . Armesworth, thus puts the question in a new light.'

Tom looked round at Mark, and, behold, his face bore a ludicrous mixture of anger and disappointment and perplexity. He seemed to be trying to make signals to Tom, and to be afraid of doing so openly before the great man.

'He is as wilful and as foolish as a gull, my lord, and I've told him so.'

'Everybody knows his own business best, Armesworth, Mr Thurnall, have you any fancy for the post of Queen's messenger?'

'I should esteem myself only too happy as one.'

'They are not to be obtained now as easily as they were fifty years ago, and are given, as you may know, to a far higher class of men than they were formerly. But I shall do my best to obtain you one, when an opportunity offers.'

Tom was beginning his profusest thanks for what was not his fortune made; but Lord Minchampstead stopped him with an uplified finger.

'And, meanwhile, there are foreign employments of which neither those who bestow them, nor those who accept them, are expected to talk much, but for which you, if I am rightly informed, would be especially fitted.'

Tom bowed, and his face spoke a hurried assent.

'Very well, if you will come over to Minchampstead to-morrow, I will give you letters to friends of mine in town. I trust that they may give you a better opportunity than the Bash Lazons will, of displaying that courage, address, and self command which, I understand, you possess in so uncommon a degree. Good morning!' And forth the great man went.

Most opposite were the actions of the two whom he had left behind him.

Tom dances about the room, hurrahing in a whisper—

'My fortune's made! The secret service! Oh, what bliss! The thing I've always longed for!'

Mark dashes himself desperately back in his chair, and shoots his angry legs straight out, almost tripping up 'I am.'

'You abominable ass! You have done it with a vengeance! Why, he has been pumping me about you this month! One word from you to say you'd have stayed, and he was going to make you agent for all his Cornish property!'

'Don't he wish he may get it? Catch a fish climbing trees! Catch me staying at home when I can serve my Queen and my country, and find a sphere for the full development of my talents! Oh, won't I be as wise as a serpent? Won't I be complimented by himself as his best lurcher, worth any ten needy Poles, greedy Armenians, traitors, renegades, rag-tag and bob-tail! I'll shave my head to-morrow, and buy me an assortment of wigs of every hue!"

"Take care, Tom Thurnall! After pain comes a fall, and he who digs a pit may fall into it himself! Has this morning's deathbed given you no lesson that it is as well not to cast ourselves down from where God has put us, for whatsoever seemingly fine ends of ours, lest, doing so, we tempt God once too often?"

Your father quoted that text to John Briggs, here, many years ago! Might he not quote it now to you? True, not one word of murmuring, not even of regret, or fear, has passed his good old lips about your self-willed plan. He has such utter confidence in you, such utter carelessness about himself, such utter faith in God, that he can let you go without a sigh! But will you make his courage an excuse for your own rashness? Again, beware, after pride may come a fall!

On the fourth day Elsie was buried. Mark and Tom were the only mourners, Lucia and Valentin stayed at Mark's house, to return next day under Tom's care to Eaton Square.

The two mourners walked back sadly from the churchyard. "I shall put a stone over him, Tom! He ought to rest quietly now, for he had little rest enough in his life."

"Now I want to talk to you about something when I've taken off my husband, that is, for it would be hardly lucky to mention such matters with a husband on!"

Tom looked up, wondering.

"Tell me about his wife, meanwhile! What made him marry her? Was she a pretty woman?"

"Pretty enough, I believe, before she married, but I hardly think he married her for her face."

"Of course not!" said the old man with emphasis. "Of course not! Whatever faults he had, he'd be too sensible for that. Don't you marry for a face, Tom! I didn't."

Tom opened his eyes at this last assertion, but humbly expressed his intention of not falling into that snare.

"Ah! you don't believe me—well, she was a beautiful woman—I'd like to see her fellow now in the county!—and I won't deny I was proud of her. But she had ten thousand pounds, Tom. And as for her looks, why, if you'll believe me, after we'd been married three months, I didn't know whether she had any looks or not. What are you smiling at, you young rogue?"

"Report did say that one look of Mrs. Armsworth's, to the last, would do more to manage Mr. Armsworth than the opinions of the whole bench of bishops."

"Report's a liar, and you're a puppy! You don't know yet whether it was a pleasant look, or a cross one, lad. But still—well, she was an angel, and kept old Mark straighter than he's ever been since—not that he's so very bad, now. Though I sometimes think Mary's better even than his mother. That girl's a good girl, Tom."

"Report agrees with you in that, at least." "Fool if it didn't. And as for looks—I can speak to you as to my own son—Why, handsome is that handsome does."

"And that handsome has, for you must honestly put that into the account."

"You think so? So do I!" Well, then Tom, —and here Mark was seized with a tendency to St. Vitus's dance, and began overhauling every button on his coat, twirling up his black gloves, till (as undertakers' gloves are generally meant to do) they burst in half a dozen places, taking off his hat, wiping his head fiercely, and putting the hat on again behind before, till at last he snatched his arm from Tom's and, gripping him by the shoulder, recommenced—

"You think so, eh? Well, I must say it, so I'd better have it out now, hand and none! What do you think of the man who married my daughter, face and all?"

"I should think," quoth Tom, wondering who the happy man could be, "that he would be so lucky in possessing such a heart, that he would be a fool to care about the face."

"Then be as good as your word, and take her yourself! I've watched you this last week, and you'll make her a good husband! There, I have spoken, let me hear no more about it!"

And Mark half pushed Tom from him, and pulled on by his wife, highly excited.

It Mark had knocked the young doctor down, he would have been far less astonished and far less puzzled too. "Well," thought he, "I fancied nothing could throw my steady old engine off the rails, but I am off them now, with a vengeance! What to say he knew not, at last."

"It is just like your generosity, sir; you have been a brother to my father, and now—"

"And now I'll be a father to you!" Oh! Mark does nothing by halves.

"But, sir, however lucky I should be in possessing Miss Armsworth's heart, what reason have I to suppose that I do so? I never spoke a word to her. I needn't say that she never did to me—which—"

"Of course she didn't, and of course you didn't! Should like to have seen you making love to my daughter, indeed! No, sir, it's my will and pleasure I've settled it, and done it shall be! I shall go home and tell Mary, and she'll obey me—I should like to see her do anything else! Hoity, toity, fathers must be masters, sir! even in these fly-away new times, when young ones choose their own husbands and their own politics, and their own honour, and their own religion too, and be hanged to them!"

What did this unaccustomed bit of bluster mean? for unaccustomed it was, and Tom knew well that Mary Armsworth had her own way, and managed her father as completely as he managed Whitbury.

'Humph! It is impossible, and yet it must be. This explains his being so anxious that Lord Minchamstead should approve of me. I have found favour in the poor dear thing's eyes, I suppose, and the good old fellow knows it, and won't betray her, and so shams tyrant just like him!' But—that Mary Armsworth should care for him! Vain fellow that he was to fancy it! And yet, when he began to put things together, little silences, little looks, little nothings, which all together might make something. He would not slander her to himself by supposing that her attentions to his father were paid for his sake; but he could not forget that it was she, always, who read his letters aloud to the old man, or that she had taken home and copied out the story of his shipwreck. Beside, it was the only method of explaining Mark's conduct, save on the supposition that he had suddenly been 'changed by the fancies' in his old age, instead of in the cradle, as usual.

It was a terrible temptation, and to no man more than to Thomas Thurnall. He was no boy, to hanker after mere animal beauty: he had no delicate visions or lofty aspirations, and he knew (no man better) the plain English of fifty thousand pounds, and Mark Armsworth's daughter—a good house, a good consulting practice (for he would take his M.D. of course), a good station in the county, a good clearance with a good pair of horses, good plate, a good dinner with good company thereat, and, over and above all, his father to live with him, and with Mary, whom he loved as a daughter, in luxury and peace to his life's end—Why, it was all that he had ever dreamed of, three times more than he ever hoped to gain!—Not to mention (for how oddly little dreams of selfish pleasure slip in at such moments!) that he would lay such a Ross's microscope! and keep such a horse for a sly by-day with the Whitford Priors! Oh, to see once again a fox break from Coldharbour gorse!

And then rose up before his imagination those drooping steadfast eyes, and Grace Harvey, the unsuspected, the despised, seemed to look through and through his inmost soul, as through a house which belonged of right to her, and where no other woman must dwell, or could dwell, for she was there, and he knew it, and knew that, even if he never married till his dying day, he should sell his soul by marrying any one but her. 'And why should I not sell my soul?' asked he, almost fiercely. 'I sell my talents, my time, my strength, I'd sell my life to-morrow, and go to be shot for a shilling a day, if it would make the old man comfortable for life; and why not my soul too? Don't that belong to me as much as any other part of me? Why am I to be condemned to sacrifice my prospects in life to a girl of whose honesty I am not even sure? What is this intolerable fascination! Witch! I almost believe in mesmerism now!—Again, I say, why should I not sell my soul, as I'd sell my coat, if the bargain's but a good one?'

T. Y. A.

And if he did, who would ever know?—Not even Grace herself. The secret was his, and no one else's. Or if they did know, what matter? Dozens of men sell their souls every year, and thrive thereon: tradesmen, lawyers, squires, popular preachers, great noblemen, kings, and princes. He would be in good company, at all events, and while so many live in glass houses, who dare throw stones?

But then, curiously enough, there came over him a vague dread of possible evil, such as he had never felt before. He had been trying for years to raise himself above the power of fortune, and he had succeeded ill enough, but he had never lost heart. Robbed, shipwrecked, lost in deserts, cheated at cards, shot in revolutions, legging his head, he had always been the same unconquerable light-hearted Tom, whose motto was, 'Fall right, and don't whimper! better luck next round.' But now, what if he played his last court-card, and Fortune, out of her close hidden hand, laid down a trump thereon with quiet sneering smile? And she would! He knew, somehow, that he should not thrive. His children would die of the measles, his horses break their knees, his plate be stolen, his house catch fire, and Mark Armsworth die insolvent. What a fool he was, to fancy such nonsense! Here he had been slaving all his life to keep his father—and now he could keep him, why, he would be justified, right, a good son, in doing the thing. How hard, how unjust of those upper Powers in which he believed so vaguely, to forbid him doing it!

And how did he know that they forbid him? That is too deep a question to be analysed here, but this thing is not worthy that there came next over Tom's mind a strange feeling still—a fancy that if he did this thing, and sold his soul, he could not answer for himself thenceforth on the score of merest respectability, could not answer for himself not to drink, gamble, squander his money, neglect his father, prove unfaithful to his wife, that the innate capacity for blackguardism, which was as strong in him as in any man, might, and probably would, run utterly riot thenceforth. He felt as if he should cast away his last anchor, and drift helplessly down into utter shame and ruin. It may have been very fanciful, but so he felt, and felt it so strongly too, that in less time than I have taken to write this he had turned to Mark Armsworth—

'So, you are what I have always found you. Do you wish me to be what you have always found me?'

'I'd be sorry to see you anything else, boy.'

'Then, sir, I can't do this. In honour, I can't.'

'Are you married already?' thundered Mark. 'Not quite as bad as that,' and in spite of his agitation Tom laughed, but hysterically, at the notion. 'But fool I am; for I am in love with another woman. I am, sir,' went he on hurriedly. 'Boy that I am' and she don't even know it but if you be the man I take you for, you may be angry with me, but you'll understand me. Anything but be a rogue to you and to Mary, and to my own self too. Fool I'll be, but rogue I won't!'

Mark strode on in silence, frightfully red in the face for full five minutes, then he turned sharply on Tom, and catching him by the shoulder, thrust him from him.

'There—go! and don't let me see or hear of you,—that is, till I tell you! Go along, I say! Hum-hum!' (in a tone half of wrath, and half of triumph) 'his father's child! If you will ruin yourself, I can't help it.'

'Nor I, sir,' said Tom, in a really piteous tone, bemoaning the day he ever saw Absalom, as he watched Mark stride into his own gate. 'If I had but had common luck! If I had but brought my £1500 sale home here, and never seen Grace, and married this girl out of hand! Common luck is all I ask, and I never get it!'

And Tom went home sulkier than a bear but he did not let his father find out his trouble. It was his last evening with the old man. Tomorrow he must go to London, and then to scramble and twist about the world again till he died? 'Well, why not? A man must die somehow but it's hard on the poor old father,' said Tom.

As Tom was packing his scanty carpet-bag next morning, there was a knock at the door. He looked out, and saw Armsworth's clerk. What could that mean? Had the old man determined to avenge the slight, and to do so on his father, by claiming some old debt? There might be many between him and the doctor. And Tom's heart beat fast as Jane put a letter into his hand.

'No answer, sir, the clerk says.'

Tom opened it, and turned over the contents more than once ere he could believe his own eyes.

It was neither more nor less than a cheque on Mark's London broker for just five hundred pounds.

A half sheet was wrapped round it, on which were written these words—

'To Thomas Thunnall, Esq., for behaving like a gentleman. The cheque will be duly honoured at Messrs. Smith, Brown, and Jones, Lombard Street. No acknowledgment is to be sent. Don't tell your father.'

'MARK ARMSWORTH'

'Queer old world it is!' said Tom, when the first burst of childish delight was over. 'And jolly old flirt, Dame Fortune, after all! If I had written this in a book now, who'd have believed it!'

'Father,' said he, as he kissed the old man farewell, 'I've a little money come in. I'll send you fifty from London in a day or two, and lodge a hundred and fifty more with Smith and Co. So you'll be quite in clover while I am poisoning the Turnkeys, or at some better work.'

The old man thanked God for his good son, and only hoped that he was not straitening himself to buy luxuries for a useless old fellow.

Another sacred kiss on that white head, and Tom was away for London, with a fuller purse, and a more self-contented heart too, than he had known for many a year.

And Elsley was left behind, under the gray church spire, sleeping with his fathers, and vexing his soul with poetry no more. Mark has covered him now with a fair Portland slab. He took Claude Mellot to it this winter before church time, and stood over it long with a puzzled look, as if dimly discovering that there were more things in heaven and earth than were dreamed of in his philosophy.

'Wonderful fellow he was, after all! Mary shall read us out some of his verses to-night. But, I say, why should people be born clever, only to make them all the more miserable?'

'Perhaps they learn the more, papa, by their sorrows,' said quiet little Mary, 'and so they are the gainers after all.'

And none of them having any better answer to give, they all three went into the church, to see if one could be found there.

And so Tom Thunnall, too, went Eastward Ho, to take like all the rest, what God might send.

CHAPTER XXVI

AND how was poor Grace Harvey prospering the while? While comfortable folks were praising her, at their leisure, as a heroine, Grace Harvey was learning, so she opined, by fearful lessons, how much of the unheroic element was still left in her. The first lesson had come just a week after the yacht sailed for Port Madox, when the cholera had all but subsided, and it came in this wise. Before breakfast one morning she had to go up to Heale's shop for some cordial. Her mother had passed, so she said, a sleepless night, and come downstairs nervous and without appetite, oppressed with melancholy, both in the spiritual and the physical sense of the word. It was often so with her now. She had escaped the cholera. The remoteness of her house, her care never to enter the town, the purity of the water, which trickled always fresh from the cliff close by, and last, but not least, the scrupulous cleanliness which (to do her justice) she had always observed, and in which she had trained up Grace—all these had kept her safe.

But Grace could see that her dread of the cholera was intense. She even tried at first to prevent Grace from entering an infected house, but that proposal was answered by a look of horror which shamed her into silence, and she contented herself with all but abominating Grace, making her change her clothes whenever she came in; refusing to sit with her, almost to eat with her. But, over and above all this, she had grown moody, peevish, subject to violent bursts of crying, fits of superstitious depression, spent, sometimes, whole days in reading experimental books, arguing with the preachers, gadding to and fro to every sermon, Arminian or Calvinist, and at last even to church—walking in dry places, poor soul, seeking rest, and finding none.

All this betokened some malady of the mind, rather than of the body, but what that malady was, Grace dare not even try to guess. Perhaps it was one of the fits of religious melancholy so common in the West country, like her own, in fact. Perhaps it was all 'nerves'. Her mother was growing old, and had a great deal of business to worry her, and so Grace thrust away the horrible suspicion by little self-deceptions.

She went into the shop. Tom was busy upon his knees behind the counter. She made her request.

'Ah, Mrs Harvey!' and he sprang up. 'It will be a pleasure to serve you once more in one's life. I am just going.'

'Going where?'

'To Turkey. I find this place too pleasant and too poor. Not work enough, and certainly not pay enough. So I have got an appointment as surgeon in the Turkish contingent, and shall be off in an hour.'

'To Turkey! to the war?'

Yes. It's a long time since I have seen any fighting. I am quite out of practice in gunshot wounds. There is the medicine. Good-bye! You will shake hands once, for the sake of our late cholera work together.'

Grace held out her hand mechanically across the counter, and he took it. But she did not look into his face. Only she said, half to her self—

'Well, better so. I have no doubt you will be very useful among them.'

'Confound the rascal!' thought Tom. 'I really believe that she wants to get rid of me.' And he would have withdrawn his hand in a pet, but she held it still.

Quant it was, those two strong natures, each loving the other better than anything else on earth, and yet parted by the thinnest pane of ice, which a single look would have melted. She longing to follow that man over the wide world, slave for him, die for him, he longing for the least excuse for making a fool of himself, and crying, 'Take me, as I take you, without a penny, for better, for worse.' If their eyes had but met! But they did not meet, and the pane of ice kept them asunder as surely as a wall of iron.

Was it that Tom was piqued at her seeming coldness, or did he expect, before he made any advances, that she should show that she wished at least for his respect, by saying something to clear up the ugly question which lay between them? Or was he, as I suspect, so ready to melt, and make a fool of himself, that he must needs harden his own heart by help of the devil himself? And yet there are excuses for him.

It would have been a sore trial to any man's temper to quit Aberlva in the belief that he left fifteen hundred pounds behind him. Be that as it may, he said carelessly, after a moment's pause—

'Well, farewell! And, by the bye, about that little money matter. The month of which you spoke once was up yesterday. I suppose I am not worthy yet, so I shall be humble, and wait patiently. Don't hurry yourself, I beg you, on my account.'

She snatched her hand from his without a word, and rushed out of the shop.

He returned to his packing, whistling away as shrill as any blackbird.

Little did he think that Grace's heart was bursting, as she hurried down the street, covering her face in her veil, as if every one would spy her dark secret in her countenance.

But she did not go home to hysterics and vain tears. An awful purpose had arisen in her mind, under the pressure of that great agony. Heavens, how she loved that man! To be suspected by him was torture. But she could bear that. It was her cross, she could carry it, lie down on it, and endure. But wrong him she could not—would not! It was sinful enough while he was there, but doubly, unbearably sinful, when he was going to a foreign country, when he would need every farthing he had. So not for her own sake, but for his, she spoke to her mother when she went home, and found her sitting over her Bible in the little parlour, vainly trying to find a text which suited her distemper.

'Mother, you have the Bible before you there.'

'Yes, child! Why? What?' asked she, looking up immensely.

Grace laid her eyes on the ground. She could not look her mother in the face.

'Do you ever read the thirty-second Psalm, mother?'

'Which? Why not, child?'

'Let us read it together then, now.'

And Grace taking up her own Bible, sat quietly down and read, as none in that parish save she could read.

'Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, and whose sin is covered.'

'Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no guile.'

'When I kept silence, my bones waxed old, through my groanings all the day long.'

'For day and night Thy hand was heavy upon me: my moisture is turned to the drought of summer.'

'I acknowledge my sin unto Thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid.'

'I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord, and Thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin.'

Grace stopped, choked with tears which the pathos of her own voice had called up. She looked at her mother. There were no tears in her eyes. Only a dull thwart look of terror and suspicion. The shaft, however bravely and cunningly sped, had missed its mark.

Poor Grace! Her usual eloquence utterly failed her, as most things do in which one is wont to trust, before the pressure of a real and horrible evil. She had no heart to make fine sentences, to preach a brilliant sermon of commonplaces. What could she say that her mother had not known long before she was born? And throwing herself on her knees at her mother's feet, she grasped both her hands and looked into her face imploringly—'Mother! mother! mother!' was all that she could say, but their tone meant more than all words. Reproof, counsel, comfort, utter tenderness, and under-current of clear deep trust, bubbling up from beneath all passing suspicions, however dark and foul, were in it, but they were vain.

Basest terror, the parent of basest suspicion, had hardened that woman's heart for the while, and all she answered was—

'Get up! What is this foolery?'

'I will not! I will not rise till you have told me.'

'What?'

'Whether'—and she forced the words slowly out in a low whisper—'whether you know—anything of—of—Mr Thurnall's money—has he it?'

'Is the girl mad? Belt? Money? Do you take me for a thief, wench?'

'No! No! No! Only say you—you know nothing of it!'

'Falsa! gull! Go to your school!' and the old woman tried to rise.

'Only say that! only let me know that it is a dream—a hideous dream which the devil put into my wicked, wicked heart—and let me know that I am the basest, meanest of daughters for harbouring such a thought a moment! It will be comfort, bliss, to what I endure! Only say that, and I will crawl to your feet, and beg for your forgiveness,—ask you to beat me, like a child, as I shall deserve! Drive me out, if you will, and let me die, as I shall deserve! Only say the word, and take this life from before my eyes, which burns day and night,—till my brain is dried up with misery and shame! Mother, mother, speak!'

But then burst out the horrible suspicion, which falsehood, suspecting all others of being false as itself, had engendered in that mother's heart.

'Yes, viper! I see your plan! Do you think I do not know that you are in love with that fellow?'

Grace started as if she had been shot, and covered her face with her hands.

'Yes! and want me to betray myself—to tell a lie about myself, that you may enjoy favour with him—a penniless, unbelieving—'

'Mother!' almost shrieked Grace, 'I can bear no more! Say that it is a lie, and then kill me if you will!'

'It is a lie, from beginning to end! What else should it be! And the woman, in the hurry of her passion, confirmed the equivocation with an oath, and then ran on, as if to turn her own thoughts, as well as Grace's, into commonplaces about 'a poor old mother, who cares for nothing but you, who has worked her fingers to the bone for years to leave you a little money when she is gone! I wish I were gone! I wish I were out of this wretched ungrateful world, I do! To have my own child turn against me in my old age!'

Grace lifted her hands from her face, and looked steadfastly at her mother. And behold, she knew not how or why, she felt that her mother had sworn herself. A strong shudder passed through her, she rose and was leaving the room in silence.

'Where are you going, hussy! Stop!' screamed her mother between her teeth, her rage and cruelty rising, as it will with weak natures, in the very act of triumph,—'to your young man?'

'To pray,' said Grace quietly, and locking herself into the empty schoolroom, gave vent to all her feelings, but not in tears.

How she upbraided herself! She had not used her strength, she had not told her mother all her heart. And yet how could she tell her heart? How face her mother with such vague suspicions, hardly supported by a single fact? How argue it out against her like a lawyer, and convict her to her face? What daughter could do that, who had human love and reverence left in her? No! to touch her inward witness, as the Quakers well and truly term it, was the only method—and it had failed! 'God help me!' was her only cry—but the help did not come yet, there came over her instead a feeling of utter loneliness. Willis dead, Thurnall gone, her mother estranged, and, like a child lost upon a great moor, she looked round all heaven and earth, and there was none to counsel none to guide—perhaps not even God. For would He help her as long as she lived in sin? And was she not living in sin, deadly sin, as long as she knew what she was sure she knew, and left the wrong unrighted?

It is sometimes true, the popular saying, that sunshine comes after storm. Sometimes true, or who could live? but not always not even often. Equally true is the popular antithesis, that misfortunes never come single, that in most human lives there are periods of trouble, blow following blow, wave following wave, from opposite and unexpected quarters, with no natural or logical sequence, till all God's billows have gone over the soul.

How paltry and helpless, in such dark times, are all theories of mere self-education, all proud attempts, like that of Goethe's Wilhelm Meister, to hang self-poised in the centre of the abyss, and there organise for oneself a character by means of circumstances! Easy enough and graceful enough does that dream look, while all the circumstances themselves—all which stands around—are easy and graceful, obliging and commonplace, like the sphere of petty experiences with which Goethe surrounds his imperial hero

Easy enough it seems for a man to educate himself without God, as long as he has comfortably on a sofa, with a cup of coffee and a review but what if that 'demonic element of the universe,' which Goethe confessed, and yet in his luxuriousness tried to ignore, because he could not explain—what if that broke forth over the graceful and prosperous student, as it may any moment? What if some thing, or some person, or many things, or many persons, one after the other (questions which he must get answered then, or die), took him up and dashed him down, again, and again, and again, till he was ready to cry, 'I reckoned till morning that like a lion he will break all my bones, from morning till evening he will make an end of me?' What if he thus found himself hurled perforce amid the real universal experiences of humanity, and made free, in spite of himself, by doubt and fear and horror of great darkness, of the brotherhood of woe, common alike to the simplest peasant-woman, and to every great soul, perhaps, who has left his impress and sign-manual upon the hearts of after generations? Jew, Heathen, or Christian, men of the most opposite creeds and aims, whether it be Moses or Socrates, Isaiah or Epictetus, Augustine or Mohammed, Dante or Bernard, Shakespeare or Bacon, or Goethe's self, no doubt, though in his tremendous pride he would not confess it even to himself,—each and all of them have this one fact in common that once in their lives, at least, they have gone down into the bottomless pit and 'stato all' inferno'—as the children used truly to say of Dante, and there, out of the utter darkness, have asked the question of all questions—'Is there a God? And if there be, what is He doing with me?'

What refuge, then, in self education, when a man feels himself powerless in the grasp of some unseen and inevitable power, and knows not whether it be chance, or necessity, or a damning tend? To wrap himself sternly in himself, and cry, 'I will endure, though all the universe be against me,'—how fine it sounds! But who has done it? Could a man do it perfectly but for one moment,—could he absolutely and utterly for one moment isolate him self, and accept his own isolation as a fact, he were then and there a madman or a suicide. As it is, his nature, happily too weak for that desperate self assertion, falls back recklessly on some form, more or less graceful, according to the temperament, of the ancient panacea, 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die.' Why should a man educate self, when he knows not whither he goes, what will befall him to-morrow? No. There is but one escape, one chink through which we may see light, one rock on which our feet may find standing place, even in the abyss, and that is the belief, intuitive, inspired, due neither to reasoning nor to study, that the billows are God's billows, and that though we go down to hell, He is there also,—the belief that not we, but He, is educating us, that these seemingly fantastical and incoherent miseries, storm following earthquake, and earthquake fire, as if the caprice of all the demons were let loose against us, have in His mind a spiritual coherence, an organic unity and purpose (though we see it not), that sorrows do not come singly, only because He is making short work with our spirits, and because the more effect He sees produced by one blow, the more swiftly He follows it up by another, till, in one great and varied crisis, seemingly long to us, but short enough compared with immortality, our spirits may be—

'Heated hot with burning fears,
And bathed in baths of lussing tears,
And lattered with the strokes of doom,
To shape and use.'

And thus, perhaps, it was with poor Grace Harvey. At least, happily for her, she began after a while to think that it was so. Only after a while, though. There was at first a phase of repining, of doubt, almost of indignation against high heaven. Who shall judge her? What blame if the crucified one writhes when the first nail is driven? What blame if the stoutest turn sick and giddy at the first home thrust of that sword which pierces the joints and marrow, and lays bare to self the secrets of the heart? God gives poor souls time to recover their breaths, etc. He strikes again, and if He be not angry, why should we condemn?

Poor Grace! Her sorrows had been thickening fast during the last few months. She was a bookworm again, true, but where were her children? Those of them whom she loved best, were swept away by the cholera, and could she face the remnant each in mourning for a parent or a brother? That alone was grief enough for her and yet, that was the lightest of all her griefs. She loved Tony Thurnall—how much, she dared not tell herself; she longed to 'save' him. She had thought, and not untruly, during the past cholera weeks, that he was softened, opened to new impressions. But he had avoided her more than ever—perhaps suspected her again more than ever—and now he was gone, gone for ever. That, too, was grief enough alone. But darkest and deepest of all, darker and deeper than the past shame of being suspected by him she loved, was the shame of suspecting her own mother—of believing herself, as she did, privy to that shameful theft, and yet unable to make restitution. There was the horror of all horrors, the close prison which seemed to stifle her whole soul. The only chink through which a breath of air seemed to come, and keep her heart alive, was the hope that somehow, somewhere, she might find that lost, and restore it without her mother's knowledge.

But more—the first of September was come and gone, the bill for five and twenty pounds was due, and was not met. Grace, choking down her honest pride, went off to the grocer, and, with tears which he could not resist, persuaded him to renew the bill for one month more, and now that month was all but past, and yet there was no money. Eight or ten people who owed Mrs. Harvey money had died of the cholera. Some, of course, had left no effects, and all hope of their working out their debts was gone. Some had left money behind them, but it was still in the lawyer's hands, some of it at sea, some on mortgage, some in houses which must be sold, till their affairs were wound up—(a sadly slow affair when a country attorney has a poor man's unprofitable business to transact)—nothing could come in to Mrs. Harvey. To and fro she went with knitted brow and heavy heart, and brought home again only promises, as she had done a hundred times before. One day she went up to Mrs. Heale. Old Heale owed her thirteen pounds and more, but that was not the least reason for paying. His cholera patients had not paid him, and whether Heale had the money by him or not, he was not going to pay his debts till other people paid theirs. Mrs. Harvey stormed, Mrs. Heale gave her as good as she brought, and Mrs. Harvey threatened to County Court her husband, whereon Mrs. Heale, en revanche, dragged out the books, and displayed to the poor widow's horror-struck eyes an account for medicine and attendance, on her and Grace, which nearly swallowed up the debt. Poor Grace was overwhelmed when her mother came home and upbraided her, in her despair, with being a burden. Was she not a burden? Must she not be one henceforth? No, she would take in needle-work, labour in the fields, heave ballast among the coarse pauper girls in the quay-pool, anything rather, but how to meet the present difficulty?

'We must sell our furniture, mother.'

'For a quarter of what it's worth? Never, girl! No! The Lord will provide,' said she, between her clenched teeth, with a sort of hysterical chuckle. 'The Lord will provide!'

'I believe it, I believe it,' said poor Grace, 'but faith is weak, and the day is very dark, mother.'

'Dark, ay! And may be darker yet, but the Lord will provide. He prepares a table in the wilderness for his saints that the world don't think of.'

'Oh, mother! and do you think there is any door of hope?'

'Go to bed, girl, go to bed, and leave me to see to that. Find my spectacles. Wherever have you laid them to, now? I'll look over the books awhile.'

'Do let me go over them for you.'

'No, you shan't! I suppose you'll be wanting to make out your poor old mother's been cheating somebody. Why not, if I'm a thief, miss, oh!'

'Oh, mother! mother! don't say that again.'

And Grace glided out meekly to her own chamber, which was on the ground-floor adjoining the parlour, and there spent more than one hour in prayer, from which no present comfort seemed to come, yet who shall say that it was all unanswered?

At last her mother came upstairs, and put her head in angrily. 'Why be'n't you in bed, girl! sitting up this way?'

'I was praying, mother,' says Grace, looking up as she knelt.

'Praying! What's the use of praying! and who'll hear you if you pray? What you want's a husband, to keep you out of the workhouse, and you won't get that by kneeling here. Get to bed, I say, or I'll jell you up!'

Grace obeyed uncomplainingly, but utterly shocked, though she was not unacquainted with those frightful fits of morose misbelief, even of fierce blasphemy, to which the excitable West-country mind is liable, after having been over-strained by superstitious self-inspection, and by the desperate attempt to prove itself right and safe from frames and feelings, while fact and conscience proclaim it wrong.

The West-country people are apt to attribute these paroxysms to the possession of a devil, and so did Grace that night.

Trembling with terror and loving pity, she lay down, and began to pray afresh for that poor wild mother.

At last the fear crossed her that her mother might make away with herself. But a few years before, another class-leader in Alverna had attempted to do so, and had all but succeeded. The thought was intolerable. She must go to her, face reproaches, blows, anything. She rose from her bed, and went to the door. It was fastened on the outside.

A cold perspiration stood on her forehead. She opened her lips to shrink to her mother, but checked herself when she heard her stirring gently in the outer room. Her pulses throbbed too loudly at first for her to hear distinctly, but she felt that it was no moment for giving way to emotion, by a strong effort of will, she conquered herself, and then, with that preternatural acuteness of sense which some women possess, she could hear everything her mother was doing. She heard her put on her shawl, her bonnet, she heard her open the front door gently. It was now long past midnight. Whither could she be going at that hour?

She heard her go gently to the left, past the window, and yet her footfall was all but inaudible. No rain had fallen, and her shoes ought to have sounded on the hard earth. She must have taken them off. There, she was stopping, just by the school-door. Now she moved again. She must have stopped to put on her shoes, for now Grace could hear her steps distinctly, down the earth bank, and over the rattling shingle of the beach. Where was she going? Grace must follow!

The door was fast, but in a moment she had removed the table, opened the shutter and the window.

'Thank God that I stayed here on the ground-floor, instead of going back to my own room when Major Campbell left. It was providence! The Lord has not forsaken me yet!' said the sweet saint, as, catching up her shawl, she wrapped it round her, and slipping through the window, crouched under the shadow of the house, and looked for her mother.

She was hurrying over the rocks, a hundred yards off. Whither? To drown herself in the sea? No; she held on along the mid-beach, right across the cove, toward Arthur's Nose. But why? Grace must know.

She felt, she knew not why, that this strange journey, that wild 'The Lord will provide,' had to do with the subject of her suspicion. Perhaps this was the crisis, perhaps, all will be cleared up to-night, for joy or for utter shame.

The tide was low, the beach was bright in the western moonlight; only along the cliff foot lay a strip of shadow a quarter of a mile long, till the Nose, like a great black wall, lurid the corner of the cove in darkness.

Along that strip of shadow she ran, crouching, now stumbling over a boulder, now crushing her bare feet between the sharp pebbles, as heedless where she stepped, she kept her eye fixed on her mother. As if fascinated, she could see nothing else in heaven or earth but that dark figure, hurrying along with a dogged determination, and then stopping a moment to look round, as if in fear of a pursuer. And then Grace lay down on the cold stones, and pressed herself into the very earth, and the moment her mother turned to go forward, sprang up and followed.

And then a true woman's thought flashed across her, and shaped itself into a prayer. For herself she never thought. But if the coast-guardsmen above should see her mother, stop her, question her? God grant that he might be on the other side of the point! And she hurried on again.

Near the Nose the rocks ran high and jagged, her mother held on to them, passed through a narrow chasm, and disappeared.

Grace now, not fifty yards from her, dashed out of the shadow into the moonlight, and in breathlessly toward the spot where she had seen her mother last. Like Andersen's little sea-maiden she went, every step on sharp knives across the rough beds of barnacles, but she felt no pain, in the greatness of her terror and her love.

She crouched between the rocks a moment, heard her mother slipping and splashing among the pools, and glided after her like a ghost—a guardian angel rather—till she saw her emerge again for a moment into the moonlight, upon a strip of beach beneath the Nose.

It was a weird and lonely spot, and a dangerous spot withal. For only at low spring-tide could it be reached from the land, and then the flood rose far up the cliff, covering all the shingle, and filling the mouth of a dark cavern. Had her mother gone to that cavern? It was impossible to see, so utterly was the chit shrouded in shadow.

Shivering with cold and excitement, Grace crouched down and gazed into the gloom till her eyes swam, and a hundred fantastic figures, and sparks of fire, seemed to dance between her and the rock. Sparks of fire!—yes, but that last one was no fairy. An actual flash, the crackle and sputter of a match! What could it mean? Another match was lighted, and a moment after, the glare of a lantern showed her her mother entering beneath the polished arch of rock which glared lurid overhead, like the gateway of the pit of fire.

The light vanished into the windings of the cave. And then Grace, hardly knowing what she did, rushed up the beach, and crouched down once more at the cave's mouth. There she sat, she knew not how long, listening, listening, like a hunted hare, her whole faculties concentrated in the one sense of hearing, her eyes wandering vacantly over the black saws of rock, and glancing on weed beds, and bright phosphoric sea. 'Thank heaven, there was not a ripple to break the silence. Ah, what was that sound within? She pressed her ear against the rock to hear more surely. A rumbling as of stones rolled down. And then was it a laney, or were her powers of hearing, intensified by excitement, actually equal to discern the clink of coin? Who knows? But in another moment she had glided in, silently, swiftly, holding her very breath, and saw her mother kneeling on the ground, the lantern by her side, and in her hand the long lost belt.

She did not speak, she did not move. She always knew, in her heart of hearts, that so it was. But when the sin took bodily shape, and was there before her very eyes, it was too dreadful to speak of, to act upon yet. And amid the most torturing horror and disgust of that great sin, rose up in her the divinest love for the sinner; she felt strange paradox—that she had never loved her mother as she did at that moment. 'Oh, that it had been I who had done it, and not she!' And her mother's sin was to her her own sin, her mother's shame her shame, till all sense of her mother's guilt vanished in the light of her divine love. 'Oh, that I could take her up tenderly, tell her that all is forgiven and forgotten by man and God!—save her as I have never saved her yet!—nurture her to sleep in my bosom, and then go forth and bear her punishment, even if need be on the gallows-tree!' And there she stood, in a silent agony of tender pity, drinking her portion of the cup of Him who bore the sins of all the world.

Silently she stood, and silently she turned to go, to go home and pray for guidance in that dark labyrinth of continued duties. Her mother heard the rustle, looked up, and sprang to her feet with a scream, dropping gold pieces on the ground.

Her first impulse was wild terror. She was discovered, by whom, she knew not. She clasped her evil treasure to her bosom, and thrusting Grace against the rock, fled wildly on.

'Mother! mother!' shrieked Grace, rushing after her. The shawl fell from her shoulders. Her mother looked back, and saw the white figure.

'God's angel! God's angel, come to destroy me' as he came to Balaam's and in the madness of her guilty fancy she saw in Grace's hand the fiery sword which was to smite her.

Another step, looking backward still, and she had tripped over a stone. She fell, and striking the back of her head against the rock, lay senseless.

Tenderly Grace lifted her up, went far water to a pool near by, bathed her face, calling on her in every term of endearment. Slowly the old woman recovered her consciousness, but showed it only in moans. Her head was out and bleeding. Grace bound it up, and then taking that fatal belt, bound it next to her own heart, never to be moved from thence till she should put it into the hands of him to whom it belonged.

And then she lifted up her mother.

'Come home, darling mother,' and she tried to make her stand and walk.

The old woman only moaned, and waved her away impatiently. Grace put her on her feet, but she fell again. The lower limbs seemed all but paralysed.

Slowly that sweet saint lifted her, and laid her on her own back, and slowly she bore her homeward, with aching knees and bleeding feet, while before her eyes hung the picture of Him who bore His cross up Calvary, till a solemn joy and pride in that sacred burden seemed to intertwine itself with her deep misery. And fainting every moment with pain and weakness, she still went on, as if by supernatural strength, and murmured—

'Thou shalt bear more for me, and shalt not I bear even this for Thee?'

Surely, if blest spirits can weep and smile over the woes and sorrows of us mortal men, faces brighter than the stars looked down on that fair girl that night, and in loving sympathy called her, too, blest.

At last it was over. Unhindered she reached home, laid her mother on the bed, and tended her till morning. But long ere morning dawned stupor had changed into delirium, and Grace's ears were all on fire with words—words those who have ever heard will have no heart to write.

And now, by one of those strange vagaries, in which epileptics so often indulge, appeared other symptoms, and by day-dawn cholera itself.

Heale, though recovering, was still too weak to be of use; but, happily, the medical man sent down by the Board of Health was still in the town.

Grace sent for him, but he shook his head after the first look. The wretched woman's ravings at once explained the case, and made it, in his eyes, all but hopeless.

The sudden shock to body and mind, the sudden prostration of strength, had brought out the disease which she had dreaded so intensely, and against which she had taken so many precautions, and which yet lay, all the while, lurking unfelt in her system.

A hideous eight-and-forty hours followed. The preachers and class-leaders came to pray over the dying woman, but she screamed to Grace to send them away. She had just sense enough left to dread that she might betray her own shame. Would she have the new clergyman then? No, she would have no one,—no one could help her! Let her only die in peace!

And Grace closed the door upon all but the doctor, who treated the wild sufferer's wild words as the mere fancies of delirium, and then Grace watched and prayed, till she found herself alone with the dead.

She wrote a letter to Thurnall—

'Sir, I have found your belt, and all the money, I believe and trust, which it contained. If you will be so kind as to tell me where and how I shall send it to you, you will take a heavy burden off the mind of—'

'Your obedient humble servant, who trusts that you will forgive her having been unable to fulfil her promise.'

She addressed the letter to Whithury, for further Tom had ordered his letters to be sent, but she received no answer.

The day after Mrs. Harvey was buried, the sale of all her effects was announced in Aberlva.

Grace received the proceeds, went round to all the creditors, and paid them all which was due. She had a few pounds left. What to do with that she knew full well.

She showed no sign of sorrow. But she spoke rarely to any one. A dead dull weight seemed to hang over her. To preachers, class-leaders, gospelists, who upbraided her for not letting them see her mother, she replied by silence. People thought her becoming idiotic.

The day after the last creditor was paid she packed up her little box, hired a cart to take her to the nearest coach, and vanished from Aberlva, without bidding farewell to a human being, even to her school-children.

Vavasour had been buried more than a week. Mark and Mary were sitting in the dining-room, Mark at his post and Mary at her work, when the footboy entered.

'Sir, there's a young woman wants to speak with you.'

'Show her in, if she looks respectable,' said Mark, who had slippers on, and his feet on the fender, and was, therefore, loth to move.

'Oh, quite respectable, sir, as ever I see;' and the lady entered in a figure, dressed and veiled in deep black.

'Well, ma'am, sit down, pray, and what can I do for you?'

'Can you tell me, sir,' answered a voice of extraordinary sweetness and gentleness, very firm and composed withal, 'if Mr. Thomas Thurnall is in Whithury?'

'Thurnall? He has sailed for the East a week ago. May I ask your business with him? Can I help you in it?'

The black damsel paused so long, that both

Mary and her father felt uneasy, and a cloud passed over Mark's brow.

'Can the boy have been playing tricks?' said he to himself.

'Then, sir, as I hear that you have influence, can you get me a situation as one of the nurses who are going out thither, so I hear?'

'Get you a situation? Yes; of course, if you are competent.'

'Thank you, sir. Perhaps, if you could be so very kind as to tell me to whom I am to apply in town, for I shall go thither to-night.'

'My goodness!' cried Mark. 'Old Mark don't do things in this off-hand, cold-blooded way. Let us know who you are, my dear, and about Mr. Thurnall. Have you anything against him?'

She was silent.

'Mary, just step into the next room.'

'If you please, sir,' said the same gentle voice, 'I had sooner that the lady should stay. I have nothing against Mr. Thurnall, God knows. He has rather something against me.'

Another pause.

Mary rose, and went up to her and took her hand.

'Do tell us who you are, and if we can do anything for you.'

And she looked wistfully up into her face.

The stranger drew a long breath and lifted her veil. Mary and Mark both started at the beauty of the countenance which she revealed—but in a different way. Mark gave a grunt of approbation. Mary turned pale as death.

'I suppose that it is but right and reasonable that I should tell you, at least give proof of my being an honest person. For my capabilities as a nurse—I believe you know Mrs. Vavasour? I heard that she has been staying here.'

'Of course. Do you know her?'

A sad smile passed over her face.

'Yes, well enough, at least for her to speak for me. I should have asked her or Miss St. Just to help me to a nurse's place—but I did not like to trouble them in their distress. Now is the poor lady now, sir?'

'I know who she is!' cried Mary, by a sudden inspiration. 'Is not your name Harvey? Are you not the schoolmistress who saved Mr. Thurnall's life? who behaved so nobly in the cholera? Yes! I knew you were! Come and sit down, and tell me all! I have so longed to know you! Dear creature, I have felt as if you were my own sister. He—Mr. Thurnall—wrote often about all your heroism.'

Grace seemed to choke down somewhat, and then answered steadfastly—

'I did not come here, my dear lady, to hear such kind words, but to do an errand to Mr. Thurnall. You have heard, perhaps, that when he was wrecked last spring, he lost some money. Yes! Then, it was stolen. Stolen!' she repeated with a great gasp. 'never mind by whom. Not by me.'

'You need not tell us that, my dear,' interrupted Mark.

'God kept it. And I have it, here!' and she pressed her hands tight over her bosom.

And here I must keep it till I give it into his hands, if I follow him round the world!' And as she spoke her eyes shone in the lamplight, with an unearthly brilliance which made Mary shudder.

Mark Arnsworth poured a libation to the goddess of Puzzle-dum, in the shape of a glass of port, which first choked him, and then descended over his clean shirt-front. But after he had coughed himself black in the face, he began—

'My good girl, if you are Grace Harvey, you're welcome to my roof, and an honour to it, say I—but as for taking all that money with you across the seas, and such a pretty helpless young thing as you are, God help you, it mustn't be, and shan't be, and that's flat.'

'But I must go to him!' said she, in so naive a half wild a fashion, that Mary, comprehending all, looked imploringly at her father, and putting her arm round Grace, forced her into a seat.

'I must go, sir, and tell him—tell him myself. No one knows what I know about it.'

Mark shook his head.

'Could I not write to him? He knows me as well as he knows his own father.'

Grace shook her head, and pressed her hand upon her heart, where Tom's belt lay.

'Do you think, madam, that after having had the dream of this belt, the shape of this belt, and of the money which is in it, branded into my brain for months—years it seems like—by God's tire of shame and suspicion,—and seen him poor, miserable, trefn, unbeliving, for the want of it—O God! I can't tell even your sweet face all—Do you think that now I have it in my hands, I can part with it, or rest till it is in his? No, not though I walked barefoot after him to the ends of the earth.'

'Let his father have the money, then, and do you take him the belt as a token, if you must—'

'That's it, Mary!' shouted Mark Arnsworth, 'you always come in with the right hint, girl!' and the two, combining their forces, at last talked poor Grace over. But upon going out herself she was bent to ask his forgiveness in her mother's name was her one fixed idea. He might die, and not know all, not have forgiven all, and go she must.

'But it is a thousand to one against your seeing him. We, even, don't know exactly where he is gone.'

Grace shuddered a moment, and then recovered her calmness.

'I did not expect this—but be it so. I shall meet him if God wills, and if not, I can still work—work.'

'I think, Mary, you'd better take the young woman upstairs, and make her sleep here to-night,' said Mark, glad of an excuse to get rid of them, which, when he had done, he pulled his chair round in front of the fire, put a foot on each hob, and began rubbing his eyes vigorously.

'Dear me! Dear me! What a lot of good people there are in this old world, to be sure! Ten times better than me, at least—make one ashamed of oneself—and if one isn't oven good enough for this world, how's one to be good enough for heaven!'

And Mary carried Grace upstairs, and into her own bedroom. 'A bed should be made up there for her. It would do her good just to have anything so pretty sleeping in the same room.' And then she got Grace snuggled and tried to make her talk, but she was distrustful, reserved, for a new and sudden dread had seized her at the sight of that fine house, fine plate, fine friends. These were his acquaintances, then—no wonder that he would not look on such as her. And as she cast her eye round the really luxurious chamber, and (after falteringly asking Mary whether she had any brothers and sisters) guessed that she must be the heiress of all that wealth, she settled in her heart that Tom was to marry Mary, and the intimate tone in which Mary spoke of him to her, and her innumerable inquiries about him, made her more certain that it was a settled thing. Handsome she was not, certainly, but so sweet and good, and that her own beauty (if she was aware that she possessed any) could have any weight with Tom, she would have considered as an insult to his sense, so she made up her mind slowly, but steadily, that thus it was to be, and every fresh proof of Mary's sweetness and goodness was a fresh pang to her, for it showed the more how probable it was that Tom loved her.

Therefore she answered all Mary's questions carefully and honestly, as to a person who had a right to ask, and at last went to her bed, and, worn out in body and mind, was asleep in a moment. She had not remarked the sigh which escaped Mary, as she glanced at that beautiful head, and the long black tresses which streamed down for a moment over the white shoulders ere they were knotted back for the night, and then at her own poor countenance in the glass opposite.

It was long past midnight when Grace woke, she knew not how, and looking up, saw a light in the room, and Mary sitting still over a book, her head resting on her hands. She lay quiet and thought she heard a sob. She was sure she heard tears drop on the paper. She stirred, and Mary was at her side in a moment.

'Did you want anything?'

'Only to—to remind you, ma'am, it is not wise to sit up so late.'

'Only that?' said Mary laughing. 'I do that every night, alone with God, and I do not think He will be the farther off for you being here!'

'One thing I had to ask,' said Grace. 'It would lessen my labour so, if you could give me any hint of where he might be.'

'We know, as we told you, as little as you. His letters are to be sent to Constantinople. Some from Aberlona are gone thither already.'

'And mine among them!' thought Grace. 'It is God's will!'. Madam, if it would not seem forward on my part—if you could tell him the truth, and what I have for him, and where I am, in case he might wish—wish to see me—when you were writing.'

'Of course I will, or my father will,' said Mary, who did not like to confess either to herself or to Grace that it was very improbable that she would ever write again to Tom Thurnall.

And so the two sweet maidens, so near at that moment to an explanation which might have cleared up all, went on each in her ignorance, for so it was to be.

The next morning Grace came down to breakfast, modest, cheerful, charming. Mark made her breakfast with them, gave her endless letters of recommendation, wanted to take her to see old Doctor Thurnall, which she declined, and then sent her to the station in his own carriage, paid her fare first-class to town, and somehow or other contrived, with Mary's help, that she should find in her bag two ten-pound notes, which she had never seen before. After which he went out to his counting-house, only remarking to Mary—

'Very extraordinary young woman, and very handsome, too. Will make some man a jewel of a wife, if she don't go mad, or die of the hospital fever.'

To which Mary fully assented. Little she guessed, and little did her father, that it was for Grace's sake that Tom had refused her hand.

A few days more, and Grace Harvey also had gone Eastward Ho.

CHAPTER XXVII

A DIFFERENT EXPOSITION IN AN ANCIENT CHATEAU

It is, perhaps, a pity for the human race in general that some enterprising company cannot buy up the Moselle (not the wine, but the river), cut it into five-mile lengths, and distribute them over Europe, wherever there is a demand for lovely scenery. For lovely is its proper epithet, it is not grand, not exciting—so much the better, it is scenery to live and die in, scenery to settle in, and study a single landscape, till you know every rock, and walnut-tree, and vine leaf by heart, not merely to run through in one hasty steam-trip, as you now do, in a long burning day, which makes you not 'drunk'—but weary—with excess of beauty. Besides, there are two or three points so superior to the rest, that having seen them, one cares to see nothing more. That paradise of emerald, purple, and azure, which opens behind Treis, and that strange heap of old-world houses at Berncastel, which have scrambled up to the top of a rock to stare at the steamer, and have never been able to get down again—between them, and after them, one feels like a child who, after a great mouthful of juicy-apple jam, is condemned to have poured down its throat an overlasting stream of treacle.

So thought Stangrave on board the steamer, as he smoked his way up the shallows, and wondered which turn of the river would bring him to his destination. When would it all be over! And he never leaped on shore more joyfully than he did at Alf that afternoon, to jump into a carriage, and trundle up the gorge of the Isbach some six lonely weary miles, till he turned at last into the wooded cañon of the Romer-kessel and saw the little chapel crowning the central knoll, with the white high-roofed houses of Bertrich nestling at its foot.

He drives up to the handsome old Kurhaus, nestling close beneath heather-clad rocks, upon its lawn shaded with huge horse-chestnuts, and set round with dahlia, and geraniums, and delicate tinted German stocks, which fill the air with fragrance, a place made only for young lovers—certainly not for those black-petioated worthies, each with that sham of a sham, the modern tinsure, pared down to a puny storm's breadth among their bushy, well-oiled curls, who sit at little tables, passing the lazy day 'à muguetter les bourgeois' of Sarrebruck and Treves, and sipping the fragrant Josephshofer—perhaps at the good bourgeois' expense.

Past them Stangrave slips angrily, for that 'development of humanity' can find no favour in his eyes, being not human at all, but pos-sessedly superhuman, and therefore, practically, sometimes inhuman. He hurries into the public room, sizes on the visitors' book.

The names are there, in their own hand writing, but where are they?

Waters are seized and questioned. The English ladies came back last night, and are gone this afternoon.

'Where are they gone?'

Nobody recollects not even the man from whom they hired the carriage. But they are not gone far. Then servants and their luggage are still here. Perhaps the Herr Ober-Bad-meister, Lieutenant D—, will know. 'Oh, it will not trouble him. An English gentleman? Der Herr Lieutenant will be only too happy,' and in ten minutes der Herr Lieutenant appears, really only too happy, and Stangrave finds himself at once in the company of a soldier and a gentleman. Had their acquaintance been a longer one, he would have recognised likewise the man of taste and of purity.

'I can well appreciate, sir,' says he in return to Stangrave's anxious inquiries, 'your impatience to rejoin your lovely countrywomen, who have been for the last three weeks the wonder and admiration of our little paradise, and whose four days' absence was regretted, believe me, as a public calamity.'

'I can well believe it; but they are not countrywomen, of mine. The one lady is an Englishwoman; the other—I believe—an Italian.'

'And der Herr?'

'An American.'

'Ah! A still greater pleasure, sir. I trust that you will carry back across the Atlantic a good report of a spot all but unknown, I fear, to your compatriots. You will meet one, I think, on the return of the ladies.'

'A compatriot?'

'Yes. A gentleman who arrived here this morning, and who seemed, from his conversation with them, to belong to your noble fatherland. He went out driving with them this afternoon, whither I unfortunately know not. Ah! good Saint Nicholas!—for though I am a Lutheran, I must invoke him now—Look out yonder!'

Stangrave looked, and joined in the general laugh of lieutenant, waiters, priests, and bourgeois.

For under the chestnuts stunted, like him in Struclpeter, as though he were a very king of Ashantee, Salima's black boy, who had taken to himself a scarlet umbrella and a great cigar, while after him came, also like them in Struclpeter, Caspar, bretzel in hand, and Ludwig with his hoop, and all the mighty boys of Bertrich town, hooting, and singing in chorus, after the fashion of German children.

The resemblance to the well known scene in the German child's book was perfect, and as the children shouted—

'Fan kohlja brabenschwarzer Mohr,
Du Sonne schen ihm ein Ahrn,
Da nim er seinen Sonnenhelm!'

more than one grown person joined therein.

Stangrave longed to catch hold of the boy, and extract from him all news; but the blackamoer was not quite so respectable company enough at that moment, and Stangrave had to wait till he strutted proudly up to the door, and entered the hall with a bland smile, evidently having taken the hooting as a homage to his personal appearance.

'Ah? Mas' Stangrave? glad see you, sir! Quite a party of us now, among dese 'barian heathen foreigners. Mas' Thurnall he come dis mornin', gone up jekin' bush wid de ladies. He! he! Not seen him dis tree year afore.'

'Thurnall!' Stangrave's heart sank within him. His first impulse was to order a carriage, and return whence he came, but it would look so odd, and, moreover, he so foolish, that he made up his mind to stay and face the worst. So he swallowed a hasty dinner, and then wandered up the narrow valley, with all his suspicions of Thurnall and Marie seething more fiercely than ever in his heart.

Some half mile up, a path led out of the main road to a wooden bridge across the stream. He followed it, careless whither he went, and in two minutes found himself in the quaintest little woodland cavern he ever had seen.

It was simply a great block of black lava, crowned with brushwood, and supported on walls and pillars of Dutch cheeses, or what should have been Dutch cheeses by all laws of shape and colour, had not his fingers proved to them that they were stone. How they got there, and what they were, puzzled him, for he was no geologist, and finding a bench insule, he sat down, and speculated thereon.

There was more than one doorway to the 'Cheese Collar'. It stood beneath a jutting knoll, and the path ran right through so that, as he sat, he could see up a narrow gorge to his left, roofed in with trees, and down into the main valley on his right, where the Isabach glittered clear and smooth beneath red-berried mountain ash and yellow leaves.

There he sat, and tried to forget Marie in the tinkling of the streams, and the sighing of the autumn leaves, and the cooing of the sleepy doves, while the ice-bird, as the Germans call the water-ouzel, sat on a rock in the river below, and warbled his low sweet song, and then flitted up the grassy reach to perch and sing again on the next rock above.

And, whether it was that he did forget Marie awhile, or whether he were tired, as he well might have been, or whether he had too rapidly consumed his bottle of red Wylpöschmer, forgetful that it alone of German wines combines the delicacy of the Rhine with the potency of its Burgundian vinestock, transplanted to the Ahr by Charlemagne,—whether it were any of these causes or whether it were not, Stangrave fell fast asleep in the Kaiser-keller, and slept till it was dark, at the risk of catching a great cold.

How long he slept, he knew not, but what awakened him he knew full well. Voices of people approaching, and voices which he recognised in a moment.

Sabina! Yes, and Marie too, laughing merrily, and among their shriller tones the voice of Thurnall. He had not heard it for years, but, considering the circumstances under which he had last heard it, there was no fear of his forgetting it again.

They came down the side glen, and before he could rise, they had turned the sharp corner of the rock, and were in the Kaiser-keller, close to him, almost touching him. He felt the awkwardness of his position. To keep still was, perhaps, to overhear, and that too much. To discover himself was to produce a scene, and he could not trust his temper that the scene would not be an ugly one, and such as women must not witness.

He was relieved to find that they did not stop. They were laughing about the gloom, about being out so late.

'How jealous some one whom I know would be,' said Sabina, 'if he found you and Tom together in this darksome den!'

'I don't care,' said Tom, 'I have made up my mind to shoot him out of hand, and marry Marie myself. Shan't I now, my—' and they passed on, and down to their carriage, which had been waiting for them in the road below.

What Marie's answer was, or by what name Thurnall was about to address her, Stangrave did not hear, but he had heard quite enough.

He rose quietly after a while, and followed them.
